This vision caused Thunderclap almost to suffocate with rage. He reined in his horse and began to hurl insults at them from below. Colonel Hua shouted back: "General Qin, you shouldn't get so worked up. Go away and rest now; tomorrow we'll engage in a little fight to the death — your death."
"You traitor! Come down here! I'll have three hundred bouts with you right now, and then we'll see!"
Colonel Hua merely laughed. "General Qin, you're too tired. If I beat you now there's no honour in it. Go back and rest and come again tomorrow!"
Still more enraged, Thunderclap continued to shout insults up the mountain, while looking for a way up. But he feared Colonel Hua's arrows so he had to be satisfied with the insults.
At this point a cry went up among his own ranks. Thunderclap hurried down to see what was going on and found that fire arrows and blazing missiles were being hurled down in that quarter. And behind the missiles a company of crossbowmen were causing havoc. Thunderclap's troops, yelling blue murder, rushed to take cover in another part of the mountain where there was a deep ravine.
It was now past midnight. The troops were sheltering from the crossbow bolts, all complaining bitterly, when a great flood came rushing down from the head of the stream, engulfing the men and horses that were gathered there in the river bed. Each man was obliged to fight for his life. Those who managed to climb out onto the bank were immobilized by the enemy with hooked poles and carried as prisoners up the mountain. Those who couldn't crawl out drowned in the flood. Thunderclap's rage was now beyond description, it was as if his brain was melting. But just then he saw a small path leading off on one side. He urged his horse forward up this path. Before he had gone fifty paces, man and horse crashed head over heels into a concealed pit. Fifty men with hooks who were lying in ambush on either side dragged Thunderclap out, stripped him of his armour, uniform, helmet and weapons, and tied him up. Then, having rescued his horse, they transferred him and it to the Windy Mountain retreat.
Now all these tricks, of course, had been thought up by Colonel Hua and Song Jiang. First they had their men draw Thunderclap's forces this way and that, now to the east, now to the west, in order to tire them out, taking care themselves never to remain fixed in one spot. They had dammed up the waters of two streams with sandbags in advance, waiting until nightfall, then forcing the troops into the bed of the stream and releasing the pent-up waters. The resulting flood finished off Thunderclap's army. Thunderclap had brought more than five hundred troops, remember. More than half of these were overwhelmed by the flood and paid with their lives. Those who were captured alive numbered around a hundred and seventy while eighty good horses were seized, not a single one having got away. And on top of all this, Thunderclap himself was caught in the trap.
When the group who had captured Thunderclap returned to the camp it was almost dawn. The five leaders were sitting in the assembly hall. Thunderclap was brought bound before the dais. Colonel Hua immediately leapt to his feet and went to meet him, personally loosening his bonds and helping him up onto the dais, then prostrating himself before him. Thunderclap hurriedly returned the compliment. Then he said: "I am your prisoner. You could beat me to death if you wished. Why do you honour me like this?"
Colonel Hua knelt and said: "Our men didn't respect you, really they were unmannerly. Please forgive us." So saying he took clothes and gave them to Thunderclap to put on.
"That leader of yours, who is he?" Thunderclap asked.
Colonel Hua replied: "That is my friend and brother, the Yuncheng registrar, Song Jiang. And the other three are the chiefs of this stronghold, Yan Shun, Wang Ying and Zheng Tianshou."
Thunderclap said: "I know those three. But this registrar Song, would it by any chance be the person they call the Opportune Rain, Song Jiang the Just from Shandong?"
"That is correct, I am he," said Song Jiang.
Thunderclap hurriedly prostrated himself and said: "I have heard so much about you, I never expected to have the honour of meeting you here today!"
Song Jiang did not fail to return the courtesy at once.
Noticing that Song Jiang had a problem with his leg, Thunder-clap asked: "Excuse me for asking, but is there something the matter with your leg?"
Song Jiang accordingly told him his story, from the time he left Yuncheng to the occasion when Governor Liu flogged him to get a confession.
Thunderclap simply nodded and said: "We only heard one side of the story and we got things all wrong. When I get back to headquarters I will put Governor Mu-Rong in the picture."
The Dandy insisted that Thunderclap stay a few days, and to this end slaughtered buffaloes and horses for a big feast. The captured enemy soldiers were all housed at the back of the mountain retreat, and were well supplied with wine and food.
After several cups, Thunderclap rose to his feet and said: "Gentlemen, since you have been so generous as to spare my life, please return to me my helmet and armour, my horse and my weapons, and let me go back to the capital."
The Dandy replied: "General, with respect: you came from Qingzhou with five hundred men and now you've none left. How can you go back? Governor Mu-Rong is bound to hold you responsible. Wouldn't it be better to stay here a while, even if this is a God-forsaken outlaws' retreat? No doubt this place of ours is beneath your dignity, but surely it's only sensible to shelter here for a time? Everything we get here is shared between us, clothing comes in whole suits, isn't that better than going back to suffer the insults of the bigwigs?"
Thunderclap stepped down from the dais before giving his reply: "All my life I've served the Emperor, in death I shall serve him too. The court made me a general and appointed me divisional commander. I've never been given any cause for dissatisfaction. How can I become a bandit and betray the Emperor's trust? If you want to kill me, go ahead. But don't expect me ever to join you."
Colonel Hua stepped down from the dais and took him by the arm. "My respected friend, do not be angry. Let me tell you this: I too come from a line of military commanders, but like it or not I've been obliged to take refuge here. Still, if you are unwilling to become an outlaw how could we possibly force you? All we ask is that you sit down for a while till we finish eating, then we'll return your armour, helmet, horse and weapons."
Thunderclap still refused to sit down, so Colonel Hua went on: "General, you've been exhausting your strength and energy for a day and a night, you yourself are almost too tired to stand, how can your horse continue unless he's fully fed?"
When he thought about it, Thunderclap could not but agree. So he went back to the dais and sat down again to eat and drink with them. The five leaders took the cup in turn and toasted him. Thunderclap, being thoroughly tired out and unable to resist the entreaties of all of them, drank himself into a stupor and had to be helped to his bed. After that the others went about their business. Of this no more.
It was already after ten when Thunderclap awoke next morning. He leapt from his bed, performed his ablutions, and was eager to leave. The others tried to persuade him not to go: "Have some breakfast first, General. Afterwards we'll all come and see you off."
But Thunderclap was an impatient man. He couldn't wait to be off down the mountain. So they quickly organized some food and drink, then fetched him his helmet and armour and helped him dress. His horse was brought out and his wolf-tooth mace. Men were sent on with these to wait at the bottom. Then the five of them accompanied him down. When they said goodbye, his horse was brought and his weapons. Thunderclap mounted, took his mace, and taking advantage of the daylight left Windy Mountain. He travelled with all speed and reached the crossroads around noon. Far off in the distance he seemed to see a cloud of smoke and dust, but there was not a single passer-by. Thunder-clap had a premonition that something was wrong. When he reached the city walls, where there used to be a hundred dwellings, he found that all had been burnt to the ground and everywhere lay broken tiles and debris, and countless bodies of men and women.
Horrified, Thunderclap spurred his horse and cantered across this scene of desolation till he reached the city wall. When he shouted for them to open the gates, the drawbridge remained up. Troops were on the alert, with banners and flags waving and ballista missiles piled up ready. Reining in his horse, Thunderclap again shouted for them to lower the drawbridge and let him in. They had already seen it was Thunder-clap. A drum started to beat and a confused hubbub arose.
"I am General Qin," Thunderclap shouted again, "why don't you let me in?"
Governor Mu-Rong now appeared on the battlements and shouted back angrily: "You traitor, do you know no shame? Many ordinary citizens lost their lives and many houses were burnt down when you attacked us yesterday. And now you have the nerve to come here and try to tempt us into opening the gates! What a mistake the Emperor made in giving you responsibility! See how you perform your duty! But I've already sent a report to the Emperor and sooner or later you'll get your desserts, you'll be captured and cut into a thousand pieces!"
Thunderclap was outraged: "Your Honour, yesterday I lost my troops and was taken prisoner by the bandits on the mountain. I've only just managed to get free, how could I possibly have attacked the town?"
"Do you suppose I don't know that horse of yours?" the Governor replied. "And your armour, your weapons, your helmet? Everyone in the town clearly saw you inciting the bandits to kill and burn, what's the point in denying it? If you expect me to believe you were defeated and captured, how come not one of the five hundred troops came back to report? Now you've come to persuade us to open the gates so you can fetch your family. Well, we've already executed your wife. If you don't believe me, take a look at her head!"
Some soldiers held up a spear with the head of Thunderclap's wife on the end. Thunderclap was a hot-tempered man, but when he saw the head of his wife, his breath seemed to stop and his heart to shrivel up. Words failed him utterly. All he could do was curse his fate. But now ballista missiles began to rain down on him from the town walls and he was forced to withdraw.
Much of the ground was still covered in flames from fires which had not been put out. He turned his horse and cantered back over the field of debris. At first in his despair he wanted to find a place to die. He considered this for a long time, but then he gave his horse its head and galloped back the way he had come. He had not gone more than three miles when he saw a body of horsemen emerging from the forest, five leaders out in front. They were of course Song Jiang, Colonel Hua and the other three, with a couple of hundred men. Song Jiang inclined and said: "Why aren't you back in Qingzhou, General? Where are you going now, all on your own?"
Thunderclap replied angrily: "Some swine, unfit to inhabit the earth, some accursed villain who deserves to roast in hell, pretended to be me and attacked the city, destroyed people and houses, killed innocent folk and brought about the death of all my family. There'll be no escape for him now, be he in heaven or under the earth. When I find him I shall beat him till I smash this mace into smithereens."
Song Jiang said: "Calm yourself, General. You've no wife now, but don't worry. Allow me to act as a matchmaker for you. I've got something in mind already. Please come with us, it's not easy to tell you about it here. If we go back to the mountain retreat it will be easier to explain. Let us go together now."
There was little alternative but to comply, so Thunderclap returned with them to the mountain. The journey was uneventful. When they reached the gatehouse they dismounted and entered the camp. Some of the men prepared wine and food in the assembly hall and the five leaders invited Thunderclap in and gave him a place in their midst. Next all five threw themselves on their knees while Thunderclap hastily returned the compliment by kneeling also. Then Song Jiang began: "Please don't be angry with us, General. Yesterday, you remember, we were trying to persuade you to stay, and you were absolutely fixed against it. So I devised a plan. I got one of the men to make himself up like you, wearing your armour and helmet, riding your horse and carrying your mace, and attack Qingzhou, inciting the bandits to kill people. The Dandy and Short-Arse Wang reinforced them with another fifty men, and made it look as if it was you trying to get your family out. This killing and arson was intended to put paid to your idea of going back. But now we must apologize for this."
This account increased Thunderclap's anger, and he sorely wished to challenge Song Jiang and the others. At the same time, he couldn't help thinking: "In the first place, it's probably the fault of my stars, and secondly, they've let me off quite lightly, and then again, I don't know if I could actually handle them. I'd better swallow my anger." So he said: "You may have meant well when you asked me to stay, but you've done me irreparable harm in causing the death of my wife and all my family."
Song Jiang said: "But without this, how would you ever have submitted? Now that you've no wife, I know that Colonel Hua has a younger sister who is very virtuous. I will sponsor the match and provide a dowry and give you a house. What do you say?"
Thunderclap, seeing they all showed him such respect and kindness, resigned himself to going along with them. The company placed Song Jiang in the middle, Thunderclap at the head and Colonel Hua next to him and the other three in the places that befitted them. They drank to the accompaniment of loud music, and all the while discussed how to attack Windy Fort.
Thunderclap said: "Should be easy, no need for you to spend a lot of thought on it. The Tamer is my subordinate. What's more, he was my pupil in martial arts. Anyway, we've always got along fine. I'll go tomorrow and get him to open up for me. Once I'm inside, I'll tell him to surrender and join us. I can marry Hua Rong's sister and we can also take Liu Gao's wife, so you can all have your revenge and wipe the slate clean. I'll make it my joining gift, how about that?"
"That is indeed handsome of you!" said Song Jiang delightedly. "It pleases us immensely!"
When the feast broke up that day they all went to rest. They rose early next day, breakfasted and put on their uniforms. Thunderclap mounted and preceded them down the mountain. Mace in hand, he galloped towards Windy City.

Now when the Tamer had returned to Windy City, he first alerted the military authorities and posted soldiers from the camp to keep a strict watch night and day, reinforcing the guard on all the gates. He decided against making any sortie, but regularly sent out scouts, who reported no sign of reinforcements from Qingzhou. When they came to him and said that Thunderclap was outside the gates, alone, on horseback, asking for the gates to be opened, he mounted and galloped off to see for himself. Having ascertained that the rider was indeed alone, with no escort, he gave orders for the gates to be opened and the drawbridge lowered. He personally met Thunderclap and escorted him in. The latter dismounted in front of the main hall and the Tamer invited him to enter. After the exchange of courtesies, the Tamer asked: "Why have you ridden here all alone, General?"

Thunderclap first told him all about how he had lost his army, and then said: "Song Jiang the Just of Shandong, he whom they call the Opportune Rain, is truly a noble and generous man. All brave men under the sun honour and respect him. When I was on Windy Mountain recently I joined the band. You too are without family attachments, why not listen to my advice and join them too? You won't have to put up with the insolence of civil administrators."

"Since the advice comes from you, how can I not follow it?" the Tamer said. "I had not heard that Song Jiang was on the mountain. When did he arrive?"

Thunderclap laughed. "Remember that prisoner you were escorting the other day, Third Brother Zhang, the Yuncheng bandit? That was he. He was afraid to give his real name, because it might remind people of the sentence against him. That's why he called himself Zhang."

The Tamer stamped his foot. "If I'd known it was Song Jiang I'd have let him escape on the way. I knew nothing about it, I only heard Liu Gao's version. To think I nearly caused his death!"

While Thunderclap and the Tamer were talking in the hall, thinking of setting out shortly, one of the guards entered and announced: "Two columns of troops, with drums and fifes, are marching on the town."

They both leapt on their horses and rode to encounter the enemy. When they reached the town gates, they saw a great cloud of dust, a deathly cloud that obscured the sky:

2 army columns are heading for the town;
4 heroes on the mountain are coming down.

THE soldiers escorting the prisoners were armed with spears, cudgels, halberds, and swords, and were morally supported further by a band of drums and gongs. They had barely covered fourteen li when as they were approaching a big forest the soldiers in the advance halted and reported that they saw spies among the trees. But the unconvinced Huang Xin merely growled at the column for having stopped, and ordered that they should march on, and take no further notice of the supposed spying. The column had to obey, and the wood was now close at hand when suddenly about thirty gongs were sounded simultaneously among the trees, with the natural consequence that the soldiers were frightened out of their wits, and began to scatter. Huang Xin's shout, however, stopped them. "Stand firm! Fall into ranks! Magistrate Liu! You guard the prisoners."

Already, Magistrate Liu on his horse had got the wind up, and exclaimed, "May we be saved by the Goddess of Mercy from a calamity! Ai Ya! Ai Ya! I will offer a a hundred thousand scriptures, at thirty altars for the benefit of those in the afterlife. Save us! Save us!" His face became the color of a green pumpkin, and then turned yellow.

Huang Xin, being a military officer, had no fear. He whipped his horse, and dashed to the front. There he could see that there were about five hundred brigands among the trees. They were all tall, and had fierce appearances. They all wore red turbans, and short jackets, and had swords in their belts, and long spears in their hands. They had by this time surrounded his column. Then three big men sprang out of the forest. Their dress was blue, green, and red respectively, and on their turbans was the "Wan" swastika in gold. They each carried a big sword and a halberd in hand—barring the road. These were the bandit chiefs, namely 'Elegant Tiger,' 'Stunted Tiger,' and the 'White Faced Squire.' They bellowed out, "You can go no further unless you give us three thousand taels of gold."

Colonel Huang Xin shouted, "You fellows are not going to treat us in this way. The 'Supressor of Three Mountains' is here."

The three bandit chiefs glared at him, and shouted, "Even if you guarded ten thousand mountains you would have to pay just the same. You shall not pass here without payment."

"I am a Colonel on official business, so why should you expect me to pay the money?"

The chiefs laughed, "Even if the Emperor himself came this way, he would have to pay the toll. If you have no money, then you can leave the man who transacts official business as ransom with us until you raise the cash."

Huang Xin was highly infuriated by such insolence, shouted back, "You brigands! How dare you be so impudent!" Ordering the drums and gongs to be beaten so as to have a martial air, he whipped his horse and charged with his sword in hand. The chiefs defended themselves, but although Huang Xin used all his available skill and strategy he could not hold himself against the three even after ten bouts.

Magistrate Liu was at the back shivering in his shoes, and instead of helping he was seriously thinking of running away.

Huang Xin at last realized that he was in danger of being captured by these men; so turning his horse, galloped back to his soldiers with the three brigand chiefs following at his heels.

Huang Xin had no time to care for his own soldiers, but rode off by himself towards the town whence they had just come. When the soldiers saw Huang Xin leaving them there was confusion, and they left the prisoner's cart, and scattered in all directions. Magistrate Liu was soon left by himself, and seeing the hopeless position of affairs whipped his horse, and followed the rabble. But some of the brigands seeing Magistrate Liu escaping drew a rope across his track-brought his horse down, and took him prisoner.

Having released Hua Rong and Song Jiang from the cage on the cart, they stripped the clothes from Magistrate Liu and gave them to Song Jiang. The band then set out for their stronghold on the mountain with the horses as their booty, and the magistrate as their prisoner.

Now before this conflict the brigands had sent spies into Qingfeng Town, and they had duly reported that Hua Rong had been arrested, and that Huang Xin had captured Song Jiang on the road. So every road had been watched, and the ambush cleverly arranged.

The bandits reached their camp about 10 P.M. that evening, and the chiefs assembled in the hall to discuss matters. They all sat down to take dinner with Song Jiang and Hua Rong in the central seats of honor.

"I and my elder brother Song are deeply indebted to you for saving our lives and revenging our wrong. In the town however are my wife and my sister, and I am afraid that Huang Xin will now arrest them. How can we save them?"

"Colonel Hua, do not worry about that," said Yan Shun. "I think that Colonel Huang Xin will not dare touch your family. We know that even if he does, he will still have to pass along this road again. We three will go tomorrow, and bring your family here." He then ordered some of his men to go into the town, and spy what was being done there.

Hua Rong expressed his gratitude for this action.

"Let us now have the prisoner Liu Gao here," said Song Jiang.

"He is bound to a pillar on the veranda," said Yan Shun. "We will cut open his chest, and present you with his heart."

"I will do that myself," said Hua Rong.

They all went outside to the veranda. There Song Jiang reviled Liu Gao. "Previously I had no quarrel with you, so why did you foolishly listen to your wife's false statements. Now that we have caught you, what have you to say?"

"Don't ask him any questions," said Hua Rong. He opened the prisoner's breast with his sword, and cutting out the heart presented it to Song Jiang. The soldiers took away the corpse.

"We have disposed of this vile scoundrel," said Song Jiang, "but as we have not yet got his whore of a wife. My hatred of her still exists."

"Never mind, brother," said 'Stunted Tiger,' "I will go tomorrow, and get her, and she will then belong to me."

They all laughed at this. They soon finished their feast, and went to sleep.

Early the next morning they again discussed an attack on Qingfeng Town. Yan Shun said, "Our men are all tired out after yesterday's work so we had better let them rest today."

They all agreed to this as there was no particular urgency about the proposed actions.

Upon reaching Qingfeng Town Colonel Huang Xin issued an order that foot soldiers and cavalry should strengthen the guards at the four barriers outside the town. It was not a walled town. He also wrote a dispatch to Prefect Murong, and sent two express messengers with it. They reached the prefectural town during the night, but when the Prefect was informed that an urgent dispatch had arrived he at once went to the yamen to receive it. The dispatch read: "Hua Rong has rebelled, and joined the bandits on Qingfeng Mountain. It is extremely important that reinforcements should be dispatched at once to safeguard the town."

The Prefect was surprised at the news, and at once sent for General Qin Ming, commander-in-chief of the troops in the Prefecture. Now the General was a native of Kaizhou in Zhili province, and had an excitable nature. He always spoke in a very loud voice, and therefore he got the nickname, "The Thunderer."

For two generations his forefathers had been in the army. He was skilled in the use of the mace with which he could overcome even ten thousand soldiers. When he heard the Prefect's summon he at once went to the yamen. After they had exchanged the usual salutations the Prefect handed him the dispatch to read.

General Qin Ming was very angry, and said, "How dare the fellow do such a thing! Your Excellency need not worry. I will send soldiers at once. I swear that if I do not arrest those bandits I will not see you again."

"I am afraid," said Prefect Murong, "that if we delay the bandits will attack Qingfeng Town."

"I will see that action is taken immediately," replied General Qin Ming. "I will give orders this very night, and the soldiers will march off early in the morning."

The Prefect was much pleased, and at once gave orders that wine and rations for the troops should be sent outside the town, and distributed to the soldiers the following morning.

General Qin Ming went to his headquarters, and issued orders mustering one hundred horsemen and four hundred infantry for the expedition the following morning outside the town.

The Prefect went himself to a monastery outside the city, and there supervised the distribution for each soldier of two steamed buns, one jin of meat, and three bowls of wine. When this had been prepared he saw the soldiers leaving the town with a red flag bearing the name, "General Qin Commander-in-chief of Infantry and Cavalry." General Qin was with them, wearing his helmet and armor. His appearance indeed was a fine spectacle. As soon as he saw the Prefect he rode forward, and dismounted. After the usual ceremony of saluting, the Prefect presented the General with a cup of wine, and said, "Take due precautions, and quickly return with victories."

When the rations had been distributed to the troops a signal cannon was fired, and they marched off on the road to Qingfeng Town.

The bandits on Qingfeng Mountain were duly informed by their scouts of the departure of these troops, and were rather surprised at this sudden move. Hua Rong said, "Gentlemen, don't worry. There is an ancient saying, 'Urgent report of the arrival of troops demands a determination to face them even unto death.' We had better order our men to take enough food and wine, and afterwards act according to my instructions. We must first use force, and then outwit them with guile." He then whispered his plan.

"Your plan is good," said Song Jiang. "Let it be carried out."

"The men were ordered accordingly, and that day Song Jiang and Hua Rong arranged their plan. Hua Rong selected one of the best horses for himself, and put on his mailed armor and helmet. He also got in good condition his bow, arrows, and spears.

Now General Qin Ming, "the Thunderer," marched with his army until he was a few li from Qingfeng Mountain where he encamped for the night. When his troops had had their meal about 4 A.M. next morning, he ordered a cannon to be fired as a signal for a forward march. He selected an open space where the troops were spread out accompanied by the rolling of drums. Just then, however, he heard gongs being sounded on the mountain, and saw a large body of mounted bandits galloping down the mountain path. He recognized Hua Rong among the brigands, and pulling up his horse he seized his "Wolves Teeth Mace." Upon reaching the foot of the mountain a gong was again sounded, and all the mounted bandits formed themselves into ranks. Hua Rong on his horse saluted "the Thunderer."

"Hua Rong," shouted "the Thunderer," "your ancestors were military officers, and you yourself received your commission from the Emperor. You were given a salary, and commanded to guard this county, so where have you got dissatisfied? Now you join these bandits, and openly rebel against the government. I have come here to arrest you. If you are intelligent, just dismount, and be bound by ropes, and so a dirty business may be avoided."

Hua Rong laughed at this, and said, "Sir, please listen! How dare I rebel? Magistrate Liu Gao has concocted false charges against me. As he was persecuting me I had no other place for refuge than this. I request that you personally investigate the charges, and so help to clear me of the accusation."

"How long will it be before you dismount?" asked "the Thunderer." "You have made a sophisticated speech in order to demoralize my troops." He ordered the drums to be sounded, and raising his mace he advanced towards Hua Rong.

Hua Rong laughed again, "Qin Ming! Do you not understand the forbearance of a decent man? I have treated you as my superior officer, but please do not think that I am afraid of you." Thereupon he urged his horse forward, and held his spear ready for action.

They both engaged in conflict, but after about fifty rounds neither of them gained any advantage. So Hua Rong decided to make a feint, and turning his horse he galloped away down the road. "The Thunderer" was very angry at this and pursued him. Hua Rong put his spear aside, took his bow, and reined in his horse. Turning round in the saddle he shot an arrow which severed the tassel on the "Thunderer's" helmet, and it fell to the ground. This served as a warning, and "the Thunderer" being startled dared not go any further. He pulled up his horse, and turned round with the idea of dealing with the followers who had come with Hua Rong. But the bandits had all turned, and were in retreat up the mountain. Hua Rong had also now turned off the road, and was also heading for the mountain by another path.

This escape of the enemy made General Qin Ming, "the Thunderer," more angry, and he said, "These rascals are detestable." He at once gave orders for a general advance up the mountain, and the drums and gongs were beaten accordingly. The soldiers shouted as they advanced. They had not gone very far when they were assailed from above by chamber pots, bottles of lime, large boulders, and logs of wood rolled down the slope. About fifty men were killed at once, and the rest realizing their danger turned and fled. General Qin Ming was now extremely angry, but also had to retreat. About noon many gongs were beaten on another hill to the west, and he saw there another body of bandits with red flags. He led a number of his cavalry in that direction, but when they got there they could not see the flags and brigands. There was only a small track there for woodcutters, and even that was obstructed by a heap of timber and bushes. He gave order that the trees be removed, but just as his soldiers were going to do this, they heard gongs sounded on another hill to the east side, and looking across they saw bandits there with red flags.

General Qin Ming immediately rushed his cavalry to the eastern hill, but upon arriving there, there were no bandits or red flags. Again there was only a small track obstructed by loose trees and bushes. Just then a scout reported to him that there were bandits with red flags again on the western hill. General Qin Ming again galloped his cavalry to the western hill, but upon arriving there there was not a single bandit to be seen. "The Thunderer" was now mad with rage, and ground his teeth with passion. Again he heard the brigands sounding their gongs on the eastern hill, but upon going there again there was only the same result. He gave orders that a road up the mountain must be found, and one of his soldiers stepped forward, and spoke respectfully, "There is evidently no proper road here, but on the southeast side there is a good road up the mountain. If we try to find a way here I am afraid we shall be entrapped."

"We must go at once by that road," said the general. The troops were rushed in that direction, but when they reached their objective it was growing dusk so they encamped there, and went to prepare their evening meal. Just then they happened to see lighted torches upon the hill, and many gongs were being beaten.

General Qin Ming was so angry that he led about fifty cavalrymen up the mountain. They were met by a storm of arrows, and several of his men were wounded. He returned to the camp, and ordered his soldiers to get the evening meal finished as quickly as possible. The cooking fires had just been lighted when they saw about ninety bandits on the mountain who had many torches, and were blowing whistles. General Qin Ming quickly got some of his soldiers ready, and was on the point of starting when the bandits extinguished their torches. It was a cloudy night so that there was not much moonlight. General Qin Ming was still angry, and he now gave his officers orders to set the forest on fire. But before this could be done there was a sound of flutes and drums, and he saw about ten torches blazing on the top of a hill. Mounting his horse he went towards the light, and there saw Hua Rong and Song Jiang seated at a table eating and drinking. General Qin Ming reined in his horse, and shouted insults to them.

Hua Rong laughed, and said, "General Qin, you need not be so hot-tempered. Go back and rest yourself. Tomorrow we will fight again, and either you or I will be victorious."

"Rebellious bandit!" thundered General Qin Ming. "Come down, here! I will have a few hundred bouts with you now and afterwards we can discuss matters."

Hua Rong laughed, and said, "General Qin, you must be tired after today's exertions, so if I defeat you now it would not be much to my credit. Go back, and come again tomorrow."

General Qin was angrier than ever, and continued to insult them. He would have gone to look for a road up the mountain but for the fear of the arrows from Hua Rong's bow. While he was still cursing them, however, he heard a noise in his camp below. He turned his horse, and galloped back to his camp, but upon reaching there he saw that the bandits were attacking the camp with fireballs and fire arrows. In the shadows at the rear of the camp many brigands let fly a shower of crossbows. His soldiers seeing their danger were leaving the camp, and seeking shelter in the deep ditches.

It was now about 1 A.M. While his men were hiding in all kinds of hollow there was a rush of water, and they were in danger of being drowned in a mountain torrent. The bandits occupied the banks of the stream, seized the soldiers by iron hooks, and many of the latter were drowned in the water. General Qin Ming was almost crazy with anger at this, but just then he noticed a small footpath. He turned his horse into it, and went forward. He had not gone more than about fifty paces when his horse stumbled and fell into a pit. Immediately about fifty brigands armed with iron hooks appeared, and lifted up the General. They stripped him off his mail, helmet, and weapons, and binding him with ropes took him up the mountain.

All this was in accordance with the plans of Hua Rong. He had divided his men so as to entice General Qin to gallop backwards and forwards, and so exhaust his men and horses without obtaining any result. He had filled bags with earth, and dammed up the mountain stream, and then during the night forced the enemy into the stream and then released the water. Of General Qin Ming's troops about half were drowned in this way, and about two hundred were captured alive. Also about eighty fine horses were seized.

When the bandits reached their stronghold with General Qin Ming, day was just breaking. The five leaders were already seated in the main building when the brigands arrived, and brought General Qin to the hall. Hua Rong immediately jumped up from his seat, and leaving the hall went and untied the ropes binding the General. He conducted "the Thunderer" into the hall, and there kowtowed to him. The General returned the courtesy, and questioned, "I am your prisoner and you may now kill me. But why do you treat me like this?"

Hua Rong knelt down, and said, "Our men did not recognize your eminence, and have ill-treated you, we ask for your forgiveness."

General Qin Ming was presented with new uniform, and he then asked Hua Rong, "Who is this leader of these heroes?"

"This is Song Jiang, formerly a clerk in the magistrate's yamen at Yuncheng County. These other three are the leaders of this stronghold—Yan Shun, Wang Ying, and Zheng Tianshou.'"

"I know these three gentlemen," said General Qin Ming. "Is Song Jiang also known in Shandong province as 'Welcome Rain'?"

"That is I," interposed Song Jiang.

General Qin Ming saluted, and said, "I have heard of your illustrious name for a long time, but I never anticipated meeting you here today."

Song Jiang quickly returned the salute, but in his doing so General Qin Ming noticed that he limped a little so he asked what was the cause of it. Thereupon Song Jiang told him in detail his adventures from the time he lived at Yuncheng County.

General Qin Ming wagged his head, and said, "What a great many mistakes are made by listening to only one side of a case! Let me get back and tell the Prefect Murong all about this affair."

Yan Shun requested the General to stay with them for a few days. Now they at once started feasting with goat and horse meat. After a few rounds of drinking, the General arose and said, "Gentlemen and heroes, as you are so good as not to kill me I now request you to return to me my helmet, and mail, my horse, and sword, and allow me to go back to Qingzhou Prefecture."

"You are mistaken, sir," said Yan Shun. "You must remember that you have lost all your soldiers so how can you return to Qingzhou Prefecture? Would not the Prefect bring an accusation against you? It would be better if you stayed here for a few days. It is true that the accommodation at this wild spot is rather rough, but we will divide our gold and silver with you, and give you whatever clothes you require, and you will be quite safe here from the wrath of your superior officer."

General Qin Ming stepped out of the hall, and said, "While living, I am a subject of the Great Song Empire, and when dead I shall be a ghost of it. I received my commission as a General from the Emperor, and as I have been well and fairly treated how can I become a bandit, and rebel against the Emperor? You gentlemen can kill me at any time that suits your convenience."

Yan Shun came forward and persuaded general Qin Ming, "Elder brother, please listen to what I say, I am also the son of an official who received his appointment direct from the Court, but have been forced by circumstances to become a bandit. As you are unwilling to join us we request you to stay with us at least for a little time until the feast is over. I will return to you the armor, helmet, your horse and arms, and you can then go if you like."

General Qin Ming was unwilling to stay, so Hua Rong again spoke to him, "When you arrived, you were extremely tired with your previous exertions, and your horse was also wearied so that you must at least give it time to eat its fodder before you depart."

General Qin Ming thought that this was quite true, so he sat down at the feast. The five men acted as hosts, and saw that he was well supplied with wine. They treated General Qin Ming so well that it was not long before he was drunk, and they then conducted him to a room where he lay down to sleep.

He awoke about 9 A.M. the next morning, and after toilet he wished again to leave the mountain. After breakfast they gave him his armor and helmet. Men were also sent down the mountain with his arms and horse with instructions to wait there for him. The five brigand chiefs accompanied him down the mountain, and before leaving, handed him his arms and horse. General Qin Ming mounted, and rode off at great speed towards Qingzhou Prefecture.

He was only about four //from his destination, and it was about II A.M. when he saw clouds of smoke and dust in the distance. When he saw this he became suspicious as he had not met a single person on the road. As he approached the town of Qingzhou Prefecture, he saw that the suburbs were in flame. The houses were all in ruins, and among the débris were the corpses of men, women, and children.
He made his way through the ruins, but when he reached the city gate he found that the drawbridge was up, and that there were numerous soldiers on the wall armed with logs and huge boulders. He reined in his horse, and shouted, "Let down the bridge as I wish to enter the city."
The soldiers had seen him coming, and recognizing him they raised a shout, and beat their drums.
The Thunderer shouted, "I am General Qin Ming. Why do you not let me into the city?" Just then he noticed the Prefect Murong was standing at the breastwork of the wall gazing at him, and saying, "Rebellious bandit! Why are you not ashamed of yourself? Last night you came here with soldiers and attacked our town; killed many innocent people, and burnt many houses. And yet today you come again, and by deception try to get the gates opened. The Emperor has treated you well, but now you act in this ungrateful way. I have however written a memorial to the Court about your affair. Sooner or later you will be arrested, and cut into pieces."
"Your worship," shouted General Qin Ming, "I took soldiers to attack the bandits, but was defeated, and taken up the mountain as prisoner. I have just been released so how could I be here and attack the city last night?"
"Do you think that I did not recognize you by your armor, your arms, your helmet, and your horse? All the men here saw you last night directing the bandits to kill the people and burn the houses. So why do you prevaricate now? Even if you were defeated how is it that not a single one of your men returned to report the matter? Do you try to deceive my men and get the gate open so that you can see your family again? If so let me tell you that your wife and all your family were killed this morning. If you do not believe this I will have your wife's head brought here for you to look at."
The soldiers immediately putting the head on a spear held it aloft for General Qin Ming to gaze at. He was a hot-tempered man and the depth of his misery made him unable to utter a word. The archers now commenced to shoot a shower of arrows at him so he turned his horse and retreated for safety. As he returned the houses all around were still burning, and amid all this destruction he could not find a place where he could put an end to his own life. He was buried in deep thought as he rode along. He had not gone more than four //when he saw a troop of cavalry emerging from a forest, and they were led by five heroes in front. He recognized them as the five chiefs of the bandits.
Song Jiang rose in his stirrups, and saluting said, "Why do you return from Qingzhou Prefecture, sir? You are by yourself, but where are you going?"
General Qin Ming was very angry at this, and said, "I should like to know who has been in my disguise in an attack on the town, and had so many people killed, so many houses destroyed, and my own family wiped out. He is deserving of death. He has made my situation so terrible that I cannot find a way in heaven or earth to end my misery. If I find that man I will smash him into pieces with my mace."
"Sir, do not be angry," said Song Jiang. "I have a proposal to make, but this is not a suitable place to discuss it. I request you to accompany us to our mountain stronghold where I can explain it to you."
General Qin Ming saw no other way but to follow them. They said nothing on the road, but when they reached the stronghold they all dismounted, and entered the main hall where a feast was soon spread. The chiefs requested General Qin Ming to take the seat of honor. They then knelt down before him, but he immediately did the same to them.
"Sir, please excuse us," said Song Jiang. "Yesterday we tried to detain you on our mountain. But as you were determined to go so we thought of a plan, and dressed one of our bandits in your armor and helmet, gave him your mace and horse, and instructed him to lead our men to attack Qingzhou Prefecture, and kill the people there. These men were reinforced by Yan Shun and 'Stunted Tiger' who each led about fifty men, and acted as if you yourself wanted to get your wife and family out of Qingzhou Prefecture. The object of this destruction was to put an end to your desire to go back. We now confess our faults."
Upon hearing this General Qin Ming boiled with rage. He would have liked to fight with Song Jiang at once, but on second thoughts he knew that he was destined by fate to join them. Further he could not fight when they were all in such a submissive attitude, and again he was entirely by himself, and was powerless against so many. Therefore he suppressed his anger, and replied, "Though it was kind of you to detain me here yet it resulted in a great injury to me as all the members of my family were killed."
"If we had not done that," said Song Jiang, "you would not have been willing to give up all thought of returning to your family. As, however, you have no wife, now Hua Rong is willing to marry his younger sister, who would make an excellent wife, to you. What do you say to that?"
General Qin Ming was persuaded as he saw that they all meant so much respect and care for him.
They then all sat down with Song Jiang in the place of honor, and partook of the feast provided. During the meal they discussed their plans for an attack on Qingfeng Town.
General Qin Ming said, "It will be an easy task, and you need not worry about it. Huang Xin is my subordinate, and I trained him in all military matters. Also we are on good terms with each other. So tomorrow I will go, and get the town barriers opened. I will talk matters over with him, and induce him to come with me and join your band. I will bring all Hua Rong's family here, and will also arrest Magistrate Liu Gao's wife so that you will be revenged for what she did to you."
"That will be most excellent," said Song Jiang.
The following morning General Qin Ming mounted his horse, and taking his mace, went down the mountain to Qingfeng Town. At the town the barricades were well and strongly guarded by soldiers and although many scouts had been sent out, yet no news arrived of any reinforcement from Qingzhou Prefecture. When General Qin Ming arrived and demanded admittance a messenger was sent to Huang Xin who mounted his horse and hurried to the barricade. There he saw General Qin Ming by himself without even an orderly. He at once gave orders for the drawbridge to be lowered, and when General Qin Ming rode over it Huang Xin conducted him to his quarters. After the usual salutations Huang Xin asked how it happened that the General had returned by himself and unaccompanied. The General then told him how he had been defeated and now joined the bandits who were led by Song Jiang of whom he spoke very highly. He argued strongly that Huang Xin should also join the bandits, and so avoid the abuse of the civil authorities. "As you've joined the bandits, my benefactor," said Huang Xin, "I'll go with you." They discussed the whole situation and were on the point of rising when a soldier reported that large bodies of men and horses were marching upon the town. Qin Ming and Huang Xin immediately mounted their steeds, and galloped to the barricades where they saw the cloud of dust raised by the movement of large troops.

The town is invaded with troops,
While 4 chiefs descend a mountain.

133

Stone General Shi Yong Delivers a Letter at the inn in a Village Tavern; The Tamer Hua Rong Shoots a Wild Goose on the wing at the Marshes of Mount Liang

But when Huang Xin and Qin Ming went outside the gate and took a closer look they saw that one of the columns was led by Song Jiang and Hua Rong, the other by Yan Shun and Stumpy Tiger Wang, and there were about a hundred and fifty men in each. Huang Xin ordered the fort soldiers to lower the drawbridge and open the gates. He himself went forward to greet the arrivals and conduct them into the town.
Song Jiang had already instructed his men that they were not to harm any of the local people or the soldiers in the fort. Now they fought their way into the southern enclosure and killed every member of Liu Gao's family with the exception of his wife. She was taken by Stumpy Tiger Wang. The bandits loaded all of Liu Gao's gold and silver and other valuables onto carts. Liu had also had a number of horses, cattle and sheep. All of these were led away.
Hua Rong loaded onto carts the valuables in his own compound, and moved out with his wife, children and younger sister. The townspeople who had been serving in his household he bid return to their homes.
When all was in order, the brave brigands, left the town of Clear Winds and went back as a single detachment to their mountain stronghold.
Zheng Tianshou welcomed the new arrivals in Righteousness Hall. Huang Xin greeted the assembled gallants and was seated below Hua Rong. Song Jiang directed that Hua Rong's wife and children be provided with a place to rest, and that Liu Gao's property be distributed among the bandits. Stumpy Tiger Wang concealed the woman he had captured in his own quarters.
Yan Shun asked: "Where is Liu Gao's wife?"
"This time you must let me keep her as my woman," said Wang.
"You can have her. But call her out. I have something to say," said Yan Shun.
"And I want to question her," said Song Jiang.
Wang summoned the woman into the hall. Weeping, she begged for mercy.
"I saved you and let you go, you harpy! I treated you as the lady of an official," shouted Song Jiang. "Why did you stab me in the back? We've caught you now! What have you got to say for yourself?"
Yan Shun leaped from his chair. "Why bother with a hussy like her?" He pulled out a sword and cut her in two.
Stumpy Tiger was enraged. He grabbed his halberd and advanced on Yan Shun. Song Jiang quickly rose and intervened.
"Yan Shun was right to kill her, brother," he said. "You saw how, thanks to my efforts, she was allowed to leave the mountain and rejoin her husband. Yet she made a complete about-face and had him injure me. Brother, if you kept her by your side, sooner or later she would have caused trouble. I promise to find you a good wife, one who'll completely satisfy you."
"I was flunking the same thing, brother," said Yan Shun. "If we didn't kill her, one day she would harm us."
The others also spoke placating words to Wang. He listened in silence. Yan Shun ordered that the corpse be removed and the blood cleaned away, and that a feast of celebration be laid in the hall.
The next day, with Song Jiang and Huang Xin serving as sponsors, and Yan Shun, Stumpy Tiger Wang and Zheng Tianshou acting as introducers, Hua Rong's sister was wedded to Qin Ming. All gifts and furnishings were contributed by Song Jiang and Yan Shun. Feasting lasted for font of five days.
About a week after the marriage a scout came up the mountain and reported: "Prefect Murong of Qingzhou has advised the Council of Administration in writing that Hua Rong, Qin Ming and Huang Xin have rebelled, and requests that a large army be sent to annihilate them."
"We couldn't hold out long in this small stronghold," the leaders agreed. "How could we cope if we were surrounded by a big army?"
"I have an idea," said Song Jiang. "But I don't know if you gentlemen will find it suitable."
"We'd like to hear it."
"South of here is an area called Liangshan Marsh. It's about eight hundred //in circumference and embraces the Water-Girt Fortress and the Liao Er Lowlands. There, Chao Gai the Heavenly King has amassed a force of nearly five thousand men. They control the entire region. When government troops go out hunting robbers, they don't dare even look in their direction. Why don't we gather our men and horses and join their band?"
"Since there is such a place, that sounds fine to me," said Qin Ming. "But we don't have anyone to take us to them. Would they be willing to accept us?"
Song Jiang laughed. He told of the hijacking of the birthday gifts, and how Liu Tang had delivered Chao Gai's letter to him and sent him gold in thanks, and how this resulted in his having to kill Yan Poxi and flee to the gallant fraternity.
"Then you are their benefactor, brother," said Qin Ming, very pleased. "There's no time to lose. Let's get our things together quickly."
Final plans were made that day. A dozen or so carts were laden with wives, children, gold, silver, valuables, clothing and luggage, and nearly three hundred good horses rounded up. Those bandits who didn't wish to go were given silver and sent down the mountain to seek other masters. The remainder, including the soldiers Qin Ming had brought, amounted to about five hundred men. Song Jiang ordered that they divide into three contingents and set out. They were to pretend to be government troops on their way to capture Mount Liangshan.
When everything that was to be taken along was loaded on the carts, the stronghold was burned to the ground, and the expedition started down the mountain in three units. The unit led by Song Jiang and Hua Rong contained nearly fifty foot soldiers and the same number on horseback. They guarded the women and children on six or seven carts, and went first. Second was Qin Ming and Huang Xin with around ninety horses and the supply wagons. Bringing up the rear was Yan Shun, Stumpy Tiger Wang and Zheng Tianshou with fifty horses and about two hundred men. They headed for Liangshan Marsh. People seeing this large contingent of soldiers and horses on the road, observed too their banner clearly inscribed with: Official Bandit Capturing Force, and so no one dared stop them. By the end of a week, they were far from the prefecture of Qingzhou.
The forward unit, led by Song Jiang and Hua Rong was only about twenty //in advance of the units following. They arrived at a place called Twin Mountains. It consisted of two high mountains, identical in shape, with a broad post road running between. On the heights ahead they heard the beating of drums and gongs.
"Robbers!" said Hua Rong.
He fastened his spear to his saddle, took out his bow and arrows, checked them over, then put the bow back in its "flying-fish" case. After shouting for his cavalry to urge the other two units to catch up, he concentrated all his carts, people and horses together. Hua Rong and Song Jiang then went forward with twenty riders to scout the road ahead.
Before they had gone half a //they saw a company of over a hundred mounted men, in red clothing and red armor, gathered around a young warrior, also in red. His weapon levelled, he reined in his horse at the foot of the slope and shouted: "You and I are going to fight it out today, until one wins and the other loses!"
Around the bend of the mountain opposite came another hundred horsemen. These were all dressed in white, surrounding a young warrior similarly clad. He was carrying a crescent-tipped lance. This band had white banners, that band had red.
Now the banners waved, and the thunder of drums shook the earth. There was no further parley between the young men. Lances in hand they galloped forward and fought over thirty rounds on the broad road, with neither the victor. Hua Rong and Song Jiang watched in admiration from their horses, Hua Rong edging his mount closer step by step. One of the lances was hung with the tail of a spotted leopard. From the other dangled a pennant marked with golden coins. In the heat of battle, the woollen tassels decorating the weapons had become entangled, and the lances couldn't be pulled apart.
Hua Rong immediately produced his bow from its "flying-fish" case with his left hand, snatched an arrow from its animal-shaped quiver with his right, notched the shaft to the string, pulled the bow to the full, and let fly at the tangle of leopard's tail and strings of wool. The arrow clipped the wool neatly and the weapons came free. A mighty cheer welled from the throats of the two hundred watchers.
The warriors halted their combat and raced over to Song Jiang and Hua Rong. They bowed from their saddles.
"May we ask the name of the officer who shot that miraculous arrow?"
"This pledged brother of mine is Song Jiang, clerk of the Yuncheng magistracy in Shandong, and known as the Timely Rain," said Hua Rong. "I am Hua Rong, commandant of the fort at Clear Winds."
The young men stabbed their lances into the ground, dismounted and kowtowed like falling gold mountains or toppling pillars of jade.
"We have long known the fame of you both!"
Song Jiang and Hua Rong hastily got off their horses and raised up the two young men.
"Please tell us what you young warriors are called."
"I am Lu Fang," said the man in red. "My family are Tanzhou people. Because I've modelled myself after Duke Lu Bu of antiquity and have learned, like him, to use the crescent-tipped lance, people call me the Little Duke. I used to trade in medicinal herbs in Shandong, but I lost all my money and couldn't go home. So I set up as a robber on Twin Mountains. Recently, this warrior came and tried to take over. I proposed that he control one mountain and I the other, but he wouldn't agree. Every day I come down and fight him. I didn't realize that today I was fated to meet Your Excellencies."
Song Jiang then questioned the man in white, and he said: "I am Guo Sheng, from Jialing in Sichuan. I was a trader in mercury, but the wind upset my boat while crossing the Yellow River and I couldn't return home. I had learned the crescent lance from a Major Zhang in Jialing, and became quite good at it. Everyone called me the Second Rengui. I heard in the gallant fraternity that there was another lance man holding Twin Mountains and robbing, and I came here to match weapons with him. Though we've fought for more than ten days now neither can vanquish the other. But it has given us the Heaven-sent opportunity to meet you two gentlemen today!"
Song Jiang told them everything that had transpired earlier, and said: "Since we've been fortunate enough to meet, suppose we make peace between you two, how will that be?"
The two warriors were delighted, and they agreed. By then the rear units had caught up, and each bold fellow came forward and was introduced. Lu Fang invited them to his mountain lair, where he slaughtered cattle and horses and laid a feast. Guo Sheng wined and dined them the following day. Song Jiang proposed that they combine forces and go together to Mount Liangshan and join up with Chao Gai.
Both young men accepted with pleasure. They mustered their men and horses, gathered their valuables, and prepared to set forth.
"Not so fast. We can't do it this way," Song Jiang cautioned. "If we advance on Liangshan Marsh with five hundred men and mounts, their scouts will report it and they'll think we've come to capture them. That won't be any joke! Let me and Yan Shun talk to them first, and the rest of you come later. March in three units, like before."
"Brother is far-sighted," said Hua Rong and Qin Ming. "We'll proceed according to your plan. You take half a day's start. The rest of us will look after our people and horses, and follow."
With Yan Shun, mounted, and a dozen men on foot, Song Jiang rode on towards Liangshan Marsh. Noon of the second day found them travelling on the highway. They observed a large tavern ahead.
"You're tired," Song Jiang said to his men. "We'll stop and have some wine."
He and Yan Shun dismounted, told the men to loosen the horses' girths, then all entered the tavern. There were only three large tables and a few small ones. A man was sitting alone at one of the large tables. His head kerchief was knotted like a pig's snout, with expensive circlets of twisted bronze thread from Taiyuan hanging down behind. He wore a black silk tunic and had a white girdle around his waist. His legs were clad in knee-length stockings. Hempen sandals shod his feet. A short staff rested beside him, a bundle lay on the far side of the table. He was tall, sallow, clean-shaven, with protuberant cheekbones and bright eyes.
Song Jiang summoned a waiter.
"We have a large party. My friend and I will sit inside. Ask that gentleman to change his table for a smaller one, and leave the big one to my men."
"I'll attend to it."
Song Jiang and Yan Shun seated themselves inside and instructed the waiter: "First give each of our party three large bowls of wine and some meat, if you have any. Then serve us here."
The men filled the kitchen, and the waiter approached the fellow sitting alone. He looked to be some sort of police guard.
"Can I trouble you, corporal? Won't you give this large table to the party of those two gentlemen inside?"
The man bridled at this lowly form of address. "I was here first," he said irritably. "I'm not moving for any gentlemen's party!"
"He's acting pretty rude," Yan Shun said to Song Jiang.
"Let him. You mustn't go down to his level in dealing with a fellow like that." Song Jiang pushed Yan Shun back into his seat.
The man turned and looked at Song Jiang, and laughed coldly. The waiter continued his urging.
"Please help me out. What harm is there in changing a table?"
Angrily, the man pounded the table. "Varlet, who do you think you're talking to! Don't try to push me around because I'm alone. I wouldn't change for the emperor himself! If you keep yammering I'll give you a taste of my long-necked fists!"

"I didn't say anything wrong."
"A churl like you wouldn't dare!"
This was too much for Yan Shun. "You, fellow, don't act so friggin tough! If you don't want to change, forget it! Just quit your friggin bullying!"
The man leaped to his feet and grasped his short staff. "It's none of your business what I say to him! There are only two men under the heavens I respect! The rest are dirt beneath my feet!"
Angry, Yan Shun picked up a stool and lumbered forward. But Song Jiang was struck by what the man had said, and he placed himself between them.
"Neither of you start anything! Let me ask you: Who are the only two men under the heavens you respect?"
"If I told you, you'd be awe-stricken!"
"What are their names?"
"One is from Henghai County in Cangzhou, descendant of the imperial Chai family—Lord Chai, the Small Whirlwind."
Song Jiang silently nodded. "And the second?"
"Another miraculous man! Clerk of the Yuncheng magistracy in Shandong, Song Jiang the Timely Rain, Defender of Chivalry!"
Song Jiang looked at Yan Shun and smiled. Yan Shun had long since set down his stool.
"Those are the only two I have any regard for. Even the emperor of the great Song Dynasty can't scare me!"
"Not so fast," said Song Jiang. "I know those two you mentioned. Let me ask you—where did you meet them?"
"Since you know them, I won't lie. Three years ago I spent four months in Lord Chai's manor. But I've never met Song Jiang."
"Would you like to?"
"I'm searching for him right now."
"Who asked you to do that?"
"His brother Song Qing the Iron Fan has given me a letter for him from home."
Smiling, Song Jiang took the man's arm. "If fated, men come together though a thousand //apart. If not, they miss each other though they meet face to face. I am Song Jiang, the man you seek."
The fellow stared at him, then dropped to his knees and kowtowed. "Heaven ordained that I should find you, brother! I might have missed you and gone on to look for you at Squire Kong's!"
Song Jiang pulled him inside and asked: "Is something wrong at home?"
"Listen, brother. My name is Shi Yong, I'm from the prefecture of Daming. I used to run a gambling house there. Local people nicknamed me General Shi. I got into a quarrel with a fellow while gambling and killed him with one blow of my fist. I ran away and took refuge with Lord Chai. Many of the gallant fraternity there spoke of you, brother, so I went to Yuncheng to join you, but you were away. I met your younger brother, and when he heard I came from Lord Chai's manor, he said you were at Squire Kong's, on White Tiger Mountain. I told him I would go to you there, and he wrote a letter and asked me to deliver it to you. 'When you find my brother,' he said, 'tell him to come home at once.' "
Worried, Song Jiang asked: "How many days did you stay at our manor? Did you see my father?"
"I just spent one night, then left. I didn't see the old gentleman."
Song Jiang told him of their plan to go to Liangshan Marsh. Shi Yong said: "After I left Lord Chai's I heard of you often from men of the gallant fraternity, how generous and upright you are, how you help those in difficulty and danger. If you're joining the band on Mount Liangshan you must take me with you."
"That goes without saying. What's one man more? Come and meet Yan Shun."
Song Jiang told the waiter to pour. After the three had drunk, Shi Yong got the letter from his bundle and handed it to Song Jiang. The clerk looked at it. The envelope was sealed the opposite of normal, and it was not inscribed with the usual "All's well." Song Jiang's anxiety increased. He tore open the envelope and read the letter. It concluded with:

... Early in the first lunar month father died of illness. He is still lying in his coffin at home. We are waiting for you to return so that we can bury him. Please return immediately, do not delay!
In sorrow, your younger brother,
Qing

Song Jiang cried out in anguish and beat his chest. "Unfilial son that I am! How badly I've behaved! He is dead and I am not there to perform my duties as a son! I'm no better than a beast!" He beat his head against the wall and lamented. Yan Shun and Shi Yong put their arms around him, and he wept till he was dazed. It was some time before he recovered.
"Don't take it so hard, brother," the other two urged.
"I'm not without feeling for our men," he said at last, "but my old father was the one I loved best. Now he's gone. I must return home tonight. Tell our brothers to go up the mountain themselves."
"Brother," said Yan Shun, "the old gentleman is no more. Even if you went home, you wouldn't see him alive. All parents die. Take a long-range view. Lead us to the stronghold, and then I'll accompany you back for the funeral. It won't be too late. 'Without a head a snake can't travel,' as the old saying goes. They'll never let us in if you're not with us."
"It would delay me for days. I can't do it. I'll write a letter in detail, telling the whole story. Take Shi Yong with you. When the others catch up, go together up the mountain. It would be different if I hadn't heard about my father's death. But since Heaven has let me know, every day seems like a year. I'm burning to get back! I don't want my horse and I don't need anybody to go with me. I'll travel alone through the night and be home tomorrow."
Nothing Yan Shun and Shi Yong said could make Song Jiang change his mind.
He had the waiter bring pen and paper and, weeping, he wrote the letter, exhorting the stronghold leaders to accede to his wishes. Then he handed the missive, unsealed, to Yan Shun. He borrowed Shi Yong's hemp sandals, concealed some silver on his person, hung a sword at his waist, and took Shi Yong's short cudgel. Song Jiang wouldn't pause even long enough to let food and wine touch his lips. He walked directly through the door.
"Brother, wait at least till you've seen Qin Ming and Hua Rong. There'll still be time," urged Yan Shun.
"I won't wait. Just take my letter and everything will go smoothly. Brother Shi Yong, please explain to our brothers about my father's death, and ask them to forgive me for leaving in such haste."
Song Jiang regretted only that he couldn't get home in one bound. Alone, he flew off down the road.
Yan Shun and Shi Yong drank some wine, ate some tidbits, and paid the bill. Shi Yong took Song Jiang's horse and they proceeded with the men another four or five //till they came to a large inn. There, they put up for the night.
The next day, by mid-morning, the rest of the expedition arrived. Yan Shun and Shi Yong told about Song Jiang's rushing home for the funeral of his father. The other leaders berated Yan Shun.
"Why didn't you keep him here a while?"
"He wanted to kill himself when he heard his father died," Shi Yong explained. "Nobody could prevent him from leaving. He was in a tearing hurry. He's written a detailed letter of introduction and wants us to go on ahead. He says when they see the letter, there won't be any problem."
Hua Rong and Qin Ming read the missive. "This has happened while we're on the march. Whether we go forward or retreat, we're going to have difficulties," they said. "We can't go back, we can't split up. The only thing we can do is advance. Let's seal the letter and bring it to the leaders on the mountain. If they won't accept us, that will be the time to discuss what to do next."
The nine bold gallants, marching together, pressed on with their band of five hundred men and horses towards Liangshan Marsh. As they travelled along a broad road through a reedy section, the beat of drums and gongs rang out across the water. Suddenly the slopes and the meadows were alive with colored flags and pennants. Two quick craft shot out to the center of the lake. The first was manned by forty or fifty bandits. Seated on the prow was Panther Head Lin Chong, their chieftain. On the second craft was the same number of bandits, and on its prow sat another leader, Liu Tang the Red-Haired Demon.
Lin Chong hailed the marchers: "Who are you churls? Which official's army? Do you think you can capture us? We'll kill every one of you! Not a man will be left alive! You ought to know the reputation of Liangshan Marsh!"
Hua Rong and Qin Ming got off their horses and stood on the shore. "We're not government troops," they called. "We have a letter here from our brother Song Jiang, the Timely Rain, of Shandong. We've come to join you!"
"Since it's brother Song Jiang who's written, please go on ahead to the tavern of Zhu Gui. Show him the letter and then we can meet."
A black flag on Lin Chong's boat waved, and a little craft with three fishermen glided out of the reeds. One remained in the boat and two came ashore.
"You officers come with us," they said.
A white flag waved on one of the two larger craft, and they sailed on, to the crash of gongs. The newcomers gazed around in astonishment. "No wonder government troops don't dare interfere here. Our little mountain stronghold could never compare!"
Following the two fishermen, they made a wide sweep and arrived at the tavern of Zhu Gui the Dry-Land Crocodile. Zhu Gui greeted them, ordered the slaughter of two yellow oxen, and wined and dined his guests.
He read the letter, then led them to a pavilion overlooking the water and shot a whistling arrow into the reeds on the opposite shore. A little craft sped over. Zhu Gui gave the bandit boatman the letter and directed him to deliver it to the stronghold. Then, in the inn, he feted the nine chieftains with pork and mutton. Places of rest were provided for the men and horses, and all retired.
At mid-morning the next day the bandits' military advisor Wu Yong arrived at the inn. Each of the chieftains was introduced and courtesies were exchanged. Wu questioned them carefully. Then nearly thirty large boats came. Wu Yong and Zhu Gui invited the nine chieftains to board. The wives, children, carts, men, horses and belongings were all also loaded on the various craft.
They sailed to the Shore of Golden Sands, and there disembarked. Through the pines a host of gallant men, headed by Chao Gai and accompanied by drums and musical instruments, advanced to greet them. The nine chieftains were provided with horses and sedan-chairs and were conducted into the stronghold to Righteous Fraternity Hall. There they were seated, facing their hosts, in opposite rows.
In the armchairs on the left were Chao Gai, Wu Yong, Gongsun Sheng, Lin Chong, Liu Tang, Ruan the Second, Ruan the Fifth, Ruan the Seventh, Du Qian, Song Wan, Zhu Gui, and Bai Sheng the Daylight Rat. (Several months before, he had escaped from the prison in Jizhou, fled to Mount Liangshan and joined the band. Wu Yong had sent someone to bribe the jailors.)
In the armchairs on the right were Hua Rong, Qin Ming, Huang Xin, Yan Shun, Wang Ying, Zheng Tianshou, Lu Fang, Guo Sheng, and Shi Yong.
Fragrant incense was lit in a burner between the rows, and both sides vowed loyalty. That day they celebrated joyously. Steers and horses were slaughtered, and a banquet was laid. The newly arrived rank and file respectfully greeted the stronghold leaders outside the hall, then joined the lesser officers in a feast. Living quarters on the rear of the mountain were provided for the wives and children.
Qin Ming and Hua Rong, at the dining-table, praised Song Jiang's many virtues, and told how he was avenged on Clear Winds Mountain. The leaders heard this with delight. They related how Lu Fang and Guo Sheng fought with lances and how Hua Rong, with a single arrow, sliced the tangled woollen tassels and freed their weapons.
Chao Gai didn't believe it. "Can he really shoot so accurately?" he asked. "I'd like to see it some day."
All imbibed wine till they were half drunk, and many food courses had been served. "Let's stroll for a while on the front of the mountain," the hosts suggested, "and then come back for more."
With each politely begging the other to go first, hosts and guests went down the stairs and wandered about admiring the scenery. When they reached the third entry guarding the stronghold, lines of geese honked by overhead.
Hua Rong thought: "Chao Gai is sceptical about my shooting the woollen tassels apart. If I don't show what I can do, in the future they won't respect me."
He looked around. One of the attendants accompanying them carried a bow and arrows. Hua Rong asked the man for his bow. It was a fine weapon, with a gold grip incised with magpies, and suited perfectly to his taste. He quickly selected a good arrow.
"Some of you didn't seem to believe the story about my shooting the tangled tassels apart," he said to Chao Gai. "A flight of geese is coming this way. I don't want to boast, but I'm going to put this arrow through the head of the third goose in line. Don't laugh at me if I miss."
He notched the arrow to the string, pulled the bow to the full, aimed, and sent the feathered shaft winging into the sky. Sure enough, it hit the third bird and brought it tumbling to the slope below. Some soldiers were sent down after it. They returned with the goose, the arrow cleanly transfixing its skull.
Chao Gai and the others were amazed. They called Hua Rong the General with Miraculous Arms.
"None of the great bowmen of antiquity could match him," said Wu Yong. "We're very fortunate to have him with us!"
From that day forward Hua Rong was respected by one and all in Liangshan Marsh. Now, they returned to the hall and feasted until late, after which, everyone retired.
The next day there was another banquet, and the order of precedence among the leaders was decided. Originally, Qin Ming was before Hua Rong. But because he had married Hua Rong's younger sister he had to rank below him, in the sixth place, while Hua Rong took the fifth chair, right after Lin Chong. Liu Tang was seventh, Huang Xin eighth, followed by the three Ruan brothers, then Yan Shun, Stumpy Tiger Wang, Lu Fang, Guo Sheng, Zheng Tianshou, Shi Yong, Du Qian, Song Wan, Zhu Gui and Bai Sheng, in that order, a total of twenty-one leaders.
When the feasting and celebration had ended, more large boats and carts were built within the fortress area. Spearheads and other weapons were forged, armour and helmets made, banners, clothing, bows and arrows put in order. The men of Mount Liang were preparing to repel government troops. Of this no more need be said.

Song Jiang travelled all night after leaving the tavern, and reached his own village late the following afternoon. He stopped to rest at the wine shop run by a ward chief named Zhang, who was on good terms with Song Jiang's family. Zhang observed his sorrowful expression and tear-filled eyes.
"You've been away for half a year, but today, fortunately, you've come home. Why are you looking so dejected? You ought to be happy. A general amnesty has been declared. Your crime surely has been reduced."
"That may be true, uncle, but it's only of secondary importance. How can I help being distressed since my old father has passed away?"
Zhang laughed. "You're jesting. He was here drinking a short time ago. He's just gone back. Why are you talking like that?"
"Don't make fun of me, uncle." Song Jiang showed him the letter. "My brother Song Qing has written here very plainly: Our father died early in the first lunar month. He urges me to come home and attend the funeral."
"Nonsense. Nothing of the sort. He was drinking here at noon with Squire Wang of East Village. I wouldn't lie."
Song Jiang didn't know what to say. His mind was filled with doubt. He thought for a long time. When it began getting dark, he said goodbye to the ward chief and hurried home. He entered the manor gate. All was peaceful. Vassals greeted him respectfully.
"Are my father and brother here?" he asked.
"The squire has been wearing out his eyes, looking for your return," they said. "How fortunate that you've come back. He's just returned, himself. He was drinking with Squire Wang at Zhang's wine shop in the village. He's having a nap inside."
Song Jiang was astonished. He threw aside the short cudgel and hurried into the thatched house. His younger brother Qing, seeing him, dropped to his knees and kowtowed. He was not wearing mourning. Song Jiang was enraged.
"How dare you, you monster! Father is alive and well. How could you write such a lying letter? I was ready to kill myself. I wept till I lost my senses. What sort of unfilial son are you!"
Before Song Qing could reply, Squire Song rounded a screen and emerged. "Calm yourself, son," he said. "It's not your brother's fault. I was thinking of you every day, and I told him to write saying I had died, knowing that would bring you home quickly. I heard there are many robbers on White Tiger Mountain. I was afraid you might be inveigled into joining them and become a disloyal, unfilial person. So I sent the letter calling you home. When Shi Yong arrived from Lord Chai's place, he was deputed to deliver it. The idea was mine entirely. It had nothing to do with your brother. Don't blame him. I've just come back from Zhang's wine shop and was lying down inside when I heard that you'd returned."
Torn between happiness and anger, Song Jiang kowtowed to his father. "Have you heard anything lately about the status of my case?" he asked. "An amnesty has been proclaimed. The charges against me are sure to be reduced. Ward Chief Zhang says the same thing."
"Before your brother Qing came home, Constables Zhu Tong and Lei Heng did a lot for you. A 'Wanted' poster was put up, but no one came around to trouble me. Why have I summoned you home? The emperor has named his heir to the throne, and in celebration has issued a general amnesty. Charges on all major criminal acts have been lessened by one degree. The edict is already in force. If you were brought before a judge now, at worst you would be exiled, but you no longer could be punished by death. So let them do what they will. We'll find some way to cope."
"Have Constables Zhu Tong and Lei Heng called here at the manor?"
"I heard the other day that they've been sent out on missions," said Song Qing. "Zhu Tong has gone to the Eastern Capital. I don't know where Lei Heng's been sent. But two new police officers have been added in the county town, both named Zhao."
"You've had a long, hard journey, son," said the old squire. "Why not go to your room and rest."
It was a happy family reunion. Of that we'll say no more.
At dusk, the jade-rabbit moon appeared in the east. Less than a single watch later everyone in the manor was asleep. Suddenly, a loud clamor arose at the front and rear gates. On all sides torches surrounded the manor, and voices shouted: "Don't let Song Jiang get away!" The old squire, hearing this, cried out bitterly.
And as a result, gallant heroes gathered on the bank of a river, in a market area loyalty and courage were manifested to the full.

When Thunderclap Qin Ming and Huang Xin, the Tamer of Three Mountains stood at the gates looking out, they saw the two approaching columns were almost upon them. In fact, one column was led by Song Jiang and Colonel Hua, the other by Yan Shun, the Dandy, and Short-Arse Wang. In each there were more than a hundred and fifty men.
The Tamer at once ordered the guards to lower the drawbridge and open the gates, and both columns entered the town. Song Jiang had already issued an order: no citizen was to be touched, no soldier harmed. But the southern barracks was to be reduced and Liu Gao's family all executed.

Short-Arse first seized Liu Gao's wife for himself. The troops then loaded all the property — money, valuables and other goods — onto carts. Buffaloes and sheep were also appropriated in large numbers. Colonel Hua went to his own residence and loaded his valuables and other items onto carts and picked up his wife and younger sister. There were some local servants who were all sent home. When all the leaders had packed their things, a column of men and horses moved out of Windy City and headed for the mountain.

Carts, people and horses having arrived in the camp, Whitey Zheng Tianshou invited everyone to meet in the hall. The Tamer, after he and the others had paid their respects, seated himself one place down from Colonel Hua. Song Jiang gave orders for a residence to be prepared for Colonel Hua's family and Liu Gao's possessions to be divided up equally among the troops.

By now Short-Arse had secreted the woman in his own house. "Where is Liu Gao's wife?" the Dandy asked him.

"This time you've got to let me have her as my slave," replied Short-Arse.

"Have her if you want her," the Dandy said, "but bring her here now because I've got something to say."

"And I want to question her too," said Song Jiang.

When Short-Arse brought her in, the woman wept and pleaded.

"You shameless hussy," Song Jiang shouted. "I rescued you because you were the wife of an official, why did you repay me with lying accusations? You're our prisoner now, what have you got to say for yourself?"

The Dandy sprang forward and said: "What's the good of asking her, the filthy bitch?" With that he drew his sword and with one cut severed her head from her body.

Short-Arse, seeing his woman decapitated, was furious. He snatched up a halberd and was about to attack the Dandy, but Song Jiang and the others intervened.

"Yan Shun was right to kill the woman," Song Jiang said. "Look what happened before, when I told you to free her and let her be reunited with her husband. It didn't stop her turning round and asking her husband to do me in. My friend, if you had kept her by you, sooner or later you'd have come to regret it. Anyway, I'm going to find you a better one, someone who will prove entirely satisfactory."

"That's exactly what was in my mind," said the Dandy. "If I hadn't killed her, it wouldn't have been any good, sooner or later she would have done us serious injury."

They were all trying to talk him round but Short-Arse remained silent. The Dandy told some men to remove the corpse and clear up the blood, and a celebration feast was prepared.

Next day with Song Jiang and the Tamer as sponsors and the Dandy, Short-Arse and Whitey as witnesses, a marriage was arranged between Thunderclap and Colonel Hua's younger sister. The dowry was provided by Song Jiang and the Dandy. There was feasting for four or five days.

About a week after the wedding, a scout got wind of something and came up the mountain to report: "There's a rumour that Governor Mu-Rong of Qingzhou has sent a report up to the Emperor saying that Colonel Hua, Thunderclap and the Tamer are in rebellion. They say a big force is being raised to destroy them and sweep Windy Mountain clean."

The leaders, when they discussed the news, were all agreed: "This place is too small. We can't afford to become too attached to it. If a big force is sent, they've only got to surround us and then what can we do?"

"I've a proposal," said Song Jiang. "But I don't know if it will meet with your approval."

"Let's hear what it is," they all said.

"There's a place to the south of here," Song Jiang said, "called the Marshes of Mount Liang. It's a hundred leagues in circumference. There, in the Place of Many Meanderings and in Duckweed Marsh, Leader Chao Gai has assembled a company of almost five thousand, foot and horse. In their home in the marshes the government troops and anti-banditry forces dare not meet them face to face. Why don't we marshal our men and go to join them?"

"If this place exists it sounds ideal," said Thunderclap. "The only thing is, without an introduction are they likely to receive us?"

Song Jiang responded happily by telling them the story of the birthday convoy and its treasure. He told also of the letter Liu Tang delivered and the gift of gold and how this led to the death of Yan Poxi and his taking refuge with the outlaws.

Thunderclap was quite excited. "In that case those people owe you a favour," he said. "We should waste no time. Let's pack up and leave at once."

So it was decided. A dozen carts were procured. Onto them were loaded families, valuables, clothing, baggage and other items. The horses, around three hundred of them, were to be taken along. Some of the men did not want to go: they were given silver and told they were free to leave. Those who did want to go were incorporated with Thunderclap's soldiers into an army four or five hundred strong. Before they left, Song Jiang divided them into three columns. They were to pose as government troops sent to subdue Mount Liang.

When these preparations were completed and all the carts loaded, the barracks was razed to the ground. The three columns then set off. Song Jiang and Colonel Hua led off with fifty foot soldiers and fifty cavalrymen, closely guarding six or seven carts and the families. Thunderclap and the Tamer followed with ninety horses and the provision carts. The Dandy, Short-Arse and Whitey brought up the rear with fifty horses and two hundred men. Thus they all left Windy Mountain and took the road for Mount Liang. Anyone who met them on the road could see clearly displayed the banners proclaiming that they were government troops sent to suppress bandits, for which reason no one dared interfere with them. After travelling nearly a week they had put a considerable distance between themselves and Windy Mountain.

Now between Song Jiang and Colonel Hua, riding at the head of the first column, which also incorporated the carts bearing the families, and the last group of men and horses there was a distance of six or seven miles. The leaders had now arrived at the place called Twinhills. Here there are two hills, identical in shape, with a broad stretch of the highroad running between them. As the two leaders proceeded, they heard gongs and drums from the hillside up ahead.

"There must be bandits ahead," said Colonel Hua, stopping suddenly and taking out his bow, which he tested and then put back in its case. Ordering the cavalrymen behind to stop the carts, Song Jiang and Colonel Hua rode forward with a score of horsemen to reconnoitre.

Less than a quarter of a mile further on they came upon a group of horsemen, perhaps a hundred of them, surrounding a young warrior. Here's how this young fellow was dressed:

On his head a three-cornered cap, with gold badge and jade pin; for dress, an embroidered coat, richly decorated with a bold pattern of flowers; armour like the scales of a fire dragon, a belt fastened with an agate clasp. He rides a charger like a dragon smeared with red grease and wields a halberd with carved red shaft and squarish blade. Behind him every single one of his followers is clad in red, both coat and armour.

This young stalwart also carried a halberd with a square blade and a carved shaft. So on one side it was all plain white banners and on the other all flaming red. Then on each side a flag dipped, one red, the other white, and amid rolling drums and musical flourishes the two riders without a word levelled their lances, spurred their horses and joined battle, each striving for victory. Colonel Hua and Song Jiang reined in their horses to watch. What a ferocious contest it was!

The pennants flutter, garments float in the wind. Like whisps of flying cloud brushing the earth reflecting red shadows, like fires sweeping through the grass in the light reflected from snow. Like in the winter garden the red tea flower vying with the white plum, like in lush spring gardens the pear's powder contending with the peach's rouge. The one turned toward the south and the heat of the sun, like a red stove whose flames lick at the sky. The other oriented to the west and Venus, like Mount Tai dipping its head into the jade well.

The two of them wielding their square halberds fought more than thirty bouts and victory inclined neither way. Colonel Hua and Song Jiang began to applaud. As Colonel Hua gradually edged his horse forward to see better, he realized that the two contestants were on the brink of a deep ravine.

Now each of the halberds was adorned near the tip with a decorative tassel, one in the form of a leopard's tail, the other a multi-coloured streamer, and in one of their encounters these threads became entangled. Try as they might they could not separate their weapons.

When Colonel Hua saw this he steadied his horse and with his left hand took his bow from its case, whilst with the right he took an arrow from the quiver and fitted it to the string. Stretching the bow to its fullest extent, he aimed carefully at the leopard's tail and the point where the strings were entangled, and loosed the arrow. With just the one shot he cut the entangled strings and immediately the two weapons flew apart. Two hundred men watching exclaimed in admiration.

The two warriors stopped fighting and galloped towards Song Jiang and Colonel Hua. Bowing deeply in salute, they asked: "May we please inquire the archer's name?"

Colonel Hua replied: "This famous fellow is the Yuncheng registrar Song Jiang the Just of Shandong, otherwise known as the Opportune Rain. I am Hua Rong, commander of Windy Fort." When they heard this the two young men stuck their halberds in the ground, dismounted and threw themselves down before Song Jiang and Colonel Hua saying: "These names are known far and wide!" Song Jiang and Colonel Hua also dismounted and raised them up, saying: "Please tell us your names." The one in red said: "My name is Lü Fang. I am from Tanzhou. Because Lü Bu was always my hero I studied the use of the square halberd and everyone calls me the Little Duke. I was selling medicines in Shandong, but I lost my capital and was unable to return home. So for the time being I set up as a robber here at Twinhills. Recently this fellow came along and wanted to seize my hideout. He could have had just one of the hills, but no, that wasn't good enough for him, so every day we come here and fight it out. But what I never dreamt was that I was destined to meet you here today!"

Song Jiang then asked the one in white his name. "I am Guo Sheng," he said, "from Jialing in Xichuan. I was a trader in mercury, but I lost everything in a storm on the Yellow River and couldn't return home. I had learnt the use of the square halberd from Major Zhang in Jialing and because I was pretty handy with it people called me the Halberdier. I heard from the rivers and lakes fraternity that someone who could use the square halberd had occupied this site at Twinhills so I came here to measure my skill against his. We've been fighting for ten days now, but neither of us has had the advantage. But what a surprise to meet you here today! I count it a blessing from heaven!"

Song Jiang now recounted the previous events and then said: "Since we have met, will you allow me to make peace between you" The two consented willingly. As the poem says:

A mere brass chain, to beat apart hard steel,
That's quite a feat.
An arrow tip, to separate two blades,
It's also pretty neat.
But let me tell you this, and don't you doubt it:
The firmness of a hero's mind can split
The toughest metal — there's no two ways about it.

The others had now come up with them and were duly introduced. L? Fang invited them all to his mountain retreat, where oxen and horses were slaughtered for a feast. The next day it was Guo Sheng's turn to provide the entertainment. Song Jiang suggested they should both enlist and go with the company to Mount Liang to join Chao Gai's band of robbers. The young men were over the moon at this suggestion and agreed at once. When their two forces had been mustered and their possessions collected they were ready to leave at once. But Song Jiang said: "Wait a minute, we shouldn't travel like this. If we all go together to Mount Liang, there's five hundred or so of us and they'll have scouts outwatching on all sides. Suppose they think we really are an anti-bandit force? That wouldn't do at all! Let Yan Shun and me go first and tell them. The rest of you can follow later, still in your three columns."

"You think of everything," Colonel Hua and Thunderclap said admiringly. "That's the best plan. We can start at intervals. You start half a day earlier. We'll marshal our forces and follow."

We shall leave the others at Twinhills, preparing to set out at intervals and we shall go along with Song Jiang and the Dandy, riding off with a dozen men as an advance party to Mount Liang. They rode for two days. Then, having travelled till noon, they found a large winehouse beside the road. Song Jiang said: "The men are all tired, let's stop for some wine before going on." So the two leaders dismounted and went into the shop, telling the men to loosen their saddle girths and follow.

Inside they found that there were only three large tables and a few small ones. One of the large tables was already occupied by one man. He was very tall, and had a sallow complexion and angular cheekbones, lively eyes and a sparse growth of hair on his chin. Song Jiang called the landlord over and said: "We're a large group. The two of us will go and sit inside there, if that's all right. Please ask that customer to move to another table and leave the big one free for our men to have a few drinks."

"I'll arrange it," the landlord said.

Song Jiang and the Dandy went and sat inside and ordered the wine. The men were to have large bowls, three bowls each, and if there was meat they would buy some for everyone, but first pour the wine. The landlord, seeing the group had filled all the seats around the stove, went over to the customer, who looked pretty much like a policeman, and said: "Sorry to trouble you, constable, but would you mind moving to leave this big table for the men belonging to those two officers inside?"

The man took exception to the form of address and protested angrily: "I thought it was supposed to be first come first serve! Who cares about some bloody officers' men? Want to change places, do they? Well, I bloody well won't!"

The Dandy reacted angrily: "Do you hear how rude he is?" he said to Song Jiang. Song Jiang restrained him, saying: "Let him be! Don't stoop to his level."

The man turned his head and gave Song Jiang and the Dandy a very dirty look.

The landlord said anxiously, "Sir, please have a regard for my business. I don't see anything wrong with changing places."

The man began to swear. He struck the table and said: "You bloody so-and-so, you don't know anything, you think because I'm on my own you can browbeat me into changing places. Well I wouldn't bloody move it was for the Emperor himself. If you don't buzz off, you'll get acquainted with my fists!"

The landlord said: "What have I said to upset you?"

"You wouldn't dare say anything to upset me," the man said.

This was all too much for the Dandy, who said: "You're really too big for your boots. If you don't want to change, all right. But just stop throwing your weight around."

The man leapt to his feet, grabbed his staff and answered: "If I choose to tell him off, what's it to do with you? There's only two people in the world I'd listen to, the rest I rate no higher than the mud under my feet."

The Dandy was furious. He picked up a stool and was about to hit the other with it, but Song Jiang, finding something remarkable in the fellow's manner of speech, stepped between them and said soothingly: "There's no need to fight. I'd like to ask you, those two people you'd listen to, who are they?"

"You'll get a shock if I tell you," the other said.

"Tell me their names."

"One is a descendant of Emperor Chai, that's Chai Jin, the Little Whirlwind."

Song Jiang nodded to himself and said: "And who's the other?"

"The other's also a great gentleman. He's the Yuncheng registrar, Song Jiang of Shandong, known as the Opportune Rain."

Song Jiang gave the Dandy a surreptitious smile. But the Dandy had already put the stool down.

"Those two aside," the man went on, "I'm not afraid of anyone, not even the Emperor himself."

"Hold on," said Song Jiang. "Let me ask you another question. Both the gentlemen you mentioned are known to me. Where did you meet them?"

"You know them, do you? Well, I'll tell you no lies. Three years back I stayed more than four months at Mr. Chai's. Only I never met Song Jiang."

"Would you be interested to meet Blackie, then?" Song Jiang asked.

"I'm on my way to find him right now," said the other.

"Who told you to look for him?"

"His younger brother, Song Qing, alias Iron Fan. He gave me a letter for him."

This delighted Song Jiang. He took the other by the arm and said: " 'If fate decrees a meeting a thousand miles are nought, if it's not destined you'll miss what's right next door.' I am Song Jiang, whom men call Blackie!"

The man took a good long look and then threw himself down, saying: "Heaven be praised for this meeting. It could all so easily have gone wrong. I'd have gone all the way to Squire Kong's for nothing!"

Song Jiang now took him inside and asked: "Is anything wrong at home?"

"Let me tell you," he said. "My name is Shi Yong and I'm from Daming. I used to run a gaming house and locally I was known as the Guv. But I hit a man at the tables and killed him so I had to run. I took refuge at Mr. Chai's. I was always hearing about you from the rivers and lakes people who came by and I went to Yuncheng to find you, but they told me you'd had to leave. I met your younger brother and when he heard I'd come from Mr. Chai's he told me you were at Squire Kong's estate on White Tiger Mountain. Seeing I was so keen to meet you he gave me a letter to deliver to you at Squire Kong's. He said if I saw you to tell you to go home at once."

This worried Song Jiang. "How long did you stay at my house?" he asked. "Did you see my father?"

"I was only there the one night. I didn't have time to see the Squire before I left."

Song Jiang now told Shi Yong about the plan to go to Mount Liang.

Shi Yong said: "I've been hearing about you all the time from the rivers and lakes fraternity ever since I left Mr. Chai's, about your valour and generosity, how you help the needy and succour the poor. If you're going there to join the outlaws please take me along, you must!"

"Certainly I will, one more is nothing. Come now and meet the Dandy." Song Jiang told the landlord to pour three cups. After they'd drunk, Shi Yong pulled the letter out of his pack and gave it to Song Jiang, who noticed at once that the envelope had been sealed upside down and without the customary message "in peace." He became even more worried. He hurriedly tore it open and read. Half-way through he came to these words: Father became ill at the beginning of February and has now passed away. He is still lying in his coffin at home; we are waiting for you to return home for the funeral. Please, please do not delay! Your grief-stricken brother, Song Qing.

Song Jiang gave a stricken cry and almost passed out when he read this. His heart was pounding and he began to revile himself in this fashion: "Unfilial, contrary son, how ill you have acted! Your old father is dead and you couldn't act like a human son, you're no better than an animal!" He began to knock his head against the wall and weep loudly. The Dandy and Shi Yong did their best to restrain him. But he went on weeping wildly and it was a long time before he came to his senses. "Don't be so hard on yourself, brother," the other two kept urging.

"Don't think I'm unfeeling or wish to let you down," Song Jiang said to the Dandy. "It's just that I can't help thinking of my father; now he's gone I must hurry back this very night, so you'll just have to go on to Mount Liang by yourselves."

"Brother, since your father is no more, even if you do return home you won't be able to see him," said the Dandy. "Everyone's parents must die, you must try to accept it. Take us there first and afterwards I'll accompany you home to the funeral. That'll be time enough. You know the old saying, 'A headless snake can't walk.' If we go without you it's most unlikely they'll let us stay."

"But I'll lose too much time if I take you there first, I can't accept that. I'll write a detailed letter for you explaining everything. You can take Shi Yong along too, when the rest catch up you can all join them on the mountain together. I didn't know about my father's death until now. But now that heaven has chosen to inform me, a day seems like a year and I'm on fire with impatience. I don't need my horse or any attendants, but I must hasten home this very night." There was nothing the Dandy and Shi Yong could do to persuade him not to leave.

Song Jiang asked the waiter for brush, inkstone and paper, and wrote a letter, in which he repeatedly urged their case, weeping while he wrote. He put the letter in an envelope without sealing it, and handed it to the Dandy. He borrowed Shi Yong's sandals with eight eyelets, stored some silver on his person, buckled on a sword and took Shi Yong's short staff. Refusing to touch food and drink, he wanted to leave at once. The Dandy said: "Why not wait until General Qin and Colonel Hua get here? You can have a word with them first, there'll still be time."

"No, I'm not waiting," said Song Jiang. "You can take my letter, there'll be no problem. Friend Shi, please explain to everyone for me — tell them how unfortunately I have to go home for the funeral and ask them to forgive me." And then wishing he could accomplish the journey in a single stride, he raced off all alone, heading for home.

The Dandy and Shi Yong, having paid for all they had had, including the snacks, set off with the rest of the men, Shi Yong riding Song Jiang's horse. A mile or two further on they found a large hostelry where they decided to spend the night and wait for the others. Next morning about eight, the rest of the company caught up with them. The Dandy and Shi Yong greeted them and explained about Song Jiang's going off to the funeral. The others were critical: "Why on earth didn't you persuade him to stay?"

Shi Yong explained: "When he heard his father had died he even wanted to kill himself, nothing would have made him wait, he simply had to rush home. He wrote this letter for us, explaining everything, and told us to go on without him. He said when they saw this letter there would be no problem."

Colonel Hua and Thunderclap, having read the letter, put the following proposal to everyone: "We're already embarked on this business, to go back is as difficult as to go on. We can't return where we came from, and it would be difficult to disperse. The only thing is to go ahead. Let us seal the letter and go on to Mount Liang and see. If they won't have us, we'll have to think of something else."

The nine leaders, riding together now, with an army of five hundred, gradually drew nearer to the Marshes of Mount Liang and began to look for the way to the mountain stronghold. As they were traversing an area of reedbeds, they heard the sound of gongs and drums wafted towards them over the water. And then suddenly the mountain and the whole countryside were filled with coloured banners, and two fast boats were shooting out from the marshes. The first of these was manned by forty or so troops with the leader seated in the bow: this was Leopard's Head Lin Chong. The second boat carried a slightly smaller number of troops and the leader seated in the bow was Liu Tang, the Red-Haired Devil. Lin Chong in the first boat now shouted out: "You lot, identify yourselves! Under whose orders are you? How can you have the audacity to come here and try to arrest us? Don't you realize you'll be killed, every man jack of you? Don't you know the reputation of our Marshes of Mount Liang?"

Colonel Hua, Thunderclap and the others quickly dismounted. Standing there on the bank they shouted: "We are not government troops. We have a letter from our friend, Song Jiang, and we've come to join your band."

"If you've got a letter from Song Jiang," Lin Chong shouted, "please proceed to the inn of Zhu Gui. We'll need to see the letter first, and then we'll invite you to a meeting."

A green flag was run up on the boat and immediately a smaller boat shot out from the reeds. Aboard it were three fishermen. One of them looked after the boat while the other two stepped ashore and said: "Come with us, all the commanders." One of the two patrol boats now displayed a white flag, some gongs sounded and the two boats sped off.

The group were amazed by all they saw. "What organization!" they exclaimed. "How can government troops take this lot on? Compared with this our little outfit is nothing at all!"

They followed the two fishermen. Making a big circuit they came to the inn of Zhu Gui, the Dry Land Crocodile. When he heard what they had to say, the Crocodile invited them in and introductions were carried out. Then he had two oxen killed and wine and food were distributed. Having examined the letter, he went to the pavilion over the water and fired off the whistling arrow in the direction of the reeds on the opposite bank. A fast boat appeared at once. The Crocodile gave orders to the troops in it to take the letter to the mountain stronghold. At the inn pigs and sheep were slaughtered to feast the nine leaders, and their troops were temporarily quartered round about.

Next day at eight o'clock the military leader of Mount Liang, "Professor" Wu Yong, appeared at the inn to welcome them. They were introduced to him one by one. After the exchange of courtesies and a good many questions, thirty or so empty boats arrived to pick them up. Wu Yong and the Crocodile invited the nine leaders to embark, followed by the families, carts, troops and baggage. All were carried over in the various boats to Golden Sands Landing on the other side. They disembarked and there on the path among the pine trees the leaders of Mount Liang with Chao Gai at their head came ceremonially to receive them amid a thunderous roll of drums. All nine having been presented to Chao Gai, he invited them up the mountain. Riding on horses or in sedan chairs everyone arrived at the assembly hall, where they saluted each other in pairs.

The left-hand row of chairs was now taken by Chao Gai, the Professor, the Taoist Gongsun Sheng, Leopard's Head Lin Chong, Liu Tang the Red-Haired Devil, the Ruans, Du Qian, Song Wan, the Crocodile and Bai Sheng (the Daytime Rat, who had escaped from Jizhou gaol a month or two earlier and joined the others on Mount Liang — the Professor had sent someone to bribe the gaolers so he could escape). Occupying the right hand row were Colonel Hua, Thunderclap, The Tamer, the Dandy, Short-Arse Wang, Whitey, the Little Duke, the Halberdier and Shi Yong. Burning joss-sticks were set between the two rows of chairs and an oath of loyalty was sworn by both sides. There was much blowing of flutes and tapping of drums, and oxen and horses were slaughtered for a grand feast. Meanwhile the new troops were entertained outside the hall by the lesser chiefs. Quarters were prepared at the rear of the stronghold for the families. Thunderclap and Colonel Hua spoke at the feast in praise of Song Jiang's many good qualities and told of the revenge killings on Windy Mountain. The leaders of Mount Liang were most impressed. They told also of the halberd contest between the Little Duke and the Halberdier, and of how Colonel Hua's arrow severed the threads and parted the halberds. Chao Gai didn't quite believe this part and was heard muttering to himself: "Hm, can he really be so accurate as he claims? One day we'll set up an archery contest and see."

The drinking went on that day till they were all half drunk and many dishes were consumed. Then the leaders said: "Let us go and walk on the mountain for a while; we'll come back afterwards and continue the feasting."

Everyone assented and they went to stroll on the mountain and enjoy the fine views. They had gone down as far as the third entrance gate when they heard in the sky the honking of some migrating geese. Colonel Hua was thinking to himself: "Chao Gai didn't believe it just now about my shooting the threads. I'd better try and give them a little demonstration of my skill right away. I must show them what I can do so they'll respect me later." His eyes searched the company till he saw someone who was carrying a bow and arrows. He asked for the bow and took it in his hand and examined it. It was a finely crafted weapon with rich decorations and was well suited to his purpose. He took a good arrow and said to Chao Gai: "Perhaps you remember hearing just now how I broke the threads on the halberds — I think you were all a little sceptical. Do you see that flock of geese there, away in the distance? I'm not trying to boast, but with this arrow I will shoot the third in the flock through the head. Only please don't laugh at me if I miss." Fitting the arrow to the string, he stretched the bow to its fullest extent, aimed carefully and loosed the arrow. What they then saw was this:

The painted bow is bent into a full moon; the feathered shaft zooms like a shooting star. The hand that draws the bow is strong, the arrow speeds towards its goal. The winging geese prove no more elusive than a target stretched in the air; the arrow homes in like metal drawn to a magnet. A falling shadow among the clouds, a startled cry amid the grass. The line of geese is sundered in the sky; the company of heroes continues to assemble.

When Colonel Hua shot his arrow, it was of course the third bird in the flock that tumbled from the sky and fell on the hillside. A soldier was sent at once to fetch it. The arrow had transfixed its head! Chao Gai and the others were astounded. They were lavish in their praises of Colonel Hua's archery. The Professor said: "Never mind about Li Guang, the great Yang Youji himself could not have bettered that! Our stronghold is really lucky to get this man!" From then on Colonel Hua was honoured by all and sundry on Mount Liang.

They now returned to feasting in the hall and continued till evening, when everyone went to rest. Next day a further banquet was arranged and each of them was allotted his proper place in the hierarchy. Thunderclap was now seated below Colonel Hua because the latter was his brother-in-law. Colonel Hua was given the place next to Leopard's Head Lin Chong in fifth position, so Thunderclap was sixth, Liu Tang the Red-Haired Devil seventh, the Tamer eighth. Then after the three Ruans came the Dandy, Short-Arse, the Little Duke, the Halberdier, Whitey, Shi Yong, Du Qian, Song Wan, the Crocodile and Bai Sheng: twenty-one leaders in all.

When the places had been decided and the welcoming feast concluded, they set about building more big boats, extra accommodation and new carts, laying in provisions, making new weapons, armour and helmets, preparing flags and banners, clothing, crossbows, arrows and so on, so that all was in readiness for repelling the government troops. Of this no more.

Meanwhile Song Jiang, after leaving the wineshop, had been travelling day and night to reach home. At four in the afternoon he was on the outskirts of his village and stopped for a little rest at headman Zhang's inn. This Zhang was an old friend of Song Jiang's family. When he saw Song Jiang's unhappy expression and the tears in his eyes, he said: "You haven't been home for a year and a half, Registrar. Today you ought to be happy! How come you look so sad, is something troubling you? You ought to be pleased about the amnesty, your sentence must at least be reduced."

"That's as may be," said Song Jiang. "But a sentence is not all there is in life. How do you expect me not to be miserable when my old father, my one and only father, is dead?"

Zhang burst out laughing. "You are a one," he said. "Making jokes like that! Why, His Worship the Squire was right here drinking in this place of mine not an hour past. What do you go and say something like that for?"

"Please don't make fun of me," said Song Jiang, taking out the letter and showing it to Zhang. "My younger brother, Song Qing, says quite clearly that our father passed away at the beginning of February this year and he wants me to go home for the funeral."

"What an extraordinary thing!" Zhang exclaimed. "I tell you, he was here drinking in the company of Squire Wang from Eastside, just about noon today. Why would I tell you a lie?"

Song Jiang was beginning to feel very puzzled. He could not make this out at all. He remained plunged in thought for a long time. But as soon as evening came, he bade the innkeeper farewell and hurried towards his home.

When he entered the house, there were no signs of activity. When they saw Song Jiang, the servants all came to pay their respects. "Are my father and brother at home?" he asked them.

"Every day he's had such a craving for the sight of you, sir," they said. "He'll be overjoyed you're here. He just got back from drinking with Squire Wang of Eastside, over at old Zhang's, and he went to his room to sleep."

Song Jiang was greatly moved. He threw down his short staff and entered the thatched hall. Immediately Song Qing rushed up to receive him and prostrated himself. When he saw his brother, who was not dressed in mourning, Song Jiang exploded. Pointing an accusing finger at him, he shouted: "You heartless little monster, what do you mean by it? Father's inside, apparently, why ever did you write that letter to torment me? Two or three times I thought of killing myself. I cried till I was almost out of my mind. How could you be so unnatural!"

Before his brother could begin to explain, the Squire himself rushed out from behind the screen and said: "Don't be angry, my son. It's nothing to do with your brother. It was because I kept thinking every day how badly I missed you, so I told your brother to write and say I was dead and you must come home quickly. I had heard, too, that there were many robbers on the White Tiger Mountain, and I was afraid they might catch you and persuade you to become an outlaw, a man without honour or respect for his family. That's why I was so anxious to say something that would make you come home. Then Shi Yong turned up from Mr. Chai's and agreed to deliver a letter to you. The whole thing was my idea, it was nothing to do with your brother, so don't blame him. I had just returned from old Zhang's when I heard you'd come home."

After hearing this, Song Jiang pressed his fist to his brow and bowed low before his father, grief and joy mingling in his breast. "Do you happen to know how the case against me stands nowadays?" he asked. "There's been an amnesty so the sentence ought to be reduced. That's what old Zhang was telling me just now."

Squire Song said: "Before Song Qing returned, Sergeants Lei and Zhu were most helpful. There was a general warrant out against you, but no one came to bother me again. Perhaps you wonder why I summoned you home. Well, I heard recently that the Emperor has named his heir and an amnesty has been proclaimed to celebrate it. All criminals throughout the land are to have their sentences reduced by one degree. So even if you were discovered and brought to trial, the most you could get is banishment, it couldn't be the death penalty."

"Do Sergeants Zhu and Lei still come to the house?" Song Jiang asked.

"I heard just the other day," said his brother, "that they've both been transferred. Zhu Tong has been posted to the Eastern Capital, and Lei Heng has gone I don't know where. Recently two new officers, both called Zhao, joined the police department in the provincial capital."

"But you've been travelling my son, you must be tired," said the Squire. "Go to your room now and get some rest."

There was great happiness in the house that night. But of this no more.

Now the sky has darkened, the hour is late. The jade hare is rising in the east. It must be about eight o'clock and all in the manor are sleeping. Suddenly at the front and back doors a great hubbub arises. What is it? On every side, there are torches, all around the manor house, and confused shouts of "Don't let Song Jiang get away!" The old Squire ceaselessly curses his fate.

Well, but for this things might have been different. We would not have seen:

On the riverbank the heroes all assembled;
In busy streets displays of courage and resolve.

WHEN General Qin Ming and Colonel Huang Xin surveyed the outskirts of the town they saw that Song Jiang and Hua Rong led one group of bandits, while "Stunted Tiger" and Yan Shun led another. They had about one hundred fifty men each.

Huang Xin gave orders that the drawbridge be lowered, and the bandits be allowed to enter the town. Song Jiang had previously issued an order that his men were not to kill even one person in the town, that they were first to reach the southern side of the town to exterminate the family of Magistrate Liu Gao. "Stunted Tiger" however took his men to Magistrate Liu Gao's house and seized the magistrate's wife for himself. The magistrate's house was looted, and all the valuables, horses, cattle, etc. were taken away. Hua Rong took his men to his own house where he took all his family and their possessions on carts. He announced that any of the men at his yamen might remain in their homes, or go with the bandits to the mountain, just as they wished. When all this had been done the bandits returned to the mountain with their loot, etc. Zheng Tianshou had remained behind in charge of the stronghold, and when he saw the bandits returning with cartloads of loot he welcomed them to the main hall. After Hua Rong had introduced Huang Xin and the new comrades they all sat down.

Song Jiang gave orders that Hua Rong's family should be given proper quarters, and that the loot from Magistrate Liu Gao's house should be equally divided among the bandits. "Stunted Tiger" had taken the captured woman to his own rooms.

In the main hall Yan Shun asked where Magistrate Liu Gao's wife was and "Stunted Tiger" replied, "You must now let me keep her to be my wife."

"You may keep her," said Yan Shun, "but first she must come here as I have something to say to her."

"I also want to ask her a question or two," said Song Jiang.

"Stunted Tiger" sent a man, who soon brought in Madame Liu Gao who was weeping and begging pardon.

"You vixen!" said Song Jiang, "I saved your life on this mountain because you were the wife of the magistrate, but why did you return evil for my good? Now that you have been arrested what have you got to say for yourself?"

Yan Shun jumped up and said, "Why do you ask questions of this slut?" So saying he drew his sword, and killed the woman on the spot. When "Stunted Tiger" saw this he seized a sword, and advanced to fight with Yan Shun. Song Jiang and the others however also arose, and intervened. Song Jiang said, "Yan Shun has done the right thing in killing this woman. I saved her life, and sent her down the mountain to rejoin her husband, and yet she caused her husband to injure me. If you keep her it would only end in trouble. I will get you a wife later on, and you will then be satisfied."

"I am of the same opinion," said Yan Shun. "If we do not kill her she would do us further injury."

"Stunted Tiger" listened to all this, and remained silent. Yan Shun ordered the servants to remove the corpse, and then spread out a feast for celebration.

The next day Hua Rong prepared the marriage of his sister to General Qin Ming under the auspices of Song Jiang and Huang Xin, Yan Shun, "Stunted Tiger," and Zheng Tianshou acting as go-between. All the dowry was prepared by Hua Rong.

All this was done, and after the wedding there was general feasting for about five days.

About ten days after the wedding one of the bandit's scouts came up the mountain and reported that Prefect Murong at Qingzhou Prefecture had sent a memorial to the Imperial Court denouncing Hua Rong, Qin Ming, and Huang Xin as rebels, and petitioning that a large army be sent to quell the rebels and the bandits. Upon receiving this news, they held a general discussion and all agreed that their position on that mountain was not too secure and that if a large army had them surrounded, they could not avoid being captured.

"I have a plan," said Song Jiang, "but I do not know whether you, my brethren, would approve of it."

"Let us hear it," they all cried.

"To the south of this place there is Liangshan Marsh with a circumference of two hundred li; and in that area are the towns Wanzi Fortress and Liao-er Hollow. That district is now controlled by about five thousand bandits under the command of Chao Gai, and the government troops dare not look them in the face. How would it be if we take all our men there, and join that gang?"

"As there is such a place," said General Qin Ming, "your proposal is admirable. But as we have nobody to recommend us would they be willing to admit us?"

Song Jiang laughed aloud, and related the whole story from the seizure of the birthday presents unto the sending of a letter to him through Liu Tang and how he killed the woman Yan Poxi, and later joined the highwaymen.

Qin Ming was pleased at hearing this, and said, "So you are their benefactor! In that case there is no need for any delay, and we can go there at once."

That day all the details were discussed and arrangements made. All the women and children, valuables, clothes, stores, etc. were loaded on about ten carts. There were about three hundred horses available. All those men who did not want to go to Liangshan Marsh were paid off, and allowed to go their own way. There were altogether about five hundred who agreed to go. These were divided into three companies, and they left the mountain separately, disguised as troops going to fight against Liangshan Marsh. When everything was ready for departure all the buildings on the mountain were destroyed and set on fire. Song Jiang and Hua Rong took command of the leading company. They had flags on which was written: "Government troops for the arrest of brigands." So that on the way no one attempted to impede the progress of such a considerable force.

Song Jiang and Hua Rong rode at the head of their column; next to them were the carts containing the women, children, stores, etc., and bringing up the rear was the main force. They had gone about seven li when they came to a place called Mount Duiying—having, two equally high and shaped mountains on both sides of a broad-way. As they were proceeding they heard drums and gongs on the mountains.

Hua Rong said, "There are evidently brigands in front," and so saying he buckled his spear, got his bow and arrows ready for action. He gave orders that the main force should move forward, and stay with the carts in one body. The two leaders then took about twenty of the mounted bandits to make reconnaissance. They had only gone half a li when they saw about a hundred mounted men, following a youth, all in red. Balancing a halberd in his hand, he gave a challenge, "I will fight with you today, and see who must be the winner."

Instantly another young warrior in white holding another halberd also led about a hundred mounted men, clad in white, down a small mound, to meet the challenge. Each side had its respective red and white flags. The roll of drums seemed to shake the very rocks. Grimly both warrirors gave reins to their steeds, and engaged in a deadly combat. After about thirty bouts neither leader gained any advantage.

Song Jiang and Hua Rong witnessed this contest from a distance and applauded the skill that was displayed. Hua Rong urged his horse forward slowly until he was quite close to the combatants. He then noticed that one man had a leopard's tail on his halberd whereas the other had a spotted streamer of five colors, and during the contest these had become entwined so that the two weapons could not be separated. Hua Rong reined in his horse, seized his bow, and shot an arrow, cutting the tangle and releasing the two halberds at the same moment. At this feat a shout of applause involuntarily broke from the throats of the two bodies of mounted men.

The two young men stopped fighting, and advanced to Hua Rong and Song Jiang with a salute, "We request the name of the marvelous archer."

Returning the salute Hua Rong answered, "This is Song Jiang, my adopted brother. I am Hua Rong, military Prefect of the Qingfeng Town."

The two young men dismounted, thrusted their halberds in the ground, and bowed down. "We have heard of your fame for a long time."

Hua Rong and Song Jiang quickly dismounted, and raised the two men to their feet. "We ask for your worthy names," they said.

The young warrior in red replied, "I am Lu Fang, of Tanzhou. I am a great admirer of the Marquis Lu Bu of the Three Kingdoms period, and therefore I learned the skill with the halberd. People have given me the same nickname as Lu Bu, the 'Little Marquis of Wen.' Some time ago I took some unprepared medicine to Shandong, but lost all my capital in that venture, and I could not go back to my native village. Temporarily I took charge of the bandits here at Mount Duiying. A few days ago this worthy came, and wanted to take my stronghold by force. I proposed to let him occupy one mountain while I held the other one, but he would not agree to that. So every day we met, and fought about that matter. By an act of Heaven our fighting has resulted in our fortunately meeting you."

Turning to the warrior in white Song Jiang asked for his name.

That person replied, "My unworthy name is Guo Sheng, and I am from Jialing in Sichuan province. I was a trader in quicksilver, but one day a strong wind upset my boat on the Yellow River so that I could not return to my native town. Formerly at Jialing I was trained in the use of the halberd by a Major Zhang, and I became so skillful that people gave me the nickname 'Rival of Rengui.' I heard that at Mount Duiying there was a man who had held that place against all comers by the use of the halberd so I came here to have a trial of strength with him. We have been fighting for about ten days without either of us winning. We did not anticipate meeting you, but Heaven has evidently favored us."

Then Song Jiang told them about his affairs, and he suggested that they should come to amicable terms. Both men agreed to this, and all were pleased. By this time all the three contingents of the brigands had arrived, and Song Jiang introduced the leaders. Lu Fang invited them all to go to his stronghold up the mountain, where he provided a banquet. On the following day Guo Sheng invited the bandits leaders to come to his mountain, and there they had another feast.

Song Jiang suggested that they should both go with them and join the brigands under Chao Gai at Liangshan Marsh. Gladly they agreed to this, and prepared their effects for an early departure. But Song Jiang said that as they had now more than five hundred strong men their movements would be duly reported to Liangshan Marsh by spies or scouts, and there they might suspect some hostile intention. So he suggested that he would go in advance with Yan Shun, and announce their proposal. They could come along afterwards, but not in one body, but divided into three contingents. The other leaders agreed to this plan as much better, and it was arranged that Song Jiang and Yan Shun should have a start of a half-day.

These two were accompanied by about ten men when they departed for Liangshan Marsh. On the third day of their journey about noon they came to an inn, and as they were all tired Song Jiang decided to stop there for food and wine. He gave orders that the horse's girths were to be slackened, and when this had been done they all adjourned to the inn. Song Jiang saw that there were only three large tables and a few smaller ones. One of the big tables was already occupied by a man. He noticed that the man wore a turban in the shape of a pig's snout, at the back of which were two finely wrought copper rings of Taiyuan make. He wore a black silk gown with a white waist sash; had puttees and hempen shoes. Leaning against the table was a short cudgel, and on the table was a bundle of clothes. The man was about eight feet high; had a sallow complexion with prominent cheekbones; the eyes were clear, there was neither mustache nor beard.

Song Jiang spoke to the waiter. "We have a large party, but we two will sit in your inner room. Will you ask that customer to be so good as to change to another table and let my men dine on that big one." To this proposal the waiter assented.

Wine was ordered; each man to have three big cups. Food was also placed on the tables. As several of Song Jiang's men could not find seats the waiter went to the guest before mentioned, who looked like a junior officer, and said:

"May I trouble you, my officer; but would you mind moving to another table so that the followers of these other honored guests may have a seat as we are short of room?"

The man was annoyed at being addressed in this way, and replied, "I was here first, I don't care who wants me to move—I won't move."

"You see he is so rude," remarked Yan Shun to Song Jiang.

"Leave him alone," said Song Jiang. "We must not follow his bad example."

Just then the man turned round, and seeing the two leaders, he laughed sneeringly.

The waiter said to him, "Sir, you may render a favor to our business here, and change tables."

The man banged the table and with an angry voice shouted, "You prick! You insult me because I am by myself, but even if the Emperor himself came here I would not shift. You do not know me, but you will soon make the acquaintance of my fist."

"Why are you so angry?" said the waiter. "I have not said any thing to insult you."

"You dare not say any thing to me," the man roared.

Yan Shun could not endure this, and called out, "Fellow, you don't have to act so stinking tough. You don't want to move, that's fine, but why threaten the poor waiter?"

The man jumped up, and seizing his cudgel said, "I may have insulted him, but that is not your business. There are only two persons I give way to, and all others I treat like mud."

Yan Shun was excited, and seized a stool to use as a weapon. But Song Jiang intervened as he saw that the man was not a common vulgar person. "Let us not have a row about this," he said, and addressing the man he asked, "I request you to tell me who are the two men whom you would give way to?"

"If I tell you that, you would be stupefied."

"But still I would like to know their names," insisted Song Jiang.

"Well, one is Chai Jin, the 'Small Whirlwind.'"

Song Jiang nodded approvingly at this and asked who was the other one.

"He is even greater. His name is Song Jiang of Shandong. He is called 'Welcome Rain.'"

A wink passed between Song Jiang and Yan Shun at this, and the latter put down the bench.

The man continued, "Those two men I would give way to, but I fear nobody else."

"Stop, I know both of them," said Song Jiang. "But where did you meet them?"

"As you know them I will tell you the truth. About three years ago I stayed for more than four months at Chai Jin's house, but never met Song Jiang there."

"Do you want to know him now?"

"I am in fact now trying to find him."

"Who set you to do this?"

"His own brother."

Song Jiang shook the man by the hands, and rejoiced. "As decreed by Heaven, you have met him, you might have failed although you traveled a hundred li; I am Song Jiang."

The man looked at him closely and saluted. "Heaven has favored me by this fortunate meeting with you. I might have easily passed you by and travel to look for you in vain at Old Kong's place."

Song Jiang took the man into the inner room, and asked, "Tell me the home news."

"Ah, Elder brother, let me tell you, my name is Shi Yong and I am a native of Daming Prefecture, Zhili province, and I was given the nickname of "Stone General." Once I made a row with a person at a gambling den and killed him with my fist. I escaped to Squire Chai's home for refuge. While staying there I heard so much of your fame that I set out for your home at Yuncheng County to make your acquaintance. There your younger brother informed me that you had gone to Old Kong's home at the Baihu Mountain. As I decided to go there, your brother gave me a letter for you; and he said that if I met you, I must tell you to go back home as quickly as possible."

Song Jiang had a misgiving when he heard this, and asked, "How long did you stay at my home? Did you meet my father?"

"I only stayed there one night," said Shi Yong, "and did not see your father."

Song Jiang then told him all about their plans of going to Liangshan Marsh. The other suggested that he might be allowed to join them. Song Jiang readily agreed to this, and then introduced him to Yan Shun. More wine was ordered as they all sat down.

Shi Yong soon got out the letter from his bundle, and handed it to Song Jiang. It could be at once noticed it had been addressed in an unusual way—indicating trouble. The two characters "with peace," ordinarily used had also been omitted. Song Jiang now had a great misgiving. Quickly he tore the letter out of the envelope, and read these in the latter part—"Father was taken ill and died in the first month of this year. The coffin is still in the house, and we wait until you return to bury him. Return at once with all speed. I, your younger brother shedding tears and blood from my eyes in writing this letter."

Now Song Jiang burst into lamentations, and striking his breast he exclaimed, "Unfilial son! A wrongdoer! My father dies, and I have not done my duty. I am like an animal." He thus cried with a flood of tears, and banged his head against the wall in utter despair.

Yan Shun and the "Stone General" seized hold of him, but Song Jiang continued to wail in a dazed condition and it was for some time before he could come to himself.

Yan Shun said, "Elder brother, do not give way to your grief so much."

"My affections cannot be restrained," said Song Jiang. "I cannot forget about my father. He is no longer alive so I must depart this very night to my home. You must go to the mountain without me."

"Brother, your father is no more," said Yan Shun. "But even if you return home at once you will never see him again. In this world parents do not live forever. So please make your mind easy, and again lead us to the mountain. When that matter is settled you can return home without any delay, and attend to funeral matters. I will accompany you there. There is an ancient saying, 'A snake without a head cannot go forward.' You are our head, and if you do not go with us they will not receive us."

"I cannot agree," said Song Jiang, "because in going to the mountain you will delay me too much time. So I will write a letter stating all the details, and you can take the letter to Chao Gai, and he will then receive the whole company. If I had not known about my father's death I would have gone with you, but as Heaven has given me the information, every day will be like a year in length, and it is imperative that I should return at once. I need neither horse nor companion but must start off straightway through the night."

Yan Shun, and the "Stone General" could do nothing further to change his mind. Song Jiang asked the waiter for pen and paper, and while writing, he was weeping all the time. He wrote most emphatically that the company must be allowed to join the bandits. The letter was not sealed and was handed to Yan Shun. Song Jiang was now ready to go, but Yan Shun asked him not to leave until Hua Rong, Qin Ming, and the other leaders arrived. But Song Jiang would not wait even for that, and instructed "Stone General" to explain the whole situation to the other leaders. He then set off.

Yan Shun and "Stone General" paid for the food and wine, and the latter then mounted Song Jiang's horse, and took the men about two li further along the road to another inn where they stopped. About 7 A.M. the following day the main body of the bandits arrived, and Yan Shun explained what had happened.

The other leaders were annoyed, and asked why Yan Shun had not asked Song Jiang to wait.

"Stone General" explained that Song Jiang was completely upset by the sad news, and in fact would have committed suicide, and would not agree to stay until they all arrived. He had hurried off at once to return to his home. He had left a letter behind which would induce Chao Gai to receive them.

Hua Rong and Qin Ming read the letter, and then said to the leaders, "We are in a dilemma, as there will be difficulty whether we proceed or retire. We cannot go back, or separate our forces, so we had better go forward. We will now seal the letter up as we have all read it, and go on our way. If we are not received at the mountain then we can discuss some other plan."

So these nine heroes all set off again, and in due course reached Liangshan Marsh. As they were proceeding amidst reeds and rushes they heard drums and gongs beaten on the lake and many flags were visible on the mountain. On the lake were two speedy boats. On the first was Lin Chong with about fifty men, and on the next Liu Tang, the Red Haired Demon, with also fifty men.

"Who are you?" called out Lin Chong. "Whose troops are you? How dare you come here to arrest us! We would kill the whole lot of you. You ought to know the reputation of us on Liangshan Marsh."

The leaders dismounted at the side of the lake, and replied, "We are not government soldiers, but have come here to join you bandits. We have here a letter from Song Jiang, the 'Welcome Rain.'"

Lin Chong said, "You had better take the letter to that inn over there where you will find our leader Zhu Gui."

A blue flag was waved on Lin Chong's boat, and a boat with three fishermen came out of the reeds, and upon reaching the bank two of them disembarked, and told the strangers to follow them. On the first boat a white flag was now waved, and gongs were sounded and both boats returned.

When Hua Rong saw the way in which the brigands promptly obeyed orders he remarked, "It is no wonder that the government troops keep away from this place. How can our stronghold compare with theirs?" He and his company followed the two fishermen to the inn.

They were introduced, and sat down to a meal with wine. After Zhu Gui, the "Dry Land Crocodile," had read the letter he went to the arbor on the bank, and shot a whistling arrow across the lake. Instantly a fast boat emerged from the reeds and came along. He told the boatman to take the letter to the leaders on the mountain, and then ordered pigs and sheep to be killed, and a feast prepared for the nine guests. He also ordered that all the men should encamp about there for the present.

The following day about 7 A.M. Wu Yong came to the inn, and was duly introduced and they talked the matter over. He and Zhu Gui then invited the leaders to embark, and all the baggage, etc. was loaded on the fleet of about twenty boats that was placed at their disposal. Upon reaching the Golden Strand they all disembarked, and were met by Chao Gai and many of the bandits. They then all went up the mountain, and gathered in the assembly hall. All the eleven leaders with Chao Gai were seated along the left side of the hall. Among them was Bai Sheng, the "Daylight Rat" who had escaped a few months ago from the prison at Jizhou Prefecture. On the right-hand side of the hall were seated the new nine leaders with Hua Rong.

In the center was burning an incense urn over which they all took the oath. All the newcomers were then sworn in. They were all given quarters, and then there was general feasting for everybody. Over the wine Hua Rong and General Qin Ming spoke highly of Song Jiang, and gave full details of his adventures. They also described their meeting with Lu Fang and Guo Sheng, and how Hua Rong had cut the tangled streamers with an arrow. To all this Chao Gai listened, and commented, but in his heart he doubted some of the statements made. He said, "Tomorrow, I hope that you will give us an exhibition of your skill as an archer."

The following day the leaders agreed to go for a stroll, and view the scenery round the mountain. They had passed the third barrier when they heard overhead the cries of a flock of wild geese which was flying in single file.

Hua Rong thought that as Chao Gai did not seem to be convinced the previous day as to his skill in archery, so he would now show him a specimen of his shooting, and so gain Chao Gai's respect. So he asked one of the archers to lend him his bow and arrow, and then turning to Chao Gai he spoke, "When I said that I cut the streamers binding the two halberds together I thought that perhaps some of you did not believe me. Now you see that flock of wild geese overhead. I do not wish to boast, but I will bring down the third bird in the column with this arrow sticking in its head. If I miss I hope that you will not laugh at me." He fitted the arrow, and pulling the bow to its full limit released the arrow which flew overhead and brought down the third bird. A man was sent to bring the goose, and upon his return it was seen that the arrow had gone through its head. When they saw this Chao Gai and the other leaders were deeply impressed, and called Hua Rong "The General with an uncanny arm."

Wu Yong said, "After this we cannot call you 'Little Li Guang,' because even Yang Youji was not as good as you.[72] We really are very fortunate to have such a man as you here." There was not a man on Liangshan Marsh who did not respect him after that.

The next day they had a celebration feast in the great hall, and elected Hua Rong to the fifth position. Qin Ming was married to Hua Rong's sister and was elected the sixth leader. The position of the other leaders were also arranged. Liu Tang the seventh, Huang Xin, the eighth, and so on. The bandits were detailed to build boats, make arms and ammunitions, erect buildings, etc. but we need not go into the many details.

Song Jiang traveled through the night, and the day following his departure, he reached his native village about 4 A.M. in the afternoon. He stopped at an inn kept by Zhang, the village chief, for a rest. Zhang was on good terms with all the members of Song Jiang's family. He saw that Song Jiang had been crying so he asked, "You have been away from home for nearly a year and half, and it is good for you to return now. But how is it that you seem to be in trouble? What is the matter? Your crime has been mitigated."

"Old Uncle, what you say about my affairs is quite right, but as my father has died how can I rejoice?"

Zhang laughed, and said, "Is this one of your jokes? Your father was here only a short time ago drinking wine, and has just gone back home an hour ago. Why do you talk like this?"

"Uncle, please do not jest with me." Song Jiang then produced the letter he had received. "You will see from this that my younger brother, Song Qing, states that my father died in the first month of this year, and is waiting for me to return home for the funeral."

"Ah! But nothing of the kind has happened. Your father came here with a man to drink wine this morning. How could I talk lies about such a matter?"

Song Jiang now doubted the letter, although the matter was not clear yet. He thought over the matter but found no explanation, and then at last decided to go home and clear the matter up. When he entered the gate of the homestead he saw no signs of mourning. When the servants recognized him they saluted, and he asked, "Where are my father and Song Qing?"

"Your father has been expecting you every day. He will be much pleased to see you. He has just come back from drinking with a friend, and is asleep inside."

Song Jiang was surprised at this, and throwing down his cudgel, he entered the house. His brother Song Qing upon seeing him kowtowed, and he was not wearing mourning. Song Jiang was now angry, and abused his brother. "You undutiful beast! My father is at home, so why did you write me that letter saying that he was dead. I was so upset that besides crying I tried to kill myself. So unfilial you are!"

Song Qing was on the point of replying to this when his father emerged from behind the screen in the room. "My son, do not get angry," he said. "That was not your brother's fault. I wanted very much to see you again, so I told your brother to write the letter stating that I was dead, and urging you to return home at once. I heard that you were at Baihu Mountain where there are many brigands, and I was afraid that you might join them, and become both disloyal and unfilial. The letter was given to a man Shi Yong who had just come from Squire Chai's place looking for you. The whole scheme was arranged by me so that you must not feel any resentment to your brother for carrying out my orders. I had just now returned from Zhang's inn, and was going to sleep when I heard your voice."

Song Jiang kowtowed to his father, and was much pleased at this unlooked-for climax. He asked, "How about my affair here? I have heard that my crime has been pardoned."

"At first they troubled us a great deal," said Old Sung, "but afterwards Inspectors Zhu Tong and Lei Hong used their influence so they made no more trouble here. On the appointment of the Crown Prince, the Emperor issued a decree reducing all sentences by one degree, and abolishing the sentence of death from a number of crimes. Even if your return home was known to the yamen, you would not receive the capital punishment but be banished to a distant district. So we can leave the matter alone."

"Do those two Inspectors ever come here now?" asked Song Jiang.

"I heard sometime ago," said Song Qing, "that they had been transferred to some other places."

Old Song however insisted that his son must be tired, they must all retire, and this was done. It was now dusk and the moon was rising in the east. About 9 pm as they were all asleep, there was a big noise outside the front and back gates. They then saw that the premises were surrounded by men who held burning torches. They called out, "Don't let Song Jiang escape!" On hearing this, his father was upset.

A crowded street; a compact throng,
Loyalty and justice seen.
A river's bank, the scene where strong
Heroes meet and disagree.

134

The professor Wu Yong speaks of the Magic Messenger on Mount Liang, Recommends, & Writes to Dai Zong; Song Jiang on Jieyang Mountain Ridge Meets Li Jun the White Water Dragon

Squire Song placed a ladder against the wall, climbed to the top and looked. Over a hundred men were outside with torches. At their head were two newly appointed Yuncheng County constable—the brothers Zhao Neng and Zhao De.

"If you know what's good for you, Squire Song," these two now shouted, "you'll send your son Song Jiang out and let us deal with him. If you don't tell him to turn himself over to the authorities, we'll arrest the both of you!"

"Song Jiang hasn't come home," the old man said.

"Don't lie," Zhao Neng retorted. "He was seen drinking in the village at Ward Chief Zhang's place. And he was followed home from there. You can't deny it."

"Don't argue with him, father," Song Jiang urged, beside the ladder. "I'll go out and give myself up. I know everybody in the county office. What's more, an amnesty has been announced. I'm sure to be given a reduced sentence. It's no use pleading with these wretches. The Zhao brothers are a couple of rogues. Although they've suddenly got themselves appointed constables, they know nothing about gallantry. They're not friends of mine. Pleading with them is a waste of time."

The old man wept. "I've harmed you, my son."

"Calm yourself, father," said Song Jiang. "Going before the court will be a good thing. Otherwise I might have taken to the hills and joined up with murderers and arsonists. Then if I were captured, I'd be ashamed to see you again. This way, I may be sent to another prefecture, but exile has a time limit. Sooner or later I'll come home and look after you in your old age."

"All right, then. I'll spread some money among high and low and buy you a good place of exile."

Song Jiang mounted the ladder and called: "Quiet down, out there. Leniency to my crime has already been declared. It's no longer a capital offence. If you two constables will come into our humble manor and have a few cups of wine with us, I'll go with you to the magistrate tomorrow."
"You're not going to get us in there with any of your tricks," Zhao Neng exclaimed.
"Would I implicate my own father and brother? Come in. You don't have to worry."
Song Jiang came down from the ladder, opened the manor gate, and invited the two constables into the guest hall. That night they were wined and dined on chicken and goose. The hundred or more soldiers were also given food and drink, and each some money. Bars of silver worth twenty ounces were presented to the two constables as "thanks for their kindness."
The constables spent the night in the manor, and at dawn the next day proceeded with Song Jiang to the county. When it was daylight, they brought him before Shi Wenbin, the magistrate, who had just opened court. The jurist was delighted. He ordered the prisoner to submit his confession. Song Jiang took a brush pen and wrote:

The crime occurred because last autumn I purchased Yan Poxi as a concubine. She was no good, and I accidentally killed her in a quarrel when I was drunk. I ran away to avoid being punished. Today, captured, and brought before the court, I set forth these details and state that I shall willingly accept whatever sentence the court decrees.

The magistrate read the confession and ordered Song Jiang remanded into custody.
Everyone in the county heard of Song Jiang's arrest, and there was not a person who didn't pity him. They pleaded with the magistrate to forgive him, telling what a good man Song Jiang was ordinarily. The jurist was more than inclined to go easy. He formally accepted the confession and directed that Song Jiang be confined to the prison but that he need not be fettered.
Squire Song bribed high and low, dispensing money freely. Yan Poxi had died half a year before, so there was no aggrieved party in the case. Zhang Wenyuan, feeling that he had lost his mistress anyway, was unwilling to make an enemy of Song Jiang. The magistrate drew up his findings and, when the sixty-day detention period was over, sent the prisoner to the prefecture of Jizhou for sentencing.
The prefect reviewed the case, taking cognizance of the amnesty which lessened the severity of the crime. He directed that Song Jiang be given twenty strokes and exiled to the prison in Jiangzhou. Many of the officers and functionaries of the prefecture also knew Song Jiang, and besides, he dispensed a bit of money. Nominally, he was to be beaten twenty blows and tattooed with the mark of his exile. But there was no aggrieved party to witness it being done, and many people supported him, so it was all inflicted very lightly. In the presence of the court a cangue was placed around his neck for travelling and documents of transfer issued. Two guards were designated as escorts—Zhang and Li Something-or-Other.
On receipt of the documents, the guards set off with their prisoner. Song Jiang's father, Squire Song, and his brother, Song Qing, were waiting outside the prefectural compound. They served the guards wine and gave them silver. They brought Song Jiang a change of clothes, a pack to carry on his shoulders, and soft hemp sandals for walking. The squire took Song Jiang aside and spoke to him quietly:
"Jiangzhou is a good place, with plenty of fish and rice. I bought you an exile there. Serve out your sentence patiently. I'll have your brother Qing visit you. Whenever there's a reliable person going in your direction I'll send you expense money. You'll be passing Mount Liangshan on your way. If those brigands come down and rescue you and urge you to join their band, don't do it, or people will criticize you for being disloyal and unfilial. Don't forget what I have told you! May you have a peaceful journey, child. I pray Heaven be merciful and that you return again soon for a happy reunion with your father and brother."
With tears in his eyes, Song Jiang bowed and bid farewell to the old man. His brother Qing saw him down the road. When it was time for them to part, Song Jiang said: "Don't any of you worry about me. My only concern is that father is getting old and I'm bedeviled by this case and have to leave home. Look after him. Don't leave him alone to come and see me in Jiangzhou. I have lots of friends in the gallant fraternity. Any of them will help me out with money if I need it. If Heaven is kind I'll be back one day."
Song Qing, weeping, bowed and departed. He returned home to look after his father. Of that we'll say no more.

Song Jiang proceeded along the road with the two guards. Because they had received his silver and knew that he was a gallant fellow, they looked after him on the journey. The three marched all day. At night, they put up at an inn, where they made a fire and cooked some rice. Song Jiang bought wine and meat and treated the guards.
"I'll be frank," he said. "From here on we'll be skirting Mount Liangshan. On the summit are a number of bold men who know my name. They might come down to rescue me and give you two a fright. I suggest we get up early tomorrow and follow small paths which detour around the mountain. Even if we have to travel a few extra li it'll be worth it."
"We'd never have known if you hadn't told us, sir Clerk," the guards replied. "We're familiar with a few paths. We definitely won't run into them there." Plans were made accordingly that night.
The three rose at the fifth watch the next morning and lit a breakfast fire. They soon left the inn, and walked along narrow trails for about thirty li. Suddenly a band of men appeared round the bend of the mountain ahead and advanced towards them.
Song Jiang groaned. Leading forty or fifty brigands was none other than Liu Tang the Red-Haired Demon. They plainly intended to finish off the two escorts. The terrified Zhang and Li collapsed to their knees in a heap.
"Brother," Song Jiang called, "who do you want to kill?"
"These two varlets, of course," replied Liu Tang. "Who else?"
"Don't soil your hands. Give me your knife. I'll do it."
The guards moaned. Liu Tang handed Song Jiang his blade.
"Why do you want to kill them?" Song Jiang asked.
"Our brothers on the mountain top sent a man to Yuncheng to inquire about your trial. At first we were going to snatch you from the jail, but we heard your situation wasn't too bad there. Then we learned you were being exiled to Jiangzhou. To make sure we didn't miss you, chiefs big and small have been posted on every road and path. We're here to welcome you and invite you up the mountain. Naturally, we've got to kill these guards."
"This won't honor me, it will disgrace me. I'll become disloyal, unfilial. If you insist, I have no choice but to kill myself." Song Jiang raised the blade to his throat.
Liu Tang grabbed his arm. "Wait, brother. Let's talk this over." He wrested back the knife from Song Jiang's hand.
"Pity me, brother," Song Jiang pleaded. "Let me go on to Jiangzhou Prison. When my term is up I'll come back and we'll meet again."
"That's not in my power to decide," said Liu Tang. "On the main road ahead our Military Advisor Wu Yong and Commandant Hua Rong are waiting to greet you. If you'll allow me, I'll ask them to come and confer."
"You can confer all you like. I've nothing more to say."
A bandit was sent to report. Not long after, Wu Yong and Hua Rong were seen galloping towards them, followed by a dozen men on horseback. The two dismounted and bowed.
"Why hasn't the cangue been removed?" Hua Rong demanded.
"What a thing to say," Song Jiang remonstrated. "It's affixed according to government law. Who would dare touch it?"
Wu Yong laughed. "I see what you mean. No problem. We won't ask you to remain in our mountain stronghold, then. But Chieftain Chao Gai hasn't seen you in so long. He's hoping to have a private chat. Stay with us for a while, and we'll send you on your way."
"Only you, Teacher, understand." Song Jiang raised the two guards to their feet and said, "Don't worry. I'd rather die than let them harm you."
"We owe you our lives, sir Clerk," they cried.
The column left the main road and came to a thicket of reeds along the bank. Boats were already waiting. They crossed over to the road on the other side and got into sedan-chairs. At Unity Pavilion they rested, and messengers were dispatched to ask the various lieutenants to assemble. Then all continued up the mountain to the Fraternity Hall. There, Chao Gai expressed his thanks to Song Jiang.
"Ever since you saved us at Yuncheng and we came here, there hasn't been a day that we haven't remembered your great kindness. What's more, you brought us several heroes to grace our humble lair. We don't know how to express our gratitude."
"After leaving here, I killed a lecherous wench and wandered about for a year and a half. I intended to come back and see you, brother, but I ran into Shi Yong in a village inn. He had a letter from home, saying that my father had died. Actually, my father was afraid I'd join your band of gallant men, and was using this method to get me to return. Although I had to face trial, I was protected by officials high and low, and I wasn't hurt much. They exiled me to Jiangzhou, a good place. Since you summoned me, I had to come. Now we have met. But there's a time limit on my journey and I don't dare overstay. I must bid you farewell."
"What's the hurry? Please sit a while, at least."
The two took their seats in the center of the hall. Song Jiang told the two guards to sit behind his chair and not separate from him by an inch.
Chao Gai ordered his chieftains to pay their respects to Song Jiang and seat themselves in two rows. Lieutenants poured the wine. First Chao Gai drank to Song Jiang, followed by Wu Yong, Gongsun Sheng and Bai Sheng. After a few rounds, Song Jiang rose to his feet.
"Your affection touches me, brothers. I'm a criminal, a prisoner. I dare not remain. I must leave you, now."
"You mustn't be annoyed with us, brother," said Chao Gai. "Since you don't want us to create trouble for the two guards, why not give them some money and send them back. They can say the Liangshan Marsh men took you by force. It probably won't be considered their fault."
"I won't hear of it. You're not honoring me, you're harming me. I haven't been filial to my old father at home for a single day. How can I go against his instructions and get him into trouble? Before, I wanted to join you, but Heaven ordained that Shi Yong should meet me in that village inn and cause me to go home. My father told me why he preferred that I should face trial. When I was ordered into exile, he exhorted me to shun personal happiness if it would hurt the family and bring distress to his declining years. He put it to me very plainly: 'Don't take the easy way. That would go against Heaven's principles and your father's teachings.' What's the point of my life if I become disloyal and unfilial? If you won't permit me to go down the mountain, I prefer to die at your hands!"
His tears streaming like rain, Song Jiang threw himself on his knees. Chao Gai, Wu Yong and Gongsun Sheng raised him.
"Since you're determined to go to Jiangzhou, brother," they said, "relax and spend the day with us. We'll see you down the mountain tomorrow morning."
After much persuasion he agreed to drink with them. But he refused to have his cangue removed, and insisted that the guards remain with him all the time.
He spent the night, but rose early the next morning and announced that he was leaving.
"Hear me, brother," said Wu Yong. "The superintendent of the two prisons in Jiangzhou is my very good friend. His name is Dai Zong, and he's called Superintendent Dai. Because he knows some Taoist magic and can walk eight hundred li in a day, everyone refers to him as 'the Marvellous Traveller.' He's extremely chivalrous and generous. Last night I wrote a letter of introduction for you. You two can become acquainted. If you need any help, send word to us here."
The chieftains couldn't convince Song Jiang to stay, so they gave him a farewell banquet and gifts of silver and gold. They also presented the guards with twenty ounces of silver. With a man carrying Song Jiang's pack, all escorted him down the mountain. There, each took his leave. Wu Yong and Hua Rong accompanied him across the lake and twenty li along the road. Then, they too returned to the mountain stronghold.
Song Jiang and the guards pushed on towards Jiangzhou. The guards had observed what a large force there was on the mountain, and how respectful the chieftains were to Song Jiang. Moreover, they had received the brigand leaders' silver. And so they were very solicitous to Song Jiang during the journey.
They marched more than half a month and came to a place where they could see a tall mountain ahead. "Good," said the guards. "Jieyang Ridge. When we've crossed that we'll be at the Xunyang River. From there we go by water to Jiangzhou. It's not far."
"It's going to be a hot day," said Song Jiang. "Let's cross the ridge while it's still early and find a place to rest."
"A good idea," said the guards.
The three men hurried forward. They climbed for some time and traversed the crest. On the slope below they could see an inn backed against a cliff, with a strangely shaped tree at the door. Before and behind the building were thatched huts. A wine pennant hanging in the shade of the tree gladdened Song Jiang's heart.
"We're hungry and thirsty and there's an inn that sells wine," he said. "Let's have a few bowls before going on."
Soon they entered the inn. The guards eased themselves of the luggage and leaned their official staves against the wall. Song Jiang had them sit at the head of the table while he himself sat at the foot. An hour passed and no one appeared.
"Host, where are you?" Song Jiang called.
"Coming, coming." From an adjoining room a big fellow emerged. He had red bristly whiskers and bloodshot tiger eyes. A torn bandanna bound his head, bare arms protruded from a sleeveless vest, a cloth apron encircled his waist. He greeted the three respectfully.
"How much wine will you have, sirs?"
"We've been walking and we're hungry," said Song Jiang. "What kind of meat have you?"
"Only cooked beef and some cloudy white wine."
"Fine. Bring us two catties of sliced beef and a measure of wine."
"Forgive me, sir, but here on the ridge we always collect in advance."
"So you want your money first. I don't mind. Just a moment while I get you some silver."
The host watched stealthily while Song Jiang opened his pack and took out some silver coins. He could see the pack was heavy and obviously contained things worth taking. Pleased, he accepted the coins, went inside, drew a bucket of wine and sliced a platter of beef. He came out, placed three large bowls and three pairs of chopsticks on the table and poured the wine. As the travellers ate, they chatted.
"There are many evil men around, these days," one of them remarked. "It's said they've done in countless good fellows. They drug their wine and meat and, when their victims go down, steal their valuables and put their flesh into dumplings. It's incredible. How can such things happen?"
The host laughed. "You're the ones who've said it. Don't eat, then. My meat and wine are drugged."
Song Jiang smiled. "Big brother has heard us talking about drugs and he's teasing us."
"Brother," said the guards, "we'd like a bowl of heated wine."
"Right. I'll warm it up for you," said the host. He heated the wine and poured out three bowls.
The travellers were hungry and thirsty and the meat and wine were before them. Why shouldn't they tuck in? Each man consumed a bowl. The eyes of the guards began to bulge, and they drooled from the corners of their mouths. Staring at each other, they toppled over backwards.
Song Jiang jumped up. "How can you be so drunk on only one bowl of wine?" He went to raise them to their feet, but suddenly he too felt dizzy and his eyes swam. He fell heavily to the floor.
The three stared at one another, paralyzed. They were unable to move.
"How lucky," said the host. "I haven't had a speck of business in days, and now Heaven sends me these three pieces of merchandise."
He dragged Song Jiang to the butchering hut beside the cliff and placed him on the skinning bench. Next, he hauled over the other two. Then he returned to the inn and carried Song Jiang's pack and luggage into the rear room and opened them up. They were filled with silver and gold.
"In all the years I've been running this inn I've never seen a prisoner like him. Where did he get so much money? It's a gift from the sky!"
He rewrapped the bundles and went outside to watch for the return of his helpers so that he could start butchering.
He stood by the door for a while, but there was no sign of them. Further down the slope he saw three men climbing rapidly towards him. Recognizing one of them, he hurried forward. "Where to, brother?" he hailed in greeting. A big fellow replied: "We're looking for a man. He should be coming this way by now. I've been waiting for him every day at the foot of the mountain, but he hasn't shown up. I can't imagine what's delaying him."
"Who is he?"
"A remarkable and chivalrous person."
"And who would that be?"
"The clerk of Yuncheng County in the prefecture of Jizhou, Song Jiang. Surely, you've heard of him?"
"Not Song Jiang of Shandong Province, famed in the gallant fraternity as the Timely Rain?"
"None other."
"Why would he be coming here?"
"I don't know. The other day I met a friend from Jizhou and he said: 'Song Jiang, the clerk of Yuncheng County, has got into some kind of trouble in Jizhou and has been exiled to the prison in Jiangzhou.' He's got to pass this way. There isn't any other road. I often thought of going to Yuncheng to meet him. Now, he's coming through here. Why shouldn't I take this chance to become acquainted? I've been waiting at the foot of the mountain for four or five days, but no prisoner has appeared. Today I've come for a stroll up the ridge with these two brothers. I thought we'd have a bowl of wine here and see how you are. What's business like these days?"
"Frankly, it's been practically dead the past few months. Today, thank Heaven and Earth, I've caught three pieces of merchandise, and they've got some stuff on them."
"Who are they?" the big fellow asked quickly.
"Two are guards and the third is a prisoner."
"Is the prisoner a dark, short, chunky man?" the big fellow queried in alarm.
"It's true he is not very tall, and he's rather dark complected."
"You haven't gone to work on him yet?" the big fellow asked hastily.

"I dragged him into the shed only a short while ago. I can't start till my helpers get back."
"Let me take a look at him, first."
The four men entered the butchering shed beside the cliff. Song Jiang and the two guards were draped over the skinning bench, lying with their heads touching the ground. The big fellow didn't know Song Jiang. He examined the tattoo on his cheek, but it wasn't clear. The big fellow didn't know what to do. Suddenly he had an idea.
"Get the guards' pack and we can read his documents."
"The very thing," said the host. They went into the house, obtained the guards' bundle and opened it up. In it were a large bar of silver, several silver coins and a document case. The contents of the latter were carefully examined.
"A lucky thing," the four men exclaimed.
"Heaven sent me up this ridge, today. If you'd set to work a little earlier you'd have taken my brother's life," the big fellow cried. "Give him something quickly to bring him out of it."
The host hastily prepared a herbal mixture. Then he and the big fellow returned to the butcher shed, removed Song Jiang's cangue, lifted him up and poured the concoction down his throat.
The four then carried Song Jiang to the front part of the inn reserved for guests. With the big fellow holding him, he slowly revived and opened his eyes. He didn't recognize any of the men standing before him. The big fellow asked his two friends to support Song Jiang, and he dropped to his knees and kowtowed.
"Who are you?" Song Jiang asked. "I must be dreaming." The host also kowtowed.
"What is this place?" queried Song Jiang. "May I ask your names, sirs?"
"My name is Li Jun," the big fellow said, "from Luzhou. I earn my living as a helmsman on Yangzi River ships. Because I'm a good swimmer I'm known as the Turbulent River Dragon. Our host here is a native of Jieyang Ridge. He's a smuggler. His name is LiLi, but everyone calls him Hell's Summoner. These two are from the banks of the Xunyang. They're here to sell smuggled salt. That's their specialty. Right now, they're living with me. They're brothers, and swim and handle boats well on the big Yangzi. Tong Wei is called the Dragon from the Cave. Tong Meng is called the River Churning Clam."
Each of the brothers kowtowed four times. "But I was knocked out by drugs," said Song Jiang. "How did you know my name?"
"A friend of mine who has just been Jizhou on business told me about you," Li Jun replied. "He said you were being sent to the prison in Jiangzhou. I'd often thought of going to your county to pay my respects, but I never was fortunate enough to have the chance. When I heard you were going to Jiangzhou I knew you would have to pass here. I've been waiting for you at the foot of the mountain for six or seven days, but you didn't show up. Today, Heaven happened to send me and these two brothers up the ridge. We stopped in for some wine and got to talking with LiLi. I was startled by his story and hurried to the butchering shed. We hadn't met before, but I suddenly thought of your documents, and that's how I knew it was you, brother. May I have the temerity to ask why the clerk of Yuncheng County is being sent to Jiangzhou prison?"
Song Jiang told what had happened from the time he killed Yan Poxi to when he was given the letter by Shi Yong in the village inn, returned home, stood trial and was exiled to Jiangzhou. His four listeners sighed.
"Why not stay here?" asked LiLi the host. "Why go to prison and suffer hardships?"
"The men on Mount Liangshan begged me to remain with them, but I refused because I was afraid to implicate my father," Song Jiang explained. "How can I stay with you?"
"Our brother is a man of principle," Li Jun said to the host. "He won't do anything wrong. Now you'd better revive those guards."
By then LiLi's helpers had returned, and he ordered them to carry the guards into the section for guests. The antidote was administered and the drugged escorts awakened. They gazed at each other blearily.
"We must have been tired from the walk to have got drunk so easily."
The others all laughed.
That evening LiLi gave a feast and they spent the night at the inn. The next day he wined and dined them again, and returned the luggage to Song Jiang and the guards. Li Jun and the Tong brothers accompanied the travellers down the mountain. They stopped to rest at Li Jun's house, where he served food and wine. He entertained Song Jiang solicitously, and they pledged each other as blood brothers.
After several days Song Jiang was determined to continue his journey, in spite of Li Jun's urgings to stay. Li Jun gave the escorts some silver, and Song Jiang again put on his cangue, gathered his luggage and bid farewell to Li Jun, Tong Wei and Tong Meng. Leaving Jieyang Ridge, he and the guards proceeded towards Jiangzhou.
They marched for some time. Early in the afternoon they came to a bustling market town. Attracted by a crowd, Song Jiang pushed his way through and saw that they were watching a wandering medicine seller putting on a display with weapons. Song Jiang and the guards halted and joined the audience. The man first showed his skill with a lance. Then, he set that down and gave a demonstration of unarmed combat.
"Excellent," Song Jiang exclaimed.
The man picked up a tray and addressed the crowd. "I've come to your honorable town from afar to ply my trade," he said. "There's nothing starling about my talent. I rely entirely on your good will. Though I've been praised in distant places, you can see that I'm a mere juggler. I'm selling plasters for injured muscles and bones. If you've no need for them, bestow a few silver coins or coppers, so that my journey here will not have been in vain."
He passed the tray around, but no one gave him any money. "Gentlemen, be generous," he pleaded. Again he passed the tray. His audience only stared. They donated not a copper.
Song Jiang could see that the man was upset. He told the guards to give him five ounces of silver. "Drill Instructor," he said, "I'm only a criminal and can't offer anything worthwhile. But take these five bits of silver as token of my esteem. Please don't scorn them as too few."
With the coins in his hand the man said: "In all of famous Jieyang Town there is not one gallant able to recognize my abilities. Only this gentleman, himself under penalty of the law, passing by, presents me with five pieces of silver. How true the verse:

People once laughed at Zheng Yuanbe
For dallying in the Houses of Joy.
But wealth is no mark of nobility,
Nor do clothes in abundance prove chivalry.

These five pieces of silver are worth more to me than fifty. I bow to you, sir. Please tell me your name, that I may spread it everywhere."
"A few paltry coins don't amount to anything, Drill Instructor. There's no need to thank me."
While they were talking, a big fellow parted the crowd and charged towards them. "You varlet," he shouted. "Who's this knave of a prisoner who dares to sully my prestige in Jieyang Town!" Raising both fists, he rushed at Song Jiang. Because of this, a fight ensued, and as a result, dragons churned waves in the Xunyang River, fierce tigers climbed heights in Mount Liang Marsh.

What happened next was that Squire Song set a ladder against the wall and climbed up to see what was going on. A forest of torches revealed a hundred men or more, led by the two new police sergeants from district headquarters. These sergeants were two brothers called Zhao Neng and Zhao De.
The two of them now said: "Squire Song, if you've any sense you'll hand over your son, Song Jiang. We'll take care of him. If you try to prevent his coming to trial, we'll take the lot of you in, yourself included."
"And when is he supposed to have come back?" the Squire asked.
"Quit fooling around!" said Zhao Neng. "There's witnesses saw him come here from old Zhang's, where he'd been drinking. He was followed here. You can't possibly deny it."
Song Jiang, standing beside the ladder, said: "There's no point in arguing with him, father. I'll give myself up, there's no reason not to. I've got friends in the district court, and the provincial court as well. Besides, if there's been an amnesty the sentence will have to be reduced. There's nothing to be gained by talking to these blighters. The Zhaos were always a bad lot. Now these two have managed to wangle themselves a promotion. They've never had any kind feelings towards me. It's a waste of time trying to talk them round."
"But it's all my fault," the Squire wailed.
"Don't worry, father," said Song Jiang. "Maybe it's not such a bad thing if my case comes to trial. Suppose I had gone off to seek refuge among the rivers and lakes, I'd certainly have met up with a bunch of cutthroats and arsonists. Then if I'd been captured, how would I have been able to look you in the eye? As it is, if I'm banished to another province I don't suppose it's forever, one day I shall return. Eventually I shall be there to look after you, father, when you die."
"All right then," the Squire said. "And I shall give a little something to everyone to make sure you get a good place of exile."
So Song Jiang now climbed the ladder and called out: "Stop making such a racket. There's been an amnesty and my crime no longer calls for the death penalty, so wouldn't you two sergeants like to step inside and take a cup of wine or two first? We'll go to the court afterwards."
"Don't try anything on," growled Zhao Neng. "You're not trying to trick us, are you?"
"Do you think I'd want to get my father and brother into trouble?" said Song Jiang. "You're perfectly safe to come in."
Song Jiang descended the ladder and opened the manor gates. He invited the sergeants to sit in the main hall and that night chickens and geese were killed and the wine flowed. The troops and hangers-on were all entertained as well and some silver and other gifts were found for them. The sergeants each received silver ingots amounting to twenty ounces, "for their pains." Indeed this was a case of:

A policeman smells money: he gives you a smile.
No money? Then count on a look full of bile.
That's why they speak of money's good looks,
And say money can laugh at the statute books.

The two sergeants stayed the night at Song Jiang's. Next morning shortly after dawn, they were all ready and waiting outside the courtroom. It had just become light when the magistrate opened the session. The two sergeants brought in the prisoner, Song Jiang. The magistrate, Shi Wenbin, expressed his satisfaction and invited Song Jiang to make a statement. Song Jiang took the brush and wrote as follows:
Unfortunately last year in the autumn having secured the services of Yan Poxi as concubine and finding her to be unsuitable an altercation arose and I accidentally killed her, in a moment of drunkenness. Having previously fled from justice, I now submit myself to the judgment of this court and declare myself willing to accept any punishment without question.
Having read this deposition, the magistrate ordered Song Jiang to be remanded in custody.
Now when they heard Song Jiang had been captured, everyone in the town was sorry for him and went to the government offices to plead for leniency, urging his normal good qualities. The magistrate himself, in his heart, was very much inclined to pardon him. He accepted Song Jiang's deposition and ordered him to be detained but without cangue or fetters. Squire Song bought the goodwill of all and sundry with money and gifts. By this time Mrs. Yan had been dead for six months, so there was no plaintiff. And Third Brother Zhang, the loss of his mistress being already past history, did not see any point in making himself an enemy. The findings were drawn up and after the due sixty days handed over to the court in Jizhou. The governor having reviewed the case and seeing that it fell within the amnesty's terms for clemency ordered twenty strokes of the cane and banishment to Jiangzhou prison camp. The provincial officials all knew Song Jiang and also had received gifts. He was supposed to be beaten before being exiled, but as there was no plaintiff or witness against him everyone was able to help him out and make sure he was not hurt. The court imposed the cangue and an iron seal and two guards were assigned to escort him. No doubt they were called Zhang Something-or-Other and Li Somebody-Else.
When the two policemen bearing the order brought Song Jiang out in front of the courtroom, his father and brother were there waiting for him with wine for the two guards, and some silver which they presented to them. They made Song Jiang change his clothes. When he had tied his pack and put on hemp sandals, Squire Song took his son aside and said by way of encouragement: "Jiangzhou is a good place, rich in fish and rice. I spent good money to get you sent there. You'll be able to manage there very well. I'll send your brother to see you from time to time. And I hope there'll be other people passing that way who can take letters. But in order to get there you'll have to pass the Marshes of Mount Liang. If they come down from the mountain and try to seize you and get you to join them, please don't listen or you'll give people reason to call you disloyal and unfaithful. Try to bear this in mind always. Travel slowly. If heaven is kind, you'll soon come back and be reunited with your father and brother."
Song Jiang was in tears as he said goodbye to his father. His younger brother accompanied him on the first stage of his journey. Before they parted, Song Jiang said to his brother: "Don't grieve for me. The only thing that bothers me about this sentence is that I have to turn my back on hearth and home when father is getting on in years. Brother, please keep a constant watch on things at home, don't on my account come to Jiangzhou and leave father all alone with no one to look after him. I have many friends among the rivers and lakes fraternity who'd all be willing to help me, I'll always have somewhere to go for money if I need it. If heaven smiles on me I shall most certainly be back one day!"
His brother wept as he said goodbye and then returned home to look after their old father. We shall leave him there.
Song Jiang and the two guards proceeded on their way. Since they'd had money from him, and since he was generally accounted a good fellow, they were very helpful to him on the journey.
After one day's travelling they stopped at an inn, where they cooked themselves some food and Song Jiang bought wine for the others. Song Jiang said to them: "I'll be frank with you. The way we are taking at the moment lies quite close to the Marshes of Mount Liang. There are some brave men up there on the mountain who, if they hear my name, are liable to come down and seize me. I'm afraid they might rough you up a bit. Tomorrow let's get up a bit earlier and choose a smaller road — even if we have to walk a bit further it will be worth it."
"If you hadn't said anything we wouldn't have known," they said gratefully. "We know some roundabout ways, you can be sure we won't run into them."
This is what they agreed in the evening, and next morning they rose and breakfasted at dawn. When they left the inn they chose an obscure route. But when they'd gone about ten miles, a group of men appeared on the hillside in front of them. Song Jiang cursed his luck. Who should it be but Liu Tang, the Red-Haired Devil, with fifty men, bent on killing his guards? Zhang and Li were terrified. They knelt cowering on the path, trying to make themselves as inconspicuous as possible.
Song Jiang called out: "Hold, brother, who do you want to kill?"
"Those two cowards, of course. What do you expect?" Liu Tang replied.
"Don't dirty your hands, give the sword to me and let me do it!"
The two unfortunates bewailed their fate. "This time we're really in for it!" they exclaimed.
"But why do you want to kill these two guards?" Song Jiang asked as he took the sword.
"Our friends on the mountain sent out spies who heard about your arrest. We wanted to go and get you out of Yuncheng gaol, but then we heard you weren't there any longer and weren't too badly off. Later we heard you'd been banished to Jiangzhou, but we were afraid we might get the wrong road, so everyone was told to go in different directions to lie in wait for you and invite you up the mountain. Surely the best thing to do with these two is to kill them?"
"This is not something which will help me, you know. On the contrary, you are trying to ruin my reputation. If you're so determined to destroy me, you'd better take my life. I'd rather die." So saying, Song Jiang held the sword to his own throat.
The Red-Haired Devil hurriedly stopped him, saying: "Please, don't be so hasty!" and took the sword from him.
Song Jiang said: "If you have any feeling for me, let me go to Jiangzhou prison camp and wait till I have served out my sentence. Then when I return I will come and see you."
The Red-Haired Devil said: "But I dare not listen to that. The military commander, 'Professor' Wu Yong, and Colonel Hua are waiting to greet you up on the main road. Please allow me to invite you to discuss matters with them."
Song Jiang said: "But that's exactly what I intended. I want to discuss it all with you."
Soldiers were sent on to report and in no time at all the Professor and Colonel Hua were seen galloping towards them, followed by a dozen riders. They dismounted, courtesies were exchanged, and then Colonel Hua said: "Why have they not removed the cangue?"
"Dear brother," Song Jiang said, "what are you saying? This is a penalty imposed by our national law, how can you dare to touch it?"
"I understand your meaning," said the Professor pleasantly. "It's quite all right, we won't make any attempt to keep you on the mountain. But Leader Chao Gai has not seen you for such a long time, he really would like to have a heart-to-heart talk with you. He invites you to spend just a little time on the mountain. After that we'll send you on your way."
"Professor, you're the only one who understands me," said Song Jiang. After helping up the two guards, he said: "I don't want them to have any cause for fear. Even if I were to die, please do not harm them."
The two guards said: "We owe you our lives, Registrar."
The whole body of men now left the road and went to an area of reedbeds beside the water. Already there was a boat there waiting. When they arrived at the main route up to the stronghold, mountain sedans were summoned to carry them. They paused for a rest at the Golden Pavilion. Men were sent to every part of the mountain to summon the leaders to a meeting and they all gathered in the assembly hall. Chao Gai spoke: "Ever since that time you saved our lives in Yuncheng, dear brother, and we found sanctuary here, not a day has passed without my recalling our indebtedness to you. If you will allow me now to invite you to honour our little place with your presence, my gratitude will know no bounds."
Song Jiang replied: "Since we parted and I killed that trollop and fled to the rivers and lakes a year and a half has passed. It was my intention to pay you a visit here on the mountain, only I happened to run into Shi Yong at a country inn and he gave me a letter from home which said my father had passed away. Actually it was all because my father feared I might join you and enter the band — that's why he sent me the letter to get me to go home. Although I have been sentenced, I have received great kindness from all the authorities and have got off very lightly. Now I'm banished to Jiangzhou, which is a pretty good place. I come here in obedience to your summons, which I would not dream of refusing. But now that I have seen you I cannot stay long, so let us part immediately."
"Why such a hurry?" Chao Gai said. "Please stay a little longer."
They both sat down together. Song Jiang told his guards to sit behind him and not leave his sight.
Chao Gai had the various leaders come and pay their respects to Song Jiang. They sat in two rows, while the lesser chiefs poured for them. Chao Gai took the cup first and then passed it to all in turn, from the military commanders, "Professor" Wu and Taoist Gongsun Sheng down to the Daytime Rat. After only a few rounds Song Jiang rose to his feet and said: "Dear friends, much as I appreciate your kindness to me, I am a sentenced criminal and I must not tarry here. It is time for me to say goodbye."
"Your attitude is really very strange," said Chao Gai. "I know you don't want any harm to come to the two guards, but why not just give them some money and send them away? They can say they were attacked by us here on Mount Liang, no one can reasonably punish them for that."

"Don't talk like that!" Song Jiang said. "That's not the way to help me out. Indeed it's the way to ruin me. I've an old father at home, I must always remember that. I have never afforded him all the honour he deserves. How can I violate his commands, how can I consent to sully his name? Previously I got carried away and I really was on the point of joining you. But heaven ordained that I should run into Shi Yong at that country inn and thus I was led to go home. My father explained why he thought it better for me to receive my sentence and suffer exile, he was most insistent on it. Just before I left he again urged me not to sacrifice the family honour to my own convenience, never to disgrace the family name, to spare my father such shame and horror. For this reason he told me and my brother that if we had no regard for his wishes we would be going against heaven's will; if we broke his commands we would show ourselves to be unfilial and dishonourable men, and in that case for what purpose had we lived? So if you are not willing now to let me leave, I would prefer to receive death at your hands." When he finished speaking, the tears flooded down and he flung himself on the ground.

Chao Gai, the Professor and Taoist Gongsun Sheng together raised him up and said: "If you are so determined to go to Jiangzhou, then be at ease for this one day and tomorrow morning we will escort you down the mountain."

Over and over again they begged him to stay and drink with them just for one day. They wanted the cangue to be removed but he would have none of it. He insisted also on remaining with his two guards.

Song Jiang did stay that night, but he was up early next morning, impatient to be off. The Professor said: "I want to tell you something. I have a dear friend who works as a warder at the Jiangzhou prison camp. He is Dai Zong, generally known as Superintendent Dai. He has a certain magic power: he can travel three hundred miles in a day, which is why people call him the Magic Messenger. He's entirely honourable and generous. Last night I wrote this letter for you to take. When you're there you can get to know him. Then if you have any problem he can let us know."

Since they could not hold onto Song Jiang, the leaders gave him a farewell feast. A tray of gold and silver was presented to him and the guards also got twenty taels. Then, carrying Song Jiang's luggage for him, they escorted him down the mountain before one by one taking their leave of him. The Professor and Colonel Hua accompanied him further, another six or seven miles down the road. Then they too went back to the mountain.

So Song Jiang with his escort took the road to Jiangzhou. The two guards, having seen that enormous army on the mountain and observed how they all bowed down before Song Jiang, and having just been given all that money, took the greatest possible care of him during the journey. They had been travelling something more than a fortnight when they came to a spot where a steep hill faced them. The guards said: "Good! Once we're past this hill it'll be the river, and after that the route to Jiangzhou is all by water. Not far to go at all."

Song Jiang said: "The weather is oppressive. Let's get this hill over with first and then look for somewhere to stay."

"Right you are," they said. They pressed on up the hill. It took them half a day's march but when they reached the top they were in sight of an inn on the other side, nestling against the hillside, with a gnarled old tree beside the door and surrounded by thatched huts. When they reached that tree's shade the inn sign was plain to see. It was a sight that brought great relief to Song Jiang's heart and he said to the guards: "We're truly hungry and thirsty. It turns out there's an inn here, so let's get some wine before we go on."

They went in. The two policemen put down their baggage and leant their staves against the wall. Song Jiang left them the place of honour and sat down at the bottom of the table. They waited a long time and no one came out, so Song Jiang shouted: "Can't you see there are customers?"

"Coming! Coming!" came a shout from inside and a big fellow emerged from a side-room. Here's how he looked:

Red curly beard in a horrible tangle,
Staring red eyes like a terrifying tiger,
With exactly the look of a fiend from the underworld,
It's no wonder they dubbed him Hell's Executioner.

This man who came out was wearing a torn head-cloth, a cotton vest which left his arms bare and a piece of linen wrapped about his waist. He looked at Song Jiang's party and barked out a salute. "How much wine would you like, gentlemen?" he asked.

"We've been travelling and we're hungry," Song Jiang said. "Have you any meat in the house?"

"All we've got is boiled beef and rough country wine," the man replied.

"That'll do fine. Bring us two catties of beef and a measure of wine, to begin with."

"Don't take it amiss, sirs, but here in the mountains what we say is 'pay first before you drink'."

"Pay first before you drink," Song Jiang repeated. "That's all right by me. Just wait while I find you the money." He opened his bundle and took out some change. The man standing on one side watched surreptitiously. Seeing the pack so deep and heavy, so full of substance, he secretly exulted. He took Song Jiang's money and went inside to fill a jug of wine and cut the meat. He brought out the meat and put down three bowls and three pairs of chopsticks. He then poured the wine.

The three men talked as they ate. "Recently among the rivers and lakes there are said to be some nasty customers around. Many a good man has fallen foul of them. Maybe the wine or food is drugged and knocks them out. Then they're cut up and the flesh is used for pie fillings. But it's hard to believe. How could such things be true?"

The innkeeper laughed sardonically. "If that's what you think, you'd better not eat or drink. Of course my stuff is all laced with drugs!"

Song Jiang laughed. "Our friend here heard what we were saying, so he's having a joke with us!"

"Let's have some warm wine," the guards said.

"I'll go and warm it then, if that's what you want," the innkeeper said.

When he returned he poured three bowls of warm wine. Hungry and thirsty as they were from the walking, how could they hold back when it was right in front of them? Each drank a bowl right off. Then suddenly the two guards' eyes were popping out of their heads, saliva began to dribble from the corners of their mouths. After swaying first this way, then that, they pitched over. Song Jiang jumped up, exclaiming: "How can you be so drunk with just one bowl?" He took a step forward to help them up, but then without warning his own head began to spin and his vision blurred, and he crashed to the floor. They stared at each other helplessly, unable to move hand or foot.

"Bloody hell!" the innkeeper said. "No business for days, but now heaven's sent me three nice pieces of stuff!" He dragged Song Jiang out first and got him into the work room under the cliff and onto the bench. Then he went back and got the other two. He returned for the packs and took them to the back. When he opened them and saw that they were full of money, he said: "I've been running this place for a good many years now, but I never came across a convict like this one. I wonder how a criminal like this comes to have so much loot? I guess he must have dropped down from heaven as my reward!" He tied the bundles again and went to the door to await the return of his assistants to help him with the cutting up.

He stood there at the door quite a while, but he didn't see a soul until three men appeared at the bottom of the hill and began to climb steadily towards him. He recognized them and greeted them hurriedly: "Where are you off to, then?" One of the three, a large man, said: "We've come up here to meet someone, we reckon he ought to have reached here by now. We've been looking out for him down there every day but we haven't seen him, he must have got held up somewhere."

"Who exactly is it you're expecting?"

"Someone pretty remarkable."

"But who is this remarkable person?"

"Prepare for a surprise then. It's the Yuncheng registrar, Song Jiang!"

"You don't mean the one who's known among the rivers and lakes as the Opportune Rain?"

"The very same."

"But what's he doing in these parts?"

"I don't exactly know myself. The other day a friend from Jizhou turned up and he said, 'For some reasons Registrar Song Jiang of Yuncheng has been tried in Jizhou and sentenced to exile in the Jiangzhou prison camp.' I worked it out that he's got to pass here, there's no other road. I often meant to go and see him in Yuncheng, but now he's coming here I don't want to miss such an opportunity to make his acquaintance, that's why I've been waiting down there for several days. Today these two friends and I thought we'd stroll up the mountain to buy a bowl of wine from you and have a little chat. How's business at the moment?"

"To tell the truth, the last few months there's scarcely been any business at all. Today, though, heaven smiled on me and I've got my hands on three nice pieces of stuff, and a bit of loot thrown in."

"What sort of people were they, these three?"

"Two policemen and a convict."

"You haven't started on them yet, have you?"

"I just took them into the workshop and I'm waiting for the lads to come back and help me with the cutting up."

"Would you let me have a look at them first?"

The four of them went into the operating room under the cliff. There on the work bench Song Jiang and the two guards were laid out with their heads hanging over the edge. The big stranger looked at Song Jiang carefully, but he didn't know him of course. Nor did the golden seals on his cheeks provide a clue. But after a moment's consideration he had an idea: "Get the policemen's packs. We can look at the official order. That should tell us something."

"Right!" The innkeeper went and got the packs from the back. When they opened them they found a great deal of silver inside. On top was the money they'd been given recently. They opened the document pouch and looked at the order. "Bloody hell!" they exclaimed.

"Heaven must have ordained it, that we should come up here today," the big man exclaimed. Think if you'd started work a little sooner! You came so close to a terrible accident that would have ended our brother's life!"

It was a case of:

When anger or revenge must strike you cannot run away.
What chance will bring or fate ordain you cannot ever say.
You cannot wear out iron shoes, however hard you try,
What comes will come without your help, no use to reason why.

"Quick, go and get the antidote," the big man urged. "You've got to revive our friend straight away."

The innkeeper was equally horrified. He hurriedly mixed the antidote and returned with the big man to the workshop. First they removed the cangue. Then, holding Song Jiang upright, they poured the mixture down his throat. After that the four of them carried him out into the front saloon. With the big man supporting him, Song Jiang gradually came round. He looked at all the people in front of him with a blank expression, failing to recognize any of them. The big man asked his two friends to take his place while he pressed his knuckles to his forehead and prostrated himself.

"But who are you?" Song Jiang asked. "Am I still dreaming?"

The innkeeper now prostrated himself also. Song Jiang acknowledged the courtesy and said: "Please get up, both of you. Where in fact am I? May I be so bold as to ask your names?"

"My name is Li Jun," the big man answered. "I'm from Luzhou. I work as a pilot on the Yangtze river. Being as I am a river expert, they call me the White-Water Dragon. The publican here is from these parts, from Jieyang Hill. He's a smuggler by trade, name of Li Li, but people also call him Hell's Executioner. The other two are from the banks of the river Yangtze, near here. They're salt smugglers and they're here now on business, they've been staying with me. They're also experienced at swimming and handling river boats. They're brothers; this one is Tong Wei, alias the Cave Dragon, and the other is Tong Meng, alias the River Rider."

The two brothers prostrated themselves before Song Jiang four times.

"I was unconscious until just now, how do you know my name?" said Song Jiang.

"I've got this friend," the White-Water Dragon began, "he's a businessman and he's just returned from Jizhou. He mentioned your name and said you'd been sentenced to exile in Jiangzhou prison camp. Well, so many times I'd thought of going to pay my respects to you in your home town, only my fate never permitted it. When I heard you were going to Jiangzhou and had to pass by here, I went and waited for you at the bottom of the hill. Five or six days I waited but I didn't see you. Today on a lucky impulse these two friends and I came up here to get ourselves a cup of wine. We fell into conversation with the Executioner and what he said gave me a start, I can tell you! We rushed into the workshop right away, but I didn't know you, see, so after giving it some pretty hard thought I suggested we take a look at the official order, and then we knew it was you. Do you mind if I ask you a question? I heard you were arrested in Yuncheng. But why have you been banished to Jiangzhou?"

Song Jiang duly gave them a full account of the killing of Yan Poxi, and everything up to the time Shi Yong gave him the letter at the inn and he went home and was sentenced and banished to Jiangzhou. The four men kept sighing in sympathy.

"Why don't you stay here instead of going off to suffer hardship in Jiangzhou prison?" the Executioner asked.

"The people on Mount Liang kept on begging me to stay there, but I wouldn't because I didn't want to disgrace my old father," Song Jiang said. "So how can you think I would stay here?"

The White-Water Dragon said to the Executioner: "You see? A man of honour can't be made to bend the rules. You'd better go and revive those guards."

The Executioner called his assistants, who had returned by now, and they carried the two guards out into the front room and administered the antidote. When they came round, they stared at each other and said: "It must have been weariness from all that travelling. How else could we have got drunk so quickly?" Everyone laughed.

That evening the Executioner provided wine for everyone and they stayed at his house. Next day there was more wine and food, and Song Jiang and the guards were given back their baggage. Having said goodbye, Song Jiang, the White-Water Dragon and the Tong brothers went down the hill together as far as the White-Water Dragon's house, where they stayed. Wine and food were brought out and they were entertained royally. The White-Water Dragon treated Song Jiang like a brother and begged him to stay a few days longer. But Song Jiang was determined to go. When he saw it was impossible to persuade him, the White-Water Dragon presented the guards with silver. Song Jiang was fitted with the cangue again, the bags were packed and they said goodbye to the White-Water Dragon and his two friends. Turning their backs on Jieyang Hill they took the road for Jiangzhou.

The three had marched without pause for the first part of the day when around noon they came to a place full of people and noise, a bustling market town. When they reached the centre, they found a crowd gathered round in a circle to watch something. Song Jiang pushed through the crowd to get closer to whatever was going on and found it was a practitioner of martial arts and peddler of patent medicine. They stood and watched him as he performed with the staff. After a while the artist laid aside his staff and gave a demonstration with his fists. Song Jiang applauded: "Great staff play, and great boxing!" The man took up a plate and said: "I've come a long way to bring my art to you good people. My skill is nothing special, of course, but I trust in your bounty. True, I have received praise in many quarters, but to your discerning eyes I probably seem a common mountebank. Still, if you want an efficacious ointment, I have some here. If you've no need of ointments, then I would ask you to donate a few ounces of silver or a copper coin or two, just so my visit will not have been altogether in vain."

He went among the crowd with the plate, but not one cent did he receive. "Good sirs," he began again, "pardon me, I pray, if I trouble your generosity!" He passed round again with the plate, but the people just stared blankly, not one coin did they give him.

Song Jiang, seeing his embarrassment when he had passed the plate twice to absolutely no effect, told his guards to take out five taels of silver. To the performer, he said: "Master, I'm just a convict, I haven't got much to give you. These five taels of silver are just a token of my good will, please do not despise them."

The man took the silver and after weighing it in his hand pronounced: "In the whole of Jieyang City, it seems, a great place like this, there's not a single connoisseur who can show his appreciation. Only this kind gentleman, quite contrary to the nature of things since he himself is subject to a judicial sentence and merely in transit here, presents me with five taels of good silver. It puts me in mind of the verse:

They said that the poet had got it all wrong
Who went to the brothel to peddle a song.
But many rich men with their riches won't part;
It isn't fine clothes that show a big heart!

These five taels are truly equal to fifty from someone else. I humbly bow down to you, sir, and beg to inquire your name, that I may proclaim it wherever I go."

Song Jiang replied: "Master, even if this paltry sum were worth so much, there wouldn't be any need to thank me."

But while they were speaking, a big stranger thrust his way through the crowd, bellowing: "Who the bloody hell is this? Where've you come from and where are you bloody going? What d'you mean by coming here and trying to ruin my reputation in Jieyang?" Then up went his fists and he took a swing at Song Jiang.

If this fight had not taken place, things might well have been different. We might never have seen how:

In the river Yangtze dragons churn the waves;
In the Marshes of Mount Liang, tigers rush the slopes.

OLD SONG put a ladder against the wall, and looking over saw about a hundred men in the light of torches. In front of them were the two Inspectors who had been recently appointed at Yuncheng County. They were brothers, called Zhao Neng and Zhao De, and they called out, "Old Song! You will know our business, and we hope that you will surrender your son Song Jiang. We will treat him well. If he does not surrender we shall have to arrest you, his father."

"When did Song Jiang return?" asked Old Song.

"Do not talk nonsense," said Inspector Zhao Neng. "A man saw him this afternoon at Zhang's wine shop, and followed him here. You need not try to hide him."

Song Jiang was standing at the foot of the ladder, and said, "Father, do not talk with them any further. I will surrender as I have many friends at the yamen, and I have already been pardoned. Why plead with these fellows? They are both wellknown to be rascals. They have suddenly been made Inspectors, but what do they know about reason. There is no good feeling between them and me, so it is a waste of time to talk with them."

"I have brought you trouble," said Old Song to his son.

"Do not let that upset you. If they go into my case it cannot do any harm. If I escape now I should be arrested eventually, and should have no further chance of seeing you. If I am now arrested, and even banished to some other district I shall at least eventually return, and meet you again. I should be able to be with you at your last moments."

"As you look upon it like this," said Old Song, "I will myself bribe the officials concerned, and see that you have every advantage."

Song Jiang now mounted the ladder, and called out, "Do not make such a noise. My crime has been pardoned so that I cannot be executed. Will you two Inspectors come inside our humble farmhouse, and drink wine with me? Tomorrow I will go with you to the yamen."

"You need not attempt to entice us into your trap," said inspector Zhao Neng.

"Why should I implicate my father and brother by such a trick? You can come inside without any suspicion," said Song Jiang. He then descended the ladder, opened the farmyard gate, and invited the two Inspectors indoors. They were entertained to wine, chicken, and goose. The soldiers were provided with food, and also money. Old Song presented the two Inspectors with twenty taels of silver. That night they all slept at the farmhouse. At dawn the following day the party started out for the town. When they reached the yamen it was broad daylight, and the magistrate occupied the bench. He asked Song Jiang to state his case, and listened to the following statement. "I did a great wrong to take Yan Poxi as my concubine, and once we quarreled after taking too much wine, and I happened to kill her quite unintentionally. I escaped but have now surrendered for justice, and will confess the crime as stated."

The magistrate ordered that the prisoner be detained in the jail. All the yamen employees were sorry to see Song Jiang as a prisoner. Many of them spoke to the magistrate of the good things Song Jiang had done in the past, and begged him to show mercy to the prisoner. The magistrate was inclined to be lenient, and he gave orders that the prisoner should have no cangue or be chained up in the prison. Old Song bribed all the officials concerned. Madame Yan had died about six months ago so that there was now no one to press the accusation of murder. As Yan Poxi was also dead her old lover Zhang Wenyuan had now no enmity against Song Jiang. So after sixty days the case was referred to Jizhou Prefecture for a sentence. The Prefect considered the case as reported by dispatch, and in view of the Emperor's decree he passed a light sentence. Song Jiang was to receive twenty blows with a bamboo, be branded, and transferred to a prison at Jiangzhou. But as the officials at Jizhou had all been bribed, they reported that the sentence had been carried out although nothing was done to Song Jiang.

But he was given a small cangue, and sent to Jiangzhou under the escort of two men—Zhang Qian, and Li Wan. Old Song and his son Song Qing were waiting outside the yamen for the escort, and invited them to take a final meal at an inn there. Money was presented to the escort, and Song Jiang was given new clothes, new hempen shoes, and a bundle of useful articles. Old Song took Song Jiang to one side and there said to him, "I know that at Jiangzhou there is plenty of rice and fish, and I will bribe the officials there to supply you with food. I shall send your brother there with money, and he will see you often. On your way you will pass close to Liangshan Marsh, but if the brigands there capture you I hope that you will not join them as people would abuse your name and say that you were both disloyal and unfilial. This point you must not forget. Make no haste on the way. Heaven will watch over you, and you will soon return home, and be reunited to your father and younger brother."

Song Jiang was much affected and burst into tears and thus took leave of his father. Song Qing accompanied him for the first stage of the road. When they separated at last Song Jiang said to his brother, "I am now a prisoner, and while I am away I want you to look after our father, and never mind coming to Jiangzhou to see me. I know a great many bandits, and they will help me. I can easily get all the money I want. If Heaven takes pity, I shall return home some day."

When they took leave of each other Song Qing wept bitterly. He returned home, and looked after his father in accordance with Song Jiang's wish.

The escort and Song Jiang continued their journey and because Song Jiang had given them plenty of money, they treated him well. One evening when they were at an inn Song Jiang said, "I will not deceive you. We shall pass quite close to Liangshan Marsh, where there are many brave men, and when they hear that I am passing they will perhaps try to liberate me. So tomorrow it would be better for us to start early, and travel by small side roads even though they take us a little out of our way."

"Sir, if you do not tell us we should not know it. But we know the side roads, and shall not meet those men." They discussed their plans, and the next morning they got up about 4 A.M. After breakfast they set out, and went by a side road. They had traveled about ten li when they saw a company of men coming round a mountain just in front. Song Jiang said it meant trouble; as he recognized among them Liu Tang, the Red Haired Demon. The escort was afraid, and knelt down.

"Younger brother," said Song Jiang, "whom do you want to kill?"

"Elder brother," replied Liu Tang, "had we not better kill those two fellows at once?"

"You need not soil your hands in that way," said Song Jiang. "Give me your sword, and I will kill them myself."

Liu Tang handed him the sword, and Song Jiang then asked, 'Why do you wish to kill them?"

"I am acting according to the orders of our chief on the mountain who knew all about your case. We wanted to go to Yuncheng County and rescue you from prison, but we then heard that you were not in prison, and were being well treated. Afterwards we heard that you were to be escorted to Jiangzhou so we guarded all the roads so that we could take you to our mountain. Why not kill these two men?"

"This is the way you will disgrace me, as I shall thereby lose my reputation of loyalty. I would much rather die myself than suffer disgrace." So saying he took the sword to cut his own throat. Liu Tang sprang forward, and caught him by the arms saying, "Elder brother, do not be hasty. Let us discuss matters." He took the sword from Song Jiang who said, "Younger brother, if you respect me please let me go to the prison at Jiangzhou, and when I have served my sentence I will certainly visit you, and discuss matters with you."

"I cannot take the responsibility for such a course," said Liu Tang. "On the main road there are Wu Yong and Hua Rong whom I will ask to come here to decide this matter."

"I am quite determined whatever you do."

One of the brigands was dispatched, and in a short time Wu Yong and Hua Rong came galloping up. They both dismounted, and after the usual salutations Hua Rong asked, "Why has your cangue not been removed?"

"That is a legal procedure with prisoners. Who would dare to infringe the regulations?" asked Song Jiang.

Wu Yong laughed and said, "I understand your idea. It is easy for us to let you proceed on your way, but our chief Chao Gai has not met you for a long time, and he would like to have a confidential talk with you. So I request you to come with us up the mountain, and after the interview you can go your own way."

"You have grasped my idea," said Song Jiang. "In case however I die I hope that you will not punish my escort. I want them to be at ease."

"Sir, we depend on you saving our lives," said the two men.

They all then set out, and soon came to the lake where they found a boat waiting for them. They crossed the lake, and found sedan chairs waiting and were carried up the mountain. Men were sent in all directions to summon all the leaders to the assembly hall for a conference. When they had assembled Song Jiang was conducted to the hall where Chao Gai addressed him. "Formerly you saved our lives at Yuncheng County, and we escaped to this place, and we have been thinking of your generosity ever since. Since we arrived here many gallant heroes have joined us on your esteemed recommendation. This has added luster to our straw sheds, but we have had no opportunity of repaying your benevolence."

"Since I left you," said Song Jiang, "I killed a bad woman, and escaped to the wilds where I have been wandering for about six months. I have often wished to come here to pay my respects to you, and on the way here I met a man named Shi Yong in a village inn who had a letter for me stating that my father had died. But it was my father's desire that I should not enter your band, and when I received the letter I at once returned home. As to my case I was well treated by the officials, and was not punished severely. I was banished to Jiangzhou which is not a bad place. When I heard of your orders I dare not decline to come here, and now that I have met you I cannot stay here, but must proceed on my way as the time limit is nearly up."

"Why be in such a hurry?" said Chao Gai. "Please take a seat."

So they all sat down, and Song Jiang asked his escort to stand behind his chair. Chao Gai asked all the leaders to approach and salute Song Jiang, and after this they all took their seats. After they had been drinking wine for some time Song Jiang at last arose and said, "It is obvious that you regard me with respect, but as I am a criminal I cannot stay here and must now take my leave of you."

"Why feel so estranged?" asked Chao Gai. "As you do not wish your escort to be injured we will give the men money, and they can then return, and report that we bandits at Liangshan Marsh have captured you, and so they will not be blamed."

"Do not talk like that," said Song Jiang. "Such a procedure would not be to my credit, but would bring trouble. I must be filial, and respect my father's wishes, or otherwise he will be implicated. It was Heaven's will that I should meet Shi Yong and return home. If now I stay here I shall be opposing Heaven, and disobeying my father, and shall have a bad reputation. If you will not agree to let me depart it would be better if you kill me at once." He then burst into tears, and knelt down on the ground.

The leaders raised him up and said, "As you are determined to go to Jiangzhou, we ask you to stay here for the night only, and early tomorrow morning you can depart." They wanted to take off his cangue, but he would not let them do so. They all sat down to drink more wine.

The following morning when he was preparing to leave Wu Yong spoke to him, "Please listen to me now. I have a very good friend at Jiangzhou who is superintendent of the two prisons there. He is called Dai Zong. He knows Taoist magics, and can travel about two hundred fifty li in one day so that people call him the Divine Traveler. He distributes wealth in good cause. Last night I wrote a letter to him which I am going to give you, and when you reach your destination you must make his acquaintance. Whatever happens you can make him your confident."

A feast had been prepared for Song Jiang, and the leaders also presented him with money. They also gave the escort twenty taels of silver. The leaders accompanied Song Jiang down the mountain. Wu Yong and Hua Rong crossed the lake, and went with him about eight li along the road before they bade him good-by.

Song Jiang and his escort continued on their way to Jiangzhou, and they had been traveling for about two weeks when they came to a place where there was a high mountain. The escort said that the mountain was called Jieyang and after crossing it they would come to the Xunyang River where they could get a boat to take them for the remainder of the journey to Jiangzhou.

"As the weather is fine just now," said Song Jiang, "let us now cross the mountain and find a place to rest on the other side."

The escort agreed to this, and they all set out. It was almost noon when they reached the summit, and from there they saw an inn at the foot of the mountain. In front of the inn were several large trees, and many grass huts were around it. In the shade of the trees was a flag flying. Song Jiang was much pleased and said, "We will stop at the inn for some refreshment, and then push on."

When they reached the inn they all entered, and the escort put their sticks against the wall. They all sat down at a table with Song Jiang in the inferior seat. They waited for a long time, but nobody came to attend to their wants. So Song Jiang called out, "Is there nobody in charge here?"

From an inner room a voice answered, "Coming! Coming!" and a very big man came out of a side room. He had a red complexion with bushy whiskers, and his eyes were bloodshot and as fierce as a tiger's. On his head was a tattered turban, and his gown was without sleeves. Around his waist was a large cummerbund. He called out, "How much wine do you want?"

"We are very hungry," said Song Jiang. "What kind of meat have you got?"

"I have some beef and strong liquor."

"That is fine. Bring us two jin of beef and a horn of wine," ordered Song Jiang.

"Do not think me strange, but I make it a rule to have the money paid in advance with the order."

"That is all right. I will pay you first. Wait a bit, and I will get the money." Song Jiang opened his bundle, and took out some money. The man stealthily looked at the bundle, and saw that it was very heavy at which he was much pleased as he knew there must be plenty of silver there. He took the silver from Song Jiang, and went into another room, and soon returned with the beef and wine. The three men dined together, and their conversation was about the bandits abroad, who would sell drugged food and wine to travelers and rob them of all their wealth and make pies out of their flesh. One of them said he did not believe such tales.

The proprietor of the inn heard this and laughingly said, "You had better be careful because this food and wine may be drugged."

Song Jiang laughed and said, "So you are ridiculing us for talking about drugged food."

"Elder brother, a cup of warm wine would be much better," said one of the escort.

"I will go and get some warmed wine for you." The man then went, and soon returned with three cups of hot wine. The three guests were hungry, and when they saw the food and wine they only thought of eating and drinking same. They soon emptied their cups, and almost immediately the escort fell back with saliva running from their mouths. Upon seeing this Song Jiang jumped up, and said, "What is the matter with you two? Are you drunk after drinking only two cups of wine?" He stepped forward to raise them up, but he was also feeling faint, and fell down. As they all lay there they all looked at each other, but not one of them could move or get up.

The inn proprietor said, "I am sorry. For many days I have found no business, but today Heaven has sent me these three." He first seized Song Jiang and dragged him into a room at the back where he placed him on the block of wood where men were usually cut up. He then dragged the other two men to the same place. He also took their baggage, and put it in another room, where he opened it and found the silver. He said, "I have kept this inn for many years, but have never before seen a prisoner with so much money. What is the reason for this? It must be a gift from Heaven for me!" He then fastened up the baggage, and went to the door of the inn to look for his assistants. But although he glanced in all directions he could not see a single one anywhere. He however saw three travelers coming up the road towards the inn. He recognized them, and went forward to meet them. He asked 'Elder brothers, where are you going?"

One of the tall men replied, "We are going up the mountain to meet a certain person, and he ought to be here today. We have been waiting for several days, and cannot understand what has delayed him."

"Who is the man you are waiting for?"

"He is a certain famous man."

"What is his name?"

"I think you know him. He is Song Jiang of Yuncheng County and is coming from Jizhou Prefecture."

"I have heard of him, but what is he traveling this way for?"

"I did not know before, but today a friend of mine has arrived from Jizhou, and he said that Song Jiang has been banished to the prison at Jiangzhou, but he did not know for what reason. I think he must come this way. I have often thought of going to Yuncheng County to make his acquaintance, but as he is passing this way now I must meet him. That is why I come here today with my two friends. How has business been with you this last month?"

"I will be frank with you," replied the inn proprietor. "During the last few months I have done no business, but today Heaven has sent me three men with many things."

"What kind of men?" hurriedly asked the man.

"Two men escorting a prisoner."

"Is the prisoner a little fat man with a dark complexion?"

"He is not very tall and has a swarthy complexion."

"Have you killed him?" hurriedly asked the visitor.

"I dragged him into the room, but have not cut him up as my assistants are absent."

"Let me have a look at him."

The four men went into the room, and there were the three men lying on the cutting-up-block. But they did not recognize Song Jiang so the visitor said they would examine the baggage, and read the official dispatch. When this had been done the man reading the dispatch said, "Heaven has directed me to come here today. If I had been even a little late my elder brother would have been cut up." He gave orders for an anti-drug to be administered to revive Song Jiang. This was quickly done, and he was carried into the other room and seated in a chair. Soon he opened his eyes, and looked around. The visitor saluted him, and Song Jiang asked, "Who are you? Am I not still dreaming? What is this place? What is your name?"

The visitor replied, "I am Li Jun of Luzhou, and I am captain of a boat that sails on the Yangtze River. I have a good knowledge of currents, etc., and so people call me the 'Muddy Water Dragon.' This man is the innkeeper and he robs travelers who come this way. His name is Li Li, and his nickname is 'Hell's Judge.'"

They then explained how the event had happened, and Song Jiang told them all about his adventures. They pressed Song Jiang to stay there instead of going to prison, but again he stood firm and declined their offers. They administered restoratives to the escort, and they soon recovered. When they came round they said, "We are very unlucky as we got drunk so easily."

At this the others all laughed. That night they all slept at the inn. The next day they were invited to Li Jun's house where they stayed for a few days then Song Jiang and his escort set out on their journey again.

The three men traveled until about 11 A.M. when they came to a market town. The street was very crowded, and they saw a crowd forming a ring round some object. Song Jiang forced his way through the men, and saw in the ring a man with a stave who was selling medicine. He watched the man performing with his stick, and when that was finished Song Jiang applauded his skill. The man took a tray, and addressed the crowd, "I come from a distant place, for certain business. I am perhaps not well skilled in military arts, but I hope that you will praise me to your friends so that they will buy my drugs. If you want the medicine you can buy some now, but if you do not care for the medicine then please contribute a small amount of money, and not let my tray be quite empty." He passed the tray round the crowd, but nobody gave money. "I hope you gentlemen will be generous in assisting me." He again walked round with the tray, but nobody contributed even a copper.

Song Jiang seeing this asked his escort to let him have five taels of silver, and offering it to the man said, "I am a criminal, and cannot give you much. This small amount will however indicate that I hold you in respect."

The man held the money aloft on the palm of his hand, and said, "It is strange that in this town of Jieyang Town there is not one man who appreciates my skill. This benefactor in passing through the town however presents me with this money. In the words of the poet

'Men laughed at Zheng Yuanhe,
Who lavishly spent his money;
Such men are not always rich,
Or dressed in the best of clothes.'

"This silver is equal to ten times the amount from a wealthy man. I salute you my benefactor, and request your name so that I can spread your fame abroad."

"Sir, do not talk about it, as my gift is so trifling," said Song Jiang.

While this was happening a big man had pushed his way through the crowd, and he now said to Song Jiang, "What fellow are you? Where do you come from? How dare you come here, and try to cast our town in the shade by offering money?" He raised his fists to strike Song Jiang.

Dragons now were stirred to fury,
But they found their destiny.

135

Unrestrained Mu Hong the Unstoppable Chases Timely Rain Song Jiang; Xunyang River Boatmen Riot on the Xunyang river in the Night & the pilot acts up

"Just because he can do a few friggin tricks with a lance, he thinks he can throw his weight around," the big fellow shouted, glaring. "I've ordered everyone to ignore him, but you, rogue, have to show off that you have money and give him silver. You're trying to weaken my power in this town!"

"Suppose I gave him a bit of silver. What's it to you?"

The big fellow seized Song Jiang. "Thief of an exile. You dare talk back to me!"

"Why not!"

The big fellow swung both fists at Song Jiang's face. Song Jiang ducked. Once again the big man charged. Song Jiang was all set. But then the drill instructor dashed in from behind the crowd, grabbed the assailant by head kerchief and waist and, with a poke in the ribs and a quick twist, slammed him to the ground. He struggled to rise. The drill instructor knocked him flat with a swift kick. The two guards intervened to restrain the fighting medicine man. The big fellow managed to crawl to his feet. He looked at Song Jiang and the drill instructor.

"If you think you can get away with this, just wait!" He strode off in a southerly direction.
"May I ask your name and place of origin?" Song Jiang politely queried the medicine man.
"My ancestral home is Luoyang, in Henan Province, and my name is Xue Yong. My paternal grandfather was an officer in the headquarters of Old General Zhong. But he offended some of the senior bureaucrats and so never rose in rank. His sons and grandsons have been forced to earn their living with displays of arms and selling medicines. In the gallant fraternity I'm known as the Sick Tiger. Dare I enquire who you are, sir?"
"Song Jiang is my name. My ancestral home is Yuncheng County."
"Not Song Jiang the Timely Rain from Shandong Province?"
"The same."
Xue Yong dropped to his knees and kowtowed. Song Jiang hastily raised him to his feet.
"Let's have a few cups together, what do you say?"
"I'd be honored. I've been longing to meet you, but I never could find an opportunity." The drill instructor gathered his weapons and medicines and went with Song Jiang to a nearby wine shop.
"We have meat and wine," said the proprietor, "but I don't dare sell you any."
"Why not?" asked Song Jiang.
"That big fellow you were fighting with just sent word that if I do he'll smash my shop to pieces. I can't go against his wishes. He's the boss of this town. Who dares oppose him?"
"In that case we'll leave. The scoundrel is sure to be looking for an excuse for another quarrel."
"Let me go back to my inn and pay what I owe. I'll look you up in Jiangzhou in a day or two. You go on ahead, brother," said Xue Yong.
Song Jiang gave him twenty pieces of silver and they parted. The clerk and the two guards walked until they came to another wine shop. "The Young Master has given orders," said the host. "We can't sell you anything. It's useless to ask."
Song Jiang and the guards had nothing to say. They tried several more shops, and in each one they got the same answer. At the edge of the town were several small inns, where they tried to put up for the night. None of the hostels would accept them. When Song Jiang asked why, they said the Young Master had given definite orders: "Don't let those three in."
Obviously, there was no use talking. They continued on towards the main highway. The red ball of the sun was low in the sky and dusk was falling. The three travellers began to get worried.
"Just because we watched a display of arms we offended that brute," they said. "Now there are no inns or villages in sight. Where are we going to sleep?"
They saw lights gleaming through a grove of trees in the distance at the end of a small path. "People must be living there," said Song Jiang. "We can beg their pardon and ask them to let us stay the night. In the morning we'll go on."
"Those lights are well off the main road."
"What else can we do? We may have to walk an extra two or three //tomorrow, but what of it?"
They travelled about two //and there among the trees was a large manor. They rapped on the gate and a vassal opened it.
"Who are you, knocking at this late hour?"
"I'm a prisoner on my way to Jiangzhou," Song Jiang said apologetically. "We've gone beyond where we originally intended to spend the night and we've no place to stay. We hope your manor will put us up. We'll pay whatever's customary in the morning."
"Wait here. I'll ask the squire. If he agrees, you can stay." The vassal went inside. He soon returned. "The squire says please come in." He led the three to a thatched building.
The squire told the vassal to quarter them in the gate-house and give them supper. The gate-house also had a thatched roof. The vassal lit a lamp and told the three visitors to rest. He fetched three portions of rice and soup and vegetables and bid them eat. When they had finished he cleared the table and departed.
"We're alone here, sir Clerk," said the guards. "We'll take off your cangue and all have a comfortable night's sleep and set out early in the morning."
"Good," said Song Jiang.
The cangue was removed and he and the two guards went out to relieve themselves. Song Jiang gazed at the star-filled sky and at the rustic lane running behind the houses on the edge of the threshing ground. He made a mental note of it. They returned to the gate-house, bolted the door and lay down to sleep. They agreed that it was kind of the squire to let them stay.
Suddenly they heard voices on the threshing ground. Song Jiang peered out through a crack in the door. The squire and three vassals were looking the manor over in the light of their torches.
"Just like my father," Song Jiang said to the guards. "He won't retire till he's checked everything personally."
At that moment someone outside the manor shouted: "Open the gate." Vassals complied, and six or seven men entered. The fellow in the lead gripped a halberd, those behind him carried pitchforks and clubs. Song Jiang could see them plainly in the torchlight.
"That one with the halberd is the man who attacked us in town," he said.
He heard the squire ask: "Where have you been, son? Who have you been fighting with, coming home so late bristling with arms?"
"You don't know what's been going on, father," the big fellow replied. "Is elder brother at home?"
"He's drunk. He's sleeping it off in the rear house."
"I'll get him up. I need him to help me chase a man."
"You've been quarrelling again. If you get your brother, you know he'll go to extremes. What's wrong? Tell me."
"A weapons-twirling medicine man came to town today and put his show on without asking permission first from brother and me. I ordered that no one was to give him a penny. But along came a prisoner and, just to show off, gave the fellow five pieces of silver. That was one in the eye for our prestige! I went to knock the prisoner around a bit, and that wretched medicine pedlar threw me down and hit and kicked me. My middle still hurts. I sent men around to tell all the wine shops and inns not to serve those louts or put them up. They'll have no place to stay tonight. Then I had a gang from the gambling den go down to the inn where that medicine man was staying and drub him. I've got him tied in the arms master's house now. Tomorrow, I'll take him down to the river, bind him hand and foot, and toss him in. That'll pay him off! But I can't find the prisoner those two guards are with. There aren't any inns ahead where he can stay. I don't know where he's found shelter. I want to get brother, divide into two parties and track the rascal down!"
"Don't be churl, son. Suppose he gave silver to the medicine seller. What is that to you? Why did you attack him? You ended up being beaten yourself. But you weren't hurt badly. Listen to me—forget it. If your brother hears you've been beaten, he won't quit till he's killed someone again. Take my advice—go into the house and sleep. The middle of the night is no time to go knocking on people's doors and upsetting all the villagers. Try earning a few good marks for your next incarnation."
The big fellow paid no attention. Grasping his halberd, he went inside the manor, with the old man following behind.
"What an unlucky coincidence," Song Jiang said to the guards. "This is bad. Taking shelter in his manor! We'd better leave. He'll kill us if he finds out we're here. Even if the squire doesn't say anything, the vassals won't dare to conceal it from him."
"You're right. We must get away without delay."
"No use trying to leave by the front gate. We'll dig our way out through the manor wall behind this house."
The guards toting the luggage and Song Jiang carrying his cangue, they slipped around to the rear of the house and dug a hole in the manor wall. Then they fled along a path in the starlight towards the depths of the grove.
They pushed on blindly for about a watch. Ahead they saw a thicket of reeds and a large body of roiling water. They had reached the banks of the Xunyang River. They heard voices behind them and shrill whistling, and saw the bobbing of many torches.
"Heaven save me," Song Jiang cried.
The three men hid in the reeds and watched the torches draw nearer. Very alarmed, they floundered around in a panic. There was no escape. Before them was the large river, on either side were broad coves. Song Jiang raised his head to the sky and lamented: "If I'd known it was going to be like this I'd have stayed on Mount Liangshan. Who'd have thought I'd meet my end here!"
Suddenly, gliding through the reeds, a boat appeared. "Over here, boatman," Song Jiang called. "Save us. I'll give you silver."
"Who are you three?" the boatman queried. "What are you doing here?"
"We're being chased by robbers, and jumped into these reeds. Come quickly and ferry us across. I'll pay you extra."
At that promise, the boatman moved his craft up and the three clambered on board. One of the guards threw the luggage into the hold, the other poled the boat with his official staff. The boatman plied the sweep-oar in the stern. The clinking of the bag's contents as they struck the boards filled him with secret satisfaction. Soon the little craft was well out in the center of the river.
The pursuers had by then reached the shore. There were a dozen torches among them. The two big men in the lead held halberds. Their twenty or more followers were armed with lances.
"Boatman," they called, "row over here."
Song Jiang and guards, huddled in the hold, said: "Don't do it. We'll give you more silver."
The boatman nodded. He ignored the gang on the bank and plied his creaking oar.
"If you don't bring your boat here," the pursuers threatened, "we'll kill every one of you."
The boatman laughed coldly, but did not reply.
"You dare disobey?" bawled the gang on the bank.
"I'm Zhang the Boatman. Stop your friggin yelling," the rower replied with a grin.
The biggest man among the torches changed his tune. "Oh, it's you, brother Zhang. Didn't you see us two brothers here?"
"Of course. I'm not blind."
"Come back, then. We want to talk to you."
"We'll talk tomorrow. My passengers are in a hurry."
"Those three on your boat are the ones my brother and I are after!"
"They're relatives of mine. They're food and clothing to me. I've invited them out for a bowl of 'deck knife noodles.' "
"Row back. We'll talk about it."
"Turn my food and clothing over to you? Fat chance!"
"Don't say that, brother Zhang. We only want the prisoner. Bring him here."
The boatman continued plying his oar. "I haven't had a passenger in days. I'm not going to row him back and give him to you. Forgive me. See you again some time."
Song Jiang didn't understand his hidden meaning. He whispered to the guards: "How lucky we met this boatman. He's saved our lives and stuck up for us. We won't forget his kindness. Where would we be if it weren't for this boat to ferry us across?"
The boatman rowed on. Soon they were far from the shore. Sitting in the hold, they could see the torches gleaming in the reeds.
"What good fortune," Song Jiang said. "How true it is that 'When good folk meet, evil men keep their distance.' We've managed to escape disaster."
As he plied his oar, the boatman sang a Huzhou tune, with his own words:

Born and raised on the river's edge,
Towards officials and Heaven I'm fearless and bold.
Last night demon Hua Guang tried to do me in,
Before he left, I snatched his brick of gold!

Song Jiang and the guards felt their bones go soft with fright. But then Song Jiang thought: "He's only jesting." While the three men were discussing this new development, the boatman put down his oar.
"You, prick, and you two police guards, it's your kind who are always squeezing us smugglers. Today you've fallen into my hands. What would you rather eat—'deck knife noodles' or 'dumplings in soup'?"
"Don't joke, sir," said Song Jiang. "What do you mean?"
The boatman glared. "Who's joking! If it's 'deck knife noodles' you want, I've a blade beneath this deck which can slice the wind. I don't need three or four slashes. One cut each will dump you dead in the water. If it's 'dumplings' you prefer, take your clothes off and jump into the river naked as dumplings and drown yourselves!"
Song Jiang clutched the guards. "Woe is me," he cried. "How true is that 'Luck comes but once, but trouble comes in droves.' "
"Talk it over and give me an answer, quick," barked the boatman.
"We didn't come here of our own choice," Song Jiang pleaded. "I committed a crime and am being exiled to Jiangzhou. Have pity. Spare our lives."
"You're wasting breath. Spare you three? Not even half a man shall be spared! I'm Dog-Faced Master Zhang. Father or mother mean nothing to me. Shut your friggin mouths and get into the water!"
"Our gold and silver and valuables and clothes—you can have them all. Only let us live!"
From beneath the deck boards the boatman took out a gleaming cutlass. "What shall it be?" he shouted.
Song Jiang raised his face to the sky and sighed. "Because I failed in respect to Heaven and Earth, was unfilial to my parents and committed a crime, I've implicated you two."
The guards gripped his arms. "Say no more, sir Clerk. We'll die together and that will be the end of it."
"Off with your clothes and into the river," roared the boatman. "Jump, or I'll hack you in!"
Huddled together, the three men stared at the water. They heard the creaking of oars, and the boatman looked quickly around. Flying towards them was a light craft. A big man with a trident stood on the prow. Two young fellows were wielding sweep-oars in the stern. In the starlight the vessel drew rapidly near.
"Ahoy," the big man with the trident hailed. "Who dares to operate in our waters? Any merchandise you have on board you'll have to share with us!"
"So it's you, brother Li," the boatman exclaimed hastily. "I couldn't imagine who it was. Out on business, brother? Why didn't you take me along?"
"So you're at it again, brother Zhang. What have you got there? Anything worthwhile?"
"You'll laugh when I tell you. I haven't had any business for days. I lost at gambling again and was left without a copper. I was sitting gloomily off the reef when a gang chased three pieces of merchandise right into my boat. Two friggin guards and a swarthy short prisoner. I don't know who he is. Claims he's been exiled to Jiangzhou, but he doesn't have any cangue around his neck. The gang after him was led by those two Mu brothers from our town. They really wanted him. But when I saw there was something to be got out of him I wouldn't give him up."
"Whew! Could that be my brother Song Jiang?"
The man's voice sounded familiar. From the hold Song Jiang called: "Who are you, bold fellow? Save me! I'm Song Jiang!"
"My brother, sure enough," the big man exclaimed, startled. "Why didn't you speak up?"
Song Jiang hurried out on deck. The starlight was very bright, and he saw that the man on the prow was Li Jun the Turbulent River Dragon and that the two in the stern with the sweep-oars were Tong Wei the Dragon from the Cave and Tong Meng the River Churning Clam.
Li Jun leaped on board. "You've had a fright, brother! If I came a little later you'd have been a goner. Thank Heaven I was bored and restless at home and came out in my boat to do some salt smuggling. I never dreamed I'd find you in this predicament."
The boatman was stupefied, speechless. Finally he asked: "Brother Li, you mean this swarthy fellow is Song Jiang the Timely Rain from Shandong?"
"Of course."
Dropping to his knees, the boatman kowtowed. "Just your name, sir, would have stopped me from doing an evil deed! I nearly took your life!"
"Who is this good fellow?" Song Jiang asked Li Jun. "What is his name?"
"He's a blood brother of mine, from Little Lone Mountain. His name is Zhang Heng, and he's known as the Boat Flame. His specialty is conducting this 'quiet and respectable' business on the Xunyang River."
Song Jiang and the guards laughed. The two boats were rowed together to the bank and moored, and Song Jiang and his escorts were helped ashore.

"I've often told you, brother," Li Jun said to Zhang Heng, "of all the gallant men under the sky, there's none to compare with Clerk Song, the Timely Rain of Yuncheng Town. Today you can examine him closely."
Zhang Heng struck his flint, lit a lantern and peered at Song Jiang. He threw himself down on the sand and again kowtowed. "Brother, please forgive me!" Then he asked: "Gallant brother, why have you been exiled here?"
Li Jun related the story of Song Jiang's crime, adding: "He's being sent to Jiangzhou."
"There's something I must tell you," Zhang Heng said to the clerk. "My mother bore two sons—me and my younger brother, Zhang Shun. He's a remarkable boy, with skin as white as snow. Not only can he swim forty or fifty //on the surface of the water, he can stay below for seven days and seven nights. Because he's like a white streak in the water and because he's so skilled with arms, he's been nicknamed White Streak in the Waves. At one time he and I were doing quite a business on the Yangzi."
"I'd like to hear about it."
"Whenever we lost at gambling, I would take our boat to a quiet shore and ferry people across the river. Travellers who wanted to save money and get to the other side quickly would board my craft. When I was full up, my brother Zhang Shun would come along, disguised as a passenger also, with a large bundle on his back. I'd row to the center of the river, stop, cast anchor, take out a big cutlass and demand passage money. My agreed price had been five hundred coppers, but I demanded three thousand. I asked my brother, first, and he pretended to refuse. Grabbing him by neck and waist, I threw him kaplunk into the water. Then I went to each of the others for my three thousand. They were all scared stiff. Every one of them paid up. After I collected, I delivered them to a secluded spot on the opposite shore. My brother had already swum underwater and reached the bank. As soon as the passengers were gone, he joined me, we divided the money and went gambling. That was how we earned our living."
"There must have been plenty of customers along the river who sought you for trips like that," said Song Jiang.
Li Jun and the others laughed.
"My brother and I are in a different line of business now," Zhang Heng went on. "We're smugglers on the Xunyang. Zhang Shun has gone to Jiangzhou Town today to sell some fish fry. Look him up when you get there. I'd give you a letter to him, only I can't write."
"We'll find a scribe in the village," said Li Jun. He instructed the Tong brothers to stay and watch the boats.
Li Jun and Zhang Heng, carrying a lantern, led Song Jiang and guards in the direction of the village. Before they had travelled half a //they saw that torches were still gleaming brightly upon the river bank.
"Those two brothers haven't gone back yet," said Zhang Heng.
"Who do you mean?" asked Li Jun.
"The two brothers of the Mu family in our town."
"Call them to pay their respects to our brother, here."
"You mustn't do that," Song Jiang said quickly. "They're the ones who were chasing me."
"Don't worry," said Li Jun. "They didn't know it was you. They're one of us." He waved his hand and whistled, once.
The torch-bearing men came running towards them. When the Mu brothers saw Li Jun and Zhang Heng in polite conversation with Song Jiang, they halted, surprised.
"Are you two brothers familiar with these three?" they asked.
Li Jun laughed. "Do you know who this is?"
"No. He went against our authority in town and gave money to that medicine man. It damaged our prestige, so we've been after him."
"He's the one I've often told you about—brother Song Jiang, clerk of Yuncheng County, Shandong, known as the Timely Rain. Hurry and greet him."
The Mu brothers cast their halberds aside and kowtowed. "We've long heard of your fame. Who'd have thought we'd meet today? We behaved rashly and injured you, brother. Please forgive us."
Song Jiang helped them to their feet. "Your names, bold warriors?"
"They're from a well-to-do family, local people," Li Jun said. "Mu Hong, the older brother, is called the Unrestrained. Mu Chun, the younger, is called the Slightly Restrained. They run Jieyang Town. You may not know this, brother, but we have three powers around here. I'll explain. On Jieyang Ridge and below, LiLi and I run things. In the town, the Mu brothers are boss. Zhang Heng and Zhang Shun control all the smuggling along the Xunyang River. That's what we mean by the 'Three Powers.' "
"We had no idea," said Song Jiang. "Since we're brothers, I must beg you to release Xue Yong."
Mu Hong smiled. "The lance twirler? No problem." To Mu Chun he said: "Get him and return him to our brother, here." He turned again to Song Jiang. "Please come to our humble manor to receive our courtesies and forgive our wrongs."
"Excellent," said Li Jun. "Excellent. We'll all go."
Mu Hong sent two vassals to watch the boats and invite the Tong brothers to join them. He directed another man to go on ahead and inform the manor to prepare food and wine, slaughter a sheep and a pig, and lay a feast. When Tong Wei and Tong Meng arrived, all walked together. They reached the manor around the fifth watch. Squire Mu was requested to greet his visitors, then they took their seats as hosts and guests in the thatched hall. Song Jiang sat opposite the squire.
They had not been chatting long when the sky began to lighten. Mu Chun arrived with Xue Yong the Sick Tiger, and he was introduced to everyone. Mu Hong feasted Song Jiang and the others until evening, at which time all retired.
The next day Song Jiang wanted to leave, but Mu Hong wouldn't hear of it. He insisted that his visitors remain. He took Song Jiang on a stroll through town and showed him the sights of the surrounding villages.
After the third day Song Jiang, afraid he would exceed the time limit for his arrival at the prison, was determined to go. When the pleas of Mu Hong and the others proved in vain, a farewell feast was laid. The following morning Song Jiang bid farewell to the squire and the assembled gallants.
"Remain here a while with Mu Hong," he urged Xue Yong. "Then come to Jiangzhou and we'll meet again."
"Don't worry, brother," said Mu Hong. "I'll take good care of him." He presented Song Jiang with gold and silver on a platter and gave each of the guards some money.
A scribe in the manor wrote a letter for Zhang Heng which he requested Song Jiang to deliver to his brother Zhang Shun. Song Jiang put it in his bundle. Everyone saw him to the edge of the Xunyang where Mu Hong summoned a boat and put Song Jiang's luggage and cangue on board. They drank a parting toast, and there were tears in everyone's eyes as they bid him farewell. Li Jun, Zhang Heng, Mu Hong, Mu Chun, Xue Yong, Tong Wei and Tong Meng returned to their respective homes. Of that no more need be said.
Song Jiang and guards embarked for Jiangzhou. This boatman was different from their previous one. He raised a sail and soon delivered them to their destination. Song Jiang wore the cangue around his neck once more. The guards, carrying his documents and bearing the luggage, proceeded with him to the office of the Jiangzhou prefectural government.
The prefect was holding court. His name was Cai Dezhang and he was the ninth son of Cai Jing, the premier. For this reason he was known in Jiangzhou as Prefect Cai the Ninth. An avaricious official, he was pompous and rude. The premier had seen to it that he was appointed to this post because Jiangzhou was a populous wealthy city.
The guards handed him the documents and produced Song Jiang. He could see that the prisoner was no ordinary man. "Why is there no prefectural seal on your cangue?" he demanded.
"We were caught in the rain on the road, and it washed off," the guards explained.
"Write a statement about that immediately and take him to the prison outside the city. I will send prefectural guards with you."
The prefect designated two men, who took the statement from the two original guards, then all five left the court and stopped for some refreshments in a wine shop outside the prefecture. Song Jiang gave the Jiangzhou escorts three ounces of silver. They delivered him to the prison, obtained a receipt and placed him in a single cell. They had put in a good word for him with the warden and the head keeper. Then they returned with their receipt to the Jiangzhou prefectural office.
The two original guards turned Song Jiang's luggage over to him, thanked him a thousand times and went back to the city. "Although we had a bad fright," they said, "we earned lots of silver." They reported to the Jiangzhou prefectural office, were given an official reply, and set out on the return journey to Jizhou.
Song Jiang invited the head keeper to his cell and gave him ten ounces of silver. He also sent the same amount to the warden, plus gifts. Nor did he forget to tip the others working in the prison and the soldiers on guard. All got silver for tea money. As a result, he was well liked.
Not long after, he was brought to the registration room and his cangue removed. The warden, who had taken the bribe, said: "Song Jiang, you have just arrived and I must tell you this. Wu De, the founding emperor, decreed that all newly exiled prisoners shall be beaten a hundred strokes to quell their arrogance. Guards, turn him face down."
"I caught a heavy cold on the road," said Song Jiang, "and I still haven't recovered."
The warden nodded. "The prisoner really does look sick. See how sallow and thin he is. Just credit him with a beating on the books. This fellow was a county functionary. Let him work as a copyist."
A written order to this effect was immediately issued, and Song Jiang expressed his thanks. He collected his luggage from his cell and moved into the Copying Section. The other prisoners, seeing that he was getting special treatment, bought wine and held a small party to congratulate him. The next day Song Jiang gave them a party in return. From time to time he invited the head keeper and guards in for drinks, and he often sent gifts to the warden. He had plenty of money and valuables and that made it easy for him to approach people. Before half a month had gone by there wasn't a man in the prison who didn't think well of him.
"Guide your actions by the moods of the powerful, treat a man according to his status," as the old saying goes. One day Song Jiang was drinking with the head keeper in the Copying Section.
"Brother," the head keeper said, "I reminded you recently that it's the custom here to send the prison superintendent gifts. Why have you delayed so long? It's more than ten days already. He'll be coming soon, and it will be awkward."
"Never mind. He wants money, but I won't give him any. You, brother, can ask me any time you need some. But I won't give that superintendent a copper. I have something to say to him when he comes."
"He's very fierce, sir Clerk, and a demon with his hands and feet. If you offend him and he gets rough, don't say I didn't warn you."
"He can do as he likes. But don't worry. I can handle him. Maybe I'll give him something, maybe not. Perhaps he'll be afraid to ask me. It's hard to say."
While they were talking, a guard came in and reported: "The superintendent is here. He's in the hall, furious. 'Why hasn't that new prisoner sent me the usual money gift?' he's yelling."
"What did I tell you?" said the head keeper. "Even we're afraid when he comes."
Song Jiang smiled. "Forgive me, brother. I can't keep you company any longer. We'll drink again another day. I must go and speak to him."
The head keeper rose. "We don't want to see him!" Song Jiang said farewell and went from the Copying Section to the Registration Hall where the superintendent was waiting. And because they met, Jiangzhou Town was turned into a den of tigers and a lair of wolves. Street corners became mountains of corpses and seas of blood. Men broke Heaven's mesh and Earth's net, and returned to Liangshan Marsh.

Now when Song Jiang made the mistake of giving five taels of silver to that martial arts master, a big man suddenly appeared among the Jieyang crowd and bellowed: "That scoundrel has no business barging in here with his bloody staff tricks and whatnot, I've already warned everybody to ignore him. And now you, you little shit, just because you want to show off how much money you've got, you go and pay him for it and cause me to lose face in my own home town!"
Song Jiang answered: "If I choose to give him money, what business is it of yours?"
The big stranger grabbed Song Jiang and shouted: "You dare to answer me back, you bloody convict?"
"Why shouldn't I answer you?" Song Jiang said.
The other raised his fists and swung at Song Jiang's jaw, but Song Jiang ducked. The man closed again and Song Jiang was about to retaliate when the martial arts master fell on the man from behind. He grasped his topknot in one hand while with the other he grabbed his waist and with a sudden twist sent him sprawling. When his opponent tried to struggle to his feet he felled him again with a kick. The two policemen had to restrain the martial arts artist while the other crawled to his feet. He gave them a black look and said: "Come what may, I'll get even with you two!" With that he left, heading south.
"May I ask your name and where you're from?" Song Jiang said to the martial arts man.
"I'm from Luoyang in Henan," the other replied. "My name is Xue Yong. My grandfather was on old field-marshal Zhong's staff, but he got on the wrong side of some officials and was never promoted. That's why his descendants have to earn their living giving demonstrations and selling medicines. Among the rivers and lakes I'm known as the Pill Monger. Will you now permit me to make so bold as to ask your name?"
"My name is Song Jiang and I'm from Yuncheng."
"You don't mean to say you're Song Jiang the Just of Shandong, the Opportune Rain?"
"Yes, at your service."
The Pill Monger prostrated himself at once and Song Jiang raised him up, saying: "How about having a cup of wine together?"
"Good idea, I've been longing to make your acquaintance, but I just didn't have the opportunity." He quickly gathered together the articles of his trade and they went off together to a neighbouring hostelry to order a drink. But the host said: "I've got plenty of wine and food, certainly, but I daren't sell you any."
"Why not?" Song Jiang asked.
"It's that big chap you fellows were fighting, it's his orders. If I sell you wine he'll come and smash this place up. I live here and I can't afford to offend him. He's the big boss here in Jieyang, everyone does as he says."
"In that case we'd better just go and find somewhere else to stay," Song Jiang said. "Obviously that man likes to make trouble."
The Pill Monger said: "I'll go back to my inn and pay for the room. We can meet again in a couple of days time in Jiangzhou. You go on ahead."
Song Jiang took out twenty taels of silver which he gave to the Pill Monger and then said goodbye and left.
Song Jiang and the two guards had to leave that inn. But when they went into the next place for a drink, the landlord said: "We all know the young master's orders, how can we sell you anything? You're just wasting your time and energy, it won't do you any good." There was nothing they could say to this, so they went on, and kept on going, because in every establishment they tried the answer was the same. Eventually they reached the very edge of town, where there were a few meagre little eating-places in one of which they hoped to find a room for the night. Even here they were rejected. When Song Jiang asked, the answer was always: "We've already received the young master's orders, we can't provide you with shelter." Song Jiang could see it was no use discussing it, so they set off resolutely down the main road. The sun was a red disk setting towards the horizon and the light was fading fast:
Mist swathes the distant peaks; cold vapours envelop the tall sky. Troops of stars pay homage to the pale moon, vying with her in splendour; green waters bow to blue mountains in a contest of jade hues. From the old temple, deep in the woods, the bell's gentle tolling fades away; from the fishermen's boats dots of light begin to wink. On the branch the nightjar cries to the evening moon; in the garden the butterfly comes to rest amid flowers.
They began to be worried when they realized it was getting late. "We should never have stopped to watch that fellow with the staves and got the big man annoyed," they said to themselves. "Now it turns out that we're caught with no village ahead of us and no inn behind. Where are we going to spend the night?"
At that moment they saw lights far away along a track on the edge of a wood. Song Jiang said: "Hey, see that light? There must be a house there. Why not go there and ask them politely to let us stay the night? We'll leave early in the morning."
"But those lights are not on our route," said the guards.
"That doesn't matter. It's not on our way, but even if that means walking another mile or two tomorrow, it won't make a lot of difference."
So they left the main road and before they had gone a mile a big manor house appeared beyond the wood. They went up to the door and knocked. In response to their knock a servant opened the door and asked: "Who are you? And why do you come knocking on doors and disturbing people in the middle of the night?"
"I'm a convict travelling to my place of exile in Jiangzhou," Song Jiang explained somewhat nervously. "We missed the right moment to stop for the night and now we can't find anywhere. I'd like to ask if we can stay here. Of course we'd pay whatever is appropriate."
"In that case just wait here a moment," said the servant. "I'll go and tell the Squire, and if he's agreeable you can stay."
The man disappeared inside and quickly returned to say: "The Squire asks you to come in."
They were received in the thatched hall by the Squire, who told the servants to show them to their room and invited them to partake of some supper. A servant led them down the steps to a room at the side. He lit a lamp and invited them to make themselves comfortable, while he brought three portions of rice, together with soup and various dishes. Later he collected the bowls and plates and vanished inside.
"Well, Registrar," the guards said, "seeing there aren't any strangers present, we might as well take off that cangue, so you'll sleep more comfortable. Then tomorrow we can be off early."
"Good," said Song Jiang.
When the cangue was off, they all went outside to wash. The sky was filled with stars. Song Jiang noticed that there was a building beside the threshing floor and behind it was a narrow road leading off into nowhere. They went in again, closed the door and prepared for sleep. "It's really lucky that this old gentleman is letting us sleep here tonight," they said. Just as they were speaking, they noticed there were people with lighted torches milling about on the threshing floor. Song Jiang put his eye to a crack in the wall and saw the Squire accompanied by three servants with torches going around inspecting everything. "This old gentleman is just like my father," he thought. "He wants to see to everything himself. Even at this time of day he won't just go to bed, he has to see everything is all right first."
As Song Jiang was speaking, a great clamour arose outside, with voices shouting for the gates to be opened quickly. Several men rushed in, the foremost of them carrying a halberd and the rest equipped with pitchforks and staves. By the light of the torches Song Jiang could make out that the leader was the same big man who had wanted to beat him up earlier at the inn in Jieyang. He also heard the Squire say: "Where've you been, my son? And who've you been fighting with? What do you need all these weapons for at this time of night?"
"Listen father, is my brother at home?" the big man asked.
"Your brother was drunk tonight," the Squire replied. "He took himself off to sleep at the back."
"I'll go and wake him up. We're going on a manhunt."
"I don't know who you've been quarrelling with, but waking your brother up isn't going to settle it. You'd better tell me what it's all about."
"You've no idea, father, there was a mountebank, a peddler of quack remedies, in town today, the blighter had the cheek not to come and get our permission first. He went straight to the market-place and started selling his medicines without a licence and performing with his staves, so I told everyone not to give him a single penny. And then this convict pops up, heaven knows where from, and wants to pretend he's the great gentleman, and get everyone's attention, so he gives him five taels of silver, just to make me a laughing-stock in Jieyang. I was just on the point of beating him up when that bloody peddler hit me from behind and knocked me down. He punched me and kicked me so hard my ribs are still hurting. I told all the innkeepers not to let them in, either to drink or to stay, so the three of them won't have a roof over their heads tonight, and I got a bunch of thugs from the gambling houses to go to that peddler's inn and haul him out and give him a good thrashing. They've hung him up now in the sheriff's. Tomorrow we'll take him down to the river, tie him in a sack and chuck him in. That should take the wind out of the bugger's sails. But now I can't find where the convict and the two policemen have got to. There's no inn further down the highway, I just can't think where they're spending the night. I want to get my brother so we can split forces to give us a better chance of catching the bugger."

"You really shouldn't be so hasty, my son," said the Squire. "What business is it of yours if he decides to give the peddler some money? Why do you have to beat him up? All right, so you got a beating, but you're not seriously hurt. You just listen to me. Don't tell your brother about this. If you get beaten up, what's he supposed to do about it? And you're liable to kill someone. Now you listen to what I say. Go to your room now and go to bed. It's after midnight. Don't go making a row and waking people up, disturbing the whole neighbourhood. Gain some merit by exercising a little restraint."

The big man paid no attention to his father's words. He took his halberd and rushed inside. The Squire hurried after him.

"Now we're in a real mess," Song Jiang said to the guards. "What are we going to do? It turns out we've picked his home to stay in. The only thing to do is to get out. If he discovers we're here he's going to kill us. Even if the Squire doesn't tell him, is it likely the servants will keep quiet about it?"

"You're right," the guards said. "We shouldn't waste any time, we must leave at once."

"We'd better not take the main road." Song Jiang said. "We'll leave from the back."

The guards shouldered their bags and Song Jiang was fitted with the cangue again. They forced a gap in the fence at the back of the house and by the light of the moon and the stars pushed ahead down a small track leading into the heart of the woods. In their haste they paid no heed to where they were going. After walking for about two hours, they came to a place that was full of rushes, with a big river sweeping past. They had reached the banks of the river Yangtze.

Just then they heard shouts behind them and saw a flurry of torches chasing after them amid a general hue and cry. "Merciful Heaven, we're done for!" exclaimed Song Jiang. They plunged on into the thick of the reeds, but when they looked back the torches seemed to be getting nearer. With mounting alarm they waded on through reedbeds which seemed to stretch ahead of them to the very limits of the earth, if not of the sky too. But then there was a broad river blocking their path, with wide inlets on each side. Song Jiang's sighs ascended to heaven: "If I'd known this was going to happen, I should have stopped with them on Mount Liang. Who would have thought that I would come to end my days here?"

At this critical juncture, the reeds suddenly parted and a boat glided stealthily out. Song Jiang immediately hailed the helmsman and offered to give him silver if he brought his boat over and rescued them. The boatman asked: "Who are you and how did you get here?"

"We're being pursued by robbers, and they've driven us into this corner," Song Jiang said. "Quickly bring your boat here and ferry us over the water. I'll give you more even than you ask for."

At this mention of more silver, the boatman drove his boat across to them. They leapt in at once. One of the guards dropped the bundles into the boat's hold, while the other shoved the boat off with his staff of office. The boatman leant on his oar, at the same time listening to the satisfying sound the bundles made as they fell on the deck and secretly rejoicing. Driven by the boatman's oar the boat was soon out in midstream. Meanwhile, their pursuers had reached the river bank. A dozen torches could be seen. Each of the two leaders carried a halberd and the score or so of followers were each equipped with spears or staves. "Ahoy there, boatman!" they shouted. "Bring your boat over here, quickly!"

Song Jiang and the two guards huddled in the bottom of the boat and said: "Don't do it, boatman! We'll give you a bit extra if you don't."

The boatman nodded and ignoring the people on the bank rowed the boat with a creaking oar towards the middle of the river. Those on the bank shouted: "You there, boatman, don't go away! We'll kill you for this!" The boatman gave a few contemptuous snorts but vouchsafed no answer. Again the men on the bank called out: "Who are you? How can you have such a nerve? Come back here!"

"Zhang's my name," the boatman shouted back scornfully. "And you'd better keep a civil tongue in your heads!"

"Of course, it's old Zhang." said the tall man on the bank. "Can't you see it's me and my brother?"

"'Course I can see you. I'm not blind, am I?"

"If you can see us, why don't you come over here? We want to talk to you."

"If you want to talk you can wait till tomorrow. My passengers are in a hurry."

"Your passengers are what we're after!"

"My passengers are my relatives, my meat and drink, my all. I've invited them on board for a bowl of knife noodles."

"If you'll come back here we can come to an agreement."

"You think I'm going to hand over my meat and drink? That's a laugh!"

"Friend Zhang, that's not what we mean. We only want that convict. Just bring him here, there's a good fellow!"

Continuing to row, the Boatman said: "I haven't had something like this for days, I'm certainly not coming back just to have you take them away from me. You'll just have to put up with it. We can talk another day."

Song Jiang had not caught the boatman's meaning. He and the two guards in the bottom of the boat were quietly saying: "What a bit of luck that this boatman has saved our lives. We'd better let him know we won't forget his kindness. It's just as well this boat was here to ferry us across."

Eventually the boatman was far enough away from the shore. Looking back towards the shore, they saw the lights moving away through the reeds. "Bloody hell!" Song Jiang said. "It's really like they say, 'Meet a good man and the evil flee.' This has got us out of a pretty tight corner."

But as he rowed on, the boatman now broke into song — a Huzhou ditty:

On the bank of the river born I was,
Fear no law, neither man's nor God's.
The King of Hell said he wanted a ride,
When I got his gold, he went over the side.

When Song Jiang and his guards heard this song, their legs felt a bit wobbly. But Song Jiang decided he must be joking. However, before they could give the matter more thought, the boatman threw down his oar and said: "Now then, you lot, it seems you've a taste for getting smugglers into trouble, but today it's me you're up against! Which do you prefer, knife noodles or wonton soup?"

"Don't make fun of us, my good man," said Song Jiang. "What do you mean by knife noodles and wonton soup?"

The boatman glared at him and answered: "Who says I'm bloody joking? If it's the noodles you want, I got a knife in the hold there keen as the March wind, it'll cut you into ribbons in a jiffy — and there won't be no seconds, one go'll do it! If it's the soup, then strip off and over the side with you, you got the whole river to die in."

"Heaven have mercy!" Song Jiang lamented. "It's like they say, 'troubles never come singly, happiness never returns'."

"Think it over if you must, but let me know quick," the boatman growled.

"Boatman, let me explain. I'm a convict, banished to Jiang-zhou, can't you find it in your heart to pity me and spare the three of us?"

"Spare the three of us!" the boatman mimicked. "You make me sick! I won't spare one half of one of you. Don't you know my reputation? Dogface Uncle Zhang, they call me, an' if it was me own mother and father it wouldn't cut no ice with me! So shut your fucking mouth and get in the water!"

Song Jiang tried again. "We'll give you everything that's in our bundles, all the money and valuables and clothes and stuff, if only you'll spare our lives!"

"You can all three get your clothes off double-quick and jump in the river," the boatman shouted. "Jump, if you're going to, if not I'll shove you in!"

So there were Song Jiang and the guards clutching each other and on the point of throwing themselves in the river, when, creak, creak, creak, the sound of oars came over the water. Song Jiang quickly looked around. A fast boat was flying downstream towards them. There were three men in the boat: a big man holding a forked spear standing in the bow and two youths in the stern plying oars. Under the starlight it rapidly approached. The big man in the bows hailed them: "You there in the boat, identify yourselves. What are you doing in these waters? Any goods you may be carrying, who sees them has part."

The boatman turned to see who it was and hurriedly replied: "Oh, it's Mr. Li! I was wondering who it could be. Been out on business too, have you sir? Why didn't you let me in on it?"

"You've been operating round here too, have you Zhang? What've you got in the boat? Anything of substance?"

"I tell you, it'll make you laugh. I hadn't been doing much, not for days. I lost a bit gambling too, hadn't a cent left. So there I was sitting on the bank, feeling pretty low I can tell you, when I was approached by these three pieces of goods being chased along by a bunch of men. Turned out to be two fucking policemen, with a little dark-faced shit of a prisoner, where from I couldn't rightly say. According to him he's been banished to Jiangzhou, but he doesn't have no cangue. The crowd that was chasing after them was the two Mu brothers from town. They were dead keen to get their hands on them. But I'd already seen there was something substantial there, so I didn't give them up."

"Wait a minute! I suppose it couldn't be my friend Song Jiang?"

The voice sounded familiar to Song Jiang, so he called out: "Who's that on the other boat? Please rescue Song Jiang!"

It gave the other quite a shock. "It is, it's my friend. Why ever did you not speak out before?"

Song Jiang crawled out onto the deck to see who it was. The stars were bright and he could make out the man standing in the bows of the other boat quite clearly:

On the banks of the Yangtze he makes his home, this hero of universal fame. His brows are thick, his eyes large and his complexion ruddy, his beard and whiskers are stiff as iron filaments. He has a voice like a gong and his stature's immense. He knows well how to wield a frosty blade, and he'll surge through the waters and leap o'er the waves with amazing effect. Such is Li Jun, native of Luzhou, known to all as the White-Water Dragon.

It was indeed Li Jun, the White-Water Dragon, and the two rowing in the stern were the two Tong brothers, the River Rider and the Cave Dragon.

As soon as he knew it was Song Jiang, the White-Water Dragon leapt aboard. "What a close shave!" he exclaimed in horror. "If I'd come a minute or two later, you could have perished. It must be heaven was directing my steps today, because when I was sitting at home I suddenly felt restless, so I decided to row out into the channel and smuggle a little salt. I had no idea I was going to find you here in such a predicament!"

The boatman meanwhile had been pondering all this, not daring to open his mouth. Now at last he said: "Mr. Li, is this dark gentleman really Song Jiang of Shandong, the Opportune Rain?"

"Who else?" said the White-Water Dragon.

The boatman prostrated himself and said: "Oh sir, why didn't you tell me your name? You'd have saved me from doing something terrible! I was near to finishing you off!"

"What is our friend's name?" Song Jiang asked the White-Water Dragon.

"Let me introduce him. This gentleman is my adopted brother, a native of Little Mount Solo, named Zhang Heng, nicknamed the Pilot. He works here on the Yangtze river at a fine safe trade!" Song Jiang and the two guards laughed at this.

The two boats now rowed over to the landing. When the boats had been tied up, Song Jiang and his guards were helped out onto the bank. The White-Water Dragon said to the Pilot: "I've often told you there there's never a gentleman like Registrar Song of Yuncheng for uprightness. Now you can really get to know him."

The Pilot struck a flint and lit a lamp so he could take a good look at Song Jiang, then flung himself down on the sand in respectful greeting, saying: "Please forgive me for what I did!" Song Jiang also took a good look at the Pilot:

Immensely tall, and with slanting eyes, he is famous up and down this stretch of the Yangtze. He surges through the water like a water sprite, he leaps o'er the waves like a flying whale. He doesn't fear dangerous waters and wild winds. The sight of him fills the flood dragon with dread. He is yet another of the stars sent down by heaven to stir things up on earth. He lives at Little Mount Solo and they call him the Pilot.

"Why are you under arrest, sir?" the Pilot asked.

The White-Water Dragon explained about Song Jiang's sentence and banishing to Jiangzhou. The Pilot listened and then said: "I'd like to tell you something, in my family there were two of us, myself and this younger brother of mine, born of the same mother, and would you believe it? He's completely white, white as snow. Not only can he swim ten to fifteen miles, but he can keep going under water for seven days and seven nights, he can live in the water just like a fish! And on top of that he's a martial arts expert. People call him the White Eel. We used to make our living on the banks of the Yangtze, with a scheme of our own devising."

"I'd like to hear about it," Song Jiang said.

"When we lost money gambling, we'd take a boat to a clear place on the river bank and offer to ferry people across privately. There was always a few takers who wanted to save a penny or two or was in a hurry. As soon as the boat was full I'd get my brother to dress up as a merchant with a big sack who wanted to be ferried across. I'd row out into midstream, put down the oar, cast anchor and pull out a big knife. Then I'd ask for the money. Originally I might have asked just five hundred coppers, but now I'd change it to three thousand. I'd ask my brother to pay up first. As we'd arranged, he would refuse, so I'd grab him by the scruff of the neck and the seat of his pants and chuck him in the river, splash! Then I'd ask the others in turn. They'd all be terrified by now and they'd fork out without a murmur. When they'd paid up I'd deliver them to a remote spot on the other bank, then I'd pick up my brother from the river and we'd go over the other side, divide up the spoils and go off to gamble. We made a good living like that."

"I suppose there were plenty of customers along the river who wanted a service of that kind," said Song Jiang, and the others all laughed.

The Pilot said: "We've changed our trade now. I do a little private business on the river here, smuggling, that is, while my brother's working at present in the fish trade in Jiangzhou. I'd give you a letter for him when you go there, only I don't know how to write, so I can't."

"We'll go into the village and hire a scribe to write it for you," said the White-Water Dragon. Leaving the Tong brothers to look after the boats and carrying lanterns they set off for the village.

They'd barely gone a few hundred yards when they saw torches were still flickering along the bank. The Pilot said: "Those two brothers haven't given up and gone home yet."

"What two brothers?" said the White-Water Dragon.

"The two Mu brothers from town."

"Let's call 'em over to pay their respects to our friend here," said the White-Water Dragon.

Song Jiang protested at once: "That's not at all a good idea. They've been trying to catch me!"

"Don't worry about that," the White-Water Dragon reassured him. "It's just that they didn't know it was you. They're in the same line of business as us."

The White-Water Dragon waved and let off a piercing whistle and immediately the torches and the little band of men began to approach at speed. When they came close and saw the Pilot and the White-Water Dragon conversing politely with Song Jiang, the Mu brothers had a shock. "Are you acquainted with these three then?" they said. The White-Water Dragon grinned. "Don't you know who this is?" he said.

"We've no idea. We only know he gave money to that mountebank in the town and made us lose face. We can't wait to get our hands on him."

"Well he's the one I've told you about so many times. Registrar Song Jiang of Yuncheng, otherwise known as the Opportune Rain. You'd better show your respect at once."

Throwing away their halberds they flung themselves on the ground. "We've heard of you so often," they said, "but we never thought to meet you here like this. We fear we have been appallingly rash and done you great injury. We implore you to forgive us."

Song Jiang helped them up and said: "Please tell me your names, gentlemen."

The White-Water Dragon spoke for them. "They're brothers and they're from a rich family. They're from hereabouts. Their names are Mu Hong, the Unstoppable and Mu Chun, the Irrepressible. They control the city of Jieyang. There's three of us here, you see. Let me explain. On Jieyang Hill and its environs, I'm the boss, together with the Executioner. In Jieyang City it's those two. The smuggling on this stretch of the Yangtze is controlled by the Pilot, Zhang Heng and his brother Zhang Shun, the White Eel. Together we're known as the Three Bosses."

Song Jiang said: "We didn't know anything about that. But if we are all brothers, let me beg you to release the Pill Monger."

"You mean the mountebank? Don't worry, I'll tell my brother to go and get him and bring him here. Allow us to invite you to our house to make up for our rudeness."

The White-Water Dragon said: "That's great. We'll all go to your house then."

Mu Hong sent two servants to watch the boats and ask the Tong brothers to join them. He also sent men on ahead to give advance warning and order wine and food, have sheep and pigs killed and get ready a great feast.

They waited till the Tongs arrived and then all went back to the manor together. It was around dawn. At the manor Squire Mu was invited to come out and meet them and they all sat down in the thatched hall, Mu Hong and Song Jiang opposite each other. They talked for a while and it soon became fully light. Mu Chun arrived with Xue Yong, the Pill Monger, and joined them. Mu Hong entertained Song Jiang and the rest royally at the feast he had organized. They stayed at the manor that night. Next morning Song Jiang wanted to leave at once but Mu Hong wouldn't hear of it. He insisted they all stay on at the manor and took Song Jiang off to stroll in town and see the sights of Jieyang. Three days he kept him. Song Jiang became anxious that he was exceeding the limit and insisted he must leave. No matter how much Mu Hong and the others insisted they couldn't get him to stay longer. So they arranged a farewell feast.

Next day Song Jiang was up at dawn, bade farewell to his hosts and before leaving told the Pill Monger to stay on a few days at the manor and then come on to Jiangzhou so they could meet again. Mu Hong said: "Don't worry, we'll look after him here." He then had a tray of silver brought, which he presented to Song Jiang and made a further gift of silver to the two guards. Before they actually got going the Pilot found someone at the manor to write him a personal letter to his brother which Song Jiang packed in his bag. The company saw them off as far as the bank of the river. There a boat was summoned. The luggage was taken aboard first, whilst the people waited on the bank. Song Jiang's cangue was fitted for the journey and they all came on board to offer him a farewell drink. Everyone was weeping at the prospect of parting. The White-Water Dragon, the Pilot, the two Mu brothers, the Pill Monger and the Tong brothers all went their separate ways. Of them no more.

We shall now follow Song Jiang and his guards as they travelled by boat to Jiangzhou. This boatman was nothing like the first one. He hoisted a sail and in no time was able to set them ashore at Jiangzhou. With Song Jiang wearing his cangue as usual and the guards carrying the official order and the baggage, they presented themselves at the government offices. The court happened to be in session. The governor of Jiangzhou was called Cai Dezhang, and he was the ninth son of Cai Jing, the Grand Preceptor at court — Jiangzhou people referred to him as Cai the Ninth. He was greedy and extravagant and extremely haughty in all his dealings. His father had got him appointed to Jiangzhou because it was a region of rich revenues, populous and rich in produce.

The guards presented their papers and escorted Song Jiang into the courtroom. The governor looked Song Jiang over and noticing something irregular about him said: "Why does the cangue not bear the provincial seal?"

"There was heavy spring rain along the way," the guards explained, "and the seals were ruined."

"Write out your report immediately," the governor said, "and send him to the prison camp outside the city. This court will appoint its own guards to accompany you."

Accordingly the two guards escorted Song Jiang to the prison camp and handed him over. The Jiangzhou guards received the report, and inspected Song Jiang and his escort. But first they all went to a wineshop and had a drink. Song Jiang took out several taels of silver and gave them to the Jiangzhou guards. An official receipt for the prisoner was made out and he was taken to a cell to wait. The Jiangzhou guards went to the warder's room to put in a word for him to be reasonably treated and to complete the procedures for handing him over and getting a receipt, before returning to the city. The two original guards handed over all Song Jiang's luggage amid many protestations of gratitude before bidding him farewell and returning. They said to themselves: "Although we've had some rough times, we've made a good bit of money out of it." After waiting a while at the government offices for the report they had to take back, they set out on the return journey to Jizhou.

Song Jiang meanwhile intended to buy himself some favourable treatment, and when the warder came to his cell he gave him ten taels of silver. He sent another ten taels to the warden's office, together with other gifts. Amongst the officers of the camp and the regular soldiers detailed to serve there he distributed silver so they could buy some extra food. For this reason his presence was welcome to all and sundry.

In a little while he was taken to the inspection room, where the cangue was removed and he was interviewed by the warden. The latter, having received the bribes, said: "New prisoner Song Jiang, hear this: in accordance with the regulation laid down by Emperor Wu De every new prisoner must receive a hundred disciplinary lashes. Guards, secure the prisoner." Whereupon Song Jiang said: "I became infected with a bad cold on the way here and am not yet recovered."

"The man certainly appears to be sick," said the warden. "His colour is yellow and his body emaciated, these are symptoms of sickness. Just credit him with the punishment. Since he has served in a government office, let him work as a copying clerk in the office of this camp."

An order to this effect was drawn up and Song Jiang was told to report to the office. He expressed his thanks and went back to his cell to pick up his things and transfer them to the office. When the other convicts saw Song Jiang had been given such status, they bought wine to honour him. Next day Song Jiang bought provisions himself to return the compliment. Shortly after he invited the head gaoler and other guards, and he regularly sent gifts to the warden. Since he was well provided with gold, silver and other valuables it was no problem for him to make friends. As they say: "The world's favour goes with fortune, men's kindness is linked to rank."

One day when Song Jiang was drinking with the head gaoler in the office, the latter said to him: "Do you remember, friend, how a little while back I told you how our prison superintendent always expects a present? How come you haven't sent him anything yet? It's been more than ten days. He's coming here tomorrow, and it's going to look quite bad."

"Don't worry about that," said Song Jiang. "If the fellow asks for money he won't get any. If you need any yourself, all you have to do is ask for it, but that superintendent isn't going to get a penny out of me. Let him come: I've got something to say to him."

"Registrar, this man's got a hell of a temper. And besides, he really knows how to use his fists and his feet. If there's trouble and he comes down on you hard, don't say I didn't warn you."

"He must do as he pleases. But don't worry. I've got my own methods. Maybe I'll give him something, maybe I won't. Maybe he'll ask me for it, maybe he won't."

But even before he'd finished speaking, a guard came in and announced: "The superintendent's come. He's in the main hall, kicking up a horrible row, wants to know where the new prisoner is and why he hasn't sent the customary gift."

"What did I say?" said the head gaoler. "Now he's going to take it out on all of us."

Song Jiang only laughed. "You'll have to excuse me now," he said. "We'll continue our conversation another time. I'll go and have it out with him at once."

The gaoler stood up, saying: "As for us, we'd better keep out of his way."

Song Jiang left the office and went straight to the inspection room to find the superintendent. Now if Song Jiang had not see that man, it would not have happened that:

Jiangzhou is changed into a den of wolves and tigers;
Bodies are heaped at the crossroads, the streets awash with blood.

And as a result:

Heaven's snare is broken, they return to the Marshes;
The world's trap is sprung, they return to Mount Liang.

THE big man said, "I have ordered the people not to give any money to this man, so how dare you offer him money without my consent."

Song Jiang replied, "I gave him money, but that is not your business."

The fellow took hold of Song Jiang and said, "You banished thief! How dare you reply to me?"

"Why should I not answer you?" asked Song Jiang.

The man raised his fist to strike Song Jiang, but the latter stepped back to avoid the blow. The man however advanced a step, and was in the act of striking when the medicine seller seized him, and lifting him up threw him to the ground. The big fellow was getting up when the medicine seller knocked him down again with his foot. The escort with Song Jiang now intervened to persuade the medicine seller not to go any further.

The man had now got up, and spoke, "Wait a little. We will soon see who is who." He then went away.

Song Jiang turned to the medicine seller, and asked for his name.

"I am a Luoyang man. My name is Xue Yong, and my grandfather was an officer in the army, but owing to intrigues of his fellow officers he got no further promotion. My father and myself have had to sell medicine for a living. Abroad I have got the nickname of the 'Sick Tiger.' I beg to ask your name."

"I am Song Jiang of Yuncheng County."

The man knelt down when he heard this. Song Jiang raised him up and said, "Let us find a place where we can drink wine together." He agreed, and gathering his things together went with Song Jiang to an inn near by.

The innkeeper, however, said, "Although I have both wine and meat yet I dare not supply you with them."

"Why not?" asked Song Jiang.

"Because you have had a row with that big man. He told the people that if anybody supply you with wine or food he would smash up our places. We dare not offer any resistance to him. He is the bully of this town, and we all have to do as he says."

"In that case we shall have to go," said Song Jiang.

"I should like to go now to the inn where I live, and settle my bill," said Xue Yong. "I will come to Jiangzhou to see you in a few days."

Song Jiang agreed to this, and gave him twenty taels of silver. They then went their own ways.

Song Jiang and his escort tried to get food at several inns, but they could not get refreshment anywhere. They at last left the town, and traveled until it was nightfall without being received by any inn. They discussed matters, and could not understand why they should have provoked the big fellow by giving the medicine vendor money. Just then however they happened to see a light in a forest in the distance and they decided to go and ask for a night's lodging.

It was not on the main road, but they agreed that it was the only place for a rest. When they had gone about half a //off the road they came to a large farmhouse. They knocked at the gate, and the farm laborers asked, "Who are you, and why do you come after dark like this?"

"I am a prisoner on the way to Jiangzhou," said Song Jiang. "We cannot find an inn to stop at, and I beg you to allow us to stay here for the night. We shall leave early tomorrow, and pay you for the lodging."

The servant asked them to wait there while he went, and reported the matter to his master. He soon returned and admitted them. The master gave orders that they were to have rooms and also food. When they had finished their meal, and the things had been cleared away the escort said that as there were no strangers in the room Song Jiang could remove his cangue, and have a peaceful sleep that night. He did this, and then they went outside to lavatory before retiring for the night. It was a clear starlit night, and looking round they saw that there was a footpath at the side of the wheat stacks leading behind the room in which they were housed. When they returned to their room Song Jiang said that it was very fortunate for them to get such a place for the night. Just then they heard men light a torch, and come searching round the wheat stacks. Looking through a crack in the door Song Jiang saw that it was the host with three laborers who bore torches. Song Jiang said, "This farmer reminds me of my father who could never sleep until he had been all round the premises at night." Just then however they heard someone knocking at the farm gate. The farm laborer opened the gate, and about seven men came in the farmyard. The leader held a halberd in his hand, and his men were armed with sticks. Song Jiang recognized the leader in the light of the torches, as the bully of Jieyang Town. The old host asked, "Where have you come from, and whom are you looking for?"

The leader replied, "You do not know, father. Is my elder brother at home?"

"Your brother became drunk, and is sleeping in the room at the back."

"I will go and call him," said the leader. "He will go with me to drive a fellow out of this district."

"With whom have you had a dispute? Your brother would not put up with the dispute. You had better tell me all about this matter."

The leader then recited all that had happened on the street that morning, and that he had given orders to all the innkeepers not to supply food or lodging to the prisoner who was passing. They had captured the medicine seller and the following day they would take him to the river, bind him with ropes, and throw him into the water. "As regards the prisoner and his escort we have not been able to find them yet. I want my brother to go with me now and search everywhere for those three fellows."

"My son!" said the farmer. "This is not a creditable affair. If the prisoner gave some money what has that got to do with you? Why do you now wish to attack him? You listen to me, and let the matter drop. You must not speak to your elder brother about this. If he hears that you have been ill-treated he will certainly want to support you. I am afraid that you will kill someone. Listen to me now, and go to bed. Do not attempt to disturb other people's rest this night."

But the son would not listen to his father's advice, and entered the yard with a halberd in his hands, followed by his father.

Song Jiang had heard all this, and spoke to his escort, "This is an unfortunate position. What shall we do? We had better go on our way for if this man gets to know that we are here he will kill us. The farmer may not say anything about us, but how dare the servants conceal us from him?"

The escort agreed, and wanted to go at once. Song Jiang said, "We cannot leave by the gate so we will get through a wall at the back of this building." They got their baggage, and having got through the wall they found a footpath leading into the forest, and they went that way. They had been walking about an hour when they came to a river bordered by reeds. It was the Xunyang River. Just then they heard behind them a great noise and many whistles being blown. It was a critical moment, and they all prayed to Heaven for assistance. They hid themselves in the reeds, and watched the flaming torches approach. They were all afraid, and went further into the depth of the reeds until they reached the edge of the reeds facing the swift running river.

Song Jiang had given up all hope when he saw a small boat emerge from the reeds. He called out, "Sir, please come here, and save us three men. We will give you money."

"Who are you, and how did you get in such a place?"

"There are men pursuing us, and we came here just to escape from them. Bring your boat here at once, and you will be rewarded."

The boatman forced his boat through the reeds, and the three men were soon on board. The baggage was thrown into the boat, and the boatman heard the noise it made and knew it contained silver, and was pleased. He sculled the boat out into the river. Looking back they saw about ten men standing on the bank of the river with lighted torches. The pursuers saw the boat, and there was much shouting for the boat to return. The three men lay down in the bottom of the boat, and the boat proceeded on its way. The pursuers called out, 'If you do not return we shall kill you later on." The boatman only laughed at this threat and replied, "My name is Zhang the Boatman. Stop goddamn yelling at me."

A voice from the bank said, "Zhang, do you not recognize us?"

"I am not blind," replied Zhang. "Of course I can see you."

"Then come here as I have something to say to you," the voice replied.

"You can speak to me tomorrow," replied Zhang the boatman. "My passengers are in great haste."

"But we want to arrest your passengers," said the voice.

"These three men are relatives of mine," said Zhang, "and I depend on them for a living. I invited them to eat a bowl of 'deck knife' noodles and when that is finished I will come back. Do you think I shall give you my livelihood for you to enjoy?"

"Zhang! That is not our idea. We only want to arrest the criminal. Come here!"

"I have had no customer for several days so that I am not going to give you now what I have just got. Do not take this ill, and I will meet you again in a few days." Song Jiang was stupefied and though he had heard all this, he did not understand it at all. But he decided that they would always be beholden to this man for saving their fives. They had narrowly escaped a great danger. As the boatman rowed, he sang a Huzhou song:

Alone I live on the river's bank;
Not a friend but money do I adore.
Last night the moon helped me fine;
I saw some gold and captured it.

Song Jiang and his escort were terrified when they heard this song. But on second thoughts Song Jiang considered that the boatman might be singing in a playful or jesting manner. They were discussing the question in the bottom of the boat, when the boatman lay down his scull and said, "You fellows! I know that you have cheated us people, and now I have you in my hands. Do you three fellows want to eat 'deck knife noodles,' or would you prefer to eat 'dumplings in soup'?"

"Do not joke with us, sir," said Song Jiang. "What do you mean by 'deck knife noodles' and 'dumplings in soup?'"

The boatman glared and said, "I am not joking. If you want to eat 'deck knife noodles,' I have a sword here, and I can quickly mince your bodies, and throw the pieces into the water. If you prefer 'soup pies' then you quickly strip off your clothes, and jump into the river."

"We are in a tight corner," said Song Jiang to his escort. "There is a saying, 'Blessings do not come in pairs; calamities never come singly.'"

"You three had better turn the matter over, and let me have your answer quickly," said the boatman.

"You do not understand," replied Song Jiang. "We have no escape. I am a criminal and am being conducted to Jiangzhou by these two policemen. Please take pity on us, and spare our lives."

"This is nonsensical language," the boatman said. "Spare three of you! I will not let even one escape. I am sometimes known as 'Dog-faced Zhang.' I do not make any difference even with my own father or mother. Shut your stinking mouths and get into the water!"

"We have much silver, gold, clothes, and other valuables in our baggage, and we will give them all to you. Please spare our lives," begged Song Jiang.

The boatman picked up a bright sword with a very broad blade from the bottom of the boat, and shouted, "Now you three! Which is it to be?"

Song heaved a sigh as he looked towards heaven. "Because I have failed in showing respect to Heaven, and have been unfilial to my parents, I have committed a crime, and implicated both of you two men."

The men took hold of Song Jiang, "Sir, enough! We three will all die together."

The boatman called out, "Now you three, get your clothes off, and jump into the water."

The three men embraced each other, and gazed at the water. Just then they heard the sound of sculling on another boat, and the boatman turned his head to listen. A boat was quickly approaching from up river, and was soon alongside. There were three men in the boat, and one of them was a big man and was standing with a pitchfork in his hands. The other two were young men, and they were sculling. The big man called out, "Who are you and how dare you do business here? You will have to divide with us all that you have in your boat."

The boatman quickly replied, "Ah! Is that brother Li? I thought it might be someone else. Where are you going to do business? You have not got brothers with you this time?"

"Younger brother Zhang, what is your game?" asked the tall man. "What things have you got in your boat? Have you any valuables?"

"If I told you, you would only laugh," said the boatman. "These last few days I have had no business—have lost all my money in gambling, and have not even a single cash. I was in a melancholy mood when these three men came to my boat with their baggage. Two were policemen and the other a small-sized criminal with a sallow complexion. I do not know who they are, but they are going to Jiangzhou. The prisoner however was not wearing a cangue. A number of men came to the river's bank with the two brothers Mu who wanted to capture the three men. As I judged that the escort had plenty of money I declined to hand them over."

"Ah! Can this be my brother Song Jiang?" asked the tall man.

Song Jiang seemed to recognize the voice and called out from his hiding place. "Who are you? I request you to save Song Jiang's life."

The tall man was startled at this and replied, "You really are my brother! Why not get up?"

Song Jiang crept out. It was a bright starlit night, and he immediately recognized the man as Li Jun, the "Muddy Water Dragon." Behind him he could make out the two men who were sculling as Tong Wei, the 'Cave Dragon,' and the other as Tong Meng, the 'River Churning Clam.'

Li Jun also recognized Song Jiang, and jumped across to the other boat saying, "Brother, you have been frighted. Had I not just happened to arrive in the nick of time you would have been killed. Today fate decided that I should be very fidgety at home, so that I got my boat to try to intercept some salt smugglers. I had not the slightest idea that I would save your life."

The boatman had listened to all this with great surprise, and now asked, "Can this man be Song Jiang, 'Welcome Rain,' of Shandong?"

"Of course it is."

The boatman knelt down, and kowtowed saying, "My God! Why did you not mention your name before, and so stopped me from attempting your life? I was nearly to murder you."

"Who is this boatman?" asked Song Jiang.

"He is my sworn brother," replied Li Jun. "He comes from the Xiaogu Hill, and his name is Zhang Heng. He is known as the 'Boatman,' and he lives as a virtuous pirate on the river."

Song Jiang and his escort laughed at this. The two boats were soon brought to the side of the river and moored.

Li Jun addressed the boatman Zhang Heng, "Today you are favored by Heaven to meet the greatest hero in the world, Song Jiang, 'Welcome Rain.' Take a good look at him, and never forget him." Zhang Heng took a flint and steel and striking a light lit a lamp, and had a good look at Song Jiang. He then knelt down, and said, "I hope that you will overlook my serious mistake. How did you come to be banished to the prison at Jiangzhou?"

Li Jun explained the whole situation, and then Zhang Heng said to Song Jiang, "Brother, I have something to say. I have a younger brother of the same mother. He is a big muscular fellow, can swim about fifteen //; and can stay in the water for seven days at a time. In the water he swims in a straight line. He is also a skilled gymnast. Because of this he has received the nickname the 'White Fish.' His name is Zhang Shun. Previously we lived on the Yangtze River very peacefully and orderly, but the time came when we had no money, and then we took our boat to a quiet solitary place to do some illicit business. Those people who like to save money and at the same time get quick ferrying came to us. I arranged for my brother to pretend to be a traveler, and also to come to our boat with his baggage. When the boat was full I would push off, but would soon drop the anchor, and taking a sword demand the fares. The proper fare was five hundred cash, but I would demand three thousand cash. I would first ask my brother, and when he refused to pay I would take his head in one hand, and the seat of his trousers in the other and throw him overboard. The other passengers would then willingly pay the amount demanded without raising the least objection. I would then row them to a quiet part of the bank, and they would quickly disembark and disappear. My brother would swim underneath the water to the side of the river, and emerge when nobody was about. We would soon meet, and divide the money. We earned a good living by this means for some time."

"I suppose you had plenty of patrons who looked out for your boat," said Song Jiang.
The men all laughed at this wit.
"We soon found another business," said Zhang Heng. "I came here to help in salt smuggling whereas my brother started in business at Jiangzhou as a wholesale fishmonger. I should like to write a letter to him, but unfortunately I do not know characters."
"We will go into the village here, and find a man to write the letter for you," said Li Jun.
They set off to the village, but they had not gone half the distance to that place when they saw many lighted torches on the riverbank.
"I see that the brothers Mu have not yet gone back," said Zhang Heng.
"Let us bring them here," said Li Jun.
"That will never do," said Song Jiang, "as they want to arrest me."
"They are our friends," said Li Jun. He then whistled and the torches immediately approached. When they arrived they were surprised to see Song Jiang with Li Jun and Zhang Heng, and asked, "Do you know these three men? How is it you are with them?"
Li Jun laughed loudly and said, "Who do you think he is?"
"We do not know his name. But we saw him give money to a medicine vendor in the market town, and so undermined our influence there. So we tried to arrest him."
'This is Song Jiang, 'Welcome Rain,' from Shandong, of whom I have spoken to you many times. Quickly pay your obeisance."
The two brothers kowtowed and said, "We have heard of your fame for a long time, but we did not expect to meet you this day. We have treated you badly, and hope that you will forgive us."
Song Jiang raised them up, and said, "I beg that you will give me your name."
Li Jun interposed, "These brothers are of a rich family in this town. This one is Mu Hong, and his nickname is the 'Unrestrained' and his younger brother is Mu Chun nicknamed 'Slightly Restrained.' They are the tyrants of Jieyang Town. There are two other groups of tyrants whom you will have heard of. On the Jieyang Mountain I myself and Li Li are the tyrants. On the banks of this river are two tyrants, namely, Zhang Heng and Zhang Shun. These form the three groups of tyrants."
"I have not heard of these men before," said Song Jiang, "but as we are all brothers I hope that you will now release Xue Yong."
"Do you refer to that medicine vendor?" asked Mu Hong laughingly. "Do not worry about him. I will send my brother to release him, and bring him here. We now beg you to come to our home where we can offer suitable apologies for our blunder."
'They agreed to this, and messengers were dispatched with an order to prepare a feast for the coming guests. Two men were sent to summon the two boatmen to join them also at the feast.
It was about 4 A.M. when they all reached the farmhouse, and were welcomed by Old Mu. It was almost dawn when Xue Yong arrived. They feasted together all that day. On the following day Song Jiang wished to continue on his way but Mu Hong would not agree to this. They all went for a stroll viewing the sights in the town; thus they stayed at Mu's house for three more days, and then Song Jiang insisted upon departure as he was afraid that the time limit would be over.
At last they agreed to his departure. Upon his departure Zhang Heng got a letter written introducing Song Jiang to his brother at Jiangzhou. They all shed tears as he embarked on the boat. The boat had sails, and as the wind was favorable it soon reached Jiangzhou. They went straight to the yamen, and presented their dispatch to the Prefect.
The Prefect Cai Dezhang, the ninth son of the Prime Minister Cai Jing, was a proud man with an overbearing manner, and he was addicted to taking secret commissions. His father appointed him here because the prefecture was a very wealthy place. He saw that Song Jiang did not look like an average man so he asked him, "How is it that there is no written statement on your cangue?"
The escort stated that on the journey there had been much rain which had washed the written statement away.
The escort was dismissed and Song Jiang was sent to the prison where he was put in a small house separate from the main building.
Song Jiang duly bribed the attendants and the warden with ten taels of silver each, so that they were all pleased. When he was called to the inspection room the warden said, "Song Jiang, listen to me. The founder of the Song Dynasty, Emperor Taizu, made a law that criminals who had been transferred to a prison should receive one hundred blows with the bamboo. Now, those on my left and right, take the prisoner and inflict the usual punishment."
"On the journey here, sir," said Song Jiang, "I caught a cold, and have not quite recovered from it."
"I can see that you are not quite well," replied the official, "so we will postpone the blows today. He was previously a clerk in a yamen so that we will use him in that capacity in this yamen." He thereupon wrote out an order to that effect.
Song Jiang expressed his thanks, and returning to his quarters took his baggage to the office where he was to work as a writer. The prisoners realized that Song Jiang was a man with influence. They bought wine, and invited him to drink with them, and he received their congratulations. The next day Song Jiang invited the prisoners to wine in the same way. He also often asked the lower officials to dine with him, and sent presents to the warden. The result was that he had many friends. Within a fortnight they were all pleased to have made his acquaintance. An ancient says, "Human relations vary—sometimes friendship, sometimes the opposite. Some fawn upon the wealthy and avoid the poor."
One day when Song Jiang was entertaining one of the turnkeys the latter said, "The other day I told you that you must not overlook giving the head jailer some money, but how is it that you have not yet done so? It is now nearly ten days since you came here. He will certainly come to see you tomorrow, and then it will be too late to offer money."
"Never mind that," said Song Jiang. "If he wants money I will not give him any. But if you turnkeys want money and ask me for it I will certainly supply the same. That superintendent shall not have a single cash. When he comes here I shall have something to say to him."
"Sir, but that man is a stern disciplinarian, and he is over us," said the turnkey. "If you have a disagreement with him he will certainly abuse you. In that case do not say that I did not warn you."
"Don't worry about that," said Song Jiang. "It may be of course that I shall give him something, and it may be that he does not want anything."
While they were talking about this a messenger came in, and reported that the head jailer was coming. He was evidently in a temper as he called out, "How is it that the newly arrived prisoner has not given me regular money?"
The turnkey said, "Did I not tell you so?"
Song Jiang laughed and said, "I will go to meet him and will see you later." He did this.

Seas of blood, and heaps of corpses,
At the crossroads in the town;
Mandarin nets were spread on all sides,
But the bandits broke them down.

136
Welcome Timely Rain Song Jiang Meets the Divine Marvellous Traveller Magic Messenger; Black Whirlwind Iron Ox Fights White Streak Eel Fish in the Waves & have a set-to in the river

Seated on a bench in the Registration Room the superintendent was shouting: "Where is the new exiled prisoner?"
The guard pointed at Song Jiang. "That's him."
"You swarthy sawed-off bait for the executioner," roared the superintendent. "Who's backing you that you dare withhold my money?"
"Gifts must be given willingly," Song Jiang retorted. "They can't be forced. You're very petty."
The men watching from both sides, hearing this, broke into a cold sweat.
"Thief of an exile," the superintendent raged. "You have the temerity to call me petty. Guards, turn this rogue up and give him a hundred strokes of the persuader!"
Everyone in the prison was on good terms with Song Jiang. When the order was given to beat him, they all departed hurriedly, leaving him and the superintendent alone. The superintendent was furious. He grabbed the persuader staff and rushed towards Song Jiang.
"What crime have I committed that you want to beat me?" Song Jiang queried.
"Thief of an exile, you're completely in my hands. I can treat your slightest cough as a crime!"
"You're just picking fault. It's not that serious. I haven't committed any capital offense."
"You haven't, eh?" the superintendent fumed. "I can take your life as easily as I swat a fly, if I feel like it."
Song Jiang laughed coldly. "Because I don't give you money I deserve to die. In that case what should be the fate of a man who has befriended Wu Yong of Mount Liangshan?"
The superintendent dropped the staff. "What's that you say?"
"I'm talking about Military Advisor Wu Yong's friend. Why do you ask?"
The superintendent hastily pulled Song Jiang aside. "Who are you? How do you know about that?"
Song Jiang smiled. "I'm from Yuncheng County, Shandong Province. My name is Song Jiang."
Startled, the superintendent clasped his hands together respectfully. "Song Jiang the Timely Rain!"
"It didn't seem worth mentioning."
"Brother, this is no place to talk. I can't kowtow here. In the city we can speak freely. Please come with me."
"I'll be with you in a few moments. I just want to lock my door."
Song Jiang went back to his room, got Wu Yong's letter, took some silver, came out, locked the door, and asked the guard to keep an eye on things. Then he and the superintendent left the prison and went into Jiangzhou. They mounted the stairs to the upper storey of a tavern off the street and sat down.
"Where did you see Wu Yong, brother?" asked the superintendent.
Song Jiang produced the letter from inside his clothes and handed it to him. The superintendent tore open the envelope, read the missive, then concealed it in his sleeve. Dropping to his knees, he kowtowed.
Song Jiang quickly returned the courtesy. "I'm afraid I spoke rudely to you. Please forgive me," he begged.
"All I knew was that a prisoner named Song had been delivered," the superintendent explained. "It's our custom for all newly arrived exiles to pay five ounces of silver. But more than ten days passed and there was no sign of the gift. I wasn't very busy today, so I came down to collect in person. I never knew it was you. I hope I didn't offend you there in prison, brother. I beg your pardon."
"The head keeper spoke to me of you several times. I intended to call on you and pay my respects, but I didn't know where you lived and had no occasion to go into town. I could only wait for you to come. That's what delayed our meeting. I didn't care about the five ounces of silver. I thought if I deliberately withheld them, brother would be sure to come. Today we've met and all my wishes have been answered."
Who was this superintendent? He was none other than Dai Zong to whom Wu Yong had written a letter of introduction, the head of Jiangzhou's two prisons. In Song times prison heads in the Jinling region were called "Master"; in the Hunan region they were known as "Superintendent". Dai had an astonishing talent. Whenever he was out on an urgent mission he would wrap a picture of a god around each of his legs, and this gave him miraculous travelling powers. He could cover five hundred //in a single day. He could do eight hundred if he tied two to each leg. For this reason everyone hailed him as Dai Zong the Marvellous Traveller.
Now that both men had revealed their feelings and motives they were very pleased with each other. Sitting in a corner room, they summoned the waiter and ordered wine and tidbits and vegetable dishes. Over the wine, Song Jiang told of the many bold heroes and men he had met on the road. Dai Zong, too, spoke frankly, revealing his relations with Wu Yong.
They talked intimately and without reserve. Before they had finished more than two or three cups of wine they heard a tumult of voices on the floor below. The waiter hurried into their room.
"Superintendent, you're the only one who can handle him," he said to Dai. "There's no other way. Please go and settle this."
"Who's raising all that row down there?"
"It's that brother Li we often see you with, the man called Iron Ox. He's trying to borrow money from the host."
Dai laughed. "That rascal is misbehaving again. I couldn't imagine who you meant." To Song Jiang he said: "Excuse me a minute, brother. I'll bring him up."
Dai went down the stairs and soon returned with a big dark complected fellow. Song Jiang was taken aback by the man's appearance. "Who is this brother?" he asked the superintendent.
"One of our prison guards, Li Kui, from Baizhang Village, Yishui County, in Yizhou Prefecture. He's nicknamed Black Whirlwind. In his native parts he's also known as Iron Ox. He had to run away from home because he beat a man to death. He wandered to Jiangzou and here he's remained, although later there was an amnesty. Because he's nasty when he's drunk, many people are afraid of him. He can wield two battle-axes, and he's good with fists and cudgel. He's on our prison staff."
Li Kui looked Song Jiang over. "Who's this swarthy fellow?" he asked Dai Zong.
The superintendent smiled. "You see what a crude lout he is, sir Clerk. No manners whatsoever."
"I only asked," said Li Kui. "What's crude about that?"
"Instead of saying 'Who is this gentleman?' you said 'Who is this swarthy fellow?' If that isn't crude, what is? Well, I'll tell you who he is. He's the noble brother you've been wanting to join for so long."
"Not Blacky Song Jiang, the Timely Rain from Shandong?"
"Must you be so vulgar?" Dai shouted. "Referring to him like that! Haven't you any sense of rank? Kowtow to him, quickly. What are you waiting for?"
"I will if he's really Song Jiang. But if he's just some idler, I'll be blown if I will. You're not just making sport of me, are you, brother?"
"I am indeed Blacky Song Jiang, of Shandong," Song Jiang assured him.
Li Kui clapped his hands. "My blessed grandfather! Why didn't you say so earlier? Iron Ox delighted!" He flopped to the ground and kowtowed.
Song Jiang hastily returned the compliment. "Brave brother, please be seated," he pleaded.
"Come sit beside me and have some wine," said Dai.
"All right, but none of those piddling little cups for me. I want a large bowl."
"What angered you downstairs?" Song Jiang asked.
"I've a big silver ingot that I pawned for ten ounces of silver coins," said Li Kui. "I wanted to borrow ten ounces from the host here to get the bar back, plus a little more for spending money. But the knave wouldn't lend me a thing. I was just going to deal with him and smash his premises when brother Dai called me upstairs."
"You need only ten ounces to redeem your ingot? Aren't there any interest charges?"
"I've got the interest money. All I need is another ten ounces."
Song Jiang took out ten coins and gave them to Li Kui. "Go redeem your ingot," he said. Dai Zong wanted to intervene, but Song Jiang had already handed the money over.
"Great," said Li Kui. "You two brothers wait here. I'll repay as soon as I get my ingot. And I'll invite brother Song outside the town to eat and drink with us."
"Stay a while," said Song Jiang. "Have a few bowls here, first."
"I'll be right back." Li Kui pushed the door curtain aside and went downstairs.
"You shouldn't lend him money," Dai Zong said. "I tried to prevent you, but you were too quick."
"Why not?"
"Li Kui is pretty straight, but he loves to drink and gamble. Where would he get a big silver ingot! It's just a ruse, and you fell for it, brother. He must be going to gamble. That's why he left here so fast. If he wins, he'll return your money. If he loses, you'll never see a penny of those ten ounces of silver. I'm ashamed to have been the cause of this."
Song Jiang laughed. "Don't treat me like a stranger, brother. The silver's not worth talking about. Let him lose it. He seems like a straightforward loyal fellow."
"He has his good points. He's just too rude and rash. In the Jiangzhou prison when he gets drunk he doesn't bother the inmates, but he beats up the toughest guards. He's caused me no end of trouble. The slightest injustice drives him wild, and he tears into bullies. Everyone in Jiangzhou is afraid of him."

"Let's have another cup or two, and stroll around outside the city."
"I nearly forgot. I want to show you the scenery along the river."
"That will be fine. I'd like to see the beauties of Jiangzhou."
Meanwhile, Li Kui, having obtained some money, thought: "What luck! Brother Song Jiang never met me before, but he lends me ten ounces of silver. He certainly deserves his reputation for righteousness and generosity. What a shame I've lost steadily at gambling these last few days. I haven't a copper to invite him out. I'll gamble with these ten ounces of silver he's given me. If I win a few strings of cash, I'll be able to wine and dine him, and that will make me look good."

Li Kui hurried to a gambling den outside the city run by a man called Little Zhang Yi. He threw his ten ounces of silver down on the gambling floor and said: "Let me have the toss coins."
Little Zhang Yi knew he played honestly. "Wait a while, brother," he urged. "You take the next round."
"I want this one."
"Bet from the sidelines which way the coins will fall."
"I don't want to do that. I want to toss them myself. I'm betting five ounces of silver." Li Kui snatched the coins from a man who was waiting to toss. "Who'll cover my bet?"
"I will," said little Zhang Yi.
"Tails," cried Li Kui, and tossed. The coins, came up heads.
Little Zhang Yi reached for the money.
"I came here with ten ounces," said Li Kui.
"I'll beg you another five, then," said Little Zhang Yi. "If you get tails, I'll return you the five you just lost."
Li Kui took the coins and tossed. "Tails," he shouted. Again the coins turned up heads.
Little Zhang Yi grinned. "I told you to wait for the next round and not grab the toss coins, but you wouldn't listen. Now you've thrown two heads in a row."
"This silver doesn't belong to me."
"It doesn't matter whose it is. You've lost and that's that."
"Lend it to me, then. I'll pay you back tomorrow."
"Idle chatter! As the old saying has it: 'There's no pity in gambling.' You've lost. What are you making such a fuss about?"
Li Kui hitched up the front of his gown. "Are you going to return me that money or not?"
"Brother Li, you gamble honestly as a rule. Why are you behaving so badly today?"
Li Kui did not reply but picked his money up from the floor and also snatched ten ounces of silver belonging to other gamblers, and put them all in the pocket of his cloth gown. Glaring, he said: "I usually play straight, but today's an exception."
Little Zhang Yi rushed up to wrest back the money. Li Kui made a feint and threw him to the ground. A dozen gamblers swarmed against the big fellow. Li Kui feinted east and struck west, feinted south and struck north. He pounded them till they had no place to hide, then he headed for the gate.
"Where are you going, young man?" the gate-keeper asked.
Li Kui thrust him aside, kicked open the gate and went out, pursued by the other gamblers. They shouted after him: "How can you behave like this, brother Li? Taking our silver!" But they didn't dare come close.
As Li Kui was walking away, a man ran up behind him, seized his arm and shouted: "How dare you grab other people's property, you scoundrel?"
"What friggin business is that of yours?" Li Kui spun around to find himself looking at Dai Zong and, standing to Dai's rear, Song Jiang. A look of embarrassment spread over Li's face.
"Don't blame me, brother. Iron Ox usually plays fair. But I lost your silver and had no money to invite you out. I got excited and behaved badly."
Song Jiang laughed. "Any time you need silver, just ask me. You obviously lost, so give them back their money."
Li Kui had no choice but to take the silver from his pocket and put it in Song Jiang's hand. Song Jiang called Little Zhang Yi over and gave him the money.
"I'll take only what belongs to us," said the gambler. "I don't want the other ten pieces which brother Li lost to me. He's liable to hold it against me."
"Take it all, and don't worry," Song Jiang urged, but the gambler was adamant. "Did he hurt any of you?" Song Jiang asked.
"The game master, the collector and the gate-keeper—he knocked them all down."
"Then let this be their compensation. If you won't accept this for them, I'll go to them myself."
The gambler took the silver, thanked Song Jiang and departed.
"Now," said Song Jiang, "let's have a few cups with brother Li."
"Up ahead beside the river is the Pipa Pavilion," said Dai. "It was once frequented by the Tang poet Bai Juyi. Now it's a tavern. We can have some wine there and admire the river scenery."
"Hadn't we better buy some tidbits in town first, to take along?"
"No need. They serve meals, too."
"In that case, let's go."
The three men proceeded to the Pipa Pavilion. One portion of it overlooked the Xunyang River, the other was used as living quarters for the host. Upstairs were ten or so tables. Dai Zong selected a clean one and invited Song Jiang to be seated. The superintendent sat down opposite, and placed Li Kui at his side. They ordered vegetables, fruit and seafood delicacies to go with the wine. The waiter produced two jugs of "Springtime in Jade Bottles"—a famous Jiangzhou liquor—and removed the clay stoppers.
"A large bowl for me," said Li Kui. "I can't drink out of those little cups."
"Rustic," Dai barked. "I want you to just drink your wine and keep quiet."
"This gentleman and I will use cups," Song Jiang told the waiter. "Give our big brother a large bowl."
The waiter responded and went out. He soon returned with a bowl which he placed in front of Li Kui. He poured the wine and served the tidbits. Li Kui grinned.
"You're really a fine man, brother Song, as everyone says. You understand me. Getting you as a friend is one of the best things that ever happened to me."
Six or seven rounds of drinks were consumed. Song Jiang was pleased with his two companions. After drinking several cups, he suddenly got a craving for hot pepper fish soup.
"Is there any fresh fish around here?" he asked Dai Zong.
"Don't you see all those fishing boats on the river?" Dai responded with a smile. "The whole region is teeming with fish and rice."
"Some hot pepper fish soup would be just right for sobering up."
Dai called the waiter and ordered three servings of fish in hot pepper soup. Not long after, the soup arrived.
" 'Beautiful crockery is more satisfying than delicious food,' " Song Jiang quoted. "Although this is only a tavern, they certainly have lovely bowls." He picked up his chopsticks. After urging Dai Zong and Li Kui to eat, he tasted the fish and sipped the soup.
Li Kui didn't bother with chopsticks. He pulled the fish out of his bowl with his hand and ate it, bones and all. Song Jiang couldn't help laughing. He took two more sips of soup, then put down his chopsticks and stopped eating.
Dai Zong said: "This is preserved fish, brother. I'm sure it's not to your taste."
"I thought a little fresh fish soup would go well after wine. But this fish isn't really very good."
"I can't eat mine, either. I don't like salted fish."
Li Kui, who had finished his own bowl, said: "If you brothers don't want yours, I'll eat it for you." He scooped the fish out of Song Jiang's bowl with his fingers and consumed it, then did the same with Dai Zong's. He spattered the whole table with soup.
Song Jiang watched Li Kui demolish three bowls of fish soup, including bones. He summoned the waiter.
"I think this brother is still hungry. Bring him two catties of sliced meat. I'll pay when you've added up the bill."
"We've no beef, only mutton. You can have all the fat mutton you want."
Li Kui flung the remnants of his soup in the man's face, slopping his clothes.
"What are you doing?" Dai Zong yelled.
"This sassy villain has the nerve to pretend I eat nothing but beef and won't give me any mutton."
"I only asked," the waiter protested. "I didn't say anything."
"Go slice the meat," said Song Jiang. "I'll pay."
Swallowing his anger, the man sliced two catties of mutton and served it on a platter. Li Kui didn't stand on ceremony. In a twiddle of thumbs, he chomped the whole thing down.
"You're a good man," Song Jiang said admiringly.
"Brother Song can read my friggin mind. Meat's much better than fish."
Dai called the waiter over. "The bowls you served that fish soup in were very nice, but the fish was too salty. Don't you have any fresh fish you can make a pepper soup of for this gentleman here, to cut the effects of the wine?"
"To tell you the truth, sir, that fish was last night's. Today's live catch is still on the boats. But none of it can be sold until the catch-master comes. So we don't have any fresh fish yet."
Li Kui jumped up. "I'll get a couple for brother."
"Don't go," said Dai Zong. "We'll ask the waiter to buy some."
"Those fishermen won't dare refuse me. There's nothing to it."
The superintendent couldn't stop him. Li Kui left. "I hope you'll excuse me, brother," Dai said to Song Jiang, "for introducing you to a man like that. He has absolutely no manners. I'm very embarrassed."
"That's his nature. No one can change it. But I respect his honesty."
The two chatted and joked in the Pipa Pavilion.
Li Kui went down to the river. Eighty or ninety fishing boats were moored in a row to willow trees along the bank. Some of the fishermen were sprawled asleep in the stern, some were mending nets on the bow. Others were bathing in the water. It was the middle of the fifth lunar month, and a red sun was sinking in the west. Of the catch-master there was no sign, and so no fish were on sale.
"You've got fresh fish on board," Li Kui called. "Let me have a couple."
"We can't open the hatches till the catch-master comes. Don't you see all those pedlars waiting on the bank?"
"Who cares about your friggin catch-master. Just let me have two fish."
"We haven't burned the paper ingots yet to pay the gods. How can we open the hatches and give you fish?"
Before the fishermen could stop him, Li Kui jumped onto one of the boats. He didn't understand anything about these craft, and he hauled up a bamboo partition.
"Don't do that," the fishermen on the bank yelled.
Li Kui groped around under the hatch cover, but he couldn't find any fish. The river boats had large openings in the stern which let the water in and kept the fish in the hold alive. The bamboo partition was to prevent them from swimming out. Jiangzhou was supplied with fresh fish through this method. When Li Kui pulled up the partition, all the fish in the boat escaped.
He leaped over to the adjoining craft and hauled up its bamboo partition. Seventy or eighty fishermen rushed on board and attacked Li Kui with bamboo poles. Enraged, he stripped off his gown and stood with only a checkered kerchief covering his loins. He snatched half a dozen of the punting poles with both hands and snapped them like scallions. The startled fishermen left hastily, undid the moorings of their boats and shoved off.
Li Kui, naked as an owl, angrily seized a broken pole and charged up the bank to continue the battle. The pedlars shouldered their carrying-poles and fled in confusion.
In the midst of this turmoil, a man was seen approaching along a path. "You've come at last, master," several persons called. "That big dark fellow has been grabbing fish. He's driven off all the boats."
"Which big dark fellow? How dare he behave like that?"
"There, on the bank, chasing and beating people."
The man sped towards Li Kui, shouting: "Have you eaten a panther's heart or a tiger's gall that you dare mess up my business?"
Li Kui looked at him. He was over six feet tall, about thirty-two or three, with a black mustache and goatee. His head was swathed in blue silk of a swastika pattern, through which a lock of hair protruded bound by a string of heartsblood red. He wore a white cloth gown, tied at the waist by a red sash. On his feet were many-looped hemp sandals with black and white bird's-foot design. He held a weighing scale in one hand.
He had come to sell fish, but when he saw Li Kui knocking people about, he passed his scale to a pedlar and rushed forward. "Who else do you want to beat, scoundrel?" he cried.
Without a word, Li Kui whirled his pole and swung. The man dodged and seized the pole. Li Kui grabbed him by the hair. Three times the man snatched for his legs, hoping to trip him up. But Li Kui had the strength of an ox. He simply held him off and prevented him from grappling. The man pummelled Li Kui's ribs, but the big fellow was unperturbed. When he started kicking, Li Kui pushed his head down and pounded his back like a drum with a fist of iron. He couldn't get away.
Someone ran up behind Li Kui and wrapped his arms around his waist, helped by another man. "You can't do this," they exclaimed.
Li Kui turned his head and saw Dai Zong and Song Jiang. He released his grip and the man he had been thumping sped away like a wisp of smoke.
"I told you not to go for fish," Dai scolded. "And here you are, fighting. Suppose you killed him? You have to spend the rest of your life in jail."
"Afraid I'd implicate you? If I killed anyone, I'd bear the whole blame myself."
"Don't talk like that, brother," said Song Jiang. "Put your gown on, and we'll have some wine."
Li Kui retrieved his gown from beneath a willow, slung it over his arm, and set off with Dai and Song. Before they had gone a dozen paces a voice behind them shouted: "Swarthy rascal, you and I are going to have this out."
Li Kui turned. The catch-master, naked except for a breechcloth, had skin as white as snow. He had removed his blue silk head binding, revealing a topknot of hair tied with string of heartsblood red. He was poling a boat towards the bank.
"Villain who deserves ten thousand slices," he yelled. "If I fear you I'm no man. Whoever runs from this fight is a craven coward."
Li Kui roared with rage, cast his gown aside, and rushed to meet the foe. The man poled his boat a bit closer to the bank, cursing steadily.
"Come ashore, if you're such a man," Li Kui invited.
The catch-master poked Li Kui in the legs with his pole. Furious, the big fellow leaped on board. Quicker than it takes to say, the man set himself and, with a few shoves of the pole, sped the craft like an arrow to the middle of river.
Li Kui knew how to swim, but not very well. He was confused and alarmed. The man stopped his swearing and set the pole down.
"Come on," he said, "let's see who'll be the victor." He seized Li Kui by the arms. "I'm not going to fight you yet. I want you to drink some water, first." With his feet he tipped the boat over, turning it bottom up and dumping both men in the river.
Song Jiang and Dai Zong, who had hurried to the bank, groaned. Nearly five hundred people were also watching from beneath the willows. "The big dark fellow was tricked," they said. "Even if he escapes with his life, he'll get a bellyful of water."
The river parted and Li Kui was lifted up, only to be shoved down under again. The two men battled in the jade waves—one dark to the point of blackness, the other pale as glistening frost. Fiercely interlocked they fought, and the five hundred spectators on the bank raised cheer after cheer.
Li Kui had been ducked so often that his eyes were white. Again he was lifted, again pushed under. He was clearly getting the worst of it. Song Jiang told Dai Zong to ask people to save him.
"Who is that big white fellow?" Dai Zong asked.
"He's our local catch-master," someone replied. "Zhang Shun."

When Song Jiang heard that name, he exclaimed: "Not the one they call White Streak in the Waves?"
"Yes, that's him."
"I have a letter for him back at the prison from his brother Zhang Heng," Song Jiang told the superintendent.
Dai went to the edge of the bank and called: "Brother Zhang, stop fighting. There's a letter for you from your older brother Zhang Heng. That big dark fellow is our friend. Let him go. Come ashore and talk."
Zhang Shun recognized the superintendent. He released Li Kui, hurried to the shore, climbed the bank and greeted Dai respectfully. "Forgive my bad manners, Superintendent," he said.
"For my sake, rescue that brother of mine and bring him here," Dai pleaded. "There's someone I want you to meet."
Zhang Shun dived into the river and swam swiftly to where Li Kui was floundering about, his head in the water. Zhang grasped him by the hand. His legs treaded water so powerfully he seemed to be walking on land, and the waves only came up to his navel. With one hand he hauled Li Kui towards the shore. The audience on the bank cheered. Song Jiang was stricken dumb with amazement. The two men soon reached the bank. Li Kui, gasping, vomited up a lot of water.
"Please come with me to the Pipa Pavilion where we can talk," said Dai.
Zhang Shun got his gown and put it on. Li Kui did the same, and the four men went to the pavilion.
"Do you know me, brother?" Dai asked Zhang Shun.
"Of course, Superintendent. But it's never been my good fortune to meet you."
Dai pointed at Li Kui. "Did you know this fellow before? Today you two have clashed."
"Naturally I know brother Li. But this is the first time we've matched strength."
"You ducked me plenty," said Li Kui.
"And you really pounded me," Zhang Shun replied.
"You're now brothers who've contended," said Dai. " 'You don't know a man till you've fought him,' as the old saying goes."
"In the future, don't try to start anything with me on land," Li Kui warned.
"I'll just wait for you on the water."
All four men laughed, and mutually apologized for their rudeness. Pointing at Song Jiang, Dai addressed himself to Zhang Shun.
"Do you recognize this brother?"
"No. I've never seen him before."
Li Kui jumped to his feet. "That's Blacky Song Jiang."
"Not Clerk Song of Yuncheng, the Timely Rain from Shandong?"
"Yes, he's brother Song Jiang," Dai confirmed.
Zhang Shun promptly kowtowed. "I've long known your fame, but I never dreamed we'd meet today. Many's the time I've heard brothers in the gallant fraternity tell of your virtues, how you rescue those in danger and help the needy, how righteous you are, how generous."
"You mustn't exaggerate. Not long ago I spent a few days in the home of Li Jun the Turbulent River Dragon, below Jieyang Ridge. Then, because of an encounter with Mu Hong at the Xunyang River, I also met your brother Zhang Heng. He wrote a letter which he asked me to deliver to you. I have it back at the prison. I came here today to the Pipa Pavilion with Superintendent Dai and brother Li to drink some wine and admire the river scenery. I got a sudden craving for fish soup to sober me up, and brother Li volunteered to get the fish. We couldn't stop him. Hearing a great row down by the bank, we sent the waiter to see what was going on. He said the big dark fellow was beating people. We rushed down to stop him. Little did we think that we would meet you, warrior. I have indeed have been blessed by Heaven today. I've made the acquaintance of three bold gallants. Please, let's be seated and have a few cups."
They summoned the waiter to lay the table and bring wine and tidbits.
"If it's fish you want, brother," Zhang Shun said to Song Jiang, "I'll get you some."
"Thank you."
"I'll go with you," said Li Kui.
"Not again?" said Dai. "Haven't you drunk enough water?"
Zhang Shun laughed, and took Li Kui's hand. "We'll go for the fish together and see what the response is."
They left the pavilion and went down to the river. Zhang Shun whistled, once. All the fishing craft on the lake came poling towards them.
"Who's got any golden carp?" Zhang Shun asked.
"Here," cried one of the boatmen.
"I've got some," shouted another.
In an instant a dozen golden carp were produced. Zhang Shun selected four large ones and strung them together with a tendril of willow. He told Li Kui to take them up to the pavilion and have the kitchen start preparing them. He himself counted the peddlers and instructed an apprentice to commence weighing and selling the catch. Then he returned to the Pipa Pavilion to rejoin Song Jiang. "Why did you bring so many?" the clerk asked him. "One would have been enough."
"Such small gifts are not worth mentioning. What you can't finish you can take back to you residence for snacks." They sat in accordance with their age. Li Kui, being older, took the third place. Zhang Shun had the fourth. The waiter was told to bring two jugs of best quality "Spring in Jade Bottles," plus seafood and various delicacies to go with the wine. Zhang Shun instructed the waiter to make pepper soup with one of the carp. Another was to be steamed in wine, sliced and fried in batter. The four men talked freely as they sat drinking. Just as they were loosening up, a girl of sixteen, dressed in silks, came in. She curtsied, hailed each respectfully, and started to sing. She interrupted Li Kui, who had begun boasting of his bold exploits. The other three men turned to listen to the girl. Li Kui jumped up and thrust two fingers against her forehead. With a scream, she fell over backwards. People crowded in to see what the matter was. The girl's peach-like complexion had turned earthen; her lips were unable to speak. She lay motionless. The host wanted to detain the four men and torn them over to the authorities. Truly, an inelegant uncultured fellow, unmoved by fragrant jade beauty, had created a troublesome problem.

So Song Jiang took leave of the head gaoler, left the office and made his way to the inspection room. Here he found the prison superintendent sitting on a stool in front of the door.
"Where's this new prisoner?" he growled.
One of the prison guards pointed out Song Jiang and said: "That's him."
"You black-faced little runt," the superintendent roared. "Who said you could skip the customary gift of cash?"
"'A gift is that which is freely given, it comes from the heart.' How can you demand a gift by force?" Song Jiang said. "That just shows how low you are."
The onlookers felt their hands grow clammy with sweat. The superintendent exploded. "You prison scum, you dare to speak like that to me? You've really got it back to front, calling me low! 'Oy, guards, take the bugger off and give him a hundred strokes."
But all the prison officers were sympathetic to Song Jiang and when they heard the order to beat him they made themselves scarce. The superintendent now found himself alone with the prisoner. The fact that everyone had left him in the lurch made him even angrier. He picked up the whip and advanced on Song Jiang, intending to thrash him within an inch of his life.
Song Jiang said: "If you're going to beat me, you'd better tell me what my crime is!"
"You're in my hands, you scum, if you so much as cough, that's crime enough!"
"You want to find fault with me, but you'll find nothing that's a capital offence."
The man was furious: "You think you don't deserve death, but I tell you, if I want to finish you off, I'll do it, easy as killing a fly."
"If I deserve death just for not giving you money, what about someone who's a friend of the leader on Mount Liang, a friend of 'Professor' Wu Yong's, what would that crime deserve?" said Song Jiang smiling ironically.
When the superintendent heard this, he hurriedly dropped the stick he was holding. "What's that you said?" he stammered.
"I merely asked what would happen to someone who knows the bandit leader, 'Professor' Wu Yong. Why are you so surprised?"
Flabbergasted, the superintendent grabbed Song Jiang's arm and said: "Who exactly are you? Where do you get your information from?"
"I am from Yuncheng district in Shandong. My name is Song Jiang."
The man could hardly believe his ears. He hurriedly saluted Song Jiang with joined hands and said: "You mean you're the famous Song Jiang, known as the Opportune Rain?"
"Yes indeed, for what it's worth," said Song Jiang.
"This is not somewhere we can talk properly," said the other. "I daren't even show you the proper courtesy here. Let's go somewhere in town where we can speak our hearts."
"By all means, but do me the favour of waiting a moment while I go and lock my door."
Song Jiang quickly went to his room, collected the Professor's letter and took some silver. He locked his door and asked the prison guard to keep an eye on things. Then in the company of the superintendent he left the prison camp. They hurried into Jiangzhou where they immediately repaired to a tavern, one that was a little off the street, and found themselves a place upstairs.
"Tell me, I beg you, how did you come to meet the Professor?" the superintendent asked.
Song Jiang took the letter from his pocket and handed it to the superintendent. The latter broke the seal, read it through and then, having tucked it away in his sleeve, stood up and prostrated himself at Song Jiang's feet. Song Jiang immediately returned the courtesy and said: "I am afraid just now I used language that must have been hurtful to you, please forgive me."
"I had only heard that someone called Song had arrived in the prison. It is the custom for prisoners to give me five taels of silver. Over ten days had passed and I saw no sign of it. Since today was a holiday, I decided to come and get it. I had no idea that the prisoner was yourself. The language I used just now was highly offensive. I sincerely beg you to forgive me."
"The head gaoler mentioned your name to me many a time," said Song Jiang. "I resolved to pay my respects to you, but I didn't know where you lived. Also I had no excuse to go into the city, so I had to wait for you to come to me. It was in order to have the chance of a meeting that I withheld the silver, not because I begrudged it you. I was sure you would come if I delayed the payment. And now you see it has come to pass and my dearest wish is fulfilled."
But who do you suppose this person is with whom Song Jiang is talking? It is the very man whom the Professor recommended, that is to say, Dai Zong, chief superintendent of the two prisons in Jiangzhou. At that time, during the Song Dynasty, all the chief prison officers in the area of Jinling were called "officers of the court." In Hunan the heads of gaols were all called "superintendent." This Dai Zong, by the way, had an amazing Taoist power: when he travelled, bearing important military intelligence for example, he would bind two special amulets onto his legs and initiate a special "walking mode." With two amulets he could travel two hundred miles in one day, with four he could cover four hundred. For this reason he was known as Dai Zong the Magic Messenger. As the poet testifies:
His face is broad, his lips well formed, his eyes bright and prominent. He is tall and thin in build and elegant in bearing. Jewel-like flowers adorn his headgear. Yellow insignia indicate his office of messenger; a red braid marks him as an emissary. The power in his legs enables him to outstrip a thoroughbred; seldom is his silk robe free of dust. Amazing the ability of this Magic Messenger: ask him to do three hundred miles, it's off in the morning, back at dusk.
So Song Jiang and the Magic Messenger talked away to their hearts' content. They sat themselves down in the tavern and told the waiter to prepare wine and side dishes, while they settled down to enjoy themselves in their little upstairs nook. Song Jiang recounted tales of the brave men he had met, the people and events he had encountered on his travels. The Magic Messenger likewise opened his heart and told all about how he had come to know the Professor.
As they were thus engaged, talking of their affairs, and after they had downed two or three cups, a commotion arose downstairs. The waiter rushed into the room and said to the Magic Messenger: "Please, superintendent, you're the only one who can deal with him, no one else can! Please may I trouble you to come and talk some sense into him?"
"Who is it kicking up such a row down there?" the Magic Messenger asked.
"It's that fellow who is often with you, that Mr. Li, the one they call Iron Ox. He's downstairs asking for the owner because he wants to borrow money from him."
"Oh, so it's that devil who's making all the fuss, is it? I wondered who it could be." Turning to Song Jiang, the Magic Messenger said: "Please stay here while I go and fetch him up." He disappeared downstairs and a moment later returned with a big black-faced individual, whose appearance Song Jiang found quite startling. "Who is the big fellow?" he asked.
"He's one of the warders at the prison. His name is Li Kui. He originates from Five Furlongs village in the Yishui district of Yi-zhou. He is nicknamed the Black Whirlwind, and his friends all call him Iron Ox. He killed a man and had to flee from justice. Although he received a pardon, he ended up here in Jiangzhou and never went back home. His temper is ugly when he's had a few too many, and the people in the town are terrified of him. He's a pretty skilful fighter with two axes, but he's also good with his fists or the staff. At the moment he's employed here at the prison."
There is a poem that describes him:

His home is in Yizhou, east of the Jade Hills,
Killing, arson and violence give him his thrills.
No need to blacken his face, he's black as a whole,
His eyes are as red as a burning coal.
Down by the river bank he grinds his great axe;
At a tall pine on the cliff edge he idly hacks.
He is strong as a wild bull, rigid as steel;
The name of Iron Ox strikes universal chill.

Iron Ox meanwhile had been observing Song Jiang and said: "Superintendent, who is the dark chap?"
The Magic Messenger turned to Song Jiang with a laugh and said: "You see what a monster he is? Absolutely no manners!"
"I asked a question, what's wrong with that?" said Iron Ox.
"Why couldn't you say 'Who is that gentleman?' instead of 'Who's the dark chap?' If that isn't rude I don't know what is. Anyway, I'll tell you. This gentleman is a very famous person, someone whose protection you have often said you would like to have."
"You mean Song Jiang the Black of Shandong, known as the Opportune Rain?"
"Really, what a brute you are! The way you say it — without any of the respect due to position. Well, why aren't you prostrating yourself? How much longer are you going to wait?"
"If it really is Song Jiang, of course I'll prostrate myself. But if it's just a nobody, why the hell should I show him respect? How do I know you aren't having me on?"
Then Song Jiang spoke. "I can assure you I am Song Jiang," he said.
Iron Ox clapped his hands. "Why didn't you say so in the first place?" he said. "That's real good news to me!" With this he flung himself down before Song Jiang, who immediately returned the courtesy and said: "My muscular friend, please be seated."
"Come and sit by me," said the Magic Messenger, "and have some wine."
"I can't stand these piddling little cups," said Iron Ox. "Let's have some big bowls."
"What were you so upset about downstairs?" Song Jiang inquired.
"I've got this big lump of silver which I gave as security for ten smaller sums that I needed for ordinary use. I asked the landlord here to lend me ten taels, I was going to redeem the lump sum and then pay him back and I needed some small change too. The bugger refused me! I was just going to teach him a lesson, smash the place up for him, when you called me up here."
"Is ten taels all you need?" Song Jiang asked. "Isn't there interest to pay?"
"I've already paid the interest. I just need ten taels to get my capital back."
Song Jiang took out ten taels of silver and offered them to Iron Ox, saying: "Here, go and redeem your funds."
Iron Ox accepted. "That's great!" he cried. "Now you two please wait for me here. I'll go and get the silver and then come to repay you. Afterwards I want to invite Song Jiang to drink a cup or two with me, somewhere out of town."
"Why not sit down and drink a cup or two first?" said Song Jiang.
"I'll go first and then come back," said Iron Ox. He thrust aside the curtain and went downstairs.

"You really shouldn't have lent him money," the Magic Messenger said. "I wanted to stop you, but you'd already let him get his hands on it."
"Why, what's wrong?" said Song Jiang.
"He's honest and big-hearted enough, but he's got a terrible weakness for drinking and gambling. When did he ever have a big lump of silver in hock? I'm afraid you've been had. He was in such a hurry to get out of the door, he must have gone to gamble. If he wins, then you'll get your money back, but if he loses, how's he going to find the ten taels to return to you? And I shall feel bad because I'm responsible."
"Stop treating me like an outsider," Song Jiang said. "Why make such a fuss about a little bit of money? Let him go and lose it if he likes. I'd say he's got the look of a proper hero."
"It's true he's got good qualities, but he's far too rough and too reckless. When he gets drunk up at the prison he doesn't bother the inmates, but he always picks a fight with the strongest of the warders. I've had all sorts of problems with him. He thinks he's got a flair for searching out injustices and beating up bullies. That's why everyone in Jiangzhou is so scared of him."
The poem says:

Bribery makes the law an ass.
Many a prisoner's paid the price.
Revenge for the suffering of the weak,
Heaven has lodged in Li Kui's fist.

"Well, let's drink up," said Song Jiang, "and then let's go and take a stroll in Jiangzhou."
"Of course, I was forgetting," the Magic Messenger said. "I ought to take you to see the river."
"The sights of Jiangzhou, that's just what I would like."
Let us leave the two of them drinking their wine, and follow Iron Ox, who after getting the silver said to himself: "Just imagine! Song Jiang hardly knows me and he's ready to lend me ten taels of silver! That's real thoughtfulness for you, they certainly tell no lies about his generosity! The trouble is, he had to arrive here when I've just been losing continuously at the tables. I haven't a sou. How can I do the proper thing and invite him? Well, since I've got the silver I'd better go and try my luck again. If I can win a few taels I'll be able to invite him and put up a reasonable show."
So Iron Ox hurried off to Zhang's gambling house, somewhere outside the city limits. He went straight to the table and flung down the ten taels of silver. "Pass me the cup. I want to throw," he shouted.
Zhang, who knew that Iron Ox always played fair, said: "You'd better sit this one out. You can come in on the next throw."
"I want to bet on this one!"
"Why don't you just stay on the sidelines and try guessing what's going to come up?"
"I don't want to, I want to bet on this throw. I shall put five taels on." One of the players was just about to throw, but Iron Ox swept the cup out of his hands and shouted: "Who is betting against me?"
"All right then, I am," Zhang said. "For five taels."
Iron Ox shouted: "Heads!" and threw, clunk. It was tails.
Zhang scooped up the silver.
"Wait a minute," Iron Ox shouted. "That's ten taels I put down."
"All right," said Zhang. "I'll put another five on. If it's heads this time I'll give you back all your silver."
So Iron Ox took the cup and shouted "Heads!" and again it came out tails.
Zhang grinned and said: "I told you not to bet this time, I said wait. You wouldn't listen to me and now tails have come up twice."
"This silver isn't my own," said Iron Ox.
"What difference does it make whose it is? You've lost, what more is there to say?"
"Well, there's nothing for it," said Iron Ox, "you'll have to lend me some money, I'll pay you back tomorrow."
"Are you crazy? You know the proverb, 'There's no father or son at the gaming table.' You lost, fair and square, so what are you whinging about?"
Iron Ox pulled up his tunic and shouted: "Are you or aren't you going to give me back my money?"
"Mr. Li," Zhang said, "you're usually such a good loser, why're you so churlish today?"
Iron Ox said nothing. He simply seized the silver, grabbing another ten taels or so of other people's, and stuffed it all down the front of his shirt. Then he glared at them and said: "I'm usually a good loser, am I? Well, just for the moment I'm tired of being a good loser."
Zhang rushed forward to wrest the silver from him but Iron Ox sent him flying with a little push. A dozen or more gamesters now converged on Li Kui but he lashed out left and right; he beat them till they didn't know where to hide themselves. He then made for the door. "Hey, where do you think you're going?" the doorman said, but Iron Ox shoved him aside, kicked open the door and left. The other gamblers pursued him as far as the door, shouting: "Mr. Li, that's not fair! You've taken our money!" They contented themselves however with standing at the door and shouting; no one dared approach any nearer.
Iron Ox was already on his way when he felt a hand on his shoulder, and a voice saying: "What the devil do you mean by stealing the punters' money?"
"You fuck off!" Iron Ox shouted. But when he turned round to look, he saw it was the Magic Messenger, and behind him was Song Jiang. His face fell. "Forgive me, forgive me," he said. "I'm usually a good loser, but today I didn't want to lose your money. And now I haven't even the means to invite you. It made me so sick I just didn't know what I was doing. I'm afraid I was a little hasty."
This made Song Jiang laugh out loud. "If it's just silver you need, for your expenses," he said, "why don't you ask me? Given that there's no doubt you've lost to him, you'd better give him back the money, and quickly."
Li Kui had no alternative but to take out the money and hand it over to Song Jiang who called Zhang over and gave it to him.
"Saving your honours, I shall only take what is mine," Zhang said, "we'll forget about the ten taels Mr. Li lost to me in two throws, for the sake of avoiding recriminations."
"Just go ahead and take it," said Song Jiang, "have no scruples about it."
But Zhang could not be persuaded.
"Well at least no one has been hurt, I hope," Song Jiang said.
"There's the cashier, the croupier and the doorman, he knocked them all out," Zhang said.
"Then let them divide this money between them," Song Jiang said. "I don't suppose Mr. Li will want to show his face here again, so I will give it to you on his behalf."
Zhang accepted the money, saluted and withdrew.
"Now," said Song Jiang, "let us all go and drink a few cups together."
"Down by the river," said the Magic Messenger, "there's a wineshop called the Inn of the Lute. It dates from the days of the poet Bai Juyi, in the Tang Dynasty. Let's go there. We can enjoy the view of the river while we're drinking."
"What about some dishes to go with the wine? Should we get them here in the town first?" said Song Jiang.
"No need, nowadays they've got everything there."
The three of them made their way to the Inn of the Lute. This turned out to have the river Yangtze on one side and the innkeeper's house on the other. There were a dozen or so tables inside. The Magic Messenger chose a nice clean one and asked Song Jiang to take the place of honour. He himself sat down opposite, with Iron Ox beside him. When they were seated they told the innkeeper to send up some dishes of vegetables, fruit and fish.
The waiter brought two jugs of a wine known as "Spring in a jade bottle," which is a famous Jiangzhou brew, and removed the clay stopper. Song Jiang gazed out at the river. It was really a first-class prospect:
Distant peaks rise blue above the clouds; far reaches of the river flash like silver. Flocks of gulls and egrets swirl above the shoreline; a few fishing boats thread their way home through the reeds. White wavelets lap against the skyline; the cool wind breathes soughingly across the face of the water. Amid sunset clouds mountains approach the empyrean; the Inn of the Lute lies half open to the water. The eye is taken by such spaciousness and exquisite decoration: the railing's reflection cased in liquid crystal, jade waters sparkling outside the window. Here sat in days gone by the poet Bai Juyi who rose to literary fame and Sima who achieved high rank after bitter trials.
Iron Ox said: "This wine should be drunk in big bowls. It's nonsense to drink it by the thimbleful."
"Don't be so uncouth," said the Magic Messenger. "Just drink your wine and shut up."
But Song Jiang called the waiter over: "Serve the two of us in the small cups, and bring a big bowl for our big friend here."
The waiter got the extra bowl and then poured the wine and served the dishes.
Iron Ox said: "Song Jiang really is a great man, everything they say about him is absolutely true. How well he understands my tastes. To have him as a sworn brother is really worth something!"
The waiter who served them poured six or seven rounds and then Song Jiang, elated with the company and the wine, suddenly felt a desire for hot fish soup. "Do they have good fish here?" he asked the Magic Messenger.
"Can't you see the river is packed with fishing boats?" the Magic Messenger said. "How could there not be good fish?"
"After all this wine I could really do with some fish soup," Song Jiang said.
The Magic Messenger called the waiter and ordered three bowls of fish soup with chillies and spring onions. They came at once, and when Song Jiang saw them he said: "Good food is nothing to fine china, as the saying is. This is only a simple tavern but look what beautiful china they've served us in!" He picked up his chopsticks and invited the Magic Messenger and Iron Ox to start eating. He himself took some fish and a few mouthfuls of soup.
Iron Ox did not use his chopsticks. He merely plunged his hand into the bowl and pulled out a fish, which he consumed whole, bones and all. Song Jiang couldn't help laughing. He drank another two mouthfuls of soup and then put down his chopsticks and stopped eating.
"I'm afraid the fish is too salty for you," said the Magic Messenger.
"No, I just like to drink the soup, after so much wine. Though actually I have to agree that the fish is not especially good."
"I can't eat it either. Far too salty, quite inedible."
Iron Ox, who had finished the fish in his own bowl, said: "If you both don't want it, I'll eat it for you." He reached over and fished out what was in Song Jiang's bowl and ate it, and then treated the Magic Messenger's bowl the same way. Drops of soup flew all over the place and spattered the table.
When Song Jiang saw that Iron Ox had gobbled up three bowls of fish soup and the bones as well, he called the waiter and said: "I think our big friend here is hungry. Could you get a big piece of meat and cut him a couple of pounds in slices? I'll pay you in just a moment."
"I'm afraid we only have mutton," the man said. "We've no beef. We could give you some good fat mutton, if you like, but that's all there is."
Hearing this Iron Ox flung the remains of his soup in the waiter's face, drenching him from head to foot.
"Whatever are you doing?" the Magic Messenger cried.
"I won't stand for it," Iron Ox answered. "The bugger wants to suggest I only eat beef, to avoid selling me any mutton!"
"I was only asking, that was all," the waiter protested.
"Just go and cut some," said Song Jiang. "I'll pay for it."
The waiter swallowed his anger and went to cut two pounds of meat, which he put on a plate and placed on the table. Iron Ox did not hold back. He grabbed the meat with both hands and commenced to stuff himself. It was all gone in a flash.
"Heavens, what a fellow you are!" Song Jiang exclaimed.
"What a great man this Song Jiang is," said Iron Ox. "How he understands my tastes, damn it. Meat is better to eat than fish any day."
The Magic Messenger called the waiter again. "That fish soup you just gave us — the bowls it was served in are magnificent, but the fish itself is salty and quite inedible. If you've got any other fresh fish, make us another bowl of hot soup, the gentleman here needs something to clear his head after the wine."
"I'll be honest with you," the waiter said. "That fish was yesterday's. Today's live fish is still in the boats. They can't start selling until the factor comes, that's why we haven't got any really fresh fish."
Iron Ox jumped up, saying: "I'll go and get you some myself."
"No, stay where you are," said the Magic Messenger. "We can send the waiter for it."
"The fishermen on the boats won't refuse me," said Iron Ox. "So it had better be me." And before the Magic Messenger could stop him he was off.
The Magic Messenger turned to Song Jiang and said: "I have to ask you to forgive me for bringing that individual along. He's so rude, it's enough to make one die of shame."
"It's his nature," Song Jiang said. "What's the point of trying to change him? I admire his honesty and directness."
Thus the two of them sat talking and laughing together. Here's a poem:

Mist on the Pen river, miraculous scene;
Mountains cluster above the banks,
Moonlight, a silver flute and solitude;
Withered sedge, stripped bamboo
And the dew falling.

Meanwhile Iron Ox had arrived at the riverside, where he found the boats drawn up in a straight line, about eighty or ninety of them, made fast under the green willows. Some of the fishermen lay in the stern, asleep, others were mending their nets in the bows, and still others were bathing in the river. It was the middle of the fifth month, and the sun's red disk was just sinking in the west. But there was no sign of the factor, who was supposed to come to the boats to sell the fish. Iron Ox went and stood near the boats and shouted: "Hey, there! You on the boats, get me two live fish!"
The fishermen replied: "We have to wait. We can't start trading till the boss comes. Can't you see the buyers are all sitting on the bank there?"
"I'm not waiting for your fucking boss. Just give me two fish."
"We haven't even burnt the paper sacrifice, we can't start selling yet. What makes you think we'd sell any to you?"
Seeing that none of them was disposed to get him the fish, Iron Ox leapt onto one of the boats and none of the fishermen dared to stop him. But Iron Ox knew nothing of boats. The first thing he did was to start pulling up the bamboo gate. The fishermen on the bank yelled at him to stop. Next he started rummaging around under the planks of the deck. But how could there be any fish there? You see, the boats on this river have part of the stern cut away, to about half way up the hull, to let the river water flow through, which is how they keep the fish alive. The opening is closed off by a bamboo gate, which allows fresh water to enter but stops the fish escaping. This is why Jiangzhou has such good fish. Iron Ox knew nothing about all this. By pulling up the bamboo gate he had let all the fish escape. When he jumped onto another boat and began to do the same thing, all seventy or eighty fishermen rushed onto the boat in order to beat him with their bamboo poles.
Iron Ox waxed furious. He wasn't going to stand for this. He stripped off his cotton tunic leaving only a simple cloth tied about his loins. Seeing a confusion of bamboo poles coming at him he raised both arms and caught four or five of them in his hands, snapping them like someone breaking off chives. The fishermen were horrified. They cast off quickly and poled their boats out into midstream. Iron Ox, half naked, his rage waxing still greater, seized a broken punt pole and leapt onto the bank, where he proceeded to lay into the buyers, who panicked and took to their heels, complete with their carrying-poles.
In the midst of all this confusion, a man appeared, emerging from a little side-alley. "Boss, boss!" they shouted, as they saw him and all gave tongue to their complaints: "That ugly great thug came to steal our fish. He's chased all the boats away."
"What thug?" the newcomer asked. "Who dares to commit such an outrage?"
"The bugger's still there by the river," they said, "looking for people to beat up."
The newcomer advanced towards Iron Ox, saying: "Listen here, you! Even supposing you've eaten a leopard's heart or a tiger's gall, you ought to be afraid of crossing me!"
Iron Ox examined the speaker. He was very tall and about thirty-two years old. He had a full set of whiskers, moustache and beard, he wore a green gauze turban folded in the form of a swastika, and under it a red skull cap; he was dressed in a tunic of white cloth, bound by a belt and had white gaiters and canvas shoes with many buckles and eyes. He was holding a portable scales, and had indeed come to sell the fish. When he saw Iron Ox creating such a commotion, he handed his scales to one of the merchants and advanced on Iron Ox, shouting: "So you want a fight, do you, you swine?" Without even replying, Iron Ox whirled his pole and struck at the other man. But the other darted in and snatched the pole. So Iron Ox grabbed him by the hair, while the other went for the legs, trying to trip him. But how could he have had the strength to match Iron Ox, whose strength was like a water buffalo's? Strain as he might, he couldn't budge him. He essayed several jabs to the ribs but Iron Ox barely noticed them. He tried a flying kick, but Iron Ox merely pressed his head down towards the ground and began hammering his back with iron fists. Struggle as he might he could not get free.
As Iron Ox continued to beat his victim, someone encircled him with his arms from behind while another person assisted, shouting: "Disgraceful! Absolutely disgraceful!"
Iron Ox turned and saw it was Song Jiang and the Magic Messenger. He stopped at once and his adversary escaped from his grip and vanished like smoke.
The Magic Messenger berated Iron Ox. "I told you not to go for the fish, and here you are fighting with these people! If you happened to kill someone, who'd save you from prison or execution?"

"You're afraid I might involve you in something, but if I killed someone, I'd take the responsibility myself," said Iron Ox.
Song Jiang now spoke. "My friend," he said, "don't argue! Just put your tunic on and let us go and drink wine."
Iron Ox picked up his tunic, which was lying at the foot of a willow, and threw it over his shoulders. Then he followed Song Jiang and the Magic Messenger. They hadn't gone ten paces when they heard someone shouting behind them: "You black assassin! We'll see who wins this time!"
Turning to see who it was, Iron Ox saw that it was the same man. But he had stripped naked, except for a pair of bathing trunks, revealing a body white as snow. He had taken off his turban but retained the red skull cap. He was not far from the bank, standing alone in a little fishing boat, which he manoeuvred with a pole, and hurling taunts at Iron Ox. "Come on, you black traitor! Call me a coward if I'm afraid of you! The first to break off is no man!"
Iron Ox went wild when he heard the taunts. He gave a tremendous roar and then, throwing off his tunic, turned and charged. The other manoeuvred his boat so that it was near the bank and held it steady with one hand on the pole, shouting insults all the while. Iron Ox replied in kind. "Come up here on the bank then, if you're not afraid!"
The other man struck Iron Ox a blow on the legs with his pole, to infuriate him still further and tempt him to jump onto the boat. The telling is slow, it happens in a flash. All the man wanted was to lure Iron Ox onto the boat. When he succeeded, he pushed his pole into the bank and shoved with both feet so that the boat shot out into midstream, like a leaf whirled away by a sudden gust of wind. Now, although Iron Ox was not completely unfamiliar with the water, his experience of it was not extensive, and he felt a certain trepidation. His opponent, meanwhile, had ceased his insults and thrown down his pole. "Come on, then!" he shouted. "Now we're really going to see who's the best man." He gripped Iron Ox's shoulders and said: "But first of all we're not going to fight, I'm going to teach you how to drink water." He rocked the boat so violently that it capsized and the two heroes were catapulted head over heels into the river, disappearing with a resounding splash. Song Jiang and the Magic Messenger rushed to the bank, but the boat was out in the river and they could only look on helplessly. A crowd had gathered by now and there were four or five hundred people watching under the willow trees. "That black thug is going to learn a lesson," they were saying. "If he comes out of it with his life, he'll at least have got a bellyful of water!" Song Jiang and the Magic Messenger watched the surface of the river break as Iron Ox's opponent dragged him up, only to thrust him under again. The struggle was proceeding out in midstream, where the water rippled by in emerald waves; one body showed as completely black, the other seemed white as frost. They gripped and twined about each other so tightly they seemed welded into one. Every one of the four or five hundred onlookers on the bank was cheering them on.
One is the prodigy of Yishui district; the other is the strange devil of Little Mount Solo. One has a skin that's supple and smooth, the other a hide that might be composed of charcoal dust. One is a metamorphosis of the celestial white serpent, the other a reincarnation of the great black tiger. One is hammered out of sterling silver, the other wrought of tempered steel. One is the white-tusked elephant of Mount Wutai, the other is the iron-scaled dragon of Hell's River. One is a painted Lohan showing off miraculous powers; the other a stone door-god displaying ferocious strength. One writhes and turns until his whole body is soaked in sweat and he exudes real pearls; the other strains till moisture steeps his whole body and black ink floods forth. One resembles the God of Fire, whose form is glimpsed in still clear depths; the other is like the black fiend, whose face appears amid surging white waves. The white dragon obscures the sun in the sky, the black fiend blots out the sky's reflection in the water.
Iron Ox's friends saw that he was helpless in the other's grip and had swallowed water till only the whites of his eyes showed. He was being repeatedly dragged up and submerged. He had gone under more than a dozen times:
Sail a boat on dry land, such a hard task he craves;
But a bout under water, for that he don't qualify.
Black Whirlwind should never have whipped up the waves.
From Iron Ox, we might say, he has turned water buffalo.
Seeing Iron Ox was definitely getting the worst of it, Song Jiang asked the Magic Messenger to get someone to help him. "Who is that big white fellow?" the Magic Messenger asked the fishermen. Those who knew replied: "That's the factor, who controls the local sale of fish; his name is Zhang Shun and he's a brave man."
At this point Song Jiang remembered something. "Would that be the person they also call White Eel?"
"That's him!" they all cried.
"I've got a letter for him from his brother, Zhang Heng, the Pilot," he told the Magic Messenger. "It's back at the prison."
The Magic Messenger immediately gave a shout in the direction of the river: "Mr. Zhang, stop fighting! We've got a letter for you from your brother. That black fellow is our friend, please let him go, and come up here to talk to us." Out in the river White Eel recognized the Magic Messenger, whom he had seen many times. He let go of Iron Ox, swam to the bank and dragged himself out. He saluted the Magic Messenger and said: "Superintendent, please forgive me if I've done wrong."
"If you want to do something for me, please go and help my friend there. When you bring him back I'll introduce you to someone," the Magic Messenger said.
White Eel dived in again and swam to Iron Ox, who by now was having the greatest difficulty in keeping his head above water. In a moment White Eel was beside him and had grabbed one of his arms. He swam as easily as if he was walking on dry land, his body half out of the water, kicking up big waves with his legs and striking out with his free arm, as he towed Iron Ox to the bank. The onlookers all cheered. Song Jiang was amazed. Finally, when Iron Ox and White Eel were both on the bank, Iron Ox panting for breath and vomiting out water, the Magic Messenger said: "Now we shall all go to the Inn of the Lute to talk."
White Eel put on his tunic again and Iron Ox did likewise and the four of them went back to the inn.
"Do you know who I am?" the Magic Messenger said to White Eel.
"Of course I know the Superintendent, but until now I had not had the opportunity to pay my respects."
Pointing to Iron Ox, the Magic Messenger asked: "And do you know him? I am afraid he attacked you today."
"How could I not know Iron Ox? Only we had not actually been introduced till now."
"That was quite a ducking you gave me!" said Iron Ox.
"And what a drubbing you gave me!" said the other.
"Well now it's made you sworn brothers," said the Magic Messenger. "As the saying is, 'You only really know someone when you've fought with him.'"
"But don't provoke me on dry land," Iron Ox said.
"I shall wait for you in the water," White Eel replied.
They all laughed at this and the two former enemies asked each other's forgiveness. Then the Magic Messenger pointed to Song Jiang and said to White Eel: "And do you know who this gentleman is?"
White Eel looked him up and down and said: "I don't. I've never seen him before."
Iron Ox jumped to his feet and said: "This gentleman is Song Jiang the Black!"
White Eel said: "Can it really be Registrar Song from Shandong, the Opportune Rain?"
"It is indeed my friend," said the Magic Messenger.
Immediately White Eel prostrated himself before Song Jiang, saying: "I have long heard of your renown, but I didn't expect to meet you here today. I have often heard the folk of the rivers and lakes speak of your great virtue, your kindness to all who need help and your generosity."
"Enough, I don't deserve such praise," said Song Jiang. "A little while back I spent a few days with Li Jun, the White-Water Dragon, near Jieyang. Afterwards I encountered Mu Hong near the Yangtze river and met your brother Zhang Heng, who wrote a letter which he asked me to give you. It's back at the prison, I didn't bring it with me. I came here with Superintendent Dai and our friend Iron Ox just to drink a few cups at the Inn of the Lute and enjoy the scenery. When I happened to say I would like some fresh fish soup to clear my head, Iron Ox insisted on coming to get the fish, nothing we could say would stop him. Then we heard a commotion down by the river. We asked the waiter to go and see what was happening, and he told us it was a big black fellow fighting with someone. So we rushed here to stop it. I had no idea I should meet you. In one day I have made the acquaintance of three great heroes. I must really say fortune has smiled on me. Let me ask you all to sit down and join me in a few more cups."
So the waiter was employed again bringing wine and dishes and preparing another feast. White Eel said: "Since you want fresh fish, I shall go myself to get you some."
"Thank you very much," Song Jiang said.
"I'll go with you," Iron Ox said.
"Oh no, not again!" said the Magic Messenger. "Haven't you drunk enough water already?"
White Eel guffawed and then taking Iron Ox by the hand, said: "This time we'll both go. Let's see what they say to that!" Indeed it can be said that:

He scraps like a tiger on land;
In water he fights like a dragon.
Yet his friendship he'll always extend.
In his home town he's truly a paragon!

Together they left the inn and went down to the river. White Eel gave a whistle and the boats all came rushing towards the bank. "Who's got golden carp?" White Eel asked.
"I have," one answered, and "I've got some," said another. In a moment a dozen fine carp were being presented. White Eel chose the four biggest, threaded them on a willow branch and sent Iron Ox back first to the inn to have them cooked. Meanwhile he organized the buyers and instructed his deputies to start weighing and selling the fish. Then he too returned to the inn and to the company of Song Jiang, who thanked him for the fish. "But why so many?" Song Jiang asked. "If you had given me just one it would have been more than sufficient!"
"A little thing like that! It's not something to make a fuss about," White Eel said. "If you can't eat it all now, you can take it back to your temporary residence for dinner."
They sat in order of seniority. Since Iron Ox was older than White Eel, he took the third place and the latter the fourth. The waiter was called again and two bottles of their best wine, "Spring in a jade bottle," were brought, together with fish, and side dishes. White Eel told the waiter to use one of the fish for soup, steam another in wine, and to cut one into small pieces. As they enjoyed their wine, each of the four men told of something close to his heart, and everything was going swimmingly, when a young girl of about fifteen in a gauze dress suddenly appeared and, having softly wished them all a thousand happinesses, opened her mouth and proceeded to sing. Iron Ox was just on the point of telling them boastfully about various feats of daring when this singing burst out. Since the other three all started listening to the song, he had lost his audience. A fury seized him and jumping up he thrust his parted fingers into the girl's face. With a scream, she collapsed on the floor. Everyone gathered around the girl. Her face was the colour of earth and no sound issued from her lips. The proprietor of the inn now prevented the four from leaving and said the affair must be referred to the police. It was really a case of "Boil an egret, burn a lute, earn yourself a fine dispute."

WHEN Song Jiang reached the inspection room he saw the head jailer there sitting on a stool. The latter immediately called out, "Is this the prisoner who recently came here?"
A messenger standing there agreed to this.
"So you are the 'Black Dwarf,' who deserves death. Upon whose influence are you relying that you disdain to give me any money?"
"Presents are made when people are on friendly footing," said Song Jiang. "Why do you demand a present? You are a mean-souled fellow."
The men standing about perspired with fear when they heard this. The head jailer was very angry and replied, "Banished thief! You are very impudent. How dare you call me a mean-souled fellow? Now, executioners, seize this fellow, and give him a hundred blows with the bamboo."
But the men standing about were all on friendly terms with Song Jiang, and when they heard this order they all sneaked out of the room. Seeing this movement the head jailer was very much annoyed, and taking a stick he advanced to beat Song Jiang.
"Sir!" said Song Jiang, "for what crime are you going to beat me?"
"You are a criminal, and are entirely in my hands. Even if you only cough in my presence that would be a crime."
"But even if I have a small fault I am not deserving of death."
"You say that you are not deserving of death," said the head jailer who was now very angry, "but if I decide to even kill you that can be easily done. I could kill you just like a fly."
Song Jiang, spoke in a sneering manner, "Because I have not given you money you think I am deserving of death, but what should a friend of Wu Yong at Liangshan Marsh deserve?"
Upon hearing this the man hastily dropped his stick and asked, "What is that you say?"
"I said that Wu Yong may have a friend here."
The man was startled, and seizing hold of Song Jiang asked, "Who are you? Why you talk like this?"
Song Jiang laughed and said, "I am Song Jiang of Yuncheng County, in Shandong."
The man was surprised and saluted saying, "So you are Song Jiang, 'Welcome Rain.' But this is not a good place for us to talk, and I cannot kowtow to you here. I request you to accompany me to a place in the town where we can talk matters over."
Song Jiang agreed to this and returned to his room. He took Wu Yong's letter and some silver. He then locked the door, and told a messenger to look after his room. They left the prison, and going into the town entered an inn, and sat down in an upper room.
"Sir, when did you last see Wu Yong?" asked the head jailer.
Song Jiang took the letter and handed it to the man who after reading it placed it in his sleeve. He then knelt down and kowtowed to Song Jiang.
Song Jiang also kowtowed, and said, "What I said has upset you. Please forgive me."
The jailer said, "I was informed that a criminal named Song was being sent to my prison, and I expected to get the usual five taels of silver. But although I waited more than ten days no money was sent to me, so today as I had a little leisure I went to investigate the matter. I never suspected that you were the man. I am afraid that my manner was rather offensive, and I ask you to overlook it kindly."
"I heard of you through the jailer, and wished to meet you, but as I was not certain where you lived I thought it better to wait until you came to see me. So I had to wait a good few days. It was not that I did not intend to give you these five taels of silver, but simply that I wished to meet you personally. I am much pleased that we have fortunately met here today."
Now who was this head jailer? He was no other than Dai Zong. Now in that period of the Song Dynasty, head jailers at Jinling were called "Master," whereas in Hunan they were called "Superintendent." This Superintendent Dai Zong had a very supernatural power. Whenever he had to travel on some extremely urgent matter he wrapped a puttee bearing a picture of a divine horse over his legs. He then by magic could travel a hundred and sixty li a day. If he doubled the number of puttees then by magic he could travel two hundred seventy li daily. That was why people called him the "Divine Traveler."
These two men talked matters over, and became much pleased with each other. They summoned the waiter to their private compartment, and ordered a big dinner to be prepared. Song Jiang told Dai Zong all that had occurred on the journey, and the latter laid bare his heart and told Song Jiang all his intimate relations with Wu Yong. They had been drinking for some time, and were quite intimate when they heard a row down below.
The waiter rushed into their compartment, and said, "There is a man below making a row, and nobody but you, sir, can stop him."
"Who is the man," asked Dai Zong.
"He is the man Li, the 'Iron Ox,' who always accompanies you on your trips, and he wants to borrow money from our manager."
Dai Zong laughed and said, "I know the fellow. He is very unruly. I request you, sir, to stay here, and I will go and bring him upstairs."
Dai Zong went downstairs, and soon returned with a big wild-looking man.
Song Jiang was surprised at seeing him, and asked, "Sir, who is this?"
"This is my assistant, Li Kui, the 'Black Whirlwind,' and he comes from Yishui County, in Yizhou Prefecture, Shandong province. In his own village he is called Li, the 'Iron Ox.' There he killed a man and escaped here. The government issued a pardon afterwards, but he then had not enough money to take him back home. He is a great drunkard, and when drunk he is a dangerous man. He is skilled in the use of the battle-axe and the cudgels. At present he occupies a minor post in this prison."
Li Kui looking at Song Jiang asked Dai Zong, "Who is this black fellow?"
Dai Zong laughed and remarked to Song Jiang, "Sir, you will understand that this fellow is rather vulgar and has no manners."
"I only ask for his name," said Li Kui, "so why do you say I am vulgar?"
"Younger brother," said Dai Zong, "you ought to speak to me like this, 'Who is this gentleman?' But instead you asked, 'Who is this black fellow?' and that is not a nice expression. I will however tell you who he is. He is the hero whom you have often said you would try to meet."
"Can he be Dark Song Jiang, 'Welcome Rain,' of Shandong?"
Dai Zong exclaimed, "Hey! How dare you refer to him in that coarse manner? And why don't you immediately kowtow to him, instead of delaying so long?"
"If he is Song Jiang I will of course kowtow to him. But if he is some other fellow why should I kowtow? Sir, do not deceive me or laugh at me about this matter."
"I am Dark Song Jiang of Shandong," interposed Song Jiang.
Li Kui clapped his hands and said, "Master, why did you not say this before, and so enable the 'Iron Ox' to have the pleasure a little sooner." He knelt on the floor and kowtowed.
Song Jiang raised him up and said, "Good fellow, please be seated."
Dai Zong invited him to sit by his side, and drink wine with them.
"Very well," said Li Kui, "but I shall want a large bowl of wine, and not one of these little cups."
"Brother," asked Song Jiang, "what was that row about down below?"

"I had a big ingot of silver in a pawn shop on which they had advanced me ten taels of silver, and today when I asked the innkeeper to loan me ten taels of silver to redeem the pledge at the pawn shop he declined to advance any loan so I got angry, and broke up many of the things in the shop. Just then you summoned me up here."
"Was there any interest to be paid for the loan of the silver?" asked Song Jiang.
"Yes, there was interest to be paid on the redemption of ingot."
Song Jiang put his hand in his pocket and drew an ingot of ten taels of silver. Handing this to Li Kui he said, "Here is some silver which will enable you to redeem the ingot from the pawn shop."
Li Kui took the silver, and said, "Thank you. Please wait here until I come back from the pawn shop. When I have redeemed my ingot of silver I can change it, and repay you. Then we will all go and drink wine outside the town."
"Please sit down, and drink wine with us now, and then go there afterwards," said Song Jiang.
"I will go now, but be back very soon," said Li Kui. He opened the curtains and departed.
"It would have been better if you had not lent him that money," said Dai Zong.
"Why not?"
"Although he is straightforward yet he has a weakness for wine and gambling. When did he ever have an ingot of silver? He has cheated you to get the money. You noticed how quickly he left us when he had got the money. He has probably gone gambling, and if he wins he will return your loan. But if he loses how can he repay the loan? I shall then feel ashamed as he is my assistant."
Song Jiang laughed, "But we are not strangers! Don't talk about such small things. If he wants to gamble then never mind. My opinion is that he is a loyal and straightforward man."
"He is a skilled athlete, and is very brave, but has a very coarse nature. In the prison when he is drunk he never hits the prisoners, but is always fighting with the brave jailers. I have had a lot of trouble with him. He always takes up the cudgels on behalf of the weaker brothers, and for this reason the people of this town are afraid of him."
"Let us have another drink," said Song Jiang, "and then go for a stroll outside the town."
"I had forgotten," said Dai Zong, "that I have not yet shown you the scenery round here."
When Li Kui had left with the silver he thought, "Song Jiang is not a common man. We are not old friends, and yet he immediately advanced me this money. He is a hero who despises wealth and stands for justice—of that there is no shadow of doubt. These few days I have lost all my money in gambling so that I have not even a cash, and cannot invite him to dine with me. Now that I have the money I will gamble again, and when I have won I will then go and invite him to a feast." Li Kui went outside the town, and entering the gambling den of Little Zhang Yi, he took his seat at the table, and put down his money. He called out, "Give me the dice box. I will be banker this time."
The proprietor knew that Li Kui had always been fair in his gambling, so he said, "Elder brother, let us just finish this round, and then you can have the dice box."
"But I want to gamble now."
"You had better watch us on one side, and do the guessing," said Little Zhang Yi.
"I am not going to guess. I want to gamble, and here is my stake five taels of silver." He took the dice box, and asked, "Now what is your stake?"
"I will stake five taels also," said Little Zhang Yi.
Li Kui threw the dice, but only low numbers turned up. Little Zhang Yi reached across for the money, but Li Kui said, "I have ten taels here."
"But you staked five taels, and if you had won I would have paid you that amount."
Li Kui did not answer, but threw the dice again, and again only low numbers turned up.
Little Zhang Yi laughed and said, "Do not be in such a hurry. You have shaken twice with bad luck. You had better rest a bit now."
"But this money belongs to another man," said Li Kui.
"That makes no difference. You will pay just the same. You have lost so we need not discuss anything else."
"Very well," said Li Kui. "But please lend me some money, and I will repay you tomorrow."
"That is nonsensical talk," said Little Zhang Yi. "There is an old saying, 'In gambling there are no duties (to parents or brothers) observed.' You have lost, so why wrangle about the money?"
"Will you give me the money or not?" asked Li Kui.
"Li Kui! You have always been straight in gambling, so how is it that today you wrangle about such a clear case?"
But Li Kui did not reply. Instead he grabbed the money, and also all the other's silver on the table, and put it in his coat. He then said, "I have always been straight, but today I cannot observe the usual procedure."
Little Zhang Yi now advanced to attempt to recover the money, but Li Kui struck him a blow, and knocked him to the ground, while all the other gamblers rushed forward to recover their money, but Li Kui hit on every side, and kept them off. He then rushed away to escape. The gatekeeper tried to stop him saving, "Where are you going?" but Li Kui pushed him on one side, opened the gate, and went out. The gamblers were following him and as they reached the gate they called out, "Li Kui, you are quite unfair to take all our money." There was not one who was brave enough to pursue him, but as Li Kui was running, a man took hold of him and called out, "Why do you take other people's money?"
"What has it got to do with you?" asked Li Kui. Turning his head he saw that the man was Dai Zong, and behind him was Song Jiang. He was surprised at seeing them there, and said, "Brothers, please excuse me. Previously the 'Iron Ox' has always been fair and square in gambling but today I have lost the money you gave me. I wished to invite you to a feast, but as I had no money I got annoyed, and grabbed other people's money."
Song Jiang laughed at this. "If you are short of money you can always come and ask for it from me. As you have lost all your money to him today, you had better give him the money."
Li Kui took all the money out of his coat, and placed it in Song Jiang's hands. The latter summoned Little Zhang Yi and handed him the money.
Little Zhang Yi said, "Li Kui lost ten taels of silver to me, but although he took it by force I will not take it back from him I have no desire to make him my enemy."
"You can take the money," said Song Jiang, "without being afraid of him in the future."
Little Zhang Yi was however still unwilling to take the money.
"Has he already injured any of you?" asked Song Jiang.
"He struck the 'banker,' the other gamblers, and the gatekeeper," said Little Zhang Yi.
"Then, take this ten taels of silver from Li Kui and distribute it among those men as compensation for their wounds. I will take Li Kui away, and he will not trouble you again."
Little Zhang Yi took the money, and after expressing his thanks went his way.
Song Jiang asked the other two to go with him, and drink wine.
"On the riverside there is the Pipa Pavilion. It is the ruins of a building of the Tang Dynasty. We can drink wine there, and enjoy the view of the river."
"We can buy some eatables in the town, and take them there with us," suggested Song Jiang.
"There is no need for that," said Dai Zong. "We can get all we want at the inn."
"All right," said Song Jiang. They all proceeded to the Pipa Pavilion, and entering they found about ten tables arranged. They selected a clean one, and sat down according to the rules of propriety—Song Jiang in the place of honor, Dai Zong facing him, and Li Kui at the side. They called for wine and food. The proprietor brought them large jars of the best wine, and Li Kui said, "Let us have big bowls, as I do not like these small cups."
"What a rude fellow you are!" said Dai Zong. "You just drink your wine and keep quiet."
"We two will have the small cups," said Song Jiang to the proprietor, "but you can let this gentleman have a big bowl."
The proprietor did this, and Li Kui laughingly said, "What a splendid fellow you are. People spoke well and truly of you. How well you have met my desires! Life will not be unworth to live when I have you as my sworn brother."
After they had drunk about six cups of wine, Song Jiang saw that they were getting merry and he thought it would be nice to have some hot chilli fish soup. He asked Dai Zong whether they could get fresh fish at the inn.
Dai Zong laughed, "Have you not noticed that all the boats on the river are fishing boats? This is just the place to get abundant fish."
"Well, how would it be if we had some fresh hot chilli fish soup?"
Dai Zong called the waiter and ordered fish for three. Very soon it was served, and when Song Jiang saw it he said, "Excellent food served in a superb dish. Although the inn is small yet the dishes are extremely fine." He took up his chopsticks and invited the others to partake with him. He ate a little of the fish and tasted the soup. Li Kui, however, did not use his chopsticks, but took the fish in his hand, and ate it including the bones. Song Jiang could hardly suppress his laughter, and after taking a little more soup put down his chopsticks, and said:
"It is just a habit of mine to drink a little fish soup after drinking wine. This fish does not seem to be very nice."
"I also do not like it," said Dai Zong, "salted fish does not suit my taste."
Li Kui finished the fish in his own bowl, and then remarked, "As you two elder brothers do not like it I will eat it for you." So he reached across the table, and with his hand took the fish from Song Jiang's bowl and ate it. He then did the same with Dai Zong's bowl of fish. When he had finished the table was covered with the soup which had dripped from the fish.
Song Jiang summoned the waiter and told him, "Our brother here is very hungry so please bring plenty of meat for him, and I will pay for it."
The waiter said they had only mutton—no beef. Upon hearing this Li Kui took the bowl of soup and threw it in the waiter's face and clothes.
"Why do you do that?" asked Dai Zong.
"Because that fellow is so unreasonable," replied Li Kui. "He insults me by saying that I can eat beef only."
"I just asked you what meat you would like," said the waiter.
"Go and bring what you have got," said Song Jiang.
The waiter smothered his anger, and soon returned with a tray of mutton which he placed on the table. Li Kui without saying a word reached out his hands, and took the mutton. He had very soon eaten the whole lot.
"What a robust fellow!" exclaimed Song Jiang. "He is really a strong man."
"How well you understand my nature!" replied Li Kui. "The mutton is much better than the fish."
Dai Zong spoke to the waiter, "You have especially fine dishes, but the fish you served in them was not of the best. If you have any better fish please bring some for my friend here."
The waiter laughed and said, "I dare not deceive you, gentlemen. The fish was caught yesterday. The live fish caught today is still on the boats and we cannot buy it until the wholesale dealer begins to sell. For this reason we cannot supply you with fresh fish today."
Li Kui jumped up, "I myself will go, and buy a pair of live fish for my elder brothers."
"You must not go," said Dai Zong. "The waiter can go himself and ask for some fish."
"The fishermen will let me have the fish at once," said Li Kui. "It is a small thing." He went off at once although Dai Zong tried to stop him.
Dai Zong spoke to Song Jiang, "I hope that you will excuse me for introducing that kind of man to you. He is not a respectable man, and I am somewhat ashamed of his manners."
"That is his natural disposition, and how can you help it? I think he is a very sincere and honest man."
They stayed in the Pipa Pavilion joking and talking for some time.
Li Kui arrived at the river bank, and there he saw about ten fishing boats all tied up in a line along the quay, under overhanging willow trees. Most of the fishermen were asleep on board, but there were a few repairing the nets, and some bathing in the river. That time was about the middle of June, and the sun was just setting in a red western sky. The wholesale merchant who sold the fish was not there.
Li Kui shouted out, "Bring me two fresh fish."
A fisherman replied, "The wholesale merchant has not come, and we dare not sell any fish without him. You see that all the fish dealers are waiting for him over there."
"Why should I wait for any damned fish merchant?" said Li Kui. "Let me have two fish at once."
"We have not yet burnt the joss paper for the spirits, so how can we let you have any fish?" replied the fisherman.
Li Kui saw that they would not give him the fish so he jumped on to the boat. The fish was in tanks in the holds and although Li Kui did not understand the arrangements of the boat he removed a bamboo screen. The fishermen could not stop him, and the spectators on the bank were astounded. Li Kui groped inside the water, but could not find a single fish. These boats had a hole at the stern which kept the tanks supplied with fresh water. There was a small bamboo screen which although admitting the water prevented the fish from leaving the tank. Because of this arrangement the fish was always fresh when sold at Jiangzhou. When Li Kui had removed the bamboo screen all the fish in the tank had escaped. As he could find no fish Li Kui jumped on to another boat, and did the same thing again. About eighty fishermen now rushed at Li Kui with bamboo poles to beat him. He, seeing the advancing crowd, immediately stripped off his coat and shirt, and seizing about six of the nearest bamboo poles in both hands he broke them into pieces at once. The fishermen were astonished at his strength, and immediately unloosened the moorings of the other boats and sculled them away from the wharf. Li Kui was now very angry and taking one of the broken bamboo poles he leapt ashore, but the fish merchants there immediately put down their loads, and ran away. In the noise and confusion a man arrived on the scene, and the men called out, "Here comes the merchant. This black man has been trying to seize the fish, and so has frightened away all the fishing boats."
"Who has dared to do this crazy thing?" asked the merchant.
The men pointed to Li Kui, "There he is. He threatens to beat us."
"You fellow with a leopard's heart and a tiger's gall," said the merchant, "how dare you come here, and upset my affairs like this?"
Li Kui saw that the merchant was big sized, and of about thirty-three years of age; he had a black moustache, and wore a blue turban with a red ribbon entwined in his hair; his shirt was of white cloth and he had a silk girdle; his hempen sandals were fastened with black and white strings; in his hand he carried a balance. He handed the balance to another man, and, advancing, shouted at Li Kui, "Whom are you going to fight?"
Li Kui did not answer, but lifted his bamboo pole to strike the man. The man stepped forward and seized hold of the pole. Li Kui seized hold of the man's hair. The man raised his foot, and kicked Li Kui who, however, still held on to his opponent's hair. The man struck several blows with his fist, but Li Kui did not mind these at all, but when the man kicked him, he pulled the man down to the ground, and hit him with his fist—his blows were like iron mallets and sounded like the beating of a drum. The man had no means of escape, but a bystander seized hold of Li Kui by the waist, and another man took hold of Li Kui's hand, and they called out, "Stop this! Stop this!" Li Kui turning his head saw that the men holding him were Song Jiang and Dai Zong. He at once released his hold, and the man immediately rushed away.
Dai Zong complainingly said to Li Kui, "I told you not to come here for fish, and now I find you fighting. If you had killed the man would you not have had to answer for it in prison?"
"You are afraid that I would implicate you. If I had killed a man I would answer the charge of murder, and not you."
"Brother, do not discuss the matter any further," said Song Jiang. "Let us go and drink some more wine."
Li Kui got his coat and shirt and throwing them over his arm he accompanied the other two. They had gone hardly ten steps when they heard a man behind cursing them. "You deserve death! I want to fight with you, and we will see who will win this time." Li Kui turned round, and saw it was the very man he had just fought with. He was now stripped naked except for a small pair of drawers. His hair was bound up with red tapes on top of his head without a turban. He was by himself and carried a bamboo pole such as are used on boats. He was quickly approaching on a small boat and shouted, "You, rascal, deserving of hacking into a thousand pieces. If I were afraid of you I should not be brave. If you walk away, you are coward."
Li Kui roared with rage at this, and throwing down his clothing he stepped forward. He and the man cursed each other and as Li Kui was standing on the bank the man threatened to strike his leg with the bamboo pole. Li Kui leapt on to the boat, and what happened occurred quicker than we can relate. The man had inveigled Li Kui to come on the boat, for as soon as Li Kui was on board he pushed the boat away from the wharf and it floated off into the current. Li Kui could swim only a little, so this movement filled him with fear. The man put down his pole, and addressed Li Kui, "Now we will fight and see who will win." He seized Li Kui's arm. "But before we fight I am going to give you a drink of water." He was standing with both legs outstretched, and all at once he moved his weight onto one leg, turned the boat upside down and threw them both into the river.
Song Jiang and Dai Zong had watched all this from the bank, and were excited when both men fell into the river with a mighty splash. There was a big crowd of men also watching this, and one of them said, "That black man has now got his deserts. Even if he does not drown he will get a bellyful of water." Now they could see both men in the water, and the boatman caught hold of Li Kui, and ducked him into the water again. They struggled together in the water, but there was not a single man on the wharf who did not applaud the spectacle. It was evident that Li Kui was getting the worst as he was frequently pushed down underneath the water. Song Jiang asked Dai Zong to get some one to act as peace-maker.
Dai Zong asked the crowd who the boatman was, and a man replied, "He is Zhang Shun, and is the wholesale dealer in fish here."
Song Jiang was startled upon hearing this. "Surely can he not be Zhang Shun, the 'White Fish'?"
"Yes, that is so."
"I have a letter from his brother Zhang Heng in my quarters," said Song Jiang.

Dai Zong hearing this shouted at the top of his voice; "Brother Zhang! Stop this fighting! Here is a letter from your elder brother. That man is one of us, and you can forgive him, and come here to talk matters over."
Zhang Shun heard this, and also recognized Dai Zong so he released Li Kui and swam to the wharf. He saluted and said, "Sir, please excuse me."
"In my behalf I will ask you to go and save that man's life," said Dai Zong. "When you return with him I will introduce you to somebody."
Zhang Shun without a word dived into the river, and soon reached Li Kui who was in difficulties. Zhang Shun took hold of Li Kui with one hand, and treading the water, and swimming with the other hand drew Li Kui towards the wharf. Upon their landing all the crowd applauded. Song Jiang was filled with admiration at this fine display by Zhang Shun. Li Kui was alternately vomiting water and taking in deep drafts of breath.
"Let us all go to the Pipa Pavilion and talk matters over there," suggested Dai Zong.
Li Kui and Zhang Shun put on their clothes, and all four set off for the inn. When they had all taken their seats Dai Zong spoke to Zhang Shun, "Brother, do you know me?"
"Yes, I know you, but I have had no opportunity of meeting you before this," said Zhang Shun.
Dai Zong pointed at Li Kui and said, "He has offended you today, but surely you also know him."
"Of course I know brother Li Kui. Only we have never been at loggerheads previously."
"But you nearly drowned me today," interposed Li Kui.
"You gave me a good beating too," responded Zhang Shun.
"Well, I hope that you will both turn out to be good friends," said Dai Zong. "Remember the saying, 'Friends are often made after a fight.'"
"You avoid meeting me on the road," said Li Kui.
"Well, I prefer to meet you in the water," said Zhang Shun.
They all laughed at this joke, and agreed not to talk about that affair again.
Dai Zong pointing at Song Jiang asked Zhang Shun whether he knew who that was.
Zhang Shun said he did not. He did not remember having met him before.
Li Kui got up and said, "This elder brother is Song Jiang."
"Can he be 'Welcome Rain' of Shandong—Song Jiang?"
"Yes, it is he," said Dai Zong.
Zhang Shun kowtowed and said, "I have heard of your great fame for a long time, but have never expected to meet you. All travelers speak highly of you—your great generosity and your distribution of wealth in good cause."
"Do not mention my small affairs," said Song Jiang. "A few days ago I was at Jieyang Mountain, and stayed with Li Jun, 'Muddy Water Dragon,' and afterwards at Xunyang River I met your brother, Zhang Heng, who gave me a letter to hand to you. It is in my baggage at my lodgings." He then explained how they had come to the Pipa Pavilion to drink wine and how Li Kui had gone to get some fresh fish against their wishes. How they had heard a row, and had come to see what had happened. He said he had been exceedingly fortunate in meeting three heroes in one day. He asked them all to drink three cups of wine with him to celebrate the auspicious occasion.
"If you wish fresh fish," said Zhang Shun, "I myself will go and get some."
Li Kui offered to go with him, but Dai Zong objected, "Have you not had enough river water for today?"
Zhang Shun laughed and taking Li Kui by the hand said, "You come with me for the fish, and we will see how the fishermen will look upon us." So they both set off, and upon reaching the wharf Zhang Shun whistled and all the fishing boats in the river came at once to the wharf. Zhang Shun called out, "Which boat has caught golden carp today?"
Two men on different boats called out that they had the fish, and they soon brought about ten big carp to the wharf. Zhang Shun selected four of the biggest, strung them on a willow twig, and handing them to Li Kui told him to take them to the pavilion. He stayed behind to see the fish weighed and sold to the various dealers. When he got back to the Pipa Pavilion Song Jiang said to him, "Why do you send so many fine fish? One would have been enough."
"These are only small things, and not worth mentioning," said Zhang Shun; "you can take what you like, and any left over you can take along to your lodgings."
They all sat down in order of seniority. The waiter was told to boil the fish, and to steam another one in wine. While this was being done, they drank wine and chatted together about their respective affairs. They then saw a girl about sixteen years of age, wearing crepe clothes that came to their table, gave them the usual woman's salutations, and commenced to sing. Now it happened that Li Kui was just then, in the midst of relating a story of his own exploits, and found it interrupted by the song, and that the other three were only listening to the music. He was annoyed and jumping up he flipped the girl's forehead with two fingers. The girl made an exclamation and fell down. She lay there without moving. The waiter was frightened and told the four guests that they must not attempt to leave until the matter had been investigated by the proper officials.

The unforeseen may sometimes end
Conditions that is perfect.

137
In the Xunyang Pavilion, Song Jiang Writes & Recites a Seditious Poem he should have known better; From Mount Liang Marsh, the Magic Messenger Dai Zong Sends a False Report in a forged Letter

The host detained the 4. "Gentlemen, what have you done?" he cried.
Very flurried, he ordered his waiters to revive the girl. They sprayed her with water, and she opened her eyes. They helped her to her feet. A bit of skin had been rubbed from her forehead. It was this which had caused her to faint. Everyone was greatly relieved. When the girl's parents heard that the perpetrator was Black Whirlwind, they were stunned. They didn't dare protest. Now their daughter had regained her speech. The mother bound the girl's head with a kerchief and collected her hair-pins and ornaments. "What is your name?" Song Jiang asked the woman. "Where do you live?"
"Our family name is Song. We're from the capital, sir. This girl is our only child. Her father has taught her a few ballads. On his instructions, she sings here in the Pipa Pavilion. But she's an impatient, ignorant child. She insisted on singing even though she saw you gentlemen were talking. So this brother moved his hand and injured her a bit. Nothing worth going to the authorities about, and involving you gentlemen."
Song Jiang was pleased that the woman spoke with a proper understanding of her place. "If you'll send someone with me to the prison," he said, "I'll give you twenty ounces of silver for your daughter's recuperation. Find her a good man and get her married. That's better than singing in this tavern for a living."
The girl's parents kowtowed. "Twenty ounces is really too much," they said.
"My word is my bond. I never lie. Let your husband come with me and I'll give him the money."
Again they thanked him. "We are deeply grateful for your assistance, sir."
Dai Zong berated Li Kui. "You must get on with people better. Look how much silver you've made brother spend."
"I only touched her with my finger and down she went. I never saw such a friggin female. Who told her to be so tender? Why, you could punch me in the face a hundred times and I wouldn't mind."
Song Jiang and the others laughed. Zhang Shun called the waiter. "The bill is on me."
"Never mind," the waiter said politely. "It doesn't matter. Just go along."
Song Jiang wouldn't hear of Zhang Shun paying. "I was the one who invited you two," he protested. "Why should you pay?"
But Zhang Shun wouldn't budge. "It's a rare privilege to know you, brother," he said. "Zhang Heng and I both were thinking of joining you when you were in Shandong. Today, I've been lucky enough to meet you at last. You must let me make this small gesture. It's only a trifling token."
"Since brother Zhang respects you so, why not let him have his way?" Dai Zong suggested.
"All right," said Song Jiang. "But only on condition that I treat him to a few cups in return, another day."
Zhang Shun was delighted. Carrying the remaining two carp, he, Dai Zong, Li Kui and the girl's father left the Pipa Pavilion with Song Jiang and escorted him back to the prison. All sat for a while in the Copying Section. Song Jiang gave two small bars of silver weighing twenty ounces to the girl's father. The man thanked him and departed. Of that no more need be said.
It was growing dark. Zhang Shun presented the fish, Song Jiang gave him the letter from his brother, and they bid each other farewell. Then Song Jiang handed a large fifty ounce silver ingot to Li Kui. "You may have use for this, brother," he said.
Dai Zong also took his leave. He and Li Kui hurried to return to the city.
Song Jiang sent one of the fish to the warden, the other he cooked for himself. Because it was fresh and delicious, he ate more than he should, and in the middle of the night his stomach knotted with cramps. By dawn he had more than twenty bouts of diarrhea. He lay weak and faint in his room. Song Jiang was always very good to people, and everyone in the prison cooked him soup and gruel and looked after him.
The next day, knowing that Song Jiang liked fish, Zhang Shun brought him two more large golden carp, in thanks for delivering the letter from his brother. He found him sick in bed, being cared for by the other prisoners. Zhang Shun wanted to call a doctor.
"I over-ate that nice fresh fish. If you buy me some diarrhea medicine I'll be fine," said Song Jiang.
Zhang Shun presented one fish to Warden Wang and one to Head Keeper Zhao, bought the medicine for Song Jiang, and departed. Of that no more need be said. The prisoners brewed the medicine and continued looking after the patient.
Dai Zong and Li Kui, bringing meat and wine, came to the Copying Section the next day to call on Song Jiang. The worst of his illness was over, but he was hardly in condition for wine and meat. They had no choice but to consume it themselves outside his room. They kept him company till late in the day, then said goodbye and left. Of that, too, no more need be said.
After resting six or seven days, Song Jiang felt completely recovered. He considered going into town and seeing Dai Zong. Another day passed without any visit from the superintendent. Early the following morning after breakfast Song Jiang took some silver, locked his door, left the prison and strolled into the city. Outside the prefectural office, he asked someone where Superintendent Dai lived.
"He has no wife or children," the man said. "He stays in the Guan Yin Monastery next door to the City Temple."
Song Jiang went there, but Dai's door was locked. He had already gone out.
Next, the clerk sought Li Kui the Black Whirlwind. "He's a headless ghost, that one," several people said. "He hasn't any home, except for the prison. And he has no routine. He'll spend a few days here, a couple of days there. You never know where he's at."
Song Jiang then went looking for the catch-master Zhang Shun. "He lives in a village in the suburbs," he was told. "Even when he sells fish it's by the river bank outside the city. He only comes into town to collect money."
The clerk again left the city, still hoping to find Zhang Shun. But he met no one he could ask. He walked on, alone and depressed. Then he came upon a lovely stretch of river, and was enchanted by the view. He saw ahead a several storied tavern. Beside it, hanging from a tall pole, was a blue banner emblazoned with the words: The Excellent Cellar by the Xunyang River. Xunyang Pavilion, the tavern's name, was written large in the calligraphy of poet Su Dongpo on a sign beneath the eaves.
"I heard of Jiangzhou's Xunyang Pavilion back in Yuncheng," Song Jiang mused, "and here it is. Although I'm alone, I mustn't miss this opportunity. I'll go upstairs and relax a while."
On the carved vermilion pillars to either side of the door were two white plaques on which a couplet was written: Incomparable wine and A world-famous place to dine.
Song Jiang entered, mounted the stairs and sat down in a room overlooking the river. He leaned on the railing and gazed around appreciatively.
A waiter came in. "Are you waiting for others, sir, or are you here by yourself?"
"I was expecting two guests, but they haven't show up. Bring me a jug of good wine, first, and some fruit and meats. I don't want any fish."
The waiter went downstairs and soon returned with a jug of "Moonlight Breeze on Lovers' Bridge"—a fine liquor, and a tray of vegetable dishes and tidbits to go with it. Then came fat mutton, crispy chicken, less-steeped goose and fillet of beef, all served on vermilion plates and platters.
Song Jiang was very pleased. "Delicious food well arranged on excellent crockery. Jiangzhou deserves its fame," he thought. "Although I'm here as an exile, I can still admire the scenery. We have a few scenic spots and antique remains at home, but nothing to compare with this."
Seated beside the railing, he drank steadily. Gradually, without being aware of it, he became drunk. In a surge of melancholy, he thought: "I was born in Shandong Province and raised in Yuncheng Town. A clerk by profession, I know many a good fellow in the gallant fraternity, and have earned something of a reputation. But though over thirty, I haven't made my name yet or done anything outstanding. Instead, I've the tattoo of the criminal on my cheek and am living in exile. Who knows when I'll see my old father and brother again?"
The wine went to his head, and he wept, very depressed. Suddenly, he decided to write a poem. He ordered the waiter to bring brush-pen and ink-stone, then rose and scanned appreciatively the poems which others had written on the white calcimined walls.
"Why not write my poem on the wall, too?" he said to himself. "Some day, when I've earned my place in the world, I'll come here and read it again, and think back on my present misery."
Stimulated by the wine, he ground a thick mixture of ink, soaked his brush-pen in it, and wrote on the white wall:

Since childhood, I studied classics and history,
And grew up shrewd and intelligent.
Today, a tiger enduring in the wilderness.
I crouch with tooth and claw, intent.
A criminal's tattoo upon my cheek,
An unwilling exile in far Jiangzhou,
I shall have my revenge some day,
And dye red with blood the Xunyang's flow.

Song Jiang laughed uproariously, delighted with his effort. He drank several more cups of wine. By now he was dancing for joy. Again he took up his pen and added four more lines:

Heart in Shandong, body in Wu,
Drifting, I breathe sighs into the air.
If I achieve my lofty aim,
No rebel chief will with me compare.

At the bottom, in large script he wrote: "by Song Jiang of Yuncheng." and tossed the pen on the table. He intoned the verses to himself, then downed a few more cups of wine. He was very drunk. Song Jiang asked for the bill, paid, and told the waiter to keep the change. Brushing smooth his long sleeves, he staggered down the stairs and returned to the prison. He opened his door and collapsed on the bed.
He slept straight through till the following dawn. When he awakened he remembered nothing about having written a poem in the Xunyang Pavilion. He had a bad hangover, and lay on his bed all day. Of that no more need be said.

Opposite Jiangzhou, on the other side of the river, was a town called Wuweijun, a desolate place. Living there was a former deputy prefect named Huang Wenbing. Although he'd read a bit of the classics, he was a narrow-hearted sycophant who envied men of ability. Those superior in talent he injured, those inferior he mocked. His speciality was harming people throughout the township.
He knew that Prefect Cai was the son of the premier, and frequently crossed the river to call and ingratiate himself. He hoped that this would lead to an appointment making him an official again. It was Song Jiang's fate to arouse this man and be treated by him as an adversary.
That day Huang Wenbing was sitting idle and bored at home. He called two servants, bought some attractive gifts, crossed the river in his own swift boat, and went to call on the prefect. But Cai was in the midst of an official banquet, and Huang didn't dare interrupt. He returned to the boat, which his servants had moored, by coincidence, below the Xunyang Pavilion.
It was a hot day, and Huang strolled up to the tavern. After looking over the wine cellar, he mounted the stairs to the rooms along the balcony. He glanced at the many poems upon the wall. Some were well-written, others were incoherent nonsense. Huang smiled superciliously.
He then read the verses of Song Jiang. "This is rebellious," he exclaimed. "Who could have written it?" He looked at the signature: "Song Jiang of Yuncheng."
Huang read the poem again: Since childhood I studied classics and history, / And grew up shrewd and intelligent... He laughed coldly. "Thinks pretty well of himself!"
He continued: Today, a tiger enduring in the wilderness, / I crouch with tooth and claw, intent... Huang cocked his head to one side. "The lout has no sense of fitness."
He read on: A criminal's tattoo upon my cheek, / An unwilling exile in far Jiangzhou... Again Huang laughed. "This is no noble-minded person. He's only an exiled prisoner."
Once more he read: I shall have my revenge some day, / And dye red with blood the Xunyang's flow... Huang shook his head. "Who does the villain want to wreak vengeance on? And why here? He's only an exile. How much of a stir can he make?"
Heart in Shandong, body in Wu, / Drifting, I breathe sighs into the air... Huang nodded. "At least those lines make sense."
If I achieve my lofty aim, / No rebel chief will with me compare... Huang stuck out his tongue and wagged his head. "What brass. An incomparable rebel leader! If that's not a proclamation of revolt I don't know what is!"
Huang read the signature again: "Song Jiang of Yuncheng."

"Where have I heard that name before?" he pondered. "Probably some petty functionary."
He summoned the waiter. "Who wrote this poem?"
"A man who was here last night. He drank a whole jug all by himself."
"What does he look like?"
"He has two lines of tattooing on his cheek. He must be one of the inmates of the city prison. A swarthy, short, fat fellow."
"I see," said Huang. He asked for a pen and ink, copied the poem on a sheet of paper, and placed it inside his clothes. "Don't scrape it off," he cautioned the waiter.
He went down the stairs and returned to the boat, where he spent the night. The next day after breakfast, with the servants bearing the gifts, he again proceeded to the prefecture. Cai had already completed court and had withdrawn to the residence. An officer went in to announce Huang. Before long the man came out and conducted Huang to the rear hall. There, Cai joined him. After some friendly chatter and when the gifts had been presented, both men took their seats.
"I came across the river last night to pay my respects," said Huang, "but Your Excellency was giving a banquet and I didn't want to intrude. So I've come today, instead."
"Such an intimate friend, you could have joined us. I'm sorry I missed you." Cai ordered that tea be served.
After a few sips, Huang asked: "May I be so bold as to enquire whether there has been any word from you honorable father the premier lately?"
"I received a letter from him just a couple of days ago."
"What's the news of the capital?"
"He says the Royal Astrologer in a report to the throne states that an evil star is shining on our land of Wu, and on Zhu, and that there are probably trouble makers abroad who must be eliminated. What's more, says my father, children on the street are chanting this rhyme: The destroyer of our country is home and tree; water and work are armed soldiery; stretched in a line are thirty-six; Shandong will put us in a terrible fix. He advises me to keep a careful watch on my prefecture."
Huang thought a moment. Then he smiled. "I'm not surprised, Excellency." He took from his sleeve the poem he had copied and handed it to Cai. "Here's the reason."
The prefect read it. "A rebellious poem. Where did you get it?"
"I didn't dare to intrude last night, and walked back to the river bank. For want of something better to do, I went into the Xunyang Pavilion to escape the heat. I saw poems idlers had inscribed on the white-washed wall, including this newly written one."
"What sort of person is the author?"
"He's put his name down. Song Jiang of Yuncheng."
"Who is he?"
"He tells us in his poem: A criminal's tattoo upon my cheek, / An unwilling exile in far Jiangzhou. He's an exile, a criminal in the city prison."
"What can a fellow like that do?"
"Don't underestimate him, Excellency. He fits in exactly with the children's rhyme your honorable father mentions in his letter."
"What do you mean?"
"The destroyer of our country is home and tree. Put the top of the character for 'home' over the character for 'tree' and you've got the character 'Song.' He's the man who'll pillage our country's money and grain. Then, Water and work are armed soldiery—the second line. Place the 'water' radical next to the character for 'work' and you've got 'Jiang,' the man who will raise armed soldiers. And it's Song Jiang who's written the rebellious poem. This is a warning from Heaven. How fortunate for the populace!"
"What about Stretched in a line are thirty-six; Shandong will put us in a terrible fix?"
"Thirty-six either refers to the year of our emperor's reign, or it's a number of some sort. As for Shandong will put us in a terrible fix, Yuncheng County is in Shandong. We've something to coincide with every line of the rhyme."
"Is the fellow still here?"
"When I questioned the waiter last night he said the man wrote the poem the day before yesterday. But it's easy enough to find out. Check the prison register."
"An extremely good idea." Cai ordered an attendant to fetch the register of the city prison from the record room. Cai examined it personally. Sure enough, there was the entry: "Fifth month. One newly exiled prisoner—Song Jiang of Yuncheng County."
"The man in the rhyme. This is very important," said Huang. "If we delay, news that we're on to him may leak out. Better seize him immediately and lock him up. Then we can discuss what to do next."
"Precisely," said the prefect. He convened court and summoned the superintendent of the city's two prisons. Dai Zong presented himself and hailed the prefect respectfully.
"Take some police, go to the city prison and bring Song Jiang of Yuncheng here," Cai ordered. "He's written a rebellious poem in the Xunyang Pavilion. I don't want a moment's delay."
Shocked, Dai Zong silently groaned and left the prefectural office. He mustered a number of prison guards. "Go home and get your weapons and assemble at my quarters next door to the City Temple," he instructed them.
The men departed. Using his magic travel method, Dai sped to the prison's Copying Section and pushed open Song Jiang's door. His friend was there. When the clerk saw Dai enter, he hurried forward to greet him.
"I went into town the other day, but couldn't find you anywhere," Song Jiang said. "I was so bored I walked to the Xunyang Pavilion and finished a bottle of wine all by myself. The effects still haven't worn off."
"Brother," Dai exclaimed, "what sort of poem did you write on the wall?"
"Who knows? I was drunk."
"Just now the prefect summoned me and ordered me to bring men and arrest you for having written a rebellious poem in the Xunyang Pavilion. I was very shaken, but I told my men to wait for me by the City Temple to give me time to let you know first. Brother, what are we going to do? How can we get you out of this?"
Song Jiang scratched his head in perplexity. "I'm a goner," he moaned.
"There is a way, though it may not work," said Dai. "I can't delay any longer. I'll have to bring my police and arrest you. Mess your hair, spill your filth on the floor, roll in it, and pretend to be mad. When I come with my men, speak wildly and act as if you were out of your mind. I'll go back to the prefect and report that you're insane."
"Thank you, brother. Save me, I beg you!"
Dai quickly bid farewell and returned to the city. At the City Temple he assembled his police and proceeded with them to the prison at a rapid pace. "Where is the new exile, Song Jiang?" he shouted with feigned ferocity. He led his men to Song Jiang's room in the Copying Section.
There they found the clerk, his hair in disarray, rolling in his own filth upon the floor.
"Who are you pricks?" Song Jiang demanded.
"Seize the wretch," Dai roared.
Eyes glaring, Song Jiang fought in a frenzy. "I'm the son-in-law of the Jade Emperor of Heaven. He's sent me here with a hundred thousand divine troops to slaughter all of Jiangzhou. The King of Hades leads my advance guard, the Demon General commands my rear. The Jade Emperor has given me a golden seal weighing eight hundred catties. I'm going to kill every friggin one of you!"
"He's crazy," said the policemen. "What's the use of arresting him?"
"You're right," said Dai. "Let's go back and tell them. If we have to take him, we'll come again."
They returned to the prefecture, where Cai was waiting in his court. "Song Jiang has taken leave of his senses," they reported. "He rolls in filth and talks wild. He stinks so badly we didn't dare bring him here."
Cai was about to inquire further when Huang emerged from behind a screen. "Don't believe them," he advised the prefect. "That poem he wrote was not the work of a madman. There's something fishy going on. Bring him in. If he can't walk, carry him."
"You're right," said Cai. He turned to the superintendent. "No more excuses. I want him here."
Orders were orders. Dai groaned inwardly, and led his police once more to the prison. "It's not going well, brother," he whispered. "I'll have to take you along." Song Jiang was placed in a large bamboo cage and carried to the prefectural court.
"Bring the rogue forward," the prefect directed.
Guards brought Song Jiang before the official dais, but he refused to kneel. "How dare you question me," he cried, glaring. "I'm the son-in-law of the Jade Emperor. He's sent me here with a hundred thousand divine troops to slaughter all of Jingzhou. The King of Hades leads my advance guard, the Demon General commands my rear. The Jade Emperor has given me a golden seal weighing eight hundred catties. Hide before I kill every friggin one of you!"
The prefect was at a loss. Again Huang addressed him. "Summon the warden and the head keeper. Ask them whether he was mad when he arrived, or did this happen only recently. If he was crazy when he came, then it's real. If this condition developed only now, then it's false."
"Very well put," said the prefect. He sent for the warden and the head keeper and questioned them. It was impossible for them to lie.
"He didn't show any signs of madness when he arrived," they admitted. "He only became this way lately."
Cai was furious. He instructed the guards to truss the prisoner up and give him fifty blows. Song Jiang was pounded till he was more dead than alive. His skin burst and his blood was streaming. Dai Zong watched, agonized, unable to help him.
At first Song Jiang continued to babble like a lunatic, but finally he could bear no more. "I wrote a rebellious poem because I was drunk," he cried. "I didn't mean anything by it."
Having obtained a confession, the magistrate directed that a twenty-five-catty cangue for capital felons be placed around the prisoner's neck and that he be detained in the big jail. Song Jiang had been beaten so badly he couldn't walk. The cangue was nailed fast and he was thrown into a cell for the condemned. Dai secretly ordered the guards to treat him well, and arranged for food to be sent in. Of that we'll say no more.
Cai adjourned court and invited Huang to the rear hall. "Were it not for your far-sightedness," the prefect said, "I might have been fooled by that villain."
"The case is urgent, Excellency. It would be best if you rushed a man to the capital with a letter to your honorable father, reporting how you are dealing with this matter of national importance. Suggest that if he wants the man, alive, you'll send him by prison cart. If he doesn't, or if he's afraid the fellow will escape en route, you'll execute him here and eliminate a great danger. The emperor will also be very pleased with the news."
"There's reason in what you say. I was intending to send a person to the capital with gifts for my father, anyway. I shall mention your contribution in my letter and ask him to request the emperor to put you in charge of a wealthy city, so that you may quickly gain fame and fortune."
"All my life I shall rely on your beneficence, Excellency, and serve you as humbly as any groom."
The prefect wrote the letter and affixed his seal. "Who will you send as a trusted messenger?" Huang asked.
"The superintendent of our two city prisons is a man named Dai Zong. He knows certain charms by which he can cover eight hundred //in one day. I'm giving him the mission. He'll make the round trip in ten days."
"If he travels that fast, splendid."
Cai entertained Huang with wine in the rear hall. The next day Huang took his leave of the prefect and returned to Wuweijun.
Cai filled two hampers with gold and jewels and precious baubles, then closed and sealed them. The following day he summoned Dai Zong to the rear hall.
"I have here some gifts and a letter which I want delivered to my father the premier in the Eastern Capital before his birthday, which is on the fifteenth of the sixth lunar month. The date is fast approaching, and only you can get there in time. Don't tell me about difficulties. Travel day and night and bring back a reply and I'll reward you handsomely. I have figured out your itinerary and just how long it should take, using your marvellous travel methods, and shall be awaiting your report. Don't dally on the road. This must not be delayed."
The superintendent couldn't refuse. He accepted the hampers and the letter, bid the prefect farewell, and left to prepare. Then he went to see Song Jiang in his cell.
"You can relax, brother," said Dai. "The prefect is sending me on a mission to the Eastern Capital, with a time limit of ten days. While I'm at the premier's residence I'll pull a few strings and get you out of this. Li Kui will be responsible for bringing you your food every day. Just be patient a little longer."
"I hope you can save my life, brother."
The superintendent summoned Li Kui and said: "Our brother has written a rebellious poem and has been convicted. We don't know yet what the outcome will be. I'm leaving today on a mission to the Eastern Capital and will be back soon. It's up to you to see it that he gets his food every day."
"So he wrote a rebellious poem. What friggin difference does that make? Thousands of plotters have become big officials! You just go on to the capital and don't worry about a thing. No one in this prison will dare bother him. I'll return good for good. But if anybody plays rough, I'll take my battle-ax and chop his friggin head off!"
"Be careful, please. If you get drunk our brother is liable to miss his meals."
"If that's what worries you, I won't touch a drop all the while you are gone. I'll look after brother Song Jiang every minute. Why not?"
Dai was very pleased. "You seem very determined."
That day, he set out on his journey. Li Kui indeed gave up drink. He remained in the prison, tending to Song Jiang, never leaving him by so much as a step.
Dai Zong returned to his quarters, put on leggings, hemp sandals, and an apricot-yellow robe bound by a waist sash, into which he tucked his identification plaque. Dai changed his head kerchief and put the letter into his pouch, along with some money for the road. The hampers he carried on either end of a shoulder-pole.
Once outside the city, he attached two charms to each of his legs, murmured some magic words, and set forth. He travelled all day, and put up at an inn in the evening. Removing the charms, he burned simulated gold ingots of paper as a gift to the Emperor of Heaven. Then he retired.
He rose early the next morning, had some food and wine, and left the inn. Again he attached the four charms, shouldered the hampers, and travelled—so rapidly that the wind and rain whistled in his ears, and his feet didn't touch the ground. He stopped only once or twice for a snack along the road.
At the end of the day he again spent the night at an inn. The following morning he got up at the fifth watch, to take advantage of the dawn cool. Attaching the charms, he struck out with the hampers on his shoulder-pole. By mid-morning he had covered nearly three hundred //without encountering a single clean tavern.
It was a sticky day in early summer. Dai's clothes were soaked with sweat. He was nearly prostrated from the heat. Hungry and thirsty, he noticed a tavern ahead. It was beside a lake at the edge of a grove. Dai was there in the twiddle of a thumb. The tavern was spotlessly clean, and had twelve red lacquered tables, with benches to match, all in a row beside the windows.
He went in, chose a secluded table rested his hampers, untied his sash and removed his gown. This he sprayed with water and hung on the window railing to dry. As he sat down, the waiter approached.
"How much wine, sir? Would you like some meat to go with it? We have pork, mutton and beef."
"Go easy on the wine. And bring me some rice."
"Besides wine and rice we sell steamed bread and vermicelli soup."
"I don't want meat. Have you any vegetables?"
"How about some peppery stewed bean-curd?"
"Just right."
The waiter soon returned with bean-curd and two vegetable dishes, and poured out three large bowls of wine. Dai was famished. He quickly finished the wine and bean-curd. He was waiting for rice when the earth and sky began to turn dizzily. His sight fading, Dai fell backwards off the bench.
"He's down," the waiter called.
From within the tavern a man emerged. It was Zhu Gui, the Dry-Land Crocodile, member of the Mount Liangshan stronghold.
"Take his hampers inside and see whether he's got anything on him," Zhu Gui ordered.
Two assistants searched Dai and found a paper packet. They handed it to Zhu Gui. He removed the paper and revealed an envelope inscribed: "Peaceful Family Letter, with the Utmost Respect to His Father from His Son Cai Dezhang." Zhu Gui tore open the envelope and read the missive from beginning to end. It said:
Today we have arrested a man who fits the prediction rhyme and who has written a rebellious poem—Song Jiang of Shandong, and are holding him in prison ... We await your orders for his disposition.
Zhu Gui was shocked beyond speech. His assistants were lifting Dai to carry him into the butchering shed when Zhu Gui noticed a red and green object attached to the sash lying on the bench. He picked it up. It was an official's identification plaque. Etched in silver were the words: "Dai Zong, Superintendent of the Two Prisons, Jiangzhou."
"Wait." Zhu Gui said to the cohorts. "I've often heard our military advisor talk of his friend Dai Zong the Marvellous Traveller from Jiangzhou. Can this be the man? But why is he bearing a letter that will harm Song Jiang? Heaven has sent him into my hands." He instructed his assistants: "Give him the antidote and bring him round. I want to question him."
The assistants poured a mixture into some water, raised Dai up and fed it to him. He soon opened his eyes and struggled to his feet. He saw Zhu Gui with the letter in his hands.
"Who are you?" Dai shouted. "How dare you drug me? And you've opened the letter to the premier. Don't you know what a crime that is?"
Zhu Gui laughed. "So what? What's opening the premier's letter to a man who's opposing the Song emperor?"
Dai was astonished. "Who are you, bold fellow? What is your name?"
"I'm Zhu Gui, the Dry-Land Crocodile, of the gallant band in Liangshan Marsh."
"Since you're one of the leaders, you must know Wu Yong."
"He's our military advisor. He controls all our military operations. How do you know him?"

"He's a very close friend."
"You're not Superintendent Dai, the Marvellous Traveller of Jiangzhou, he so often speaks about?"
"I am."
"When Song Jiang was on his way to exile in Jiangzhou, he stayed at our stronghold, and Wu Yong gave him a letter to you. Why are you helping to take his life?"
"Song Jiang is like a brother to me. He wrote a rebellious poem and I couldn't prevent his arrest. I'm on my way to the capital right now to find a way to save him. I'd never harm Song Jiang."
"You don't believe me?" retorted Zhu Gui. "Take a look at this."
Dai read the letter the prefect had written. He was shocked. He told Zhu Gui how he had met Song Jiang, when he came with the note from Wu Yong, and how Song Jiang got drunk and wrote a rebellious poem in the Xunyang Pavilion.
"In that case, please come with me to the stronghold and talk it over with our leaders," said Zhu Gui. "We've got to rescue Song Jiang."
First he wined and dined Dai Zong. Then he went to the pavilion overlooking the lake and shot a whistling arrow to the opposite cove. A bandit promptly rowed over in a boat. Zhu Gui helped Dai and his hampers on board. They landed at the Shore of Golden Sands and climbed to the fortress. When it was reported to Wu Yong that they were at the gate, he hurried down to greet them.
"It's been a long time," he said to Dai. "What good wind blows you here? Please come up. We'll talk in the stronghold."
Wu Yong introduced him to the other leaders, and Zhu Gui told the reason for Dai's visit: "Song Jiang is in prison."
Chao Gai hastily invited Dai to be seated and asked him how this came about. Dai related in detail the story of Song Jiang and his rebellious poem. Chao Gai was very alarmed. He proposed to the other leaders that they immediately muster men and horses, raid Jiangzhou and bring Song Jiang back to the fortress.
"That's not the way, brother," Wu Yong said. "Jiangzhou's quite far from here. A large body of men and horses would only provoke disaster. 'Disturbing the grass alerts the snake.' It would mean Song Jiang's life. What's needed here is guile, not force. I'm not very clever but I have a little plan by which we can rescue Song Jiang. It involves Superintendent Dai."
"Let's hear it, Military Advisor."
"Dai has to bring back a reply to the letter Prefect Cai is sending to the Eastern Capital. We'll write a false one and turn the tables on them. The reply Superintendent Dai will deliver will say: 'Take no action against the prisoner Song Jiang. Send him here under appropriate guard. After thorough interrogation we shall execute him and put his head on display and discredit the prediction rhyme.' When Song Jiang is being escorted through this area, our men will snatch him. What do you think of my plan?"
"Suppose he doesn't pass this way? We'll miss our chance," said Chao Gai.
"That's no problem," said Gongsun Sheng. "We'll dispatch scouts near and far to inquire. Whichever path he travels, we'll be waiting for him. One way or another, we'll get him. Our only worry is that they won't convoy him to the capital."
"The plan sounds all right," said Chao Gai, "but who's going to write the reply of Cai Jing the premier?"
"I've thought of that," said Wu Yong. "The four most favored styles of writing today are those of Su Dongpo, Huang Luzhi, Mi Yuanzhang, and Cai Jing. In all of Song, they are considered the most perfect. I have a scholar friend in the town of Jizhou named Xiao Rang. Because his calligraphy is so good, he's known as the Master Hand. He's also skilled with lance, staff, sword and knife. I know for a fact he can write in the style of Cai Jing. We'll have Superintendent Dai go to his house and say: 'The Yue Temple in Tai'an Prefecture needs an inscription written for a monument. Here are fifty ounces of silver for your family's expenses while you're gone.' Dai will bring him here. Later, we'll trick his wife and family into coming up the mountain also, and we'll get Xiao to join our band. How's that?"
"If he can write the reply, that's fine," said Chao Gai. "But we'll need a seal as well."
"There's another friend I have in mind for that. He's the best in the whole central plain, and he also lives in Jizhou. His name is Jin Dajian. He carves writing beautifully in stone and cuts excellent jade seals. What's more, he's a demon with lance and staff. He's known as the Jade-Armed Craftsman because he carves jade so well. Dai will give him fifty ounces of silver and tell him he's needed to engrave the monument. We'll capture him too on the way. We can use men like Jin and Xiao here in our stronghold."
"Very shrewd," commended Chao Gai.
That day a feast was laid for Dai Zong, and in the evening all retired.
The next morning after breakfast, Dai was disguised as a deacon and given two hundred ounces of silver. He tied on his charms, went down the mountain, and was ferried from the Shore of Golden Sands to the opposite side, where he set out for Jizhou. In less than two watches he arrived. He inquired for Xiao Rang the Master Hand.
"He lives in front of the Confucius Temple east of the prefectural office," Dai was told.
The superintendent went to Xiao's door and coughed. "Is Master Xiao at home?" he called.
A scholar emerged and looked at Dai. He's never seen him before. "Where are you from, Deacon?" he asked. "What can I do for you?"
Dai greeted him courteously. "I am the deacon of Yue Temple in Tai'an. We're repairing our Five Sacred Mountains Building and our local gentry want a monument carved. They've instructed me to give you fifty ounces of silver to care for your family while you've away and to ask you to come with me to our temple to write the inscription. The opening date has already been set and cannot be postponed."
"I only write the words on the stone, nothing more. If you're in a hurry for the monument, you'll need an engraver as well."
"I have another fifty pieces of silver. I intend to invite Jin Dajian the Jade-Armed Craftsman. An auspicious day has already been chosen. Please favor us with your guidance. We'll get Jin and go together."
Xiao Rang accepted the silver and took Dai to call on Jin. They went past the Confucius Temple and Xiao pointed. "That's Jin coming now."
Xiao hailed him and introduced him to Dai. He explained what it was that Dai wanted. "The deacon is giving each of us fifty ounces of silver to go with him," the scholar added.
Jin was pleased at the mention of the money. He and Xiao invited Dai to a tavern for a few cups of wine and some vegetable dishes. Dai gave him the silver for family expenses.
"The necromancer has selected a lucky day," the superintendent said. "I'd like both of you to leave with me at once."
"It's very hot today," said Xiao. "If we go now we won't get very far, and won't reach any place where we can put up for the night. Why not start tomorrow at the fifth watch? Just call for us and we'll go."
Jin concurred. "He's right, you know."
They arranged to leave at dawn, and returned to their homes to prepare. Dai stayed over with Xiao Rang, at the scholar's request.
At dawn the next day Jin, with a bundle of clothes and his tools, called for Xiao and Dai, and they left Jizhou. Before they had gone ten //Dai spoke.
"You two masters continue slowly. I mustn't rush you. I'll go on ahead and inform the gentry so that they can come and greet you." He lengthened his stride and hurried forward.
The two craftsmen, their bundles on their backs, proceeded at a leisurely pace. By early afternoon they had covered about eighty //. Suddenly, a shrill whistle ahead broke the stillness, and a band of forty of fifty bold fellows leaped out from concealment on the slope. In the lead was Wang the Stumpy Tiger of Clear Winds Mountain.
"Who are you two?" he called. "Where are you going? Take them, children. We'll eat their hearts with our wine!"
"We're on our way to Tai'an to carve a stone monument," said Xiao. "We haven't any valuables. Only these clothes."
"I don't want your valuables or your clothes," shouted Wang. "It's your clever hearts and livers I'm after as a savoury for my drinks!
Alarmed, Xiao and Jin mustered all their skill with arms. Raising their staves, they charged the Stumpy Tiger. Wang attacked with halberd, and the three fought half a dozen rounds until Wang was forced to turn and flee. The craftsmen were about to pursue when, on the heights, they heard the crash of gongs. From the left came Guardian of the Clouds Song Wan. From the right came Skyscraper Du Qian. Behind was Zheng Tianshou the Fair-Faced Gentleman and over thirty others. They seized Xiao and Jin and dragged them into the forest.
"Don't worry," said the four gallants. "We've been ordered by our chieftain Chao Gai to invite you up the mountain to join our band."
"What use would we be in your stronghold?" said Xiao. "We haven't the strength to strangle a chicken. All we can do is eat."
"In the first place Military Advisor Wu is your friend and, secondly, we know of your skill with weapons," said Du Qian. "That's why we sent Dai Zong to your homes to invite you."
Xiao and Jin looked at each other, speechless. All went together to the tavern of Zhu Gui the Dry-Land Crocodile, where food and drink were served. The same night a boat was called and the party proceeded to Mount Liangshan.
On arrival at the stronghold they were greeted by Chao Gai, Wu Yong and the other chieftains. The two craftsmen were given a feast of welcome and were told about forging the letter from Cai Jing.
"And so we're inviting you two to join us," the leaders concluded, "and become part of our righteous fraternity."
The craftsmen clutched Wu Yong anxiously. "We've no objection to staying here," they said, "but what of our wives and children? When the authorities hear about this they'll surely harm them."
"Set your minds at ease, brothers," Wu Yong said. "Tomorrow morning you'll understand."
That night all drank until it was time to retire.
At daybreak a bandit arrived and reported: "They're here."
"Please go and receive your families," Wu Yong sand to Jin and Xiao.
The two men could scarcely believe him. Halfway down the mountain they met sedan chairs coming up, bearing their wives and children. The two questioned them in astonishment.
"After you left, yesterday," the women related, "these sedan-carriers arrived and said: 'Your husbands are at an inn outside of town suffering from heat stroke. They want you and the children to go there at once and look after them.' But when we left the town they wouldn't let us out of the sedan-chairs, and brought us here."
Both families had been reunited. Xiao and Jin had nothing to say. They abandoned all hope of leaving and went back up the mountain to join the band.
When the families were settled in, Wu Yong conferred with Xiao on the writing of Cai Jing's reply. As to the seal, Jin said: "I've always been the one who's carved all of Cai Jing's seals, both of his official name and his popular name." They set to work and soon finished the letter.
A banquet was laid for Dai Zong, who was given detailed instructions. The superintendent bid all farewell and went down the mountain to the Shore of Golden Sands, where a bandit ferried him across to Zhu Gui's tavern. Dai tied the charms to his legs, took leave of Zhu Gui, and strode forth on his journey.
After seeing Dai off to the ferry point, Wu Yong and the other chieftains returned to the mountain fortress and feasted. Suddenly, while they were drinking, Wu Yong uttered a cry of lamentation. Everyone was mystified.
"What's wrong?" they queried.
"That letter I prepared is the death warrant for Dai Zong and Song Jiang!"
"What's the matter with it?" the chieftains asked in alarm.
"I thought only of one thing and forgot another. There's a terrible error in that reply!"
"I wrote exactly in the style of Cai Jing. Not a word was wrong," said Xiao. "Please tell us, Military Advisor, where was the error?"
"The seal I carved corresponds to Cai's in every detail," said Jin. "How'd anyone see any flaw?" Wu Yong raised 2 fingers and revealed the mistake to the assembled warriors. And as a result, bold fellows caused havoc in Jiangzhou Town and threw White Dragon Temple into confusion. In a shower of arrows men fled for their lives in a forest of weapons, heroes were saved.

Now when Iron Ox stuck his fist in that girl's face and knocked her down, the innkeeper thrust himself between them, saying: "Gentlemen, please what are you trying to do?" Anxiously he called his waiters and assistants over to give the girl first aid. When they sprayed water over her face she came to and they helped her to her feet. She had lost a chunk of skin from her temple, which was the cause of her fainting. Now they had brought her round there was general relief.
The girl's parents had heard the name Black Whirlwind, Iron Ox's other name; they were struck dumb and for a long time stood there not daring to open their mouths. Once the girl had regained her speech, her mother took out a handkerchief and bound up her head and then began gathering up her hairpins.
"What is your name, where do you live?" Song Jiang asked them.
"Our name is Song, sir, I'll tell you no lies," the old woman said. "We're from the capital. This is our only daughter, her name's Yulian. Her father has taught her a few songs, and nothing would satisfy him but that she should come to this restaurant and sing to people, to earn a bit of money, you know. But she's so flighty, she has no sense of what's proper. She took no heed that you were talking, she just had to go and sing. Then this gentleman gets impatient and gives her a bit of a knock. We certainly don't want to make a complaint and give you gentlemen a lot of bother."
Seeing that she spoke so circumspectly, Song Jiang said: "If you send someone with me to the camp, I will give you twenty taels of silver. Let her rest and later you can find her a good husband so she won't have to come here and sing for her living."
The old couple prostrated themselves in gratitude, saying: "We don't deserve so much!"
"A promise is a promise," Song Jiang said. "I never go back on my word. Let your husband come with me and I'll settle up with him."
The old people thanked him again. "We are deeply grateful, Your Honour," they said.
"Now look at you," the Magic Messenger said to Iron Ox. "Just in order to shut someone up you've made our friend spend all that money!"
Iron Ox said: "I only meant to touch her with my finger. She fell down by herself. How was I to know the bloody girl was so fragile? You could punch me in the face a hundred times and it wouldn't do anything to me!"
Song Jiang and the others all laughed. White Eel called the waiter over and said to him: "I'm paying."
"Don't worry about that," the man said. "I just want you to leave."
Song Jiang didn't want to accept the offer. "I invited you," he said. "Why should you pay?"
But White Eel was adamant. "When you were in Shandong we were even planning to join you. Now I've got the luck to be here with you face to face, you've got to let me do this little thing."
The Magic Messenger said: "Song Jiang, my friend, it seems Mr. Zhang has set his heart on inviting you, I think you should give way."
"All right, then," said Song Jiang. "On condition that you allow me to invite you another time."
White Eel was satisfied. Carrying the two carp he, the Magic Messenger and Iron Ox, and also old Song, accompanied Song Jiang from the inn back to the prison camp. Arriving there, they went and sat in the inspection room while Song Jiang fetched two bars of silver amounting to twenty taels for the old man, who thanked him and departed. Of him no more.
It was getting dark by now. White Eel gave Song Jiang the fish and the latter handed over his brother's letter. White Eel now left. Song Jiang also gave Iron Ox a fifty ounce silver bar, saying: "This is for you." After which the Magic Messenger and Iron Ox said goodbye and returned to the town.
Song Jiang presented one of the fish to the warden and kept the other himself. The fish was temptingly fresh and tasty, and Song Jiang ate too much of it. That night he had such a pain it felt as if his guts were being tied in knots. By daybreak he had been to the bathroom twenty times. He was so giddy he collapsed on his bed and slept. Since everyone liked him in the camp, they all brought him rice porridge and soup and looked after him and fed him. Next day White Eel came with two more big golden carp, since he knew Song Jiang liked fish, to thank him for bringing the letter. He found him in bed with diarrhoea, attended by the inmates of the camp. White Eel wanted to call the doctor, but Song Jiang said: "It's my own fault for being greedy. I ate too much fish. Just get me some of that special mixture for diarrhoea and I'll be fine." He told White Eel to give the fish away, one to the warden and the other to the Magic Messenger. White Eel did so, and got him the medicine, then left. Of this no more.
The inmates of the camp continued to look after Song Jiang. Next day the Magic Messenger and Iron Ox came to see him in the office, bringing wine and meat, but they found him still sick and unable to face any food, so they consumed it themselves in the front room. They stayed till evening. Of this no more.
Song Jiang continued to rest in the camp for another week or so, after which he felt well much better, quite recovered from the sickness, and began to think about going to see the Magic Messenger in the town. Another day passed and the Magic Messenger did not turn up, so next day after breakfast somewhat before nine o'clock he took some silver, locked his room and left the camp. He strolled easily down the road till he reached the town. In front of the government offices he asked where he could find Superintendent Dai. Someone said: "He has no family, he stays at the monastery of the Goddess of Mercy next door to the Temple of the City God." Thither he directed his steps, but found the door locked and no one in.
Next he inquired about Iron Ox. "He's a restless soul, he doesn't have any fixed place," everyone told him. "He tends to sleep at the gaol, but he doesn't have a regular routine. He'll spend a couple of nights here and a few more there, you can never really say where he lives." Song Jiang also asked about the factor, White Eel. "He lives in a village outside the city," they said. "At the time of the fish auction he's always down by the river. He only comes into town to collect money."
After hearing all this Song Jiang decided to go and look for White Eel in the country. Hoping to meet someone of whom he could ask the way, he strolled along gloomily by himself. When he had left the town behind the river scenery was beautiful, he felt he would never tire of it. He found himself in front of an inn. Raising his eyes he saw the inn sign, a pole from which hung a blue inn pennant bearing the words "Famous wines of the Yang-tze River." Attached to the carved eaves was a sign with three characters in the calligraphy of Su Dongpo: "The Yangtze Pavilion." He thought: "At home in Yuncheng I often heard about the wonderful Yangtze Pavilion in Jiangzhou. So this is it! Although I'm on my own here, it would be a pity to miss it. Why not go in by myself and have a drink or two?"
Beside the door were two red carved pillars and on them two white signs each with five characters: "Finest wine in the world, at the world's finest inn." He went upstairs and found himself a seat in an alcove beside the river. Leaning on the rail he looked around. It was indeed a fine inn, with a view that Song Jiang felt no amount of praise could do justice to. The waiter came upstairs and asked: "Are you waiting for someone sir, or are you by yourself?"
Song Jiang said: "I was expecting two people but they haven't come yet, so bring me a jug of good wine first. You can give me some side dishes and some meat too, but I don't want any fish. The waiter went downstairs with the order. Soon he returned with a tray and a jug of Blue Bridge Wind and Rain wine. He set out the dishes of vegetables and fresh fruit of the season, poured the wine, arranged some plates of fat mutton, tender chicken, marinated goose and prime beef all served on handsome red china. Song Jiang quietly appreciated all this, congratulating himself on his good fortune: "This kind of well-presented food and clean china is typical of all that's best in Jiangzhou. Although I'm sent here as a banished man, I have the opportunity to see some really fine scenery. We've got several famous mountains and ancient monuments at home, but nothing to compare with the prospect here."

Being all on his own, Song Jiang drank one cup after another, leaning on the rail and taking his ease, and he gradually became somewhat tipsy. Suddenly he was filled with melancholy: "I was born in Shandong, I grew up in Yuncheng, I come from an educated family, I have known many heroes of the rivers and lakes, but although I've gained a certain undeserved reputation, I am past thirty and have still achieved no lasting fame and gained no real profit, my cheeks are lined by care, and here I am now, a banished man. My father and younger brother remain at home, what chance have I of ever seeing them again?" Imperceptibly the wine mounted to his head, tears welled up in his eyes, as an overwhelming emotion took hold of him. Suddenly he felt inspired to write a poem. He asked the waiter for a brush and inkstone. After getting up and looking around him, he saw a whitewashed wall covered in previous customers' compositions. "Why not write it here?" he thought to himself. "If later I prosper, and if I pass this way and see it again, it will remind me of former times and today's bitterness." While the euphoria of drunkenness was still upon him, he ground some ink, loaded his brush and going over to the whitewashed wall wrote with a flourish:

I passed a studious youth,
But later learned discretion's worth.
Like a tiger lying in wait on the hill
With sheathed claws I bide my time.
At present I mourn my branded cheeks,
My banished state, here in Jiangzhou.
But the day of my revenge will come
And the banks of the Yangtze swim in blood.

When he'd finished and looked at what he'd written he was filled with pleasure and he drank several more cups, growing merrier by the moment. He became so excited that his hands began to dance and his feet to tap. He took up the brush again and went and wrote four more lines after the first poem:

My heart's in the north, my body in the south,
By this river I wander, wallowing in sighs.
My ambition's lofty as the clouds; if it succeeds,
I can scorn the most famous outlaws' deeds.

At the end of this he also wrote in big letters: "Song Jiang of Yuncheng wrote this." Then he threw the pen down on the table and recited it to himself. After drinking a few more cups he became really drunk. The wine had completely vanquished him. He called the waiter and asked for the bill. Taking out some silver he gave the waiter more than he owed and told him to keep the change. Then he marched out. Stumbling and swaying he made his way back to the camp. He opened the door of his room and collapsed on the bed, falling asleep at once and not waking till morning. When he awoke he had a hangover and remembered nothing of his poetic efforts at the Yangtze Pavilion the night before.

Now on the other bank of the river opposite Jiangzhou there was a town called Wuweijun, a somewhat desolate place. Here lived a retired official by the name of Huang Wenbing. This individual, although a scholar, was also a great proponent of flattery and servility; he was narrow-minded and prone to envy and spite. Those who were better than himself he would destroy, those who were inferior he ridiculed, and he delighted in offending the local people, who often referred to him as Bee Sting Huang or Bee Huang, for short. He knew that Governor Cai was the son of Grand Preceptor Cai at court and took every opportunity of buttering him up, crossing the river with great frequency to pay him visits, all in the hope of being recommended for a post, since he wanted to serve as an official again. Evidently Song Jiang was destined to be unfortunate, because he came up against this adversary.

One day this Huang Wenbing was sitting at home feeling bored. He decided to take two servants and go and buy some seasonal gifts. Next he took a fast boat across the river from his house and directed his steps towards the government offices, intending to pay Governor Cai a visit. Unfortunately an official dinner was in progress and he didn't like to go in. Returning to the boat, he found his people had moored it outside the Yangtze Pavilion. Since it was a warm day he decided to go and pass some time inside. He strolled in, and after looking around, took himself upstairs, where he remained leaning happily on the rail. There were a good many poems on the whitewashed wall, he observed. Some were quite good, but others were irregular and confused enough to arouse his contempt. When he came to Song Jiang's poem with the four additional lines, he received a shock: "This is seditious, if I'm not mistaken. Who could have written it?"

Then he saw Song Jiang's name at the end. He read the poem through again: " I passed a studious youth, But later I learned discretion's worth. This fellow has a pretty high opinion of his own value," he said to himself. " Like a tiger lying in wait on the hill, With sheathed claws I bide my time. The villain evidently has no regard for what is befitting his status. At present I mourn my branded cheeks, My banished state, here in Jiangzhou. But this is not some person of rank, it is evidently a convict! But the day of my revenge will come And the banks of the Yangtze swim in blood. On whom does the villain desire vengeance? He plans to stir up trouble here. What does he think he can achieve, if he's only a convict? My heart's in the north, my body in the south, By this river I wander, wallowing in sighs. These two lines at least are reasonable." When he came to " My ambition's lofty as the clouds; if it succeeds, I can scorn the most famous outlaws' deeds," he nodded to himself and said: "This is an unconscionable villain, he wants to outdo all the great outlaws. If that isn't sedition I don't know what is!" He read the name, "Song Jiang," again, and said: "I've heard that name somewhere. I believe it's some minor official or other."

He called the landlord over and asked: "Who exactly was the author of these two poems?"

"A geezer who came last night all on his own. He drank a whole bottle of wine and got roaring drunk and went and wrote all that."

"What was he like?"

"He had the golden seals on his cheeks, reckon he was one of them convicts from the prison."

"No doubt of it," said Huang Wenbing. He asked for a brush and inkstone, and copied the poems down on a piece of paper, which he put away. He told the landlord not to rub it out.

When he left the restaurant Huang Wenbing took the boat and went home to sleep. Next day after breakfast accompanied by a servant carrying a box with gifts he made his way to the government office. The governor had just adjourned the court and was in his residence. The servant went in to announce him and after a certain time Governor Cai sent a servant to take Huang into the inner hall. The governor now entered and after an exchange of small talk and the presentation of the gifts they both sat down. "I came across to see you yesterday, Your Excellency, but I found there was an official reception so I didn't like to intrude," Huang Wenbing respectfully explained. "I have come again today to pay my respects and assure you of my gratitude for all the favours you have shown me."

Governor Cai said: "But you're a friend and a colleague, there was nothing whatsoever to stop you coming in. I am afraid I have failed in hospitality."

The Governor's servants now brought tea. Huang Wenbing said: "May I make so bold as to ask, Your Excellency, if you have been vouchsafed any news of your gracious father?"

The Governor replied: "We did receive a letter from home the other day."

Huang Wenbing said: "And what is the news of the noble preceptor, if I may be permitted to inquire?"

"In his letter my papa writes that recently the court astrologers have reported to the Emperor that intensive study of the heavens has revealed an evil star, which is shining on the kingdoms of Wu and Chu. It appears that troublemakers are active in the region, and it is essential to investigate and suppress them. In addition children in the market-place have been heard singing a certain rhyme: 'The bane of our land are home and wood; water and work will do us no good. Thirty-six stand in a row, in Shandong rebellions grow.' My good papa accordingly warns me of the need to keep a tight rein on my province."

Huang Wenbing turned this over in his mind for a while and then said with satisfaction: "Your Excellency, this is not news to me." He took from his sleeve the poem that he had copied and presented it to the Governor, saying: "See what I have here!"

"This is seditious!" the Governor said when he had read it. "Where did you get hold of it?"

"Yesterday afternoon, when I did not want to intrude on you, I went back to the river and having nothing better to do I entered the Yangtze Pavilion to relax and escape the heat. I was looking at the poems customers had written when I saw this, which had been recently written on the whitewashed wall."

"Who do you think could have written it?"

"Your Excellency, the name is clearly written underneath. It says 'Song Jiang of Yuncheng wrote this'."

"I wonder who this Song Jiang is then?"

"He's written plainly enough, 'At present I mourn my branded cheeks, My banished state, here in Jiangzhou. He's obviously a prison inmate, one of the convicted criminals in the prison camp."

"I wonder what he's up to!"

"You must not neglect this. It's exactly as it said in your gracious father's letter. That rhyme the children were singing corresponds precisely to this man."

"How do you make that out?"

" 'The bane of our lan`d are home and wood.' The one who would lay waste our country's wealth and goods must have a name composed of the character for 'home' and the character for 'wood.' That's 'Song,' what could be clearer? The second line, 'water and work do us no good' points to one whose name has 'water' next to 'work,' obviously 'Jiang.' This fellow whose family name is Song, given name Jiang, writes seditious poems. As they say, 'Hear heaven's voice, let the people rejoice!'"

"But what do you make of 'Thirty-six stand in a row, in Shandong rebellions grow'?

"Either it's the year of the Emperor's reign, or it's some kind of magic number. As for 'in Shandong rebellions grow,' well, Yuncheng is in Shandong. This rhyme fits the facts in every particular."

"But is there such a person here?"

"When I asked the innkeeper yesterday he said this person had written the poem only the day before. It's a simple matter, we just need to check the list of prisoners, we'll soon see if he's on it or not."

"You think of everything, my friend," said the Governor, and ordered a servant to tell the prison registrar to bring him the prison records. When the records were brought from the registry, the Governor examined them himself and saw that the name Song Jiang of Yuncheng did indeed appear at the end, as a prisoner who arrived in the fifth month.

"It's our man in the rhyme!" Huang Wenbing cried. "This is serious! If you delay I fear the news will leak out. Better seize him at once and shove him in the lock-up. You can think what to do with him afterwards."

"You're absolutely right." said the Governor. He went into session at once and told an official to summon the prison superintendent immediately.

When the Magic Messenger had saluted, the Governor said: "Take some guards and go at once to the prison camp and arrest the criminal who has been writing seditious poems in the Yangtze Pavilion, a fellow called Song Jiang of Yuncheng, and bring him here. Do not lose a moment."

The Magic Messenger was horrified and lamented in his heart. As soon as he left the courtroom he went and sent all the gaolers home to fetch their weapons and told them to come to a meeting at his house next to the Temple of the City God. They all went off in different directions, while the Magic Messenger sped to the prison camp, using his magic walking, and burst into the copying room. Song Jiang was there when he pushed open the door, and seeing who it was hurriedly greeted him, saying: "The other day I went into town but I couldn't find you anywhere. Since you weren't in and I was bored, I went to the Yangtze Pavilion and drank a bottle of wine. I've been feeling dizzy for the last two days. I've still got the hangover."

"Brother, what's this you wrote on the wall there the other day?"

"Who remembers everything he does when he gets drunk?"

"The Governor just called me into the courtroom and told me to get plenty of guards and go and fetch Song Jiang, accused of writing a seditious poem at the Yangtze Pavilion. I'm to bring you before the court. It gave me quite a shock, I can tell you. For the moment I've got all the guards waiting at the Temple of the City God, so I could come and let you know first. What are we going to do? How are we going to get you out of this?"

Song Jiang hearing this scratched his head but could think of nothing. He could only lament. "This time I'm really done for!" he said.

"I'll tell you one possible way out dear brother, but I don't know if you'll like it. I daren't delay now, but before I come back with the others to arrest you, you must mess up your hair and smear excrement on the floor and fall down in it. You must pretend to be mad. When we come for you, rave and gibber as if you've gone clean out of your mind. I'll go back and tell the Governor about it."

"I'll gratefully follow your suggestion, brother, I just hope it works."

The Magic Messenger hurried off. He went to his house beside the Temple of the City God and told all the guards to hurry with him to the prison camp. Arriving there he shouted with deliberate fierceness: "Where is the new prisoner Song Jiang?"

What the chief of militia saw when he led his men into the copying room was Song Jiang with his hair in total disorder, rolling about in his own filth.

When he saw the Magic Messenger and the guards Song Jiang said: "Who the bloody hell are you?"

The Magic Messenger gave a calculated roar: "Seize the bastard!"

Rolling his eyes and wildly waving his arms, Song Jiang babbled: "I am the Jade Emperor's son-in-law. His Majesty has sent me here with a hundred thousand men to kill all of you Jiangzhou people, the King of Hell is in the vanguard and the Demon General in the rear. They gave me a silver seal weighing more than eight hundred catties to kill you scum."

The guards all said: "This is obviously a lunatic. What's the use of arresting him?"

"You're quite right," said the Magic Messenger. "We'd better go and report this. If they really want him we can always come back."

They all went with the Magic Messenger to the government offices where the Governor was awaiting them in the courtroom. They reported to the Governor as follows: "Evidently this Song Jiang is mad. He's covered in excrement and he doesn't even care, he's ranting and raving and he stinks to high heaven. We didn't like to bring him here."

Before the Governor had time to inquire further, Huang Wen-bing slipped out from behind the screen and said to him: "Don't believe it. The one who wrote the poems did not write like a madman. There's some deception here. Arrest him anyway. If he can't walk, then have him carried here."

"You're right," said the Governor. "Don't argue," he told the Magic Messenger, "just bring him!"

The Magic Messenger having received this order could only lament and return with the guards to the prison camp. He told Song Jiang: "Dear brother, things do not look good. I'm afraid you'll have to go." A bamboo cage was brought and in it Song Jiang was taken to the district court.

"Bring the felon here," the Governor ordered.

The guards forced Song Jiang in front of the bench, but he refused to kneel. He glared at Governor Cai and said: "Who the hell are you? How can you dare to question me! I am the son-in-law of the Jade Emperor and I have orders from His Majesty to bring an army of a hundred thousand troops to kill all you Jiangzhou people. The King of Hell is in the vanguard, the Demon General in the rear, and they've given me a silver seal weighing eight hundred catties. Let me go at once or you shall die for it!"

The Governor could not make head or tail of all this. But Huang Wenbing said: "Call the prison warders and ask them if this man was mad when he arrived, or whether he only recently became mad. If he was mad when he came, then it's genuine. But if he only recently became mad, he's a fake."

"That's a very good idea," said the Governor. He sent people to the prison camp, where the warders did not dare deceive him and had to say: "When this man arrived he did not seem to be mad, this madness seems to have appeared only recently."

The Governor was outraged. He ordered the gaolers to tie Song Jiang up and give him fifty lashes on the spot without pause. Song Jiang was beaten till he lost consciousness and was half way to nirvana. The skin was broken, wounds opened and the blood poured out. The Magic Messenger could only watch and lament and could think of no way to help him. At first Song Jiang continued to rave, but finally under the torment of the beating he confessed: "It was a mistake, I was drunk, the poem was a piece of foolishness, it has no meaning."

Having obtained this confession, the Governor imposed the twenty-five catty cangue of a condemned man and ordered Song Jiang to be locked up in the prison. He had been beaten till he could no longer walk. After the cangue was fitted he was thrown into a cell for condemned prisoners. The Magic Messenger did what he could to help by telling the gaolers to take great care of this prisoner. He also arranged food for Song Jiang. Of this no more.

When the court adjourned Governor Cai invited Huang Wen-bing into the residence to thank him. "If not for your perspicacity and far-sightedness," he said, "I was close to being deceived by that scoundrel."

Huang said: "Your Excellency, this business is still pressing. Quickly write a letter, to be delivered with all possible speed to the Grand Preceptor, informing him of everything, and pointing out how you are dealing with a matter of national import. And tell him at once that if he wants the prisoner alive a prison cart will be used to transfer him to the capital; but if he does not want him alive, given the very real danger of losing him en route, let him be beheaded right here, as an example to felons and to deter further disorders. When this is known at court it cannot fail to please."

"What you say makes good sense. When I write home I will commend your efforts and ask my father to petition the Emperor on your behalf for an appointment as governor of some wealthy district, so you may gain wealth and fame."

Huang thanked him. "I am deeply indebted to you, Your Excellency. I shall remain forever your faithful servant."

Having thus persuaded Governor Cai to write a letter home and put his seal on it, Huang Wenbing now asked: "Whom can you send with it that you trust?"

"I have a prison superintendent in my district called Dai Zong who can do what is known as magic walking, he can cover more than two hundred miles a day and still arrive early. If we get him to take it, he'll be there and back in around ten days."

"If he is really so fast, that's splendid, splendid!"

The Governor laid on wine in a back room, and entertained Huang Wenbing. Next day the latter bade the Governor farewell and returned to Wuweijun.

Governor Cai prepared two gift boxes and filled them with gold, pearls, jewels and other such pleasant things and placed his seals upon them. First thing next morning he summoned the Magic Messenger to the residence and said: "I have certain gifts and a letter which I want delivered to the Grand Preceptor's palace in the Eastern Capital to honour my father's birthday on the fifteenth of the sixth month. Since the date is so close, you are the only one who can get there in time. If you spare no effort, going without pause for sleep, and bring back the reply, I shall value your services most highly. Be assured that I have your future very much at heart. I have worked out how long it should take with your magic walking, and I shall await your return. Do not linger on the way or make any mistake."

The Magic Messenger could hardly refuse. He was obliged to take up the letter and the gift boxes and make his farewells. After making arrangements for the journey he went to the prison and said to Song Jiang: "Don't worry, brother, the Governor is sending me to the Grand Preceptor's but I'll be back within ten days. I can make some inquiries at the Preceptor's court and perhaps find a way to resolve your affair. I will leave the matter of your food in Iron Ox's hands. He will arrange for you to get it and won't let you go short. So just stay calm and resist for a few days."

"If you can just save my life that will be quite enough," said Song Jiang.

The Magic Messenger called Iron Ox and gave him his instructions there and then: "Our brother made the mistake of writing a seditious poem and has got a prison sentence for it. How it will end I don't know. I'm under orders from the Governor to go to the Eastern Capital, but I'll be back in a little while. I am making you responsible for bringing him his food, morning and evening. Be sure to look after him properly."

Iron Ox answered: "Why the hell should reciting a bloody poem be such a big deal? People can have led actual rebellions and they get promoted to important posts. But don't worry, you can go off to the Eastern Capital with an easy mind, no one in the prison will dare to interfere with him. If everyone behaves, all well and good. If they don't, I'll get my axe and behead the fuckers."

Before he left, the Magic Messenger again admonished him: "Take care, brother, don't indulge in wine and neglect our brother's meals. Don't go and get drunk and leave him to starve."

"Brother, set your mind at rest. If you're really so worried, I'll promise to give up drinking completely until the day you return. I'll stay in the prison and look after Song Jiang all the time, how's that?"

The Magic Messenger was very pleased with this. "If you're truly resolved to look after him well, that's fine." After the Magic Messenger had said goodbye that day and left, Iron Ox really did give up drinking and stayed all the time in the prison to look after Song Jiang, not straying by so much as a footstep from his post.

We will leave Iron Ox to look after Song Jiang and follow the Magic Messenger as he returns home, puts on new leggings and hemp shoes and an apricot yellow tunic, adjusts his belt and attaches his name tablet to it, dons a new headdress, puts the letter and travelling expenses away in the bag, slings the two gift boxes on a pole and leaves town. He has with him four of the special amulets for magic walking, two for each leg. He has only to intone the magic formula and magic walking will commence:

Like riding on mist he goes, like walking on air. Feet skimming the ground he soars over the mountains. One minute he's leaving a country town, the next he's passing a great city. Truly miraculous are the priceless magic amulets, with them a hundred leagues is as an inch before one's nose.

The day the Magic Messenger left Jiangzhou he travelled till nightfall before stopping at an inn to rest. He removed the amulets and burnt a quantity of paper gold as an offering. After a night's rest he was up early, partook of food and drink and left. He had tied on the four amulets again and was carrying the boxes on a pole. He set off at a grand pace, flying along with the sound of wind and rain in his ears, his feet not touching the ground. He planned to stop only for some vegetarian food and plain wine, or a few snacks. When night fell, he stopped at once and found an inn to rest in. Next day he was up at dawn to profit from the morning cool. On he went with his four amulets and the boxes on a pole. When he had done nearly a hundred miles, quite early in the morning, he looked about for a clean inn, but not one did he see. It was the beginning of the sixth month and so hot the sweat was pouring off him, he was completely drenched, and he was afraid of getting sunstroke. Also he was extremely hungry and thirsty. Then he saw in front of him, by the edge of a little wood, a most inviting inn, situated beside the water on the edge of a lake. He lost no time in approaching. It looked spotlessly clean and had places for twenty; the tables and benches were painted red and lined up along the windows. He entered with his carrying-pole and found a secluded seat. He put down the boxes, took off the shoulder strap, and sprinkled his yellow tunic with water and hung it up to dry on the window rail. As soon as he sat down the waiter approached and said: "How much wine can I serve you, sir? And what would you like to eat with it? We've got pork, mutton or beef."

The Magic Messenger said: "I don't want a lot of wine, but bring me a spot of rice."

"As well as wine and rice we've got fresh bread and noodle soup."

"I won't eat meat. Have you got any vegetarian food?"

"I can find you some chilli tofu, how about that?"

"That'll do fine."

In no time at all the waiter had produced a bowl of tofu, served some dishes of vegetables and poured three big bowls of wine. Since the Magic Messenger was hungry and thirsty, he scoffed the wine and the tofu in one go and was about to ask for more rice when suddenly the whole world started to spin. His brain began to cloud, stars danced before his eyes, and he collapsed in a heap beside the bench. "He's gone!" the waiter cried, and a man immediately appeared from inside. This is what he was like:

His frame is big, his waist is small,
For guests he always has a smile.
This hero on Mount Liang they call
Zhu Gui the Dry Land Crocodile.

When the Crocodile entered, he said: "Take the boxes in, but first search him and see if he's carrying anything."

Two rascals hastened to do his bidding. When they searched the Magic Messenger they drew from an inner pocket a roll of paper containing a letter which they handed to the Crocodile. The Crocodile tore it open and saw that it was a personal letter because the envelope bore this message: "Hoping it finds you in peace, this letter carries respectful greetings, dear father, from your most obedient son Cai Dezhang." The Crocodile broke open the envelope and began to read. The letter began: "Having captured a certain Song Jiang of Shandong, author, as the popular rhyme foretells, of a seditious poem, and having closely confined him in prison for the time being, I now await your instructions ..."

For quite a while the Crocodile was struck dumb by the gravity of what he read. His assistants picked the Magic Messenger up and lugged him into the butcher shop to cut him up. But his belt was left beside the bench, with the red and green name tablet still attached to it. The Crocodile picked this up and examined it. Engraved on it in silver letters was: "Dai Zong, Chief Superintendent of the two prisons of Jiangzhou."

"Stop!" the Crocodile shouted to the assistants, "don't begin yet. I often heard the military leader say that in Jiangzhou there is a 'magic messenger' named Dai Zong who is his dearest friend. I wonder if this can be he? But why would he be carrying a letter so injurious to Song Jiang? Thank heavens this letter has fallen into our hands! Let's get the antidote and bring him round. There's a few answers I'd like to get from him."

His assistants mixed the antidote in some water. They supported the Magic Messenger's head and poured it into him. In a little while his eyebrows began to twitch and his eyes to flutter. Then with an effort he sat up. When he saw the Crocodile was holding the opened letter in his hand, he shouted: "Who the hell are you? How dare you knock me out with drugs! And how could you take it on yourself to break open a private letter to the Grand Preceptor? That is a most fearful crime!"

The Crocodile only laughed: "What does the fucking letter matter? So what if it's a letter to the Preceptor I've opened? As far as I'm concerned, a letter like this gives me a bone to pick with the Emperor himself."

The horrified Dai Zong asked: "Who are you, my friend? May I ask your name?"

"I've no call to hide or conceal it," he replied. "Zhu Gui, the Dry Land Crocodile, from the band of heroes on Mount Liang, that's me."

"Then if you are one of the leaders of Mount Liang, you must know 'Professor' Wu Yong?"

"'Professor' Wu Yong is our military leader, in charge of our army. How do you know him?"

"We are close friends."

"I suppose you're not by any chance the Magic Messenger of Jiangzhou, Superintendent Dai Zong, of whom our military leader has so often spoken?"

"I am he."

"But before Song Jiang went to his place of exile in Jiangzhou, he passed through our mountain stronghold and the Professor gave him a letter for you. So why do you now seek to undo Mr. Song and take his life?"

"Song Jiang and I are also close friends. Recently because he composed a seditious poem I was unable to save him from prosecution. Now I am on my way to the Preceptor's court where I hope to find some way of saving him. How could I possibly want to harm him?"

"If you don't believe me, take a look at this letter of Governor Cai's."

The Magic Messenger looked and got a shock. He told the Crocodile everything about the letter from the Professor and his first meeting with Song Jiang and how Song Jiang had got drunk in the Yangtze Pavilion and written that poem, with such unfortunate results. The Crocodile said: "In that case, you must please come to the mountain retreat and discuss with the leaders what to do, how we can save Song Jiang's life."

Having hurriedly ordered wine and food to be served in the Magic Messenger's honour, the Crocodile went to the water pavilion and loosed a signal arrow towards the opposite shore. In response to the signal, some soldiers quickly rowed over in a boat. The Crocodile and the Magic Messenger got into the boat with the boxes and were rowed across to Golden Sands Landing. When the Professor was informed at the camp he rushed down to receive them. Greeting the Magic Messenger, he courteously said: "It is long since we parted, what wind has blown you here? Please come up to our stronghold and meet all the leaders."

The Crocodile explained why the Magic Messenger had come and how Song Jiang had recently been sentenced. On hearing this, Chao Gai anxiously asked the Magic Messenger to take a seat and tell them what exactly Song Jiang had received such a sentence for. The Magic Messenger told them all about the affair of the seditious poem. Chao Gai was so upset by this that he wanted everyone immediately to saddle their horses and muster their men and go down to attack Jiangzhou and bring Song Jiang back.

But the Professor objected: "Not so fast, brother. Jiangzhou's a long way from here. With all those troops on the move we'd be certain to make a big stir and raise the alarm, with the gravest consequences for Song Jiang. We can't use just force in this matter, we must use our brains. Now I'm not very clever, and all I can devise is a simple plan, but with Superintendent Dai's assistance I think we can certainly save Song Jiang's life."

Chao Gai said: "Please tell us your plan, it's sure to be good."

"Governor Cai has sent Superintendent Dai with a letter to the capital. He is expected to bring back the Grand Preceptor's answer. Now this answer is our opportunity. We must forge an answer for the Superintendent to take back. The letter will say, 'On no account are you to take action against the criminal Song Jiang yourself. He must be sent under close guard to the capital. We will interrogate him to uncover all the facts, then execute him publicly in order to scotch the rumours.' When they bring him past here we will send troops down the mountain to seize him. How's that?"

"But suppose they don't pass this way? It could all go disastrously wrong!" Chao Gai objected.

Taoist Gongsun Sheng said: "That's all right. We can send out scouts far and wide, so that whichever route they take, we've only to wait and in the end we'll get him. I'm only afraid they might not send him."

Chao Gai said: "Very well then. But there isn't anyone who can write the letter in Preceptor Cai's calligraphy."

"I've already thought of that," said the Professor. "Nowadays four schools of calligraphy are flourishing: Su Dongpo's, Huang Luzhi's, Mi Yuanzhang's, and the Grand Preceptor Cai Jing's. These four, Su, Huang, Mi and Cai are the four greats of the Song Dynasty. Now I am acquainted with a certain bachelor in Jizhou, by name Xiao Rang, whom everyone calls Magic Hand, because he is able to reproduce all the famous calligraphers' styles. He is in addition quite adept with the spear and the staff, and knows how to thrust and parry with a blade. I am sure he can do the Grand Preceptor's writing. Why don't we send Superintendent Dai to speak to him and say, 'The Temple of the Peaks in Tai'an wants an inscription done, they're sending you this payment in advance of fifty taels of silver for your family's expenses,' and then get him to come. Afterwards we can send people to bring all his family up the mountain so we can persuade him to join our company. How about that?"

Chao Gai said: "He can write the letter, that's all right, but we'll need a seal as well, to stamp it."

"There's another friend of mine, I've got it all worked out. This one is also a native of central China, living in Jizhou. His name is Jin Dajian, he's a great stone-carver and he makes beautiful seals and jade carvings. He also knows how to use a staff. He's such a wonderful carver of jade that everyone knows him simply as the Craftsman. We'll send another fifty taels to persuade him to come and do the carving. While he's on the way, we'll carry out the same plan. We can use both of these men in the stronghold."

Chao Gai said: "That's brilliant!"

After a banquet that day in honour of the Magic Messenger they all went to bed.

Next day after breakfast the Magic Messenger was asked to dress up as the abbot of a monastery. Carrying a few hundred tales of silver, he tied on his amulets and descended the mountain. He was ferried across from Golden Sands Landing to the other bank and set off at speed for Jizhou. In under four hours he reached the city and began asking for Magic Hand Xiao Rang. Someone told him: "His house is by the Confucian temple to the east of the government offices."

When the Magic Messenger arrived at the door, he gave a cough and asked: "Is Master Xiao at home?" A scholarly-looking gentleman emerged. Not knowing who the Magic Messenger was, he asked: "What is it, father? What can I do for you?"

After a courteous greeting, the Magic Messenger said: "I am abbot of the monastery of the Temple of the Peaks in Tai'an. We are engaged in repairing the Five Peaks Tower and the rich men of our district want to have a tablet inscribed. They have entrusted me with the mission of presenting this silver to you, fifty taels in remuneration for your services, and asking you to be so good as to accompany me to the temple to carry out the work. The day is chosen, it brooks no delay."

Magic Hand said: "All I can do is to write the pattern, nothing else. If you want to set up a tablet you need an engraver as well."

"I have another fifty taels of silver here and it is my intention to ask Jin Dajian, the Craftsman, to do the engraving. We have found an excellent day for it, I do hope you will agree. If you can help me find the Craftsman, we will all go together."

Magic Hand took the silver and went with the Magic Messenger to seek the Craftsman. When they arrived at the Confucian temple, Magic Hand suddenly pointed: "That fellow coming towards us is the Craftsman, Jin Dajian." Magic Hand stopped him and introduced him to the Magic Messenger, explaining about the Tai'an temple and the repair of the Five Peaks Tower, and the rich people wanting a tablet, and how the abbot had fifty taels of silver for each of them if they went along with him. Jin Dajian was impressed by the silver. The two of them invited the Magic Messenger to have a cup of wine and some side dishes with them in a local hostelry. The Magic Messenger handed over the silver to the Craftsman and said: "The fortune-teller has fixed the day, I would like you to get going right away."

"The weather's very hot," said Magic Hand. "If we start now we won't get very far and we may not even find somewhere to spend the night. It would be better to get up at dawn tomorrow and take ourselves off then."

"I'll second that," said the Craftsman.

So they agreed to get an early start next day and went home to pack their things in readiness. Magic Hand invited the Magic Messenger to spend the night with him.

Next day at dawn the Craftsman appeared with his luggage and the three of them set off together. When they had gone less than three miles, the Magic Messenger said: "You keep going at your own pace, I don't want to hurry you. I'll go on ahead to tell the leaders so they'll be ready to receive you." With this he quickened his pace and raced on in front. The other two, with their luggage, proceeded quite slowly. In the early afternoon, when they had done some twenty miles or so, they suddenly heard a wild whistle and a band of men came leaping down the hillside. There were around fifty of them and they were led by Short-Arse Wang of Windy Mountain, who roared out: "You two, who are you and where are you heading? Catch 'em boys, we'll have their hearts to eat with our wine."

"We're only two craftsmen going to engrave a tablet for the Tai'an temple, we haven't a penny of our own, all we've got is some clothes."

"I don't want your money or your clothes," said Short-Arse. "All I want from a pair of clever dicks like you is your hearts and livers to eat with wine."

Thus beset, Magic Hand and the Craftsman had to summon up their courage, raise their staves and charge him. Short-Arse likewise raised his halberd and attacked. Wielding their various weapons they had fought out half a dozen bouts when Short-Arse suddenly turned about and left. They were about to give chase when they heard a sound of gongs on the mountain and from the left appeared the Door-God in the Clouds, Song Wan, and from the right Skyscraper Du Qian, followed by Whitey Zheng. Each was accompanied by thirty troops. They immediately seized Magic Hand and the Craftsman and dragged them into the forest.

"Don't be afraid," they said. "We are under orders from Leader Chao to invite you to come and join our band on the mountain."

Magic Hand said: "What does the mountain stronghold want us for? We haven't the strength to tie up a chicken, all we're good for is eating up rice."

The Skyscraper said: "General Wu knows you. Also he knows about your valour and martial skills. The Magic Messenger was sent specially to get you."

They looked at each other in amazement, uncertain what to say. But by now they had reached the Crocodile's inn, where everyone was provided with wine and food, and the same night a boat was summoned and they were taken up the mountain. When they reached the stronghold they met Chao Gai, the Professor and all the other leaders. A banquet was held and they were told about the forging of Cai Jing's reply — "That's why we invited you to come and join our company."

When they heard this they each put a restraining hand on the Professor's sleeve and said: "Wecould stay here, that's no problem, but we've both got our families at home to think of, when the authorities find out they'll make them suffer."

The Professor said: "There's no need for you to worry about that. Tomorrow you'll see why." The rest of the evening was given up to eating and drinking.

First thing next morning a soldier came and announced: "They're all here."

The Professor said to Magic Hand and the Craftsman: "Please come and personally receive your families." They didn't know whether to believe him or not. Halfway down the mountain they met a number of sedan chairs carrying their families up — everyone was there, young and old. Magic Hand and the Craftsman were amazed and asked them what exactly had happened. They all said: "After you left yesterday, these people came with the sedan chairs and said you were at an inn outside the city and had caught a fever. They wanted us to come with the whole family to save you. Once we left the city they wouldn't let us get out of the chairs. They just brought us straight here." Both families told exactly the same story. Magic Hand and the Craftsman kept quiet after that and resolved to return up the mountain and join the band. Two dwellings were prepared for their families. The Professor then asked them to join him and discussed with Magic Hand the writing of the reply in Cai Jing's handwriting which was going to save Song Jiang's life. The Craftsman said: "I have carved every seal of the Grand Preceptor's, both with his official name and his personal name." The two of them set to work and produced the letter. After this there was a banquet, and then the Magic Messenger was sent off on his journey, having been told exactly what to do. The Magic Messenger said his farewells and went down the mountain. The soldiers rowed him across from Golden Sands Landing to the Crocodile's inn. There he tied on his four amulets, said goodbye to the Crocodile and set off.

After the Professor had seen the Magic Messenger off at the ferry, he returned with the others and they had a big dinner. But just as they were drinking, he suddenly uttered a loud despairing cry. The other leaders asked: "What ever is the matter, general?"

"You just can't imagine! That letter of mine has signed the Magic Messenger's and Song Jiang's death warrants!"

Horrified, they asked: "But what is wrong with your letter?"

"I couldn't see the wood for the trees! It contains a fatal flaw!"

Magic Hand said: "I copied the Grand Preceptor's hand perfectly, not a word was wrong. Where is the fault?"

The Craftsman also said: "I'm sure my carving was perfect, not a single slip, so what's this fatal flaw you're talking about?"

The Professor joined his fingers and explained the mistake. Without this mistake, how would we have seen that:

In Jiangzhou town, the heroes create turmoil,
In White Dragon temple, the pot starts to boil.

Nor would it have been the case that:

Amid a storm of arrows men flee for their lives,
From the midst of a forest of weapons, a hero is saved.

WHEN Li Kui had knocked the girl down the innkeeper said, "Well, what are you four men going to do?" He also told the waiter to blow some water on the girl's face. This done the girl came out of her faint, and got up. They then saw that the skin on her forehead showed a scar. Her father and mother had now arrived on the scene, but when they knew that this had been done by Li Kui the "Black Whirlwind," the were afraid to say a word. The mother took a handkerchief and tied it round the girl's head. She picked up her hairpin which had fallen to the ground.

"What is your name?" asked Song Jiang.

The mother replied, "I will tell you the truth, sir. Our name is Song, and we come from the capital. We have no son, and only this daughter whose personal name is Yulian. Her father taught her singing, and then told her to come to this pavilion to sing to the guests, and so earn a little money. She is quite untrained and sometimes sings when the guests are talking. Today this occurred, and this gentleman's hand slipped so that she got hurt. But that is only a small affair, and is not worth bringing into court."

Song Jiang saw that she was speaking in a conciliatory manner, and said, "If you will come with me to my lodging I will give you twenty taels of silver as compensation. You can then find a husband for her so that she need not depend on her singing for a living."

"We did not expect so much," replied the parents.

"What I say is final," said Song Jiang. "My words have not a double meaning. You tell your husband to come with us, and I will give him the money."

"Your succoring us in this way fills us with deep gratitude," replied the parents.

Dai Zong spoke to Li Kui, "You are always querulous and now you have caused our elder brother here to spend a lot of money."

"I did not use much force with my finger," said Li Kui, "she tumbled down herself. You can see for yourself how delicate she is. If you hit me in the face with your fist a hundred times it would have no effect on me."
Song Jiang and all the bystanders laughed at this. Zhang Shun told the waiter that he would pay the bill for the wine, etc. supplied. "Never mind!" said the waiter. "That does not matter."
"But I asked you gentlemen to come here and dine with me," said Song Jiang, "and I cannot agree to your paying the bill."
"It is seldom that we meet you," said Zhang Shun. "When you lived in Shandong we often talked of going there to see you. Today fortune has brought about this gathering, and if I pay, that will only be a very small part of what I think is due to you."
"Sir," said Dai Zong, "as our brother, Zhang Shun, appears to be determined I suggest that you give way to him in this case."
"If he pays today then I must invite him some other day to dine with me," said Song Jiang.
Zhang Shun was much pleased at this. Picking up two of the fresh carp he and the others and the old man Song, accompanied Song Jiang to his lodgings in the city where they all sat down. Song Jiang took the twenty taels of silver, and gave them to old man Song who expressed his thanks and departed. Song Jiang also took the letter out of his baggage, and handed it to Zhang Shun who also then departed. He also took fifty taels of silver and presented these to Li Kui who then left with Dai Zong.
Song Jiang presented one of the carp to the warden, and had one cooked for himself. He found the fish nice eating and took a lot of it. In the night about 3 A.M. he had pains in the stomach, and was seized with violent diarrhea and vomiting. He was soon rendered extremely weak. He had the sympathy of the jailers who came, and offered him bowls of rice congee.
The next day Zhang Shun wished to show his gratitude to Song Jiang for the letter he had received, so he got two more fresh carp to present to Song Jiang. But when he reached the prison he found Song Jiang lying on the bed unable to get up. He decided to go and fetch a doctor at once, but Song Jiang said that it was only caused through eating too much fish, and said he would soon be better if Zhang Shun would get for him some diarrhea medicine called "Liu He Tang." He asked him to take the fish away and present them to the warden and the head turnkey Zhao. Zhang Shun did this, and, when he returned with the medicine he gave it to Song Jiang and then left. In the prison was a man who knew how to make up medicines, and he administered the drugs.
The following day Dai Zong and Li Kui brought some meat to the prison for Song Jiang who had recovered, but was not yet strong enough to take meat. They stayed with him till the evening, and then departed.
It took Song Jiang about a week to recover his strength, and then as he felt quite better he decided to go into the town to see Dai Zong.
For a whole day nobody had been to the prison to visit him. So, soon after breakfast he took some money, locked the door of his lodging, and left the prison sauntering slowly. Upon reaching the vicinity of the yamen he began to ask passers-by where Dai Zong lived. One man told him that Dai Zong had no home, but he often stayed at the Goddess of Mercy Guanyin Monastery near the City God Temple. Upon reaching that place however he found his door locked.
So he asked bystanders where Li Kui, the "Black Whirlwind," lived. They said that he also had no fixed residence, but sometimes could be found in the prison. He was often moving about—two days in the eastern side, and then for some time on the west side.
He then inquired for Zhang Shun, the wholesale fish dealer, and they said that he lived in some village, and he only came to the wharf when there was fish to sell and only came into the town when he wanted to collect some accounts.
As Song Jiang could not find anyone he knew he continued his walk, and went outside the town. He admired the views of the river, and he came at last to an inn on the river's bank, which had a blue flag flying from a pole with the characters, "Xunyang River View Point." Under the eaves was a board with three characters, "Xunyang Pavilion," written by the great poet Su Dongpo. Song Jiang remembered that at home he had heard of this pavilion, but did not know that it was in such a place. As he was there by himself he decided to step inside, and have a look at it. When he got to the door he saw two white boards hanging from the red pillars with these inscriptions: "Nowhere is there wine equal to ours; our inn is famous everywhere." He went upstairs, and found a room overlooking the river. The view of the river from the veranda was very fine.
The waiter came and asked, "Will you wait for some other guest, or will you drink wine by yourself?"
Song Jiang told him he would not wait, and that he could bring wine and food, but no fish. The waiter soon returned with Lanqiao fine wine and food. Song Jiang was highly pleased with the fine refreshments supplied. He was glad that he had found such a place in such ideal surroundings—it was worth being banished to such a spot for a few years. In Shandong they had fine old mountains, but nothing could equal to this. He drank and ate by himself, and was not aware that he was nearly drunk. He soliloquized, "I am from Yuncheng County in Shandong, and although a clerk I have met some fine men on my travels. Though I have a good name everywhere, yet now I am over thirty years of age and yet I have not made a glorious record. But branded as a criminal and banished here how can I meet my father and my younger brother who are now at home."
The wine now began to take effect, and he began to weep. The more he thought of his affairs the more he felt aggrieved. All at once he felt inclined to write an epic so he asked the waiter to bring a brush and ink slab. He looked round and saw that the whitewashed walls of the room were already well covered with inscriptions. He thought "Why should I not add my little quota? I will put the date down as well, and then when I come here again on some future occasion I shall realize what trouble I passed through at this moment." So he rubbed the ink on the slab, and wetting his brush he wrote on the white wall as follows:

In youth I studied hard the classics old,
As old I grew I fixed my mind intense,
Now like a tiger bold I hide in hole,
And lie with tooth and claw to wait my chance.
My face was branded as a criminal,
And then to Jiangzhou I was banished,
But soon the tide will turn; I'll have revenge,
And stain this spot with enemies blood galore.

When he had finished this and reread it, he was much pleased with the result, and laughed loudly. He was partly drunk, and gesticulated with his arms. He again picked up the brush, and added the following lines:

My body is in Wu; but heart in Shandong;
I float on sea and river like a weed;
I laugh at rebels bold whose fame is unsung,
For they just failed where I'll succeed.

Written by SONG JIANG OF YUNCHENG COUNTY
Placing the pen on the table he read aloud the whole thing. He drank more wine, and became quite drunk. He summoned the waiter, and paid the bill, and then staggered off downstairs. He reached his quarters in the prison, and throwing himself on the bed slept there until about 5 A.M. the next day. When he awoke from his drunken sleep he did not remember what he had written the previous day. He however felt the effects of his drunken carouse, and therefore did not go out that evening.
On the opposite bank to Jiangzhou was a wild and uncultivated country in which there was a town called Wuweijun. In this town there lived an expectant magistrate named Huang Wenbing who although a well-read man was a cringing fellow. He had a mean heart, and was envious of men who had got better official apointments. He tried to injure the successful ones, and treated with scorn the unfortunate ones. He acted in this way particularly in his own village.
He had heard that the Prefect Cai Jiu was a son of Prime Minister Cai, and therefore he frequently crossed the river to visit the Prefect, and made presents on the least pretext, in the hope that eventually he would be given a better official post. It was very unfortunate that Song Jiang should have this mean fellow as an opponent. It happened that Huang Wenbing had that day purchased a present for the Prefect, and crossed the river with it. When he reached the yamen he found that the Prefect was giving a feast to some officials so that he could not enter. He returned to his boat which was moored close to the Xunyang Pavilion. As it was a very hot day he went into the inn to rest a while. Going upstairs he went on the veranda to enjoy the view. Turning round he noticed the walls of the room covered with verses some of which were quite good, and some rather absurd which made him laugh. When, however, he happened to read the verses bearing the name of Song Jiang he was startled and thought, "Is that not rebellious? Who has written it?" He then saw the name of the author, and sneered, "This fellow is very vain, and has also ambitious ideas. He is a low mean fellow, and is evidently also a criminal. Who can be his enemy on whom he wishes to have revenge? He evidently thinks of making trouble here although he is only a useless criminal. As he is evidently banished and away from home, he could accomplish nothing." But when he read the last two lines he put out his tongue in disgust, wagged his head and said, "The fellow has no decency. He is evidently a rebel. But surely I have heard of that name Song Jiang before this." He summoned the waiter and asked him who had written the verses.
The waiter informed him that they had been written by a man who came there yesterday, and drank some wine.
"What kind of man was he?"
"He was branded on the face," replied the waiter, "and evidently resides in the prison. He had a sallow complexion; was not tall, and was rather stout."
Huang Wenbing asked for a brush and paper, and upon these being supplied he copied the verses down. He told the waiter that the verses must not be rubbed off the wall. He then went on his boat, and slept there for the night.
After breakfast the next day he got a man to carry his presents, and went to the Prefect's yamen again. He was told by the servant to wait in a room, and very soon the Prefect entered. After exchanging greetings, the prefect accepted the presents; and they both sat down.
Huang Wenbing then explained how he had come to visit the Prefect the previous day, but had retired on hearing that the Prefect was giving a feast.
The Prefect said this ought not to have stood in the way of Huang Wenbing joining him seeing that they were friends. The Prefect then said, "A letter has come from the capital stating that recently the Imperial Astrologer has examined the skies, and reports that the Dipper indicates that in the lands of Wu and Zhu there is a man who is going to create a rebellion. It is important that a careful watch should be kept for the man. It has also been reported to me that little boys on the streets in this town are always repeating these sentences:
"The country will be destroyed because in the home, there is wood.
"The war was caused by drops of water beside the work.
"There will be thirty-six in both directions, and they will create disorder in Shandong."
(A pun on words Song Jiang; "in the home there is wood" refers to the Chinese character for "Song," meaning "pine." The ideogram for "Song" depicts a tree, the character for "wood" under a roof. "Drops of water beside work" is a pun on the word "Jiang" or "river," the Chinese character depicting three drops of water beside the character for "work." "Thirty-six" is a reference to the "36 Heavenly Spirits," a subdivision of the "108 Stars of Destiny," the heroes of mount Liang Marsh.)
"Because of all this I have instructed all officials to be on their guard."
Huang Wenbing thought in silence a little time and then laughed, "Sir, there is nothing accidental in this." Taking the verses out of his sleeve he handed them to the prefect and said, "I did not expect to find the matter contained in these verses."
The Prefect read the document and said, "These are seditious verses. Where did you get them?"
Huang Wenbing explained how he had happened to notice them on the wall of the Xunyang Pavilion.
"But what kind of man can have written them?"
"Sir, it is clearly stated that the verses were written by Song Jiang of Yuncheng County."
"But who is Song Jiang?" asked the Prefect.
"In the verses he states that his face has been branded, and that he was banished to this place. So that he must be a prisoner here."
"In that case he cannot do any serious thing," said the prefect.
"Sir, you should not treat such man too lightly. In view of the letter received from the capital mentioning the strange rumors, it is clear that this man is the one referred to."
"Why do you think that he is the man?" asked the Prefect.
Huang Wenbing then explained the meaning of the riddle as heard on the streets. "It is quite clear that he is the person referred to, and in the interests of peace and order he should be dealt with."
"Do you know that there is such a man here?"
"The waiter at the inn said that he was there two days ago," said Huang Wenbing. "If you look through the register of the prison here you will soon know whether such a man is there or not."
"Your suggestion is very valuable and to the point," said the Prefect. He sent a messenger at once to bring the register from the prison, and when it arrived he looked through it carefully. He soon found the entry that Song Jiang had recently arrived.
"That is the man," said Huang Wenbing, "and besides writing the seditious verse, he is the man also referred to in the riddle. It is a serious matter. If you do not act at once the news may leak out, and so your plans may be defeated. You had better get this man arrested and imprisoned and meanwhile you can decide what to do."
"What you say is quite true," said the Prefect. He then sent for the head jailer, and very soon Dai Zong entered. He then ordered him to have Song Jiang brought there immediately.
Dai Zong was astonished at this order, and knew that it meant trouble. He went, and got soldiers armed and ordered them to assemble at his own quarters in the City God Temple. He then used his dodge of quick traveling, entered the prison, pushed open the door of the clerk office, and found Song Jiang inside.
Song Jiang said, "A few days ago I went into the city, but could not find you anywhere. So I went to the Xunyang Pavilion, and drank a bottle of wine all by myself. Since then I have stayed indoors to recover from the effects of the wine."
"Elder brother," asked Dai Zong, "what did you write there?"
"How can I remember what I wrote when I was drunk?"
"I have just been summoned to the Prefect who told me to bring to him the prisoner Song Jiang who wrote those seditious verses in the Xunyang Pavilion. I was astonished to hear this. I summoned my soldiers to my own quarters, and then rushed here to warn you. Now what shall we do? What can I do to save your life?"
Song Jiang scratched his head as he realized the danger. "This time I shall be killed."
"I will tell you a plan," said Dai Zong. "I cannot stay here any longer, as men will soon come for you. So unloosen your hair, tumble about on the ground covered all over with night-soil, and pretend to be mad. When I come with the soldiers you can ramble in talk like a lunatic, and I will then leave you alone, and report to the Prefect that you are in a mad fit."
"Many thanks for your good advice," said Song Jiang. "I do hope that you will assist me in carrying it through."
Dai Zong hurriedly took his leave, and upon arriving at the City God Temple he ordered the soldiers already assembled there to follow him to the prison. When they got there Dai Zong with an assumed voice called out, "Where is that newly arrived prisoner Song Jiang?" The jailer took them all to Song Jiang's lodging where they found the latter lying on the floor in his own night-soil, with his hair all streaming loose. When he saw the soldiers he asked, "Who are you pricks?"
Dai Zong shouted at the top of his voice, "Seize that fellow!" Song Jiang gazed upwards, and showed the white of his eyes. He struck out with his hand, and spoke in a confounded manner, "I am the son-in-law of the Heavenly Jade Emperor, and he told me to lead a hundred thousand troops to Jiangzhou and kill all the people here. The King Yama is my advance guard, and in my rear are the Five Great Generals. He gave me a golden seal weighing eight hundred jin. I will kill the whole lot of you fellows."
The jailer said, "He is quite mad. What is the use of trying to arrest him?"
"That is so," said Dai Zong. "I will go back and report the matter. If they insist upon seeing him then I will return here."
The soldiers accompanied Dai Zong to the yamen where they found the Prefect waiting for them. Dai Zong reported to the Prefect, "The prisoner Song Jiang has gone quite mad. He rambles in his speech, and lies on the floor with his body and clothes covered all over with night-soil so I thought it better not to bring him here in that disgraceful condition."
The Prefect was just on the point of cross-examining Dai Zong when Huang Wenbing emerged from a screen behind the Prefect's seat where he had been hiding and listening. He said, "Sir, do not listen to this. The man who wrote those verses is by no means mad. There must be a subtle trick in this affair. Better have him brought here in whatever state he is. Even if he cannot walk he may get somebody to carry him along."
"What you say is quite sensible," said the Prefect. He then told Dai Zong that he must bring the man whether mad or otherwise.
When Dai Zong received such definite orders he knew that it meant trouble. He took his men off to Song Jiang's quarters where he spoke, "Brother, our plan has failed. You must come with me." A bamboo basket was brought in; Song Jiang was lifted inside, and in this way was carried on the shoulders of the men into the hall where the prefect was waiting.
The Prefect told them to produce the prisoner, and the men took him out of the basket, and placed him in front of the bench. They told Song Jiang to kneel, but instead he stared at the Prefect and asked, "Who are you, and what do you want to ask me about? I am the son-in-law of the Jade Emperor and supporting me are the Five Great Generals. My father-in-law has sent me to take the lives of the people of Jiangzhou. The King Yama is my advance guard. My seal weighs eight hundred jin. You had better get out of my way as very soon I shall kill you all."
The Prefect was nonplused at this, but Huang Wenbing interposed, "Let us send for the jailer, and ask him whether this prisoner was mad when he arrived. If he was mad when he first came then it is genuine, but if he is only recently mad it must be pretended madness."
The Prefect agreed to this, and sent for the jailer and also the turnkey. When they arrived he warned them to tell him the truth.
The jailer replied that when the prisoner arrived he was not mad, but he became mad that very day.
The Prefect was angry at this, and told the soldiers to bind the prisoner, and give him fifty blows with the bamboo. This they did, and Song Jiang's flesh was broken, and was covered with blood. Dai Zong had to watch all this with a sore heart, but could do nothing to save his friend. Song Jiang stood this for some time, but at last could no longer endure the pain. He confessed, "I ought not to have written those seditious verses when I was drunk."
The Prefect wrote this confession down, and ordered that an extra large cangue should be fastened round the prisoner's neck, and that he be sent back to prison. This was done, and Dai Zong had to give orders to the jailers to take special care of the prisoner.
The Prefect retired from the bench, and was accompanied by Huang Wenbing to his private quarters. There he said, "Had it not been for your valuable suggestion I should have been deceived by that fellow."
"Sir, this kind of case should be quickly settled," said Huang Wenbing. "You should immediately write a report of the case, and send it forthwith to your father at the capital, so that they will see how well you handled the Emperor's affairs. With that dispatch you can send a private note stating that if they wish to spare his life you can send him by cart to the capital. But as you are afraid that he might be rescued on the way you could have him executed here if they do not want to spare his life. That will put an end to the danger. When the Emperor hears of how you have dealt with the case he will be extremely pleased."
"What you say is very reasonable," said the prefect. "In my dispatch I will mention what valuable assistance I got from you, and recommend you for a good post."
"I have to depend on your influence for this life," said Huang Wenbing, "and in some future life I am willing to be a beast at your disposal in order to return your great favor. Huang Wenbing stayed while the Prefect wrote the dispatches and sealed them. He then asked the Prefect, "Who is the confidential servant that will take this dispatch?"

"Here we have the best messenger Dai Zong, the Divine Traveler, who can travel about two hundred fifty li a day, I will send him off early tomorrow morning, and he will be back in ten days."
"If he can go so quickly that will do very well," replied Huang Wenbing.
They then adjourned to another room where the Prefect entertained Huang Wenbing to some wine. The following day the latter returned home.
Early the next day the Prefect packed up a few presents, and sealed the package with labels of paper. He then summoned Dai Zong and said, "I want you to take these dispatches and presents to my father, the Prime Minister, at the Eastern Capital, and convey my congratulations for his birthday on the fifteenth day of the sixth month. As that date is so near I want you to get there with all speed, and travel day and night. When my father writes his reply you must bring it here also as quickly as possible. I am aware of the rapidity of your flight, and I shall await your return with great expectation, so do not loiter on the way."
Dai Zong dared not raise any objection to this, so he received the packages, saluted, and withdrew to his quarters. He then went to the prison, and saw Song Jiang. "Elder brother, be at ease. The prefect is sending me to the Eastern Capital (Kaifeng), but I shall be back within ten days. When I am at the capital I will arrange some means of helping you. I will tell Li Kui to bring you rice every day so that you will not be short of food. So please be patient for a few days more."
"I am much indebted to you for saving my life," said Song Jiang.
Dai Zong found Li Kui, and told him, "Our elder brother wrote some seditious verses, and we do not yet know what the government judgment will be. I am now going to the Eastern Capital, and will soon be back. You must look after the rice for Song Jiang, and take it to him yourself at all mealtimes."
"That is not a serious matter," said Li Kui. "What's the damned difference? Many traitors have become officials. You go with an easy mind, as nobody in the prison here will make any trouble. If anybody attempts to create trouble for him I will chop his damned head off with my axe."
When Dai Zong was on the point of departing he said to Li Kui, "Now, younger brother, take care. Keep off the wine, and avoid omissions of the rice. If you get drunk your elder brother will be hungry."
"You go with an unembarrassed mind," said Li Kui. "If you doubt me then I will not touch a drop of wine till you come back. I will wait upon Song Jiang in the prison from morning till night."
Dai Zong was much pleased at this. "Younger brother, it is very good of you to say that." He then departed.
Li Kui kept his word, and not only abstained from wine, but also waited closely upon Song Jiang.
Dai Zong put on his puttees, and hempen shoes. He wore also a yellow shirt and a cummerbund, and hid the dispatches in the latter. He changed his turban, and carrying the two wicker baskets of presents on his shoulder he left the city. There he put on his charmed puttees, and chanted the magical spell as he rushed off along the road at a great speed. That evening he stopped at an inn to rest, and offered some paper joss money. He slept there that night. He started off again the next morning in the same way. He traveled at such a speed that a violent storm seemed to keep roaring in his ears. His feet scarce touched the ground. On the way he stopped occasionally to get a little food and wine at the inns. The second day was like the first. On the third day he had started very early, and had covered about a hundred li by about 10 A.M. He felt hungry, but could not find an inn to rest. It was the sixth month and the middle of summer, and he was perspiring freely in the heat of the sun. All his clothing was wet with his perspiration, and he was afraid of getting a sunstroke. Just as he was feeling very hungry and tired he espied on the side of the road a small inn situated between a forest and a lake. Almost immediately, he arrived at the inn and saw that it was very clean, with about twenty tables all newly varnished, and windows wide open on all sides. He entered, took a seat at a table, took a cup of cold water, and rinsed out his mouth. He took off his gear, the wicker baskets from his shoulders, his cummerbund containing the dispatches, and placed them on the table. He took off his wet yellow shirt, and hung it in an open window.
When the waiter came he asked Dai Zong how much wine and food he wanted.
"I don't want much wine," said Dai Zong, "but enough rice for one person."
"We also have buns and vermicelli," said the waiter.
"I am a vegetarian. What kind of vegetable soup have you got?"
"We have some bean curd nicely flavored with chilli."
"That will be fine," said Dai Zong.
The waiter retired and very soon had the food and wine served and placed on the table. Dai Zong soon finished what had been supplied as he was both hungry and thirsty. Soon after he felt very dizzy, lost consciousness, and fell to the ground.
The waiter seeing this called out, "He has fallen!" and a man came out of the room at the back. He was Zhu Gui, the "Dry Land Crocodile," of Liangshan Marsh. He said, "Take the wicker baskets into the other room, and then search his clothing." Two men then appeared and searched Dai Zong's clothing. They soon found the dispatches hidden in the cummerbund, and took these to Zhu Gui. He read the inscription, and found that it was written by the Prefect to his father. He opened the envelope, and read the dispatch. "We have arrested Song Jiang of Shandong who wrote seditious verses. We have him in prison awaiting your decision."
On reading this he was so astonished that he could not speak. The men had now carried Dai Zong into another room to be killed and there they found on him a wooden tabled warrant. Zhu Gui seized it and saw that the characters were in silver as follows: "Dai Zong, head jailer of the Prison, at Jiangzhou."
When Zhu Gui read this he told the men to leave Dai Zong alone. He remembered that the teacher of the bandits at Liangshan Marsh had often said that he had a close friend at Jiangzhou named Dai Zong. "Could this be the man? But how is it that he has this letter about Song Jiang? I have been favored by Heaven in getting hold of this letter."
He called one of his men, and told him to administer an antidote to enable Dai Zong to recover. This was done, and the mixture was poured down Dai Zong's throat. In a short time he opened his eyes, and got up. When he saw the letter in Zhu Gui's hand he shouted angrily, "Who are you? What courage you have! You drugged my wine, and made me asleep. You opened the Prefect's letter. Your crime is a serious one."
Zhu Gui laughed and said, "This damned letter is nothing! What's opening the Prime Minister's letter to a rebel to the Great Song Emperor."
Dai Zong was startled at this bold remark, and asked, "Kind hero, who are you?"
"I am Zhu Gui, the 'Dry Land Crocodile,' of Liangshan Marsh."
"As you are a leader of Liangshan Marsh, you must know Wu Yong."
"He is our military councillor here. But how do you know him?"
"He is a personal friend of mine," said Dai Zong.
"He often spoke of a friend of his at Jiangzhou called Dai Zong—can you be that man?"
"Yes, I am that person."
"Sometime ago a man Song Jiang was banished to Jiangzhou, and as he passed this place he met Wu Yong who gave him a letter for you. How is it that you are now carrying letters which concern the killing of Song Jiang?"
"I am on very intimate terms with Song Jiang," said Dai Zong. "He wrote some seditious verses, and I could not see a way to save his life. I would not injure him in any way. I am now taking letters to the capital where I hope to find some means of saving his life. How can I intend to injure his life?"
"If you do not believe it," said Zhu Gui, "you had better read these letters yourself."
When Dai Zong read them he was surprised. He then told all details of the affair to Zhu Gui.
"This being the case," said Zhu Gui, "you had better come with me to Liangshan Marsh where we can deliberate and find some plan to liberate Song Jiang."
After they had drunk some more wine Zhu Gui shot a whistling arrow across the lake, and very soon a boat issued from the reeds. They both embarked, and were conveyed across the lake to the Jinsha Bank and were soon in the brigands' stronghold on the mountain. Their arrival had already been announced, and Wu Yong met them at the barrier. After salutations Wu Yong said, "I have not seen you for a long time. What wind has blown you here today? Please come into our stronghold." Dai Zong was there introduced to all the other leaders, and Zhu Gui explained what had happened, and how Dai Zong had been brought there.
As soon as Chao Gai heard of Song Jiang's misfortune he immediately went to give orders that horses and men should assemble, and advance at once to attack Jiangzhou.
Wu Yong remonstrated, "Elder brother, do not be so reckless. Jiangzhou is a long way from here, and I am afraid that our men might meet a calamity before they get there. 'Beat the grass and the snake will be startled.' In that case, the result would be only to drive our enemy into cover, and endanger Song Jiang's life. So we must use strategy instead of force. I am not very clever, but I have a small plan which may save Song Jiang if Dai Zong will carry it through."
"Let us hear of your plan," said Chao Gai.
"The Prefect of Jiangzhou has written dispatches to his father, Prime Minister Cai at Kaifeng. We can make a plot on this letter. We can write a forged reply, and ask Dai Zong to take it to Jiangzhou. In the letter we will say that Song Jiang must not be executed, but sent to Kaifeng for trial, and that after a close cross-examination he will be executed at the capital, which will put an end to all the rumors. When he passes close to this place on his way to Kaifeng, we can rescue him from his escort. What do you think of that?"
"And if he is not sent by this route then your plan will fail," said Chao Gai.
"That will not matter," said Gongsun Sheng. "We can send spies to find out which way the escort will travel, and we can have men in every place so that we shall be sure of rescuing him at one place or another. I am afraid, however, that the Prefect will not send him to Kaifeng for trial."
"The plan will do," said Chao Gai, "but we have no one who can imitate the handwriting of the Prime Minister, Cai."
"I have thought that over," said Wu Yong. "In the empire there are only four men whose penmanship is famous. They are Su Dongpo, Huang Luzhi, Mi Yuanzhang, and the Prime Minister Cai Jing. These four are all first class. I know a Xiucai scholar (BA), graduate of the county level Imperial examinations at Jizhou who is very good at imitating anybody's handwriting. His name is Xiao Rang and he is called 'Sacred Handed Calligrapher.' He is also very good with the spear and sword. I know that he can imitate Cai Jing's writing very closely. A good plan would be for Dai Zong to go to his home and tell him a fancy tale that at the Yue Temple, in Taian Prefecture they want to erect a new stone tablet, and that they would be glad if he would go there and write the characters. For which service Dai Zong is to offer fifty taels of silver. When they have departed another man is to induce his family to come to our mountain. Then we can get them all to join our band here."
"It is a good plan to get the letter written," said Chao Gai, "but how are we going to get a proper seal?"
"I know a man who can make an exact reproduction of the seal," said Wu Yong. "He is the best in the land, and lives at Jizhou. His name is Jin and he has a double personal name Dajian. He is a splendid engraver on jade stone, and he has the nickname the 'Jade Armed Craftsman.' We can offer him also fifty taels of silver and pretend to go to Taian Prefecture, and engrave the characters on the stone tablet there. On the way we can arrange to bring him to our stronghold here."
"A splendid plan!" said Chao Gai.
The following morning Dai Zong dressed himself as a lay temple assistant. He took with him about two hundred taels of silver. He put on his charmed puttees, and started off. He arrived at Jizhou in less than four hours. Upon inquiring he soon found out that Xiao Rang lived near the Confucius Temple on the east side of the yamen. He went to the house, and called out at the door, "Is Scholar Xiao at home?"
A scholar soon appeared, but as he did not recognize Dai Zong he asked, "Where are you from, and what do you want?"
After saluting, Dai Zong said, "I come from the Yue Temple, at Taian Prefecture where as a verger I look after the offerings made in the temple. Just now we wish to repair one of the towers, and a wealthy man offered fifty taels of silver which I have brought to present to you, and to ask you to go there, and write an inscription for a new stone tablet to be erected. I hope that you will come with me without delay as a lucky day has already been selected."
"I can only write essays or good penmanship," said Xiao Rang. "If you want the characters on a stone tablet you must employ an engraver for that work."
"I have also got another fifty taels of silver to engage Jian Dajian, the 'Jade Armed Craftsman' to do that work. I must ask you to introduce me to him so that we three can go together."
Xiao Rang took the money, and then went with Dai Zong to show him the way to Jian Dajian's house. They had just passed the Confucius Temple when Xiao Rang pointed to a man approaching and said he was Jian Dajian. Xiao Rang called Jin, and when he arrived presented him to the verger of the aforementioned temple, and explained what his business was.
Jian Dajian was much pleased to see the money. They invited the "verger" Dai Zong to go with them into a wine shop where they entertained him to wine and food.
When Dai Zong had given Xiao Rang the money, he suggested that as a diviner had selected the day they should start on their journey that day.
"Just now the weather is hot," said Xiao Rang, "and we cannot travel far even we set out today. Let us start tomorrow morning about 5 A.M."
This was agreed to, and Xiao Rang took Dai Zong to stay at his house that night.
The next morning they all started off about 5 A.M., and they had only gone a few li when Dai Zong said, "I will not press you two gentlemen to go any quicker, but if you like I can go in advance, and announce that you are coming to the temple." He then left them with his usual speed. The two men continued on their way slowly. By about 3 P.M. they had covered about three li; when as they approached a hill they heard a whistle, and saw a big man with about fifty followers. The big man at the head was Wang Ying, 'Stunted Tiger,' and he called out, "Who are you two men? Where are you going? Seize them! We will soon have their hearts to drink wine with."
"We are going to Taian Prefecture," said Xiao Rang, "to engrave an inscription on a new stone tablet there. We have only these clothes, and have no spare money."
"We do not want either your clothes or money," said "Stunted Tiger." "We shall be satisfied if we drink the wine with your hearts."
But Xiao Rang and Jian Dajian were very angry at this, and seizing their cudgels they advanced to attack "Stunted Tiger."
"Stunted Tiger" defended himself with his halberd and fought for about seven bouts when he withdrew. His two opponents pursued him when they heard gongs being sounded on the mountain, and on their left they saw Song Wan, the "Diamond in the Clouds," and on their right was Du Qian, the "Sky Feeler," and behind them was Zheng Tianshou, the "White Faced Squire." With each leader were about thirty men who rushed forward, seized the two men, and took them into the forest. The leaders said, "You need not be afraid. We have been ordered by Chao Gai to arrest you, and take you up the mountain where he hopes you will join our band."
"What do you want us to do in your stronghold?" asked Xiao Rang. "We are very weak, and shall only eat our rations."
"Our military leader, Wu Yong," said Du Qian, "is your friend, and he knows that you have certain abilities. He intentionally sent Dai Zong to induce you to come here."
Xiao Rang and Jian Dajian looked at each other in surprise at this, but could not say a word more. They soon reached the roadside inn managed by Zhu Gui, "Dry Land Crocodile." There they were treated to a meal, and were then put on a boat and taken across the lake. Upon reaching the stronghold they were met by Chao Gai, and Wu Yong who entertained them to a feast. Wu Yong explained how they proposed to forge a letter from the Prime Minister Cai, and asked them to join in "this righteous adventure."
Both men agreed to help in this plot, but pointed out that their families would be in danger as soon as the officials found out that they had joined the bandits.
"You two gentlemen need not fear that," said Wu Yong. "Tomorrow you will understand how we have safeguarded them."
Early next morning one of the men reported, "They have all arrived." Wu Yong asked the two recruits to meet their families.
When Xiao Rang and Jian Dajian heard this they could hardly believe it, but when they descended halfway down the mountain they saw many sedan chairs coming up the mountain carrying their families, old and young, and were very much surprised. When they asked their people for an explanation their wives said, "When you had just gone, these men came and said that you had stopped at an inn just outside the town. They added that there you were sick, and that you wanted us all to go there at once to look after you. When we got outside the town these men refused to allow us to get down, but brought us here without any stop."
Both Xiao Rang and Jian Dajian upon hearing this were dumbfounded, and giving up any thought of an alternative they returned to the stronghold. When they had all been assigned quarters Wu Yong came and discussed with Xiao Rang about the matter of writing the false reply from Prime Minister Cai.
Jian Dajian said that he had previously been employed to cut the seal for the Prime Minister. The two men set to work accordingly, and had soon written the false dispatch which was duly sealed. This was handed to Dai Zong with detailed instructions, and he took his departure with his mailed armor and soon he disappeared.
After Dai Zong had departed the leaders sat down to another feast, when Wu Yong suddenly exclaimed, "Ai Ya! I have been confounded."
"Why, how is that?" asked the other leaders.
"That letter we sent is of no avail," said Wu Yong, "and will only result in the death of both Dai Zong and Song Jiang."
"What was the mistake?" asked the leaders in anxious tones.
"I have been careful at the beginning, but in the conclusion there is a serious oversight," said Wu Yong.
"I wrote exactly like Prime Minister Cai, would have written," said Xiao Rang. "I made no mistake. I am not aware of anything being wrong."
"I'm sure that there's not the slightest difference in the seal I engraved," said Jian Dajian. Wu Yong then explained where the oversight was. This will lead to a bitter fight near the Bailong Temple at Jiangzhou.

Amidst arrows lives were saved,
From throngs of swords heroes escaped.

138

The Gallant heroes of Mount Liang Marshes raid the execution ground & Rescue Men; 29 Bold Heroes' leaders assemble & Hold a Meeting at the White Dragon Temple

Wu Yong explained what was wrong with the letter. "I was careless," he said. "I didn't see it. The seal reads 'Cai Jing, Member of the Hanlin Academy.' That seal will cause superintendent Dai to stand trial!"
"But that's the seal the premier uses on all his writings and essays," Jin protested. "The one I carved is exactly the same. What's wrong with it?"
"A father writing to his son would never use his formal title. I forgot about that. When Dai returns to Jiangzhou he'll surely be questioned. If the truth comes out, it will be terrible."
"Let's send a man after Dai, quickly, and bring him back," Chao Gai suggested. "We'll re-do the letter."
"He couldn't catch him. Dai is using his magic travel method. He must have covered five hundred li by now. We can't delay. Dai and Song Jiang have to be saved."
"How can we save them?" asked Chao Gai. "What's your plan?"
Wu Yong spoke softly in Chao Gai's ear for several minutes, concluding with: "Issue the order quietly among our men. Tell them how to act. Instruct them to move promptly, without fail."

The bold fellows, on receiving their commands, took the implements they needed and went down the mountain that very night. They headed for Jiangzhou. Of that we'll say no more.

Dai returned to Jiangzhou and reported to the prefectural office with the reply within the allotted time. Prefect Cai was very pleased. He rewarded his emissary with three ceremonial beakers of wine. Then he took the letter.
"Did you see the premier?" he asked.
"No," said Dai. "I only stayed one night, then came directly home." The prefect opened the envelope and read:
I've received all your gifts, intact ... As to that demon Song Jiang, the emperor wants to see him personally. Send him to the capital immediately in a cage cart under a trustworthy guard. Make sure he doesn't get away on the road ... I have spoken to the emperor about Huang Wenbing. He undoubtedly will be given a good appointment.
Cai was delighted. He presented Dai with a flowery silver ingot weighing twenty-five ounces. He also ordered that a cage cart be assembled and discussed the guard to be sent. The superintendent thanked him and returned to his quarters. He bought wine and meat and went to see Song Jiang in the prison. We'll say no more of that.
The prefect urged the builders to hurry with the cart. A day or two later, all was in readiness to take the prisoner to the Eastern Capital. The gate-keeper entered and announced that Huang Wenbing was calling.
Cai received him in the rear hall. Huang had brought wine and fresh fruit. "You're always so thoughtful," murmured the prefect. "You really shouldn't."
"Meager gifts from my rustic village," said Huang. "Not worth mentioning."
"Congratulations on the honors which will soon be yours."
"What makes you say that, Prefect?"
"I received a reply yesterday. The evil-doer Song Jiang is to be sent to the capital. Your contribution has been reported to the emperor. You will be given a high position. It's all in my father's letter."
"I'm deeply grateful for Your Excellency's recommendation. Your messenger is indeed a marvellous traveller."
"Read the letter yourself, if you don't believe me."
"A private, family letter—I wouldn't have dared ask. But since you permit me ..."
"Why not, a trusted friend like you."
Huang read the letter from start to finish, then turned it over and looked at the seal on the flap. He observed that it had been newly cut. Huang shook his head.
"This letter is a fake."
"You must be mistaken. It's my father's own handwriting. It must be authentic."
"His style is easily copied. Did he put this seal on letters to you in the past?"
"No, he just wrote informally. Probably the seal was near at hand and he reached for it automatically."
"Please don't think I'm being meddlesome, but the letter is a forgery. The styles of writing of Su, Huang, Mi and Cai are very popular these days. Anyone can imitate them. And this seal—it was made when your father became a member of the Hanlin Academy. He affixed it to all his essays and calligraphy. Many people have seen it. But why would he still be using it today, now that he's risen to the position of premier? In any event, a father writing to his son certainly wouldn't add an official signature seal. The premier possesses infinite wisdom and intelligence. He'd never make a mistake like that. If you don't believe me, Prefect, question the messenger closely. Ask him who he saw at the Residence. If he answers incorrectly, then the letter is false. Forgive me for talking so much. It's only because you've been so kind that I dare to speak."
"That's easy enough. He's never been to the Eastern Capital before, I have only to query him and I'll know whether he's lying."
The prefect told Huang to conceal himself behind a screen, and he convened court. He then sent attendants out in all direction to look for Dai Zong. They were to say the prefect had need of him, and to report at once.
The day he returned, Dai went to see Song Jiang in the prison and spoke softly in his ear, telling him what had transpired. Song Jiang was very pleased. A man invited Dai out for wine the following day, and he was drinking in a tavern when an attendant, who had been looking for him, came in. He conducted Dai to the prefectural court.
"You certainly did a good job of the mission I troubled you with the other day," said Prefect Cai. "I still haven't rewarded you properly."
"When entrusted with a task by Your Excellency, I could only do my best."
"I've been rather busy lately. I haven't had a chance to ask you about it in detail. By which gate did you go into the capital?"
"It was already dark when I got there. I didn't notice."
"Who received you at the gate of the family residence? Where did they put you up?"
"A gate-man took your letter in. A short while later he came out and accepted the hampers. He told me to find an inn for the night. I returned to the Residence at dawn the following morning, and the gate man handed me a reply. I wanted to be sure to reach Jiangzhou on time, so I didn't bother to ask questions and hurried back."
"Did you notice how old the gate-keeper was? Was he dark and thin, or fair and fat? Tall or short? Did he have a beard?"
"It was dark when I reached the Residence, and the next morning at dawn the light was dim. I couldn't see very clearly. He didn't seem very tall, around medium height. I think he had a bit of a beard."
"Take this man before the court," the prefect shouted angrily.
A dozen prison guards came out from the side and dragged Dai to the front of the dais.
"I've done no wrong," the superintendent cried.
"You death-deserving scoundrel! Our old gate-keeper Wang passed on years ago. His son, who has the job now, is only a beardless youth. He has no right to enter the Residence. Any letters that arrive he gives to Secretary Zhang, who hands them over to Majordomo Li. Only Li can notify the inside and accept presents. If a reply is requested, you have to wait three days. And how could anyone who wasn't a trusted attendant and who didn't question you in detail simply take my gifts? My mind was slow the other day. I let you hoodwink me. The truth, now, where did you get that letter?"
"I didn't know all that. I was confused and in a hurry to come back."
"You're lying. These thieving wretches—if you don't beat them they never confess. Guards, pound this rogue for me, hard!"
The prison guards knew it was hopeless. They couldn't be concerned for their superintendent's dignity. They tied Dai, held him prone, and beat him till his skin split and his fresh blood flowed. Dai couldn't take it. "The letter is false," he exclaimed. "Where did you get it?" the prefect demanded.
"I was passing through Liangshan Marsh when a gang of brigands seized and bound me. They hauled me up the mountain to cut my heart out. When they searched me, they found and read your letter. They decided to keep the hampers and set me free. But I couldn't come home. I wanted to kill myself. They wrote this letter, figuring it would cover me. I was afraid of being punished, so I deceived you, Excellency."
"That may be partly true, but plenty of it is poppycock. You're in cahoots with those Liangshan robbers. You plotted with them to steal my hampers, and now you're telling me this fancy tale. Beat him some more!"
But in spite of the torture Dai would not admit to any connection with the men of Liangshan. Again the prefect had him beaten. Dai stuck to his story.
"Enough," said the prefect. "Put a big cangue on him and throw him in jail."
He left the court and summoned Huang. "If it weren't for your shrewdness I'd have committed a serious blunder," he said gratefully.
"Dai is obviously also in league with the Liangshan Marsh bandits," Huang said. "They're organized, and plotting a revolt. It must be nipped in the bud, or it will mean disaster."
"I'm going to take the confessions of Dai Zong and Song Jiang and draw up formal documents. I'll have them both decapitated in the market-place and then send a written report to the higher authorities."
"Extremely wise, Excellency. It will please the imperial court and win you high praise for your meritorious handing of this important matter. It will also forestall the Liangshan bandits from coming to raid the prison."
"You are very far-sighted. I shall write a report personally guaranteeing you and recommending that you be raised in rank."
Prefect Cai entertained Huang, and saw him to the gate of the prefectural compound. Huang returned to Wuweijun.
The next day Cai opened court, summoned the scribe, also named Huang, and said: "Compile all documents on Song Jiang and Dai Zong and add in their confessions. Also write criminal convictions to be posted on the day they are beheaded in the market-place. Since ancient times, rebellious plotters have been executed promptly. Decapitating these two will avert calamity."
Scribe Huang was on very good terms with Superintendent Dai. But he had no way to rescue him, and he groaned inwardly.
"Tomorrow is a national day of mourning," he said, "and the day after is Midsummer Ghosts' Day—you can't execute them then. The following day is a national holiday. Nothing can be done till after the fifth."
Huang had no better plan, he could only delay Dai's death as long as possible. He did this usually for condemned men whenever he could. The prefect agreed with his suggestion and set the execution date for the sixth.
On the morning of the appointed day a crossroads in the market-place was swept to serve as an execution ground. After breakfast soldiers and executioners were mustered—well over five hundred men—and assembled outside the prison gate. At mid-morning the warden went to the prefect and formally requested him to supervise the beheadings. Scribe Huang had no choice but to present the convictions. On each the word "Decapitate" was inscribed, and the announcements were pasted on reed mats.
Although the head keeper and guards in the city prison were friends of Dai Zong and Song Jiang, there was nothing they could do to save them. They could only bemoan their fate.
Everything was in readiness. The prisoners' arms were bound, the hair of each was soaked with gluey paste, twisted up in the shape of a pear and transfixed with a red artificial flower. They were driven before a black-faced idol and fed a bowl of "Eternal Rest Rice" and a cup of "Permanent Parting Wine." Then they were taken from the shrine. Cangues were locked round their necks. Surrounded by sixty or seventy guards, Song Jiang, followed by Dai Zong, were marched out of the prison gate. The two men looked at each other, but they were unable to speak. Song Jiang stamped in futility, Dai Zong hung his head and sighed.
A crowd of nearly two thousand jammed the market-place around the crossroads, which was guarded by a wall of soldiers with spears and staves. Song Jiang was placed facing south, Dai Zong was placed facing north and, still bound, they were forced to sit. All were waiting till three quarters afternoon, when the supervisor would come and the executions would take place. The spectators read the announcements of criminal conviction. They ran as follows:
Jiangzhou Prefecture.
Criminal Song Jiang. Wrote a rebellious poem, spread evil rumors, and colluded with bandits in Liangshan Marsh to foment a rebellion. Sentenced to be decapitated. Criminal Dai Zong. In order to help Song Jiang, secretly handed over a private letter, colluded with the bandits in Liangshan Marsh and plotted with them to foment a rebellion. Sentenced to be decapitated.
Supervisor of executions: Cai, Prefect of Jiangzhou
The prefect reined his horse to a halt and sat, waiting. From the east side of the market a band of snake charmers pushed their way through the crowd. The soldiers tried to beat them back, but they wouldn't leave. In the midst of this disturbance, a group of medical cure pedlars who gave displays of arms elbowed through the spectators on the west.
"You unmannerly louts," the soldiers shouted at them. "Where do you think you are—shoving like that?"
"Ignorant rustics," the men retorted. "We've travelled all over the country, and nowhere have we been prohibited from looking at people. Even when the emperor has culprits killed in the capital you're allowed to watch. Just because your little town is executing two men you think you're shaking the world. We want to see. What's all the friggin fuss about?"
"Get back there," shouted the prefect. "Don't let them come any closer."
At this moment a convoy of porters, carrying goods on shoulder-poles, arrived from the south.
"Heads are going to be chopped off here," the soldiers yelled. "Go another way."
"We're bringing things to your prefect. How dare you stop us?"
"Even if you were officials from the prefectural office, you'd have to detour!"
The porters set down their burdens, detached their carrying-poles, and stood, holding them, among the spectators.
From the north a troupe of merchants approached, pushing two carts. They insisted on passing through the execution grounds.
"Where do you think you're going?" the soldiers barked.
"We're in a hurry. Let us through."
"Not a chance. Criminals are being knocked off here. If you've in a hurry, take another road."
The merchants laughed. "That's easy enough to say. We're from the capital. We're not familiar with your cruddy roads. We can only stick to the main highway."
The soldiers wouldn't let them go on. The merchants crowded together in a stubborn knot and refused to retreat. Arguments were raging on all four sides of the crossroads. Prefect Cai was unable to quell them. He observed that the merchants had climbed onto their carts and were watching from there.
Not long after, the group of officers on the execution grounds parted and a man stepped forward and announced: "Three quarters past noon."
"Cut off their heads," ordered the prefect.
Soldiers opened the prisoners' cangues. Two executioners stood with swords at the ready. Quicker than it takes to say, rioting broke out. One of the merchants pulled a small gong from his tunic. Standing on the cart he struck it sharply three times. On all sides, men went into action.
A hulking dark tiger of a fellow, stark naked, appeared in the upper story of a tea-house beside the crossroads. Brandishing a battle-ax in each hand, he uttered a heaven-splitting roar, leaped down, hacked the executioners to death, and began carving his way towards the mounted prefect. Soldiers thrust at him with their spears, but nothing could stop his headlong advance. They crowded around Cai and rushed him off to safety.
Daggers suddenly appeared in the hands of the snake charmers on the east side, and they began killing soldiers. The medicine men on the west side, holding spears and staves, let out a yell and charged into the soldiers and guards, slaughtering left and right. On the south, the porters swung their carrying-poles, felling soldiers and spectators indiscriminately. The merchants on the north jumped down from the carts and tipped them over, blocking the road. Two of the merchants darted through the melee and got Song Jiang and Dai Zong on their backs. Some of the remainder produced bows and arrows and started shooting. Others threw stones they had concealed in their clothes. A few waved pennanted signal spears.
The merchants were in fact Chao Gai, Hua Rong, Huang Xin, Lu Fang and Guo Sheng. The medicine men were Yan Shun, Liu Tang, Du Qian and Song Wan. Disguised as porters were Zhu Gui, Stumpy Tiger Wang, Zheng Tianshou and Shi Yong. The snake charmers were actually the three Ruan brothers and Bai Sheng. These leaders from Liangshan Marsh had brought with them more than a hundred men, and all were locked in furious battle.
They saw the big dark fellow laying about him vigorously with his battle-axes. Chao Gai and the others did not recognize him, but they knew that he had been the first to go into action, and that he was killing more of the foe than anyone.
Then Chao Gai suddenly remembered something. The Marvellous Traveller had spoken of a certain Black Whirlwind, officially called Li Kui, who was dear to Song Jiang: a wild, rough sort of fellow, he had said. So Chao Gai called out: "You there, in front, are you by any chance the Black Whirlwind?"
But the one he addressed paid no attention, and continued consuming lives with his big axes like a blazing inferno. Chao Gai ordered the men carrying Song Jiang and Dai Zong to follow in the big dark fellow's wake.
By now bodies of soldiers and civilians were sprawled all over the crossroads, and blood flowed in rivulets. Countless more had been felled and wounded. The Liangshan leaders abandoned their carts and merchandise and continued behind the big fellow, fighting their way out of the city. Hua Rong, Huang Xin, Lu Fang and Guo Sheng, covering the rear, sent swarms of arrows in their pursuers. Neither the soldiers nor the people of Jiangzhou dared come too near.
Li Kui slaughtered down to the stream's edge, his whole body spattered with blood. He went on killing along the bank.
Halberd in hand, Chao Gai shouted: "Don't hurt the ordinary people. This has nothing to do with them!"
But the big man wouldn't listen. He cut down victims one after another.
They walked six or seven li along the stream outside the city until they saw before them a broad river. Here, all paths came to an end. Chao Gai was very distressed. Only then did Black Whirlwind speak: "Don't worry. Carry our brothers into that temple."
Ahead, near the river, was a large temple, its double gates tightly locked. Li Kui smashed them open with his battle-axes, and they all went into the courtyard. Ancient junipers and pines blocked out the sunlight. A plaque upon the building was inscribed in letters of gold: Temple of the White Dragon Spirit.
Song Jiang and Dai Zong were carried inside and set down. Song Jiang open his eyes and saw Chao Gai and the others. "Brothers," he exclaimed, weeping, "this must be a dream."
"You wouldn't stay with us on the mountain, brother. That's why you're in such a predicament today," Chao Gai expostulated. "Who is that big swarthy fellow who fights so powerfully?"
"Li Kui the Black Whirlwind. He was ready to spring me out of prison all by himself. But I didn't think we could get away with it, so I didn't agree."
"A remarkable man. He fought harder than any of us, and was absolutely fearless in the face of every enemy weapon."
"Bring fresh clothing for our brothers," Hua Rong called.
While they were changing, Li Kui started down the porch, battle-axes in hand. Song Jiang shouted after him: "Where are you going, brother?"
"Looking for those monks. I'll kill them all. Not only didn't the louts come out to welcome us, they even barred their friggin gates. If I find them, I'll slay them before those gates as a sacrifice!"
"Come over here, first. I want to introduce you to my brother, the chieftain."

Li Kui cast aside his axes and dropped to his knees before Chao Gai. “Forgive Iron Ox’s crassness, brother,” he entreated. He was also introduced to the others and discovered he and Zhu Gui came from the same township. Both men were exceedingly pleased.
“Brother,” Hua Rong said to Chao Gai, “you told us to follow brother Li, and now here we are, with a big river cutting us off, and no boat to take us across. When the soldiers from the city catch up how will we be able to repel them and escape?”
“Never mind,” said Li Kui. “I’ll fight my way back into the city and chop them into mincemeat, friggin prefect and all!”
Dai Zong had just revived by then, and he cried: “Don’t be rash, brother. There are six or seven thousand troops in the city. If you go charging in you’ll be throwing your life away.”
Ruan the Seventh said: “I see some boats along the opposite bank. My brothers and I will swim over and haul a few back. How will that be?”
“The best possible idea,” said Chao Gai.
Stripping and tying on daggers, the Ruan brothers dived into the river. They had swum about half a //when three boats, being rowed with the speed of wind, prows raised, came flying across the surface of the water. On each were a dozen or more men, all with weapons in their hands.
The watchers on the shore grew alarmed. “My fate is bitter,” Song Jiang lamented when he heard of the approaching vessels. He hurried out of the temple to look. Seated in the foremost craft was a big fellow holding a five-pronged pitchfork. His hair was twisted up on top of his head and bound by a red cord. He wore a pair of white silk swimming pants, and he was whistling sharply.
It was none other than Zhang Shun. Song Jiang waved his arms and shouted: “Save me, brother!”
Zhang Shun and the others recognized him. “We will,” they cried.
Their boats flew towards the shore. The Ruan brothers turned around and swam back. All headed for the bank before the temple.
Zhang Shun was leading a dozen sturdy fellows. Zhang Heng, on the second craft, led Mu Hong, Mu Chun, Xue Yong and ten or more vassals. On the third boat Li Jun was in command of LiLi, Tong Wei, Tong Meng and a dozen salt smugglers. Fully armed, they disembarked and climbed the bank.
To Zhang Shun the sight of Song Jiang was a gift from heaven. Weeping, he kowtowed and said: “I was beside myself when I heard that you had been tried. But I couldn’t think of how rescue you. Then I heard that Superintendent Dai had been taken, and brother Li Kui had disappeared. I went to my brother Zhang Heng and took him to Squire Mu’s manor and called together many of our friends. Today we were going to fight our way into Jiangzhou and snatch you out of prison. I never dreamed that gallant men would have saved you already and brought you here. May I ask which of these heroes is Chao Gai, chieftain of Liangshan Marsh?”
Song Jiang pointed to a man standing to the fore. “That is brother Chao Gai. Let’s all go into the temple and be ceremoniously introduced.”
The nine leaders of Zhang Shun’s party, the seventeen of Chao Gai’s, plus Song Jiang, Dai Zong and Li Kui, a total of twenty-nine, entered the White Dragon Temple. This event later became known as the “White Dragon Temple Small Meeting.”
Shortly after the twenty-nine had exchanged formal greetings, one of the bandits hurried in and reported: “In Jiangzhou City, to the beating of gongs and drums, a huge host of men and horses has been assembled and are marching forth to catch us. You can see them in the distance, their flags covering the sky, their swords thick as flax. Armored horses are in the lead, followed by hordes of spearsmen. With great swords and broad axes they’re speeding down the road to White Dragon Temple!”
“Let me at them!” Li Kui roared. He seized his twin axes and rushed through the temple gates.
“If we fight, we fight to a finish,” shouted Chao Gai. “Rally round me, bold fellows. We’ll return to Liangshan Marsh only after we’ve slaughtered every man of Jiangzhou’s army!”
“We’re at you orders!” responded the assembled heroes. 145 yelling, to the riverbank. And as a result the waves were en-crimsoned and corpses were piled mountain-high. Truly, wave-leaping dragons spewed poisonous flames, mountain-climbing tigers roared gales into the sky.

When Chao Gai and the others asked the Professor: “What is the error contained in your letter?” the latter replied: “When I wrote that answer which Superintendent Dai has just taken I had a lapse of concentration, I completely overlooked something. The letter was stamped with the four characters, ‘Hanlin Academician Cai Jing,’ was it not? It’s that stamp which is going to betray the Magic Messenger.”
“But I’ve seen Preceptor Cai’s writings and compositions many, many times,” said the Craftsman. “They always bear that stamp. I carved it perfectly, there’s not a single error, how can there be something wrong?”
“Don’t you see?” the Professor said. “Governor Cai, present governor of Jiangzhou, is the Grand Preceptor’s son. How can a father use his own name on the stamp when he writes to his son? It’s simply not done! That’s the mistake I made. I completely overlooked it. When the Magic Messenger reaches Jiangzhou they’ll put him to the torture and demand the true facts. It’s a disaster.”
“Quickly, send some one to catch him and bring him back,” said Chao Gai. “Then we can write it again, can’t we?”
“How could anyone catch him? He’ll be doing his magic walking. He’ll have done at least a hundred and fifty miles by now. But there’s not a moment to be lost. There’s just one way for us to save them.”
“How can we save them, what’s your plan?” said Chao Gai.
The Professor leant forward and whispered in Chao Gai’s ear: “We must do this, and this … and so, and so…. You must pass the word round quietly, let everyone know. This is our only chance, we must not let it slip.”
When they had all received their orders, each made his preparations for travel and that same night they went down the mountain and headed for Jiangzhou. Of this no more. You may ask why I do not tell you what the plan was, but just be patient and you shall see.
By this time the Magic Messenger had arrived back in Jiangzhou exactly on time and gone to deliver the letter. Governor Cai was delighted to find him so punctual and entertained him for three whole hours. On receiving the letter, he asked: “Did you see my father?”
“I only stayed one night and left the next day,” the Magic Messenger replied. “I was not able to see His Excellency.”
The Governor broke open the letter and read first of all that the various items in the boxes had all been safely received. Further on his father said that he wished personally to question the dangerous criminal, Song Jiang, who was to be sent immediately to the capital in a secure prison cart closely guarded and with an appropriate escort. Every precaution was to be taken to prevent his escaping along the way. The letter ended by saying that Huang Wenbing would be recommended in due course to the Emperor and would undoubtedly receive an appointment. When he read all this, Governor Cai’s joy knew no bounds. He had a silver ingot weighing twenty-five catties brought and presented it to the Magic Messenger. He also ordered a prison cart and discussed whom to send with it as escort. The Magic Messenger thanked him and went home. He bought some wine and meat and went to the prison to see Song Jiang. Of this no more.
Governor Cai did all he could to expedite the construction of the prison cart and within a day or two it was on the point of setting off, when the porter suddenly announced: “Huang Wen-bing of Wuweijun is asking to see you.” Governor Cai invited Huang into the residence. Huang presented several gifts, new wine and seasonal fruit, for which the Governor thanked him, saying: “This is too much, you really shouldn’t.”
“Just local stuff, barely worth your trouble,” Huang replied.
Governor Cai said: “I have to congratulate you on a prestigious appointment.”
“Has Your Excellency heard something then?” Huang responded.
“The messenger returned yesterday. The malefactor Song Jiang is to be sent to the capital. And in due course you will be recommended to the Emperor and you will receive an important post. It’s all in my father’s letter.”
“Then I am most deeply grateful for Your Excellency’s interest. And that messenger of yours is indeed miraculous.”
“If you don’t believe me, take a look at the letter and see for yourself.”
“I fear it is taking too much on myself to read your personal letter. But if you insist, I would like to take just a glance at it.”
“We are the closest of friends, of course you can see it.” He told a servant to bring the letter and then handed it to Huang Wenbing.
Once he got it in his hands, Huang Wenbing examined that letter from head to tail. He turned it around and looked at the envelope and observed that the stamp was new. He nodded to himself and said: “This letter is not authentic.”
“You must be mistaken. It is written by my father himself, it is in his own hand. How can it not be authentic?”
“Your Excellency, when a letter comes from home does it usually bear this stamp?”
“Indeed, in the general run of things the letters do not have this stamp, they are usually addressed informally. In this case the chop must just have been lying to hand, so he stamped the envelope with it”.
“Your Excellency, please do not count it an impertinence on my part! But this letter has been written to deceive you. At present there are four famous styles of calligraphy, Su, Huang, Mi and Cai, and everyone has studied them. In addition, this stamp came out when your father was appointed a member of the Hanlin Academy, it appeared on official documents and there are many who have seen it. But now he has been promoted to Grand Preceptor. Why would he go back to the Hanlin Academy stamp? And what is more, this is a father writing to his son, he could not use his own name on the seal. Your worthy father is a man of great knowledge and understanding. How could he make a careless mistake like this? If you do not believe me, question the messenger carefully about the people he saw at your father’s palace. If he gets it wrong, the letter is forged. Please do not think ill of me for saying all this. It is only because you have shown me such favour that I so presume.”
“Well, it’s easy enough,” the Governor said. “The fellow has never been to the capital before, we’ve only to question him and the truth will out.”
Governor Cai had Huang Wenbing sit behind the screen while he went into session and announced that he had business with the Magic Messenger. Officers were accordingly sent out in all directions to look for him. There is a poem which says:
After the poem, the forged letter;
The bandits were trying to make things better.
But for the sting in Bee Huang’s tail,
The governor, poor fool, had fallen for it all.
When the Magic Messenger got back to Jiangzhou he had gone first to the gaol to see Song Jiang, in whose ear he whispered all that had happened. Song Jiang was overjoyed. After that someone invited the Magic Messenger to drink with him. So he was drinking in a tavern when he heard that the officers were looking for him. When he reached the court, the Governor said: “I gave you a hard mission and I have not yet sufficiently shown my appreciation of your efficiency.”
“I went as a special messenger in your service, of course I wouldn’t waste any time,” the Magic Messenger replied.
“I’ve been very busy lately, I didn’t have time to ask you more. When you went to the Grand Preceptor’s palace for me the other day, which gate did you enter by?”
“When I reached the capital it was already dark, I couldn’t tell which gate it was.”
“Who was it who received you in our residence? And where did you stay?”
“When I got to the palace I found a gate and went in with the letter. Almost immediately a porter appeared. He took the boxes and then told me to go and find an inn to sleep. Next morning I got up at dawn and went to wait at the gate. They brought the answer out right away and since I didn’t want to be late I naturally didn’t ask any questions but just got going at once.”
“Which porter did you see? How old was he? Was he a thin dark man, or a fat man with a pale complexion? Was he tall or short? Did he have a beard and whiskers or was he clean-shaven?”
“It was quite dark when I arrived, and I left next morning in the fifth watch, so it still wasn’t properly light, you couldn’t make anything out clearly. As far as I could tell he was getting on, he was about medium height, and I think he had something of a beard.”
The Governor exploded. “Arrest this man!” he screamed. A dozen guards rushed forward and threw the Magic Messenger to the ground.
“But I haven’t done anything!” the Magic Messenger protested.
“You deserve to die, you bastard!” the Governor shouted. “Our old gatekeeper, Wang Gong, has been dead for years. There’s only Young Wang now to keep the gate, how can you say he’s old and has a beard? And in any case the porter, Young Wang, isn’t allowed to enter the house. If any missive or package arrives the procedure involves first Zhang, the major-domo, then the secretary, Li, who reports within, and only then is it received. And for a reply there’s always a wait of three days. I sent those two boxes of things, how could they be received just like that, instead of some confidential person coming and asking you to give a complete account? I was in a hurry yesterday and for a moment you fooled me. Now you’d better confess right away where you got that letter from!”
“I was just so worried about getting back in time, I didn’t give it much thought,” the Magic Messenger said.
“Bollocks!” screamed the Governor. “The only way to get the truth out of this lying bastard is to beat him. Guards, beat this man till he squeals!”
The prison guards could see there was nothing for it. Without regard for the superintendent’s dignity they tied him up and beat him till cuts opened, the flesh split and the blood flowed freely. Unable to stand any more, the Magic Messenger confessed: “It’s true, the letter’s a fake!”
“And how did this forged letter come into your hands?” the Governor yelled.
“On my way I had to pass the Marshes of Mount Liang. A band of robbers set upon me, tied me up and took me up the mountain. They were about to cut my heart out, but then they found the letter on me. They took all the things in the boxes but they left me alive. Thinking it was impossible for me to return, I begged them to kill me there on the mountain; but instead they wrote this letter so that I could return safely. I deceived you because I was too afraid of being held responsible.”
“It sounds plausible, but there’s still something wrong,” the Governor said. “It’s obvious you were hand in glove with those robbers in the Marshes of Mount Liang. The plan was to get your hands on my goods, so why all these lies? Beat him again!”
Under further torture the Magic Messenger confessed his connection with the Mount Liang band. The Governor continued the beating and interrogation for a while, but since he was only getting the same story he said: “There’s no point in going on with this. Put a heavy cangue on him and throw him into prison.” With that he adjourned the session and went to thank Bee Sting Huang. “But for your perceptiveness, I might have made a serious blunder.”
“It’s obvious this villain was in league with the Marshes of Mount Liang, it is a conspiracy, and if we do not repress it there will be dire consequences.”
“When we have obtained confessions from these two, and drawn up a case, we will have them beheaded in the market-place. Then, when it is done, we will send a full report to the Emperor.”
“Your Excellency’s judgement is indeed clear and incisive. Firstly it will be most pleasing to the Emperor, who will see how successfully you have brought this business to a conclusion. And secondly, it will forestall any attempt by the outlaws on Mount Liang to raid the gaol.”
“My friend, your understanding is remarkable, you think of everything. I shall mention you in my report and I shall personally interest myself in your advancement.”
After lavish hospitality that day, Bee Sting Huang was seen off in style and returned to Wuweijun.
When he convened the court next day, Governor Cai summoned the court secretary and said: “Get the case copied out quickly and append the confessions of Song Jiang and Dai Zong to it. Have a crime sheet written out and fix the day for a beheading at the execution ground. With planned and premeditated crimes of this nature no time should be lost. By executing Dai and Song we will prevent much trouble later.”
Now the court secretary who was dealing with the case, also called Huang, was on good terms with Dai Zong, but he could think of no excuse that would get him off. He could but pity him. However he did say: “Tomorrow is an imperial remembrance day; and the day after is the full moon of the seventh month, both these are days on which executions are not permitted. And after that it’s a national holiday. The execution really cannot be carried out for the next five days.” Well, the first step to save Song Jiang had come from Heaven, the next was up to the heroes of Mount Liang.
Governor Cai needs must follow Secretary Huang’s advice. So it was only on the morning of the sixth day that he sent men to the crossroads to sweep the execution site. After breakfast, a guard was selected, together with the headsmen and their assistants, over five hundred men in all, and sent over to wait outside the main prison. After nine o’clock the prison guards asked the Governor if he would come himself to supervise the execution. Secretary Huang now displayed the crime sheet in the courtroom, the sentence of beheading was duly announced, and rush mats were laid down. All the prison officers of Jiangzhou, knowing there was nothing they could do to help Song Jiang and the Magic Messenger despite their friendly feelings towards them, grieved for their fate. When these preliminaries were completed, back in the main prison the Magic Messenger and Song Jiang had their hands tied behind their backs and their hair washed with starch and made into an oval bun to which an artificial red flower was added. They were then driven to an altar with a black-faced god and given the bowl of eternity rice and the cup of farewell wine. They bowed to the god when they finished, and mounted the wooden donkey. Some sixty prison officers now herded them through the prison gate. The two men looked at each other, but found nothing to say. Song Jiang merely stumbled a little and the Magic Messenger lowered his eyes and sighed. Several thousand citizens of Jiangzhou were there to watch, jostling and craning their necks:
Hatred hangs like a cloud, the atmosphere is dense with resentment. No gleam lightens the air above, all around a sad wind howls. Tasselled spears threaten; the low note of drums saddens all hearts. Staves and cudgels thickly cluster; the monotonous gong subdues the spirit. The crime sheet waves on high; after this going, men say, how can there be a return? White paper flowers flutter; life is but a passing moment, all aver. Eternity rice is hard to stomach, the wine of everlasting farewell sticks in the gullet. Now the hideous executioner grips his knife; the fell minister of justice grasps his axe. Under black banners the sprites are gathered, ghosts linger at the crossroads. The presiding officer prepares to give the signal, the coroner is ready and waiting, to cart away the corpse.
The executioner had summoned a group of ruffians to harry the prisoners along to the execution ground at the crossroads, surrounding them with a forest of spears and staves. Song Jiang’s face was to the south, the Magic Messenger’s to the north. They were obliged to sit now and wait till the presiding officer arrived and gave the signal at twelve forty-five.
Raising their eyes, the people read the crime sheet, which said:
Jiangzhou prisoner, Song Jiang, author of a seditious poem containing wild and felonious language. Guilty of collusion with the robbers of Mount Liang and conspiracy against the state. Sentence: death by decapitation. Criminal, Dai Zong, convicted of illegally purveying to Song Jiang a private letter and of complicity with the robbers of Mount Liang and conspiracy against the state. Sentence: death by decapitation. Presiding officer: Governor Cai of Jiangzhou.
The Governor reined in his horse. Everyone was waiting for the signal.
Then suddenly on the eastern side of the execution ground a group of snake charmers were seen trying to force their way forward to have a closer view of the proceedings. The guards attempted to push them back but without success. While all this was going on, on the west of the execution ground a group of martial arts merchants and medicine peddlers began trying to force their way in. The guards shouted: “ ‘Oy there, you lot, where’s your manners? Who do you think you are, to come pushing in like this?”
The martial arts merchants responded: “You provincial louts, we’ve travelled the world, we been everywhere, we have, do you think we haven’t seen a man killed before? If the Emperor himself executes someone in the capital, everyone’s allowed in to see it. What’s so earth-shattering about the execution of two men in this God-forsaken dump? Why the hell shouldn’t we come and have a look?”
As this lot were arguing with the guards, the presiding officer shouted: “Move back, you can’t come through!”
While the row continued unabated, there appeared on the south side of the execution ground a group of porters with carrying-poles who also wanted to get in to watch. The guards shouted: “You there, where are you trying to take those loads?”
“We’re carrying goods for the Governor, you can’t stop us!” they replied.
“If you’re working for the Governor, you’d better find yourselves another route,” the guards said.
The porters set down their loads and grasping the poles settled down among the crowd to watch. At this point on the north of the execution ground a group of merchants pushing two carts appeared, also bent on forcing their way through. “Where do you think you’re going?” the guards shouted.
“We’re just passing, please let us through,” the merchants replied.
“How d’you think you’re going to get through here?” the guards said. “If you want to get on with your journey you’d better find another route.”

"That's no bloody good," they said. "We're from the capital, we don't know your blasted streets, we've got to stick to the main route."
Since the guards would not let them pass, the merchants became jammed in a tight mass so they could not move anywhere. On all sides now the noise was incessant. The Governor could see there was no remedy. He could only watch as the merchants climbed onto the carts and settled down to view the spectacle.
In a short while the crowd in the square parted a little, and a voice rang out: "The time is twelve forty-five!" The Governor as presiding officer then ordered: "Let the decapitation take place!" Two assistant executioners removed the cangues and the ministers of justice took up their axes — it's slow in the telling — everyone wanted to get a clear view — it happens in a flash. A deafening tumult arose. Suddenly, as the word "decapitation" reached the ears of the merchants on their carts, one of them took out a little gong and struck it several times: dong, dong, dong! Everywhere things began to happen. But first there's a poem:

On impulse, he enters the tavern's door,
By waters that smoke in the autumn air.
With wine, he seeks to ease his grief,
With verse to purge his heart of care.
But the exile's song fails of its aim,
And he lands in a dismal dungeon again,
Till the heroes of Mount Liang, provoked,
Descend like a storm on the town for his sake.

Then from the upper floor of a teahouse at the crossroads a great black tiger of a man, stark naked and brandishing a pair of broad-edged axes, leapt down like a bolt from the blue, letting out a wild whoop that echoed round the heavens like a thunderclap. His axes rose and fell and the two executioners fell to the ground. In a moment he had hacked a path to where the supervising officer sat on his horse. The guards hurriedly readied their spears, but they were powerless to stop him. Everyone fled in a bunch, pressing round the Governor.
At this moment the snake charmers on the east produced swords, and began killing the guards. The martial arts merchants on the west raised a great cry and also started a general massacre, killing prison officers and guards. The porters on the south began whirling their poles in all directions, knocking down guards and spectators. The merchants on the north jumped down off their carts and pushed them forward to block the road. Two of these merchants dived into the m□□ and emerged, one carrying Song Jiang, the other carrying the Magic Messenger. Some of them took out bows and started shooting arrows, others took out stones and set up a bombardment and still others took out iron-tipped spears which they began to wield.
Now these supposed merchants were of course Chao Gai, Colonel Hua, the Tamer, the Little Duke, and the Halberdier. The fake martial arts merchants were the Dandy, the Red-Haired Devil, the Door-God in the Clouds and Skyscraper. The fake porters were the Crocodile, Short-Arse, Whitey and Shi Yong. The snake charmers were the three Ruan brothers and the Daytime Rat. Seventeen leaders of Mount Liang had come on this expedition, with over a hundred men, and they were all now hard at it, mowing people down on all sides.
And in the thick of it was the big swarthy fellow, tirelessly whirling his axes and felling opponents. Chao Gai and the others did not know who he was, but it was easy to see he was in the forefront and had accounted for the greatest number of the enemy. Then Chao Gai suddenly remembered something. The Magic Messenger had spoken of a certain Black Whirlwind, officially called Li Kui, who was dear to Song Jiang: a wild, rough sort of fellow, he had said. So Chao Gai called out: "You there, in front, are you by any chance the Black Whirlwind?" But the one he addressed paid him no heed and went on furiously whirling his axes and killing people. So Chao Gai instructed the soldiers carrying Song Jiang and the Magic Messenger to stick close behind the black fellow. The latter simply went on killing, there in the market-place, making no distinction between military and civilian, until the corpses lay all about in heaps and the gutters ran with blood. The number of those who were overthrown was countless.
The leaders of Mount Liang had abandoned their carts or their loads and were all following the big black fellow, fighting their way out of the city. Bringing up the rear were Colonel Hua, the Tamer, the Little Duke and the Halberdier, four famous bowmen who shot off their arrows behind them like a cloud of locusts. Who of the soldiers and people of Jiangzhou dared come forward? By now the big black fellow had hacked his way to the banks of the river. He stood alone on the bank slaughtering people, his body drenched in their blood. Chao Gai now rested his halberd and said: "This is no fault of the ordinary people, stop killing them!" But the other paid no attention. He went on wielding his axes, a single blow to each one, felling them in rows.
When they had progressed along the bank about two miles from the town, they were confronted by a broad river, with no way across it. Chao Gai lamented when he saw this, but the big man cried: "Don't worry, just take our brothers into the temple."
There was indeed a big temple, close to the river bank, but its gates were tight shut. The big fellow heaved his axes and burst it open. Inside they found a screen of ancient junipers and dark green pines, providing deep shade. In front of them the monastery sign said in gold letters: "Temple of the White Dragon." The soldiers carried Song Jiang and the Magic Messenger inside and laid them down. Only then did Song Jiang trust himself to look around. When he saw Chao Gai and the others tears came to his eyes. "Is this a dream, brother?" he asked.
Chao Gai chided him: "You wouldn't stay with us on the mountain, and now just look at the result! But tell me, who is that big dark fellow who is wreaking such havoc?"
"He's Li Kui, whom they call 'the Black Whirlwind.' Many times he suggested helping me to escape from the main gaol, but I was afraid we would be caught and didn't let him."
Chao Gai said: "His energy is amazing, and his courage unflinching."
Colonel Hua said: "Bring clothes for our two brothers here."
During this conversation, Iron Ox was suddenly seen rushing off waving his two axes. Song Jiang called to him to stop. "Where are you off to?" he asked.
"I'm going to find that blasted monk and kill him, the unthinkable swine didn't receive us, he even shut the bloody gates. I'm bloody well going to make a sacrifice of him, if I can only find the bugger."
Song Jiang said: "Come here and meet the leaders first."
Accordingly Iron Ox threw down his two axes and knelt right down in front of Chao Gai, saying: "Elder brother, forgive Iron Ox for being so uncouth."
When he was introduced to everyone, he and the Crocodile were delighted to learn that they were countrymen.
Colonel Hua now said to Chao Gai: "You told everyone just to follow Iron Ox and now look where we are! There's a big river in front of us blocking our way. We're cut off and there's no boat to take us across. If the army in the city decide to pursue us, what can we do against them? How can we save ourselves?"
Iron Ox said: "Don't worry. We'll all go back and attack the city first, and finish off that bloody Governor Cai once and for all. We won't leave till we've done that."
At this point the Magic Messenger had just regained consciousness and he cried: "Brother, why must you always be so fool-hardy? There are five or six thousand troops in the city, if we go and attack them we're bound to be destroyed!"
Ruan the Seventh said: "Over there on the other side of the river I can see some boats tied up. Why don't I and my brothers swim over and fetch boats to ferry us all across?"
"That's by far the best plan," said Chao Gai.
So the Ruan brothers stripped off their clothes and dived into the water, each equipped with a sharp knife. But when they had only gone about three hundred yards, three rowing boats appeared upstream and came flying towards the others, with a whistling sound like the wind. To their considerable dismay they saw there were about ten men in each, all fully armed. When they told Song Jiang, he said: "Then I must be doomed!" and rushed out of the temple to see. On the first boat sat a big man holding a five-pronged fork which flashed bravely in the sunlight. His hair was tied on top of his head with a red cord and he wore white silk trousers for swimming. He was whistling. And who do you think this was?

East runs the River for many a league,
Follow its course and a hero you'll meet.
His face is like chalk and his body's like whey,
He travels in water as if on his feet.
In the gorges no rapids can cause him to fear,
To snatch from the dragon his ball he would dare;
He masters the flood like a fish in the sea,
His name is White Eel, world-famous is he.

When the White Eel in the first boat saw them, he shouted: "Who are you? How do you dare to hold a meeting at the White Dragon temple?"
Song Jiang dashed out of the temple and said: "Brother come and help us!" When he saw it was Song Jiang, White Eel gave a great shout of "Right away" and the three boats flew towards the bank. Seeing this the Ruan brothers turned back. The whole company was now assembled on the bank in front of the temple.
White Eel had a dozen sturdy fellows with him in the boat. His brother the Pilot was in the second boat with Mu Hong, Mu Chun and the Pill Monger, and a dozen retainers. In the third boat were the White-Water Dragon, the Executioner, the two Tong brothers and a dozen smugglers. All were now standing on the bank, fully armed. White Eel was elated when he saw Song Jiang. He prostrated himself and said: "Ever since you were sentenced I have been unable to rest. But I could think of no way to rescue you. Recently I heard that Superintendent Dai was taken and elder brother Li had disappeared, so I went and got my brother and went to Squire Mu's to ask for news. We were just on our way now to attack Jiangzhou. We planned to free you from gaol, of course we had no idea they had already rescued you and brought you here. Dare I ask if this great company has something to do with the famous leader of the Marshes of Mount Liang, Chao Gai?"
Song Jiang indicated the foremost figure of the group and said: "This is indeed elder Brother Chao Gai. Please come into the temple everyone so you can be introduced."
So all of these leaders, that is, the nine from the boats, and Chao Gai's party of seventeen, together with Song Jiang, the Magic Messenger and Iron Ox, making altogether twenty-nine, met together in the White Dragon temple. This is what became known as the Lesser Gathering in the White Dragon temple.
When the introduction ceremonies between each of the twenty-nine heroes were just completed, one of the men burst into the temple and breathlessly announced: "In Jiangzhou town there's drums and gongs and a huge army's on the move, they're coming for us! You can see the banners blocking out the sun and swords as thick as grass! There's armoured foot and horse in front, and spearmen behind that and they're pouring down this road to the White Dragon temple!"
Iron Ox immediately let out a great roar of "Kill 'em!", grabbed his axes and charged out of the door. Chao Gai shouted: "It's all or nothing now! Rally round me, men, and we'll smash the might of Jiangzhou before we go home to Mount Liang!"
The others all cried in unison: "Let's go!" And a hundred and fifty men all shouting together raced along the riverbank towards Jiangzhou. But for this, how would we have seen:

The river flowing with blood, the corpses heaped in mounds;
The green river dragon spitting deadly fire,
The mountain tiger raging like a storm through the heavens.

WHAT oversight has been made in the letter?" asked Chao Gai.
"In writing the letter I failed to exercise sufficient care," said Wu Yong. "I overlooked the four characters, 'Hanlin Cai Jing' on the seal. That's enough to result in the arrest of Dai Zong."
The Hanlin Academy was the highest academic and administrative institution. The senior echelons of the Imperial civil service were drawn from members of the academy. "But I know," said Jian Dajian, "that Cai Jing always uses such a seal on all his essays and letters. There is not the slightest error, so why do you say there has been an oversight?"
"You gentlemen overlook the fact that the Prefect at Jiangzhou is the son of the Prime Minister Cai Jing," said Wu Yong. "Is it likely that a father writing to his son would use such a seal? There is the mistake! I overlooked that. When Dai Zong presents the dispatch at Jiangzhou they will suspect it and cross-examine him. If he tells the truth there will be serious consequences."
"Would it not be better to send a man after him, and bring the letter back?" asked Chao Gai.
"How can we do that? Is he not the Divine Traveler? He will now be nearly two hundred li on his way. We must not however have the slightest delay in this matter, but must go at once to save those two men."
"How can we save them?" asked Chao Gai. "Have you any plan?"
Wu Yong whispered in Chao Gai's ear, and then said, "Sir; we must do this and issue an order to our men to start at once. It permits of no delay."
Chao Gai issued the orders, and all the men went to get their arms, and very soon were on their way to Jiangzhou.
Dai Zong arrived back at Jiangzhou within the scheduled time, and Prefect Cai was very glad to see him back so quickly, and offered Dai Zong three cups of wine as a reward. When the Prefect received the dispatch he asked, "Did you see my father?"
"I stayed there for only one night, so I did not see the Prime Minister," replied Dai Zong.
The Prefect read the letter which began with "I have duly received your presents." Then in the middle of the letter was this, "The Emperor would like to see the rebel Song Jiang, so you must send him here in a cart well guarded, and care must be taken that he does not escape on the way." The letter concluded with this, "As regards Huang Wenbing, his case will soon be put before the Emperor, and he will be appointed to a higher post."
The Prefect was highly delighted, and gave Dai Zong twenty-five taels of silver. He then issued an order for a prisoner's cart to be got ready for Song Jiang, and appointed an escort to go with it.
Dai Zong after expressing his thanks went to his quarters, bought some food, and took it to Song Jiang in the prison.
Prefect Cai gave orders that the cart for the prisoner must start in a day or two. Just then the gatekeeper reported that Huang Wenbing wished to see the Prefect, and was told to bring the visitor into the private apartments. Huang had brought wine and fruit which he presented to the Prefect who after thanking him said, "You give me so many presents that I hardly know how to recompense you."
"Don't mention it. They are only small things from the country."
"I shall congratulate you that you will soon be appointed to a good post."
"How do you know that?"
"Yesterday I got a reply from my father in the capital, and he orders me to send that seditious man Song Jiang there. Your name will be mentioned to the Emperor and you will be promoted very soon."
"Many thanks for your recommendation. Your messenger must have flown like a spirit."
"I will show you the reply which will convince you that I am telling you the truth."
"As it is a personal letter from your father I dare not presume to look at it. But as you have asked me to do so I will beg you to let me see it."
"You are a very intimate friend of mine," said the Prefect, "so why should you not read my letter?" He sent a messenger to bring the letter, and handed it to Huang Wenbing. The latter read the letter through, and looking carefully at the seal noticed that it looked quite like the impression from a new seal. He wagged his head, and said, "This letter is not genuine."
"You are mistaken," said the Prefect; "I know it is my father's handwriting. Why do you think it is false?"
"Sir, please allow me to speak. Do the letters from your father always bear this seal?"
"Other letters from my father did not bear such a seal as this, as he always signs his name. But the seal must have been at his side so he just used it for this letter."
"Please pardon me if I am too loquacious, but I think that this letter is a forgery to deceive you. As you know the styles of writing of Cai, Su, Huang, and Mi are well known everywhere so that many people have learned them. Only this seal is exactly like what your father used when he was a member of the Hanlin Academy. But as he is now the Prime Minister why would he use this seal? Moreover, as he is writing to you, his son, why does he use a seal with his full name on? Your father is the most able and illustrious man in the empire, and would not make such a mistake as this. If, however, you do not believe me then you can cross-examine the messenger as to what people did he see in the Prime Minister's residence. If his answers are wrong then the letter must be false. You have been very kind to me in the past so I presume to talk to you in this free manner. Please excuse me."
"Never mind," said Prefect Cai Jiu. "The messenger has not been to Kaifeng before so I shall soon find out if he did not go there this time." He asked Huang Wenbing to sit behind the screen, and sent a messenger to summon Dai Zong as he wanted to see him about some other matter.
Now when Dai Zong arrived at Song Jiang's cell in the prison he whispered to him all that had happened at Liangshan Marsh. The next day Dai Zong was invited by a friend to dine at a wine shop in the town, and while they were drinking a messenger came and told Dai Zong that the Prefect Cai wanted to see him. When he reached the yamen the Prefect spoke to him, "I think that I did not reward you sufficiently for the excellent service in which you carried out that commission to Kaifeng."
"I am your messenger so why dared I to be slow in executing your business."
"I have been very busy lately and have not had the opportunity of speaking to you about that matter again. When you visited the capital by which gate did you enter?"
"When I reached Kaifeng it was evening and almost dark so that I could not see the name of the gate."
"Whom did you speak to at the door of my father's residence? Where did you rest while you were there?"
"I gave your letter and presents to the doorkeeper, and he told me that I had better sleep in some inn for the night. I did so, and the next morning I went to your father's residence about 4 A.M., and received the reply. As I knew the matter was urgent I did not delay by talking to the doorkeeper, and started off immediately on my return journey."
"Could you tell me how old was the doorkeeper, was he lean or stout, tall or little, and had he a moustache or not?"
"It was dark in the evening when I was there, and the following morning it was not quite daybreak so that I could not get a clear view of the gatekeeper. He was not very tall, and had a little moustache."
The Prefect became angry at this, and shouted out to his attendants, "Seize that man!" They did this, and bound him with ropes.
"I have committed no crime," said Dai Zong.
"You deserve death," shouted Prefect Cai Jiu. "The doorkeeper Old Wang at my father's house died a number of years ago, and that work is now done by his son who is quite young so that he cannot have a moustache as you say. Moreover, Young Wang could not go inside with the letter. When letters and dispatches arrive his duty is to call a servant named Zhang who would take the letters to the steward Li who after delivering it and finding all in order, would come to the door to receive the presents. It takes two or three days before a reply can be got. Further, the presents would not be received in an irregular manner as it is usual for a confidential clerk to receive them, and he would ask many questions. Yesterday I was so busy, that I was almost deceived by you. Now you have a chance of speaking the truth, and you must tell me where you got this letter."
"When I was on this business I did everything with the greatest speed, and therefore did not notice clearly who handed me the letter."

"Nonsense! You, thief, will not speak the truth unless I beat it out of you," shouted Prefect Cai Jiu. "You there! Beat this fellow severely!"
The attendants did not like to do this, but they knew that if they dealt only light blows the Prefect would notice it, and only be more angry. So they took Dai Zong, and dealt heavy blows so that blood was soon flowing from the wounds. Dai Zong could not stand the pain any longer, so he confessed, "Certainly the letter is a false one."
"Where did you get it?" asked the Prefect.
"When I was passing Liangshan Marsh I was seized by some bandits who took me to their stronghold, and were going to cut me open, and take out my heart. They found your letter in my clothes, and so they released me. I knew that I could not return here and attempted to commit suicide. But they wrote the reply and told me that that would save my life. I was afraid that if I told you the truth you would punish me so I deceived you in this way."
"That may be so, but there is still something in your statement that means deception. It is evident that you are in complot with the bandits on Liangshan Marsh, and planned to take my letter there, and then make up this tale when you returned. Beat this fellow again!"
But Dai Zong was now determined not to admit that the bandits were his friends. When Prefect Cai Jiu saw that the beating had no effect he said, "I will not ask him anything else. Put a cangue on this man, and lock him up in the prison."
This was done, and then Prefect Cai expressed his thanks to Huang Wenbing. "If it had not been for your valuable suggestion I should have made a serious blunder."
"It is evident that this fellow is in close alliance with the bandits on Liangshan Marsh, and that he has planned all this deception himself. If you do not have him executed at once you will live to regret it," said Huang Wenbing.
"I am going to cross-examine these two prisoners, and after getting their confessions will have them executed before I report the case to the Emperor."
"Your measures are excellent," said Huang Wenbing. "I am sure that the Emperor will appreciate very much your capable administration. If you do this it will prevent the brigands from trying to rescue their friends from jail."
"You have been of great assistance to me and I will report the case to the Emperor, and strongly recommend you for promotion."
After dining together Huang Wenbing returned to his own home.
The next day when Prefect Cai Jiu entered the court he summoned the clerk, and told him to quickly write out the case, and add to it the statements made by both Song Jiang and Dai Zong. He was also to write out a wooden tablet stating the crimes of both men who were to be executed at the crossroads the following day. Now it was a general rule that rebels were to be executed without delay. When they were executed there would be no further trouble.
Now the clerk, named Huang, was a personal friend of Dai Zong, but although he would have liked to save him yet he saw no means of doing so. But he replied, "Tomorrow will be the anniversary of the late Emperor's death, and the following day will be the 15th of the seventh month, the Festival of Departed Spirits, so that we cannot execute the prisoners on those days. Three days from now is also debarred as it is the anniversary of the Emperor ascending the throne, but five days from now there will be no obstacle in the way." By saying this Huang hoped to postpone the fatal day.
Prefect Cai Jiu agreed to this, and early in the morning of the sixth day he gave orders for the execution ground to be prepared for the execution. On that day about five hundred soldiers were on parade in front of the prison about 10 A.M. with the executioner. The superintendent of the jail informed the Prefect that everything was ready. Clerk Huang produced the boards with the names of the prisoners, and the Prefect wrote opposite each name the character "Behead." The boards were attached to two reed mats to be suspended on the prisoners' backs. In the jail of Jiangzhou many jailers sympathized with the prisoners, but they could not save them. In the jail the prisoners' hands were bound; their hair was washed with glue so that it stood upright, and in it was stuck a goose quill, and a red silk flower. They were taken to the Green Faced Idol inside the prison where they partook of their final meal and wine. They then kowtowed to the idol, and were conducted to the main entrance of the prison. Neither of the prisoners uttered even a word. Song Jiang occasionally stamped with his foot, while Dai Zong hung his head and sighed. There was a huge crowd of about two thousand civilians pressing forward to see the sight. Upon reaching the execution ground at the crossroads the soldiers formed a ring. The prisoners were placed in the center, and told to sit down—Song Jiang facing the south, and Dai Zong facing the north. It was about a quarter to one when the official in charge of the execution arrived.
The crowd witnessed that on Song Jiang's back was a board with this announcement: "This criminal, Song Jiang, purposely wrote a seditious poem, containing false and devilish sentiments. He was in complot with bandits of Liangshan Marsh, in rebellious designs. According to law he is to be executed."
On Dai Zong's back was a board bearing this statement: "This criminal, Dai Zong, secretly conveyed a letter for Song Jiang to Liangshan Marsh concerning rebellious designs, and according to law he is to be executed."
Now, the Prefect reined in his horse to await the report. He noticed that on the east side of the execution ground there was quite a crowd of snake charmers who were trying to get to the execution ground but they were being forced back by the armed guard.
He also heard a noise on the west side, and saw there a crowd of medicine sellers armed with sticks who were also being repulsed by the soldiers.
A soldier called out, "You fellows have no manners! Why push and shove like that?"
"What do you say? We travel in all parts so why should we be stopped here? We have seen men executed in many places. Even when the Emperor at the capital orders an execution he allows anybody to witness it. But you fellows at this insignificant place, try to make it appear an important affair when you only kill a couple of men. If we go inside and look on what damned difference does it make?"
They still tried to force their way in, but the soldiers would not let them do so. In this tumult the superintendent of the execution shouted out, "Do not admit those fellows!"
While this row was still proceeding the Prefect sitting on his horse saw a crowd of men on the south side carrying loads on bamboo poles over their shoulders. They were also trying to get to the execution ground. The soldiers called out, "This is an execution! What do you fellows come here for?"
"We are carrying these things to give to the Prefect so why don't you let us proceed?"
"Even men in the Prefect's yamen have to go some other way," replied the soldiers.
The men put down their loads, held the poles in their hands, and stood looking on.
The Prefect now noticed on the north side a number of hawkers pushing carts who also were insisting upon seeing the execution. The soldiers blocked the way, and the hawkers said, "We are in a hurry. Let us go through."
"This is an execution. You cannot go this way!"
The hawkers laughed, "That sounds easy. But we come from the capital and do not know the byroads about here. We only know the main road." The soldiers still would not allow them to pass, and the hawkers put down their carts and stood on them so that they could see over the heads of the soldiers.
By this time there was a general uproar on all sides and just then a messenger pressed his way out through the crowd, and coming to the prefect announced, "It is now a quarter to one." The Prefect ordered that the execution was to take place.
Inside the ground were two executioners who held swords in their hands ready for the final moment. The word "Execute" had been called out when one of the hawkers standing on thier carts took a small gong out of his clothes, and struck it four times. Immediately the crowds on all the four sides pressed forward.
Overlooking the execution, ground was a tea-house, and standing on the veranda was a tall man with a sallow complexion. When he heard the gong he bellowed out like a clap of thunder, and with an axe in each hand he leapt from the veranda onto the ground. He rushed at the executioners and killed them on the spot. He then rushed at the Prefect who was seated on his horse, and the numerous soldiers who were armed with spears could not impede him. Seeing this hopeless position the Prefect Cai Jiu took to flight with those soldiers. The sudden attack from all sides resulted in many soldiers being killed, and the remainder scattered about leaving the prisoners behind. The hawkers soon released the two prisoners and put them in their carts. Some of the attacking crowd used bows and arrows, others spears, others bamboo poles, while others simply threw stones at the soldiers. This huge crowd were bandits from Liangshan Marsh led by seventeen of the leaders under Chao Gai. But Chao Gai was surprised to see the man with the two axes who was doing deadly work among the soldiers. He did not know the man, but Dai Zong informed him that the man was Li Kui, 'Black Whirlwind,' a very rough character who however was a supporter of Song Jiang.
Chao Gai called out, "Are you not 'Black Whirlwind'?" but the man did not reply as he was still busy brandishing his two axes. Chao Gai therefore told the two bandits who carried Dai Zong and Song Jiang on their backs respectively to follow the big black fellow. All the bandits now moved towards the crossroads where many soldiers and people had been killed, and the ground was covered with streams of blood.
The bandits followed Li Kui and they fought their way out of the town. The rear was brought up by four of the leaders with men armed with bows who discharged arrows rapidly at the crowd of soldiers and civilians who dared not approach them. The bandits at last reached the bank of the river. Chao Gai saw that Li Kui was covered with blood, and was still killing people who were in the way, so Chao Gai called out to him, "We are not fighting civilians so do not kill any more people." But Li Kui paid no attention to this, and continued killing people. Wherever he saw a man he killed him. When the bandits had gone about two //along the bank of the Yangtze River they still could not find a way for further progress. Chao Gai was much annoyed at this unexpected check, but Li Kui called out, "Never mind! I will carry my brother Song Jiang on my back to the temple." They then saw a large temple, but noticed that the doors were firmly closed. Li Kui however took his axe, and soon cut the doors open.
Chao Gai noticed that there were very old fir trees which cast deep shadows on both sides of the door, and that above the door was a board with four characters in gilt, "Bailong Spirit Temple."
The men carried Song Jiang and Dai Zong into the temple, and put them down there. Song Jiang now opened his eyes, and seeing Chao Gai and the other men he cried, saying, "Elder brother, am I not dreaming?"
"Sir, if you had only been at Liangshan Marsh this trouble would not have arisen," said Chao Gai. "But who is this sallow complexioned man who has been killing so many people?"
"He is Li Kui, the 'Black Whirlwind.' He tried to rescue me from prison but I was afraid and would not listen to his suggestions."
"He is a very rare kind of man," said Chao Gai. "He is not afraid of either swords, axes, or arrows."
"I think we had better find new clothes for our two brothers," interposed Hua Rong.
Just then Li Kui came out of the porch of the temple with two axes still in his hands.
"Where have you been?" called out Song Jiang.
"I want to find the caretaker of this temple, and kill him," replied Li Kui, "I do not know what spirits or demons have caused them to fasten the doors of the temple in broad daylight, so I thought it better to sacrifice to the door god with his head but so far I could not find him anywhere."
"Come here," said Song Jiang, "and I will introduce you to my commanding officers."
Li Kui threw his axes down and kneeling before Chao Gai said, "Brother, please excuse my rough manners." He then saluted all the other men who were standing around, and among them was much pleased to recognize Zhu Gui who was a compatriot of his own village.
Here Hua Rong interrupted, "Elder brother, as you said that it would be better if we all followed this man, Li Kui, who will guide us to a better spot, but now we are all in an awkward position, because we are surrounded by water, and have no means of escape should troops be dispatched from the town to capture us. "
"Do not get excited," said Li Kui, "I will go with you into the town, and kill some more men even including the Prefect Cai Jiu so as to enjoy ourselves."
Dai Zong had now regained consciousness, and after listening to this said, "Younger brother, you must not do such a stupid thing. There are about seven thousand cavalry in the town, and against them you would stand no chance."
Ruan the Seventh, said, "On the other side of the river there are many boats. I and my two brothers will swim across, and get the boats to come here so that you can all embark."
Chao Gai thought this a good plan, and the three brothers Ruan stripped off their clothes, armed themselves with a dagger each, and plunged into the water. They had not swam more than a third of a //when the men on shore saw three boats coming down the river. The men on the boats were sculling energetically, and a whistle was being blown. There were about ten men on each boat who were well armed and this filled the brigands with great anxiety. Song Jiang who was inside the temple heard the noise, and said, "In my life there is nothing but trouble." He got up and went outside to see what was happening. He saw a big man standing on one boat armed with a five-pronged spear. On his head he wore a red turban, and was dressed in white silk. He was blowing the whistle. Song Jiang at once recognized him as Zhang Shun and signaled to him with his hand shouting out, "Younger brother, save me!"
Zhang Shun at once recognized Song Jiang, and called out that he was coming. The boats almost flew to the bank of the river. The brothers Ruan who were swimming saw the three boats, and at once turned back to the bank they had left. Song Jiang knew the men on the boats. On the first boat was Zhang Shun with about ten followers. The second boat carried Zhang Heng, Mu Hong, Mu Chun, and Xue Yong with about fifteen other men. On the third boat were Li Jun, Li Li, Tong Wei, and Tong Meng and about ten other men. They were all armed and disembarked.
When Zhang Shun met Song Jiang he was much pleased and wept saying, "From the time of your imprisonment I have felt uneasy, but could see no way of setting you free. Then I heard of the arrest of Dai Zong, and in addition I did not meet Li Kui so I had to find my elder brother Zhang Heng and we both went to Old Mu's farmhouse and summoned many of our friends to assemble at that place. Today we intended to go to Jiangzhou to rescue you from the prison, but did not think that other men would precede us with that object. We dare not venture to make acquaintance of such great heroes as these—are they not all chivalrous men under Chao Gai from Liangshan Marsh?"
Song Jiang pointed with his finger and said, "This is my elder brother, Chao Gai. Please come inside the temple, and I will introduce all of you to each other."
They then all went into the temple, altogether twenty-nine leaders, and there occurred what we have called, "The Meeting at the Bailong Temple."
They had just finished their general introduction to each other, when one of the bandits rushed into the temple in an agitated manner and said, "In the town there is great noise of gongs and drums assembling the troops, and many soldiers are already passing the gates to arrest us. There are myriads of flags enough to conceal the sun, and swords as numerous as a field of hemp. Cavalry was in front and officers with so many big swords and big axes in the rear; they are now rushing upon this temple."
Li Kui upon hearing this shouted, "Kill them!" and seizing his two axes he rushed out of the temple.
Chao Gai called out, "If you don't do it at once, it can never be done. All you gentlemen must now assist me in defeating these soldiers, before we go back to Liangshan Marsh."
His followers all cried out with one voice, "We will obey your orders."

Waves were stained with blood so rare,
Dragons came forth from their lair;
During storm that raged then,
Tigers leapt from mountain den.

139
Song Jiang plans the capture of, Attacks, & Cleverly Takes Wuweijun; White Eel Zhang Shun Captures & Arrests Bee Sting Huang Wenbing alive

Liu Tang and Zhu Gui escorted Song Jiang and Dai Zong on board. Li Jun, Zhang Shun and the three Ruan brothers put the boats in order. From the river's edge they could see the government troops advancing from the city, six or seven thousand strong. The cavalrymen in the van wore helmets and armor. They were equipped with bows and arrows and carried long lances. Behind them hordes of foot soldiers, shouting and waving banners, surged fiercely forward.
Li Kui, stark naked, dashed towards them, brandishing his axes. He was closely followed by Hua Rong, Huang Xin, Lu Fang and Guo Sheng. Eyeing the bristling lances of the cavalry ahead, Hua Rong feared for Li Kui's safety. He quietly pulled out his bow, fitted an arrow, stretched the string to its utmost, and let fly at the commander of the horsemen. The whistling shaft brought him tumbling to the ground. Startled, the cavalrymen pulled their mounts around and fled for their lives, knocking down half the infantry in the process.
At this point, the bold gallants charged. They slaughtered the government troops till bodies littered the plain and the river was dyed red with blood, and fought to the city walls of Jiangzhou. From the ramparts the defenders flung down logs and bombarded them with ballista stones, covering the frantic retreat into the city of the last of the government troops. Then the big gates were barred. For several days no one dared to come out.
The bold fighters, pulling Black Whirlwind back with them, returned to the boats before the White Dragon Temple. Chao Gai reassembled his forces and ordered all men on board. The three craft shoved off. Sails were raised to catch a favorable wind. Filled with fighters and commanders, the boats headed for the manor of Squire Mu. An uneventful journey brought them to his dock, where they disembarked.
Mu Hong invited them into the inner hall of the manor. Squire Mu emerged and greeted Song Jiang and his companions.
"You chieftains have had a hard night," the old man said. "Please avail yourselves of our guest house and rest."
The visitors retired to rooms provided, where they rested and mended their clothing and weapons. Mu Hong instructed his vassals to kill a yellow ox, a dozen pigs and sheep, as well as chickens, geese, fish and ducks, and prepare rare and tasty dishes for a feast in honor of his guests.
During the drinking, many details were recalled. Chao Gai said to the two Mu brothers: "If you hadn't come to our rescue in your boats we'd surely have landed in their net."
"What made you choose that road out of the city in the first place?" Squire Mu queried.
"I went to fight wherever people were thickest, and these fellows followed," Li Kui explained. "I didn't ask them to."
Everybody laughed.
Song Jiang rose and addressed the assembly. "Superintendent Dai and I would be dead now if you hadn't come to our rescue. Our gratitude is as deep as the sea. We don't know how to thank you. I hate only Huang Wenbing. That villain did nothing but pick fault and spread slanders. He tried to ruin us. I must have vengeance. I beg you bold gallants to do me a great favor once again and attack Wuweijun, kill Huang Wenbing and slake Song Jiang's burning hatred. What do you say?"
"We can't get away with another sneak raid," mused Chao Gai. "How shall we proceed? Those treacherous scoundrels will be on their guard. Perhaps we should return to the mountain stronghold and muster a larger force. We'll get Wu Yong, Gongsun, Lin Chong and Qin Ming to join us. There's still time."
"If you go back, you won't be able to come again," Song Jiang said. "In the first place, it's too far. In the second place, the Jiangzhou Prefecture will surely warn all districts to be on the alert. We have to strike now, before they have a chance to get ready."
"You're quite right," said Hua Rong. "The problem is we have no one who is familiar with the roads and terrain. We'll send a man into Wuweijun first, to reconnoiter. We've got to know how to get in and out of there and where, exactly, Huang Wenbing lives. Then we can make our move."
Xue Yong stood up. "I've been around a lot. I know Wuweijun better than any of you. Why not let me go in and see what I can find out?"
"If you would, brother," said Song Jiang, "that would be fine."
Xue Yong took his leave that same day, and departed.
Song Jiang and the brigand leaders remained in Mu Hong's manor and discussed the attack on Wuweijun. They put their lances and swords in order, arranged their bows and arrows, accumulated boats large and small, and made preparations. Two days later, Xue Yong returned, bringing with him a man he presented to Song Jiang.
"Who is this brave fellow?" Song Jiang asked.
"His name is Hou Jian, and his home town is Hongdu. He's a first-rate tailor. Needle and thread in his bands really fly. He's also good with lance and staff, a skill which I have taught him. Because he's dark and thin and agile, people call him the Long-Armed Ape. At the moment, he's doing some tailoring in the home of Huang Wenbing. I happened to run into him, and brought him here."
Song Jiang was very pleased. He invited the man to be seated. Hou Jian was one of the stars of Earthly Fiends. The loyalty between him and Song Jiang was immediate and natural. Song Jiang asked for news about Jiangzhou and the terrain in and around Wuweijun.
"Prefect Cai tallied his soldier and civilian losses. There are more than five hundred dead and countless wounded by arrows," Xue Yong said. "He's rushed a messenger off to report to the throne. The Jiangzhou city gates are shut every day from noon on. Anybody going in or out is questioned closely. The harm done to you, brother, is not Prefect Cai's fault. Each time he acted against you and the Superintendent, it was at the instigation of Huang Wenbing. Since our raid on the execution grounds, Jiangzhou has been in chaos. It's patrolled night and day. When I was inquiring in Wuweijun, I met this brother as he was coming out to eat. I got the details from him."

"How do you know all this, brother Hou?" Song Jiang asked. "Since childhood I have loved jousting with lance and staff," said Hou Jian. "I owe much to Teacher Xue's instructions. That is something I shall never forget. The last few days I have been doing some tailoring in the home of Huang Wenbing. Coming out, I ran into Teacher. He mentioned your great name and told me what has been going on. I've always wanted to meet you, so I took this opportunity to come and report in full.
"Huang Wenbing has an older brother, Huang Wenye. Both are sons of the same mother. Wenye is a good man. He repairs bridges and lays roads, builds idols and sustains monks, rescues the endangered and succors the poor. For this reason he is known in Wuweijun as Huang the Buddha. But Huang Wenbing, although he was once a deputy prefect, is vicious and cruel. In Wuweijun they call him Huang the Wasp. The brothers live in two separate compounds near the town's North Gate, but their entrances are in the same lane. Huang Wenbing's compound is right up against the town wall. Wenye's is due south, and borders on a large street.
"When I was working there, I heard Wenbing come home and say: 'They fooled the prefect. I exposed their trick and advised him to cut off their heads first, and then report to the imperial court.' Wenye criticized him behind his back. He said: 'What a disgraceful thing to do. It's none of his affair. Why should he want to harm them? If there's any justice in Heaven, retribution is bound to follow. He's bringing disaster down on his own head.' When the Wasp heard of the raid on the execution grounds he became very alarmed. Last night he went into Jiangzhou to see the prefect and make plans. He still hasn't returned."
"How far is the Wasp's house from his brother's?" Song Jiang asked.
"Originally, it was all one compound. It's divided into two, now, separated by a vegetable garden."
"How many people in Huang the Wasp's home? How many families are there?"
"Male and female, forty or fifty."
"Heaven has willed that I shall have my revenge and has sent me this man," cried Song Jiang. He turned to his cohorts, "I rely entirely on your support, brothers."
"We'll go through with it though we die! We'll destroy that deceitful villain and wipe your slate of vengeance clean."
"It's only the Wasp I hate. This has nothing to do with the people of Wuweijun. Since his brother is virtuous, you must not harm him, or people will revile us for lacking benevolence. And not the slightest injury may be done to the citizenry. I have a plan. I hope you brothers will assist me."
"We await your instructions."
"If I may trouble Squire Mu, I would like eighty or ninety gunny sacks and a hundred or so bundles of reeds and faggots, plus five large boats and two small. I'd like Zhang Shun and Li Jun to handle the two small boats. Zhang Heng, the three Ruan brothers and Tong Wei will be in charge of the five large craft and man them with good swimmers. This is essential."
"We have here all the reeds, oil-soaked faggots, and sacks you can use. Every man in the manor can swim and handle a boat. Just take what you want," said Mu Hong.
"Brother Hou will first conduct Xue Yong and Bai Sheng into Wuweijun and conceal them there. The next day at the second interval of the third watch when they hear the tinkling of a belled pigeon which we'll release outside the town gate, Bai Sheng will mount the wall and stick a white pennant on a pole at a point nearest to the Wasp's house. That is where we'll climb the town wall."
Song Jiang continued: "Shi Yong and Du Qian, disguised as beggars, will also hide inside the town, near the gate. As soon as they see flames rising, they will kill the gate guards. Li Jun and Zhang Shun will patrol the river in their small craft and be ready for action."
Song Jiang finished making his disposition. Xue Yong, Bai Sheng and Hou Jian left first. Shi Yong and Du Qian disguised themselves as beggars, concealed daggers on their persons, and followed. The large boats were laden with sand-filled sacks, reeds and oil-soaked faggots. When the time came, each of the bold leaders girded up his clothing and readied his weapons. The fighting men hid in the holds.
Then the chieftains went on board. Chao Gai, Song Jiang and Hua Rong were on Tong Wei's craft. Yan Shun, Wang the Stumpy Tiger and Zheng Tianshou were on Zhang Heng's craft. Dai Zong, Liu Tang and Huang Xin joined Ruan the Second. Lu Fang, Guo Sheng and LiLi were with Ruan the Fifth. Mu Hong, Mu Chun and Li Kui went with Ruan the Seventh. Only Zhu Gui and Song Wan remained in Squire Mu's manor. Their job was to watch for possible developments in Jiangzhou. Tong Meng went ahead in a fast fishing craft to scout the town.
The brigands and fighters crouched in the holds. Peasants, vassals and boatmen manned the oars. Stealthily through the darkness the vessels advanced on Wuweijun.
It was the seventh lunar month, a still, windless night. A bright moon shone on the clear waters, which reflected on their jade surface the dark green shadows of the mountains. By the first watch the craft, large and small, had reached the banks of the Wuwei River, and were moored in a line deep in the reeds. Tong Meng returned in his fast little boat.
"All quiet in the town," he reported.
Song Jiang ordered his men to unload the sandbags and reeds and dry faggots onto the bank. He scrutinized the town wall. When the watchman's drum beat out the commencement of the second watch, Song Jiang directed the brigands to shift the bags and reeds to near the wall. The bold gallants had their weapons in hand. With the exception of Zhang Heng, the three Ruan brothers and the two brothers Tong, who were left to guard the boats, all moved towards the wall of the town.
About half a //from the North Gate, Song Jiang directed that a belled pigeon be released. Atop the wall a white pennant on a bamboo pole suddenly appeared fluttering in the breeze. Song Jiang ordered his men to pile the sandbags at that point against the wall, and told the fighters to climb up with the reeds and oil-soaked faggots.
Bai Sheng met them on the ramparts. He pointed downwards inside the town. "Huang the Wasp lives in that lane."
"Where are Xue Yong and Hou Jian?" Song Jiang queried.
"Concealed in the Wasp's compound, waiting for you."
"Have you seen Shi Yong and Du Qian?"
"They're hiding beside the town gate."
Song Jiang led his men down the wall into the town and proceeded to the door of the Wasp's compound. Hou Jian was lurking beneath the overhanging eaves. Song Jiang summoned him softly.
"Open the door of the vegetable garden, and the men will pile the reeds and faggots inside. Tell Xue Yong to set them ablaze, then knock on the Wasp's door and say: 'Your neighbor's house is on fire! We've brought crates of his belongings here for safekeeping!' When they open the door I've arranged what to do next."
Song Jiang sent two groups of men to guard both ends of the lane. Hou Jian opened the door of the vegetable garden and the fighters brought in the reeds and faggots and laid them in a pile. He handed fire-making materials to Xue Yong, who lit the reeds. Hou Jian rushed out and pounded on Huang Wenbing's door.
"Your neighbor's house is on fire! We've brought crates of his belongings here for safekeeping. Open up, quick!"
Those inside could see the flames rising in the next compound, and they hastily opened the door. Chao Gai, Song Jiang and the others charged in, yelling fiercely. They killed everyone in sight, a total of nearly fifty persons, young and old. Not a single one was spared. But the Wasp was not at home.
The bold gallants collected all the money and valuables Huang had extorted from innocent people. A loud whistle, and the brigands shouldered crates and hampers of booty on carrying-poles and mounted the ramp to the top of the town wall.
When Shi Yong and Du Qian saw the fire they pulled out their daggers and killed the soldiers guarding the gate. Neighbors hurried along the street with buckets and ladders to fight the blaze.
"Stop where you are," Shi Yong and Du Qian shouted. "There are thousands of us here from Liangshan Marsh. We're wiping out Huang the Wasp's family, one and all, to avenge Song Jiang and Dai Zong. This has nothing to do with you. Go home and hide. Don't interfere in things that are none of your business."
Some of the neighbors weren't convinced, and stood watching. But when they saw Black Whirlwind Li Kui rolling towards them brandishing his axes, they cried out in dismay, picked up their ladders and buckets, and fled.
In the rear lane was a contingent of soldiers who guarded the town gate. Many of them rushed forward with empty sacks and barbed poles to extinguish the flames. Hua Rong quickly bent his bow and sped an arrow into the man in the lead. He stumbled to the ground.
"Anyone who wants to die, come fight the fire," Hua Rong shouted. The soldiers retreated in a body.
Xue Yong set every part of Huang the Wasp's compound to the torch. It was soon being consumed by crackling flames.
By then Li Kui had smashed the lock and opened the town gate. Half the raiders left through this exit. The other half went over the wall. They were met by the three Ruan brothers, Zhang Heng and the two Tong brothers. The crates and hampers of booty were loaded onto the craft. It was already known in Wuweijun that the gallants of Liangshan Marsh had snatched the proposed victims from the execution grounds in Jiangzhou and slaughtered many people. Who would dare now to pursue them? Everyone stayed out of their way.
Bitterly disappointed that they hadn't taken Huang the Wasp, Song Jiang and his brave company boarded the vessels and rowed towards Mu Hong's manor. Of this we'll say no more.
The flames in Wuweijun, encrimsoning the night sky, stirred excited conversation all over the city of Jiangzhou. A report was made to the prefect. Huang the Wasp, who was at that moment with the official, became disturbed.
"There's a fire in my town. I'd better go home and look after things."
Prefect Cai ordered that the city gate be opened to let Huang out and that a government boat take him across the river. Huang thanked the prefect and departed. With his retainer he hastily boarded the craft and set out. From the river he stared at Wuweijun. The flames were burning fiercely, reflecting red on the surface of the water.
"That fire's near the North Gate," one of the boatmen said.
Huang grew more agitated. As they approached the center of the river, a small craft was seen rowing past them. Shortly after, another little boat appeared. Instead of passing, it proceeded directly in the path of the government vessel.
"Who are you?" the retainer shouted angrily. "Veer off!"
A big fellow jumped up in the small boat. He had a grappling hook in his hands. "I've been ordered to Jiangzhou to report on the fire," he said.
Huang popped out of the cabin. "Where is it?"
"North Gate. Huang the Wasp's whole family has been slaughtered by bold fellows from Liangshan Marsh. They've taken all of his valuables and set the place to the torch."
Huang groaned. He was absolutely stunned. The man snagged the boat with his hook and jumped on board. Huang was a very sharp person. He immediately sensed that something was wrong. He darted to the stern and dived into the river.
But a man from the other little boat was waiting for him underwater. He seized Huang around the middle and hauled him back to the government vessel. The big fellow helped heave him on deck, then bound him securely with rope. Zhang Shun the White Streak in the Waves had made the underwater capture. Li Jun the Turbulent River Dragon was the big man with the grappling hook. They now both stood on the deck of the government craft. The official boatmen fervently kowtowed.
"We're not going to kill you," Li Jun assured them. "We only want this scoundrel Huang the Wasp. Go back and tell that thieving donkey of a prefect the gallants of Liangshan Marsh will let him keep his head for the time being. But sooner or later we're coming to collect it."
"We'll do that," the trembling boatmen stammered.
Zhang Shun transferred the prisoner to his own craft and let the government vessel depart. The two bold fellows sculled their swift little boats towards the manor. They found the chieftains waiting for them on the bank, where the crates and hampers were being unloaded. Song Jiang was beside himself with joy when he saw that Huang had been captured.
"Just the man we've been looking for," the assembled gallants exclaimed.
Li Jun and Zhang Shun brought Huang ashore. Surrounded by the whole company, he was taken to the manor. Zhu Gui and Song Wan greeted the returning raiders. All went into the thatch-roofed hall and sat down.
Song Jiang stripped Huang of his wet clothes, tied him to a willow tree, and asked the leaders to sit around in a circle. He called for a pot of wine and cups for all. From Chao Gai the highest to the lowest-ranking Bai Sheng, they totalled thirty bold gallants. When the cups were filled, Song Jiang turned to his captive.
"Huang Wenbing, you knave! I've never done anything against you. Why should you want to harm me? Four or five times, you tried to get Prefect Cai to kill me and Dai Zong. A man who's studied the books of the sages—how could you be so vicious? There's no terrible blood feud between us. Why have you conspired against me? Your brother Huang Wenye was born of the same mother, yet he's a kindly man. The folk in your town call him Huang the Buddha. Last night I ordered that he was not to be disturbed. But you, you rogue, do nothing but injure people! You tie up with the powerful, inveigle yourself in with officials, and persecute the innocent. In Wuweijun you're known as Huang the Wasp. Well, today I'm going to remove your sting!"
"I acknowledge my crimes," said Huang. "I ask only for a quick death."
"Thieving donkey," shouted Chao Gai. "You're going to die, never fear. You wouldn't have behaved as you did if you knew this day of reckoning was at hand."
"Which one of you brothers will do the deed for me?" Song Jiang asked.
Li Kui the Black Whirlwind leaped forward. "I'll slice the villain for you, brother."
He took a sharp knife, looked at Huang and laughed. "In the prefect's rear hall you lied and slandered, stirred him up, invented stories out of whole cloth, deceived him. So you want a quick death? I'm going to see to it that you die slowly."
He started by carving the prisoner's legs. It wasn't long before he had sliced him to ribbons. Only then did Li Kui cut open Huang's chest, pull out his heart and hold it up for the assembled gallants to see.
All returned to the thatch-roofed hall and congratulated Song Jiang. To their astonishment he dropped to his knees. They hastily knelt with him.
"What is it?" they cried. "Speak freely. There's nothing we're not willing to hear."
"I'm a person of no talent, only a clerk. But I've always tried to be good to people and make friends with the bold and gallant. Unfortunately, lacking the strength and the ability, I have never been able to treat them as is their due and satisfy my life-long wish. When I was being exiled to Jiangzhou, Chao Gai and you other chieftains urged me to remain with you. But because of my father's strict instructions I was unable to do so. Later, I had a Heaven-sent opportunity to meet another band of heroes at the Xunyang River. Who would have thought that in my ignorance I would get drunk and write wild words and put Superintendent Dai's life in jeopardy? With fearless disregard of danger, you gallants snatched me from the tiger's den, the dragon's lair, and saved my wretched life. And now you have graciously helped me get my revenge.
"But we have committed great crimes, and caused turmoil in two prefectural towns. This will surely be reported to the emperor. I have no choice but to join you brothers in Liangshan Marsh. What about the rest of you? If you feel the same, gather your belongings and we'll go together. If there are some who don't wish to go, I await your orders. It's just that I'm afraid this is going to stir up a tremendous reaction ..."
"We'll all go," Li Kui interrupted. "Anyone who refuses gets a knock from my friggin ax. I'll cut him in two."
"How can you speak so crudely? Each brother must make up his own mind."
The men conferred. "We've slaughtered scores of officers and soldiers and thrown two towns into disorder. The prefect is bound to report to the imperial court, which is sure to send an army to capture us," they said. "If we don't leave with brother Song Jiang, to live and die together, where else can we go?"
Very pleased, Song Jiang thanked them. That same day Zhu Gui and Song Wan were sent ahead to inform the mountain stronghold.
The marchers were divided into five units. In the first were Chao Gai, Song Jiang, Hua Rong, Dai Zong and Li Kui. In the second were Liu Tang, Du Qian, Shi Yong, Xue Yong and Hou Jian. In the third were Li Jun, LiLi, Lu Fang, Guo Sheng, Tong Wei and Tong Meng. In the fourth were Huang Xin, Zhang Shun, Zhang Heng, and the three Ruan brothers. In the fifth were Mu Hong, Mu Chun, Yan Shun, Stumpy Tiger Wang, Zheng Tianshou and Bai Sheng. These twenty-eight leaders and some of the men divided the booty taken at Huang the Wasp's house and loaded it onto carts.
Mu Hong also put Squire Mu and the entire household in vehicles, along with family valuables and possession. Vassals who did not want to go along were given silver and told to find other masters. Those who did joined the party. The first four units had already set out. Mu Hong issued a dozen torches, set fire to the manor, left his fields, and headed for Liangshan Marsh.
One behind another, the units proceeded, separated by intervals of about twenty //. We'll speak now of the first unit, led by Chao Gai. Song Jiang, Hua Rong, Dai Zong and Li Kui, all mounted, and followed by a body of men and carts. Oh the third day of the march they came to a place called Yellow Gate Mountain.
"An evil-looking mountain," Song Jiang said to Chao Gai. "It must be infested with bandits. We'd better send someone to urge the rear units to catch up before we go on."
The words were scarcely out of his mouth when drums beat and gongs clashed in a gap in the mountain. "What did I tell you?" exclaimed Song Jiang. "We'll halt right here. When the rest of our force joins us we'll deal with those louts."
Hua Rong fitted an arrow to his bow, Chao Gai and Dai Zong each clutched halberds. Li Kui held his axes. They gathered protectively around Song Jiang and urged their mounts forward. Four or five hundred bandits came riding down the slope, with four bold fellows at their head each with a weapon in hand.
"You rioted in Jiangzhou, raided Wuweijun, slaughtered government soldiers and people. You still hope to return to Liangshan Marsh?" the four shouted. "We've been waiting for you a long time. Leave us Song Jiang, if you have any sense, and we'll let you live."
Song Jiang stepped out and knelt upon the ground. "There were persons who injured me, Song Jiang, but I could not redress my grievances. Then, gallant men came from all sides and rescued me. Have I offended you four heroes in some way? Restrain your noble hands. Forgive and spare me, I pray."
The four rolled from their saddles, cast their weapons aside, flew forward and dropped to their knees. "We have heard of the great fame of Song Jiang the Timely Rain from Shandong. Though we longed to meet you, it was never possible. Then we heard that you had been convicted in Jiangzhou, and we decided to raid the prison. But we couldn't get any reliable news. The other day we sent one of our men into the city to inquire. He came back and said: 'A large band of bold fellows has already rioted in Jiangzhou and snatched him from the execution grounds. They took him to Jieyang Town. After that, they set fires in Wuweijun and plundered the home of Huang the Wasp.' We figured you must pass this way, and we've had scouts on the lookout. But we weren't sure these were your rescuers, so we put on this little show. Forgive us if we've alarmed you, brother. Today we meet at last. We've prepared some poor fare in our small stronghold as a welcome. Won't you and your gallant escort join with us a while?"
Song Jiang was very pleased. He helped the four to their feet and asked their names. The leader was called Ou Peng, and he came from Huangzhou. He had been a military guard on the Yangzi. But because he had offended his superior officer, he was forced to flee and become a bandit. He had earned himself the nickname Golden-Winged Hawk.
The second was Jiang Jing, from Tanzhou in Hunan. Originally he had studied for the imperial examinations. But when he failed to pass, he abandoned the pen and took up the sword. A clever fellow, he was a skilled mathematician. In ten thousand calculations, he was never off an iota. He was also good with lance and staff, and a sharp tactician in battle. And so he was known as the Magic Calculator.
The third was Ma Lin, from Jinling in Jiankang. He had been an idler who played the double flute. But when he wielded his big skewer knife, a hundred men couldn't come near him. People called him the Elfin Flutist.
Tao Zongwang, the fourth man, was from Guangzhou. His family were tenant farmers. He could ply an iron spade and was very strong. He was skilled also with spear and knife, and was known as the Nine-Tailed Tortoise.
These four bold fellows welcomed Song Jiang, and their underlings brought forth tidbits, a large pot of wine and two platters of meat and laid them out and poured the wine. The cups were handed first to Chao Gai and Song Jiang, then to Hua Rong, Dai Zong and Li Kui. The rest of the unit were introduced, and they were also served wine.
In less than two watches the second unit arrived, and its leaders were introduced. After all had been given wine, they were invited up the mountain, and the ten chieftains proceeded to the stronghold on Yellow Gate Mountain. The four leaders ordered that cows and horses be slaughtered to feed their guests. Bandits were sent down the mountain to invite the other eighteen chieftains to the feast when the remaining three units arrived. Before half the day was gone, they too had come and met their hosts at the festive board in the meeting hall of the fortress.
While they were drinking, Song Jiang said to the four leaders: "I'm on my way to join the forces of brother Chao Gai on Mount Liangshan. I wonder whether you would be willing to abandon this place and come with me?"
"If you two noble warriors don't scorn us as unworthy, we would be pleased to serve as your grooms."
Song Jiang and Chao Gai were delighted. "In that case," they said, "please prepare to depart."
All of the chieftains were glad, and they spent the night in the stronghold.

The next day Song Jiang and Chao Gai went down the mountain and set forth as heads of the first unit, as before. The other units followed, keeping a distance of twenty //between each. Collecting their valuables, the four leaders and their four or five hundred men burned down the Yellow Gate Fortress and brought up the rear as the sixth unit.

Song Jiang was happy they had joined. As he rode along he said to Chao Gai: "Although I've had some alarming experiences since taking to outlawry, I've come to know many good fellows. Today, I'm going with you, brother, to the mountain stronghold and my mind is settled. We'll live and die together."

They chatted of many things upon the road. Before they knew it, they reached Zhu Gui's inn.

Wu Yong, Gongsun Sheng, Lin Chong and Qin Ming, who had remained in charge of the fortress, and two new arrivals Xiao Rang and Jin Dajian, had already been informed by Zhu Gui and Song Wan of their impending arrival. They sent a lesser chieftain every day by boat to the inn to meet them. Now, they proceeded with him to the Shore of Golden Sands. To the thunder of drums and the tootling of flutes, the returning chieftains mounted horses and sedan-chairs and commenced the climb.

At the pass they were greeted with wine by Wu Yong and the other five. All then proceeded to Fraternity Hall, where a burner of good incense was lit. Chao Gai requested Song Jiang to take the seat of highest leadership. Song Jiang wouldn't hear of it.

"You mustn't do this, brother," he protested. "I owe my life to the fearless rescue by you gallants. You, brother, are the leader of this stronghold. How can you relinquish it to a man of no talent? I'd rather die than accept."

"Don't talk like that, brother," Chao Gai responded. "We seven wouldn't even be here if you hadn't waded through a sea of blood to save us and brought us up the mountain. You are the rightful benevolent leader. No one is better qualified to take the chair."

"But you are my senior, a man of sixty years. I'd be ashamed." Song Jiang pushed Chao Gai into the first chair. He himself sat down in the second. Wu Yong sat in the third chair, Gongsun Sheng in the fourth.

"Old leaders take seats on the left as hosts, new on the right as guests, without regard to merit or rank," Song Jiang directed. "We'll see how you distinguish yourselves in future engagements, and then decide."

"Very fitting," the others agreed.

Amid the sounding of horns and beating of drums, a total of forty leaders feasted and celebrated.

Song Jiang spoke in detail how the children's ballad at the Eastern Capital had been interpreted by Huang Wenbing so as to complicate Song Jiang himself. How the false letter conveyed by Dai Zong had been explained by Huang who had strongly urged the Prefect to have both Song and Dai executed. "If you bold gallants hadn't rescued us, we wouldn't be here today."

Li Kui jumped to his feet. "Good. Brother fits the Heavenly prediction exactly. Although he had to suffer because of Huang, he had the pleasure of watching me carve him to pieces. We've lots of men and horses. Let's rebel! What's there to be afraid of? Brother Chao Gai will be Emperor of Greater Song, brother Song Jiang will be Emperor of Lesser Song. Wu Yong will be Premier, Gongsun will be Commander-in-Chief, and we'll all be generals. We'll slaughter our way into the Easter Capital, seize the friggin throne, and rejoice! It will be great! Much better than this friggin marsh!"

"Iron Ox," Dai Zong cried, "you're talking nonsense. You can't behave here like you did in Jiangzhou. You must take orders from these two brothers who are our leaders, and not be forever shooting off your mouth. If you keep interrupting like this, we'll cut your head off as a warning to others."

"Aiya, if you do that, it will take me a long time to grow another. All right, I'll just drink my wine and be quiet."

Everybody laughed. Song Jiang harked back to the time of their first battle with government soldiers.

"I was terrified when I heard they were going after you," he said to Chao Gai. "Who would have thought that it would be my turn next."

"You would have saved yourself a good deal of trouble if you remained here on the mountain with us, as we urged, instead of going to Jiangzhou," Wu Yong reminded him. "But everything happens according to Heaven's will."

"Where is that knave Colonel Huang An today?"

"He fell ill and died two or three months after."

Song Jiang sighed. That day, all ate, drank and were merry. Chao Gai first saw to it that Squire Mu and his household were settled in, then divided Huang the Wasp's family valuables among the lesser bandits who had done well, and gave to Dai Zong the hampers of gifts he had been taking to the capital for the prefect. Dai refused to accept. He insisted on contributing them to the general treasury.

Chao Gai introduced Li Jun and the other new leaders to the rank and file, who greeted them respectfully. Oxen and horses were slaughtered for several days in a row for the feasting and celebration. Of that we'll say no more.

At Chao Gai's orders, homes were provided on the front and rear of the mountain, more buildings were erected inside the fortress, and the fortifications were strengthened.

On the third day of feasting, Song Jiang rose and addressed the other chieftains: "I have an important matter to attend to. I wonder if you would allow me to leave for a few days?"

"What is it, brother?" asked Chao Gai. "Where do you wish to go?" Calmly, Song Jiang replied. And as a result, he barely escaped with his life from a forest of knives, and on a mountainside, he received a revelation of immortality.

Truly, because the goddess gave him the three books, he was able to create several fine pages in history.

Now these heroes from Mount Liang assembled in the White Dragon temple outside Jiangzhou, having just stormed the execution ground and rescued Song Jiang and the Magic Messenger, were seventeen in all, namely Chao Gai, Colonel Hua, the Tamer, the Little Duke, the Halberdier, the Red-Haired Devil, the Dandy, the Door-God in the Clouds, the Skyscraper, the Crocodile, Short-Arse, Whitey Zheng, Shi Yong, the three Ruan brothers, and the Daytime Rat. Under their command were eighty or ninety seasoned troops. Those who had joined them on the Yangtze river amounted to nine more leaders, namely the White Eel, his brother the Pilot, the White-Water Dragon, the Executioner, the two Mu brothers, the two Tong brothers and the Pill Monger. They had more than forty men, all of them smugglers. They had arrived in three big boats. In addition there was Iron Ox, who had led the charge out of the city along the banks of the river. So altogether that meeting in the White Dragon temple numbered about a hundred and fifty.

And now they heard the soldier say: "There's a great beating of drums in Jiangzhou city, and waving of banners and sounding of gongs. They're heading this way, shouting and cheering."

When he heard this, Iron Ox gave a roar, seized his axes and bounded out of the door. The others too raised a shout, and brandishing their weapons sallied forth to encounter the enemy. But first the Red-Haired Devil and the Crocodile transferred Song Jiang and the Magic Messenger onto one of the boats for safety. The White-Water Dragon, White Eel and the Ruan brothers took charge of the boats. Along the bank they could see the forces streaming out of the city, some five or six thousand horsemen, the first ranks all in full armour, equipped with bows and arrows and wielding long lances. Behind them thronged the infantry, charging to the attack with waving banners and loud cries.

At this point Iron Ox was well in advance of the others. Waving his axes and stripped for action, he was rushing to the attack. Behind him were Colonel Hua, the Tamer, the Little Duke and the Halberdier, all backing him up. Colonel Hua seeing how the enemy cavalry that faced them were steadying their lances feared for Iron Ox's safety and surreptitiously reached for his bow, fitted an arrow to it, bent it to the full and let fly at the leader of the cavalrymen. The very first arrow sent him tumbling headlong from his horse. This gave the rest of the cavalry such a fright that thinking only of saving themselves, they jerked their horse's heads round and fled, trampling half of their own infantry as they did so. At this point all the heroes charged, cutting down the enemy till the bodies lay piled in heaps and the river ran red with blood. They went on killing till they were at the gates of Jiangzhou. By then the troops defending the city had prepared ballista missiles and stones which they rained down on the attackers. All the government troops now beat a hasty retreat inside the walls and closed the gates. It would be days before they dared venture forth again. The heroes, dragging a reluctant Iron Ox with them, returned to the White Dragon temple and prepared to board the boats. Chao Gai drew them up in good order, and one by one they went down into the boats, which shoved off and left.

The wind was directly behind them so they hoisted sail, the three bigger boats carrying the troops and the leaders setting their course for Squire Mu's. With a following wind they were at the jetty in no time and all disembarked. Mu Hong invited them all into the inner hall where Squire Mu came out to receive them and Song Jiang was able to meet all the other leaders. The Squire said: "You've been hard at it all afternoon, please go and rest in the guest quarters to restore your strength." So they all retired for a while and rested or repaired their clothes and arms. Meanwhile Mu Hong had the servants slaughter an ox, a dozen pigs and sheep, and provide chickens, geese, fish and ducks for a magnificent banquet in honour of the leaders. Later while they were drinking, many incidents were recalled. Chao Gai said: "If you hadn't come with those boats to save us we would have been in serious trouble."

Squire Mu asked: "What made you try and leave the city by that road?"

Iron Ox said: "I was just looking for where there were most people to kill. It was they who chose to follow me, I didn't tell them to." This made everyone laugh.

Song Jiang now rose to his feet and said: "We would both have lost our lives, Superintendent Dai and myself, if all of you had not come to the rescue. Our debt to you is deep as the ocean, how can it ever be repaid? But I still can't get over the way that bastard Huang Wenbing just kept on and on, repeatedly finding ways to express his malice and engineer our downfall. How can I leave this injustice unavenged? I hesitate to ask you this, but would you all do me one more enormous favour? Would you go with me to attack Wuweijun and kill that swine Huang Wenbing, in order to take from me this inexhaustible anger of mine, before we go back home? What say you?"

"But to enter the enemy camp secretly, to raid their very headquarters, that's something that can only work once, how can it be repeated?" Chao Gai objected. "They will be ready for us now. Wouldn't it be better to go back to the mountain fortress and recruit a big force, together with 'Professor' Wu and Taoist Gongsun, Leopard's Head Lin Chong and Thunderclap? There'd still be time enough to avenge you."

Song Jiang said: "If we go back to the mountain first, we can't come out again. In the first place it's a long way. And then Jiangzhou must have reported it to the court and they'll be on the alert everywhere. We mustn't do something foolish. No, we have to take advantage of this opportunity, strike while the iron is hot, there's no point in waiting till they're fully prepared."

Colonel Hua said: "He's right. But all the same, we've nobody who knows the roads, or exactly where he lives. We should send someone first to spy out the land and find out as much as possible, to see exactly what there is there in Wuweijun and pinpoint Bee Sting Huang's house. Then we can get to work."

The Pill Monger now jumped up and said: "I've travelled a lot in the rivers and lakes and I know this place called Wuweijun pretty well. Suppose I go and take a look?"

"That would be great," Song Jiang said.

That same day the Pill Monger said goodbye and left. Song Jiang and the others, meanwhile, remained behind at Squire Mu's and considered the attack on Wuweijun. Swords and spears and bows and arrows were got ready and also a number of large and small boats and suchlike. These preparations were complete when, having been gone two days, the Pill Monger returned, bringing with him another man.

When the Pill Monger greeted Song Jiang, the latter asked: "Who is this good fellow?"

"This is Hou Jian. He's from Hongdu. He's a master tailor. He can make the needle simply fly and his thread just races along. But he's also pretty handy with spear and staff, as I know because he was my student. Because he's small, dark and wiry they call him the Long-Armed Ape. I found him working at Bee Sting Huang's house so I brought him along."

Song Jiang was very pleased with this and asked Hou Jian to sit and join their discussions. The latter was in fact one of the original baleful stars, or demon princes, so of course he was a kindred spirit.

When Song Jiang asked about Jiangzhou, and about the roads in Wuweijun, the Pill Monger said: "Governor Cai has now counted their losses. More than five hundred government troops and civilians were killed. The number wounded by arrows is beyond reckoning. He has sent messengers to ride night and day to report it to the court. The city gates are closed at midday and anyone wanting to get in or out is questioned closely. Of course the persecution you suffered is not the fault of Governor Cai, it's all because of that Huang Wenbing, who repeatedly incited him against both of you. Now since the raid on the execution ground there is great alarm in the city, and they're on the alert night and day. When I went to Wuweijun to gain intelligence I bumped into my friend Hou Jian, when he was leaving the house to eat, that's how I got all this information."

"And how did you know about all this, Mr. Hou?" Song Jiang asked.

The Ape replied: "From childhood I have always loved practising with spear and staff. My master here taught me such a lot, I shall always be grateful to him. Recently Bee Sting Huang called me to his house to make him some clothes. When I was leaving I happened to meet my master; he mentioned your name and told me about this business. I very much wanted to meet you so I came personally to make this report. This Huang Wenbing has an elder brother called Huang Wenye, another son of the same mother. Huang Wenye devotes himself to good works: mending bridges and repairing roads, paying for Buddha images and feeding monks, rescuing the oppressed, succouring the needy. In Wuweijun they call him Buddha Huang. His younger brother, on the other hand, although he's a retired official, has a malicious spirit and spends his time doing evil. Everyone in Wuweijun calls him Bee Sting Huang. The two brothers live apart, though they are in the same street close to the north gate of the town. Bee Sting Huang is nearer to the town wall and Buddha Huang is towards the main street. One time when I was working there Bee Sting Huang came home and I heard him say, 'Governor Cai has been cheated and I have advised him to execute the offenders first and report to the Emperor afterwards.' Buddha Huang was angry when he heard this, and said, 'Why do always have to stick your nose into everything? It's nothing to do with you, why do you always want to make life difficult for other people? If there's justice in heaven and present retribution, all you're doing is heaping coals of fire on your own head.' Then in the last couple of days, news of the raid on the execution ground reached us, and Bee Sting Huang was scared stiff. He rushed off to Jiangzhou to see the Governor and discuss things with him and he still hasn't returned."

"What is the distance between Bee Sting Huang's house and his brother's?" Song Jiang asked.

"It used to be a single house, before they were divided. There's just a vegetable garden in between."

"How many people are there in the house, and how many separate households?"

"About forty or fifty, counting both men and women."

"Heaven favours my revenge, this person must have been sent to help me," Song Jiang said. "All the same, I shall need the support of all of you."

They all said with one voice: "Even if we have to die in the attempt, we are determined to rid the world of that evil scheming bastard, in order to avenge your wrongs and wipe out your hatred."

"My quarrel is only with this scoundrel Huang Wenbing, it's nothing to do with the people of Wuweijun. And since his brother is an honest fellow he must not be harmed either. We do not want posterity to say we acted dishonourably. When we attack we must avoid doing the least harm to any of the people. But I've a plan for this attack. All I ask of you is a little help."

"We will do whatever you ask," they replied in unison.

Song Jiang said: "I would like to ask Squire Mu to provide eighty or ninety sacks and we shall also need over a hundred bundles of reeds for burning. We'll use five big boats and two small ones. I'd like White Eel and the White-Water Dragon to take charge of the two small boats and I'll explain how to manoeuvre them; on the big boats we'll have the Pilot, the three Ruans and Tong Wei, the Cave Dragon, with all the others who are experienced on water manning them. This should enable my plan to succeed."

Mu Hong said: "We've got dry reeds, fuel and sacks, our people on this estate all know the water and can handle boats, so just go ahead, please, and tell us what to do."

Song Jiang said: "First I want Mr. Hou to take the Pill Monger and the Daytime Rat into Wuweijun and hide there. In a few days' time a pigeon with a bell attached to it will be released outside the gates at midnight. Then the Daytime Rat is to go up on the city wall and stick out a white silk pennant near Bee Sting Huang's house, as a signal to show which part of the wall is nearest to it. And Shi Yong and Skyscraper are to dress up as beggars and go to the city gates and wait there. When they see the fire it will be their signal to kill the guards on the gate. The White-Water Dragon and White Eel will approach on the river and lie there in readiness."

When Song Jiang had allotted these duties, the Pill Monger, the Daytime Rat and the Ape set off. Next it was the turn of Shi Yong and Skyscraper, dressed as beggars and each carrying a concealed dagger. The sacks filled with sand and mud were brought and together with the reeds and the fuel loaded onto the boats. The other leaders stood in readiness, well provided with arms, and the fighting men hid under the decks of the boats. The leaders now boarded their boats. Chao Gai, Song Jiang, and Colonel Hua were on the Cave Dragon's boat; the Dandy, Short-Arse and Whitey were with the Pilot; the Magic Messenger, the Red-Haired Devil and the Tamer were with Ruan the Second; the Little Duke, the Halberdier and the Executioner were with Ruan the Fifth; Mu Hong, Mu Chun and Iron Ox were with Ruan the Seventh. That left the Crocodile and the Door-God in the Clouds, who remained at Squire Mu's to listen for the news from Jiangzhou. Tong Meng, the River Rider, was sent ahead in a fast fishing boat to reconnoitre. The brigands and other fighting men were hidden under the decks, while the farm-hands and boatmen manned the boats. They came secretly the same night to Wuweijun. It was seasonal weather for the seventh month, cold nights and a fresh breeze, the water glistening under the moonlight, with the river in shadow and brightness flooding the hills, as if all were fashioned in jade.

It was about the first watch when all the boats arrived at Wuweijun where they chose a place where the reeds were thick and moored in a long line. The River Rider returned and reported: "All's quiet in the town." Song Jiang ordered the men under his command to unload the sandbags, reeds and dry firewood and move them to beside the town wall. They heard the drum beat the hour: it was exactly nine o'clock. Song Jiang told the soldiers to take the sandbags and firewood and pile them up beside the wall. The leaders now took up their arms, leaving only the Pilot, the Ruans and the Tongs to guard the boats and hold themselves in reserve, while the rest charged towards the town. When they were just a few hundred yards from the north gate, Song Jiang gave orders for the pigeon with the bell to be released and on top of the town wall a bamboo pole appeared with the white signal tied to it, fluttering in the breeze. Song Jiang immediately ordered his troops to pile up the sandbags at this spot and then told the assault party to carry their loads of reeds and firewood up onto the wall. The Daytime Rat was waiting for them there. He pointed and said: "Bee Sting Huang's house is in that street."

"Where are the Pill Monger and the Ape?" Song Jiang asked.

"They've entered Bee Sting Huang's house, they're waiting for you," was the reply.

"And have you seen Shi Yong and Skyscraper?"

"They're in position near the town gate."

Song Jiang now ordered his men to descend from the wall and proceed to Bee Sting Huang's door. The Ape suddenly materialized under the eaves of the house. "Go and open the garden gate and let them in," Song Jiang whispered urgently. "Tell them to make a bonfire of the reeds and the primed firewood and tell the Pill Monger to fetch fire and light it. Then go and knock on Bee Sting Huang's door and shout, 'The official's house next door is on fire, bring out any boxes and trunks for safekeeping.' After they open the door I'll take care of them."

Song Jiang told everyone to line up on both sides while the Ape went and opened the garden door. The troops carried the reeds and firewood inside and piled it up there. The Ape had found the tinder and handed it to the Pill Monger. The fire was lit. The Ape slipped out and went to knock on the door of the house, shouting: "The official's house next door is on fire, we've got to move all the chests and boxes out for safekeeping, come on, open the door quickly!" When those inside awoke they saw the flames next door and hurriedly opened the door and rushed out. With wild shouts, Chao Gai, Song Jiang and the others fell on them. Each hero went to work on his own account: if they saw one, it was one dead; if they saw two, it was a pair. The members of Bee Sting Huang's household, family and others, young or old, some forty or fifty all told, were slain one and all. There was not one survivor. Only Bee Sting Huang himself was missing. The company collected up all of the very considerable quantity of family possessions in gold and silver that he had long been extorting from honest citizens. Then when a whistle was heard they shouldered these goods and rushed to the wall. Meanwhile Shi Yong and Skyscraper after seeing the fire had each drawn his sharp knife and killed the soldiers on the gates. When they saw a group of neighbours approaching down the street carrying buckets and ladders to fight the fire, they shouted: "Stop where you are! We are the company from the Marshes of Mount Liang. There's thousands of us here and we've come to kill Bee Sting Huang and his thieving clan and to avenge Song Jiang and Dai Zong. We intend no harm to the people. Go home quickly and shut your doors. Don't meddle with what does not concern you." Some of the neighbours were still not convinced and simply stood there gaping, but when Iron Ox suddenly charged out, whirling his axes, there was a terrified shout and they picked up their ladders and buckets and fled in disorder. Some guards also issued from a backstreet with some men who were dragging fire-fighting equipment, ropes and hooks, aiming to fight the fire. But Colonel Hua quickly armed his bow and shot the first one through, crying: "If you want to die, then come and try to put the fire out." The others beat a hasty retreat. Finally, the Pill Monger took a torch and set fire to Bee Sting Huang's house front and back and the flames began to rage. Here's how it was:

Black clouds enfold the earth, red flames fly toward heaven. A myriad golden snakes march irresistibly forward, the writhing flames scatter a thousand embers. A fierce breeze fans the flames, carved beams and painted pillars last but an instant; leaping flames fill the sky, mansion and hall are gone in a flash.

It was not just an ordinary fire, for

Bee Huang had an evil nature,

He roused the god of fire.

His malice raised an evil flame,

He made the fire that burnt him.

Shi Yong and Skyscraper had already killed the guards on the gate and Iron Ox destroyed the lock with a blow of the axe. When the gate was open, half the band left the town through the gate below while the other half departed over the wall above. The Pilot, the Ruans and the Tongs came to help them carry the booty aboard the boats. The people of Wuweijun had already heard about the raid on Jiangzhou execution ground, in which countless people were killed, so no one dared interfere. They simply went back home and hid. For Song Jiang and his friends the only thing missing was that they had failed to capture Bee Sting Huang himself. They embarked, shoved off and returned to Squire Mu's. Of this no more.

Now in the city of Jiangzhou, when they saw the fire in Wuweijun painting the sky red, everyone began to talk about it, and naturally the Governor was informed. It so happened that Bee Sting Huang was with the Governor just then discussing some business. When he heard the news he hurriedly said to the Governor: "There is a fire in my district. I must hurry back home to see what's going on." Governor Cai immediately ordered the gates to be opened and arranged for him to go on an official boat. Bee Sting Huang thanked him and left at once, found his servants and boarded the boat with all haste. They rowed out into the stream and headed for Wuweijun. The fire was now seen to be raging fiercely and the reflection painted the surface of the river red. The helmsman said: "It's somewhere near the north gate which is on fire." This did nothing to reassure Bee Sting Huang. When they reached the middle of the river, a small boat was seen rowing in the opposite direction. Before long another boat appeared, rowing towards them. But instead of passing them by, it came straight at them. "Ahoy there! Who are you?" Bee Sting Huang's servants shouted. "What are you doing rowing straight towards us?" Suddenly in the other boat a large man jumped up with a grappling iron in his hand and shouted in reply: "This boat is heading for Jiangzhou with a report on the fire!" So Bee Sting Huang emerged and asked: "Where is the fire?"

"Near the north gate in Mr. Huang's house," the other replied. "His family have all been killed and his goods stolen by the robbers of Mount Liang. Now they've set fire to the house."

Bee Sting Huang began wildly cursing his fate, he nearly went out of his mind. When he heard him, the other man grappled their boat with his hook and leapt aboard. Bee Sting Huang was no dim-wit, he guessed what was about to happen and he rushed to the stern and dived into the river. But someone from the second boat was already lurking under the water. He seized Bee Sting Huang round the waist and supporting his head dragged him aboard the boat. The big man on board assisted. They tied him with rope. The one who grabbed Bee Sting Huang from the bottom of the river was White Eel; the one in the boat with the grappling hook was the White-Water Dragon. With these two now aboard, the official boat's helmsman saw no better policy than to prostrate himself. The White-Water Dragon said: "I'm not going to harm you. I only want this bastard Bee Sting Huang. Go back and tell that ass, Governor Cai, that we of the Mount Liang band will let him keep his donkey's head for the time being, but sooner or later we'll return and take it."

Shaking like a leaf, the helmsman stammered: "I will tell him."

Now they had Bee Sting Huang in their boat, the White-Water Dragon and White Eel were content to let the official boat go.

The two men in their fast boats raced back to Mu Hong's. When they got there they found all the company on the bank waiting for them. The boxes had been unloaded. When he heard that they had captured Bee Sting Huang, Song Jiang could scarcely contain his joy, which was shared by the whole company. "I'm looking forward to meeting this person," he said. The White-Water Dragon and White Eel duly bundled Bee Sting Huang out onto the bank. When everyone had had a good look at him, he was locked up and they all left the river and returned to Squire Mu's house. The Crocodile and the Door-God in the Clouds joined them here and everyone went to the thatched hall. Song Jiang had Bee Sting Huang's wet clothing removed and he was tied to a willow tree. The leaders were asked to sit in groups. Song Jiang ordered a pot of wine and everyone raised their cups. Beginning with Chao Gai and going right down to the Daytime Rat, thirty of them in all were present.

Song Jiang began to berate Bee Sting Huang: "You scoundrel! I had no quarrel with you, neither past nor present, why did you try to ruin me, not once but five times, telling Governor Cai to have us both killed? You're supposed to have read the classics, how could you behave so viciously? There's no personal vendetta between us, why did you have to plot against me? Your brother Huang Wenye was born of the same mother, how is it that he spends his days doing good? I'm told that in your town they call him Buddha Huang. I was most careful not to do him the least harm yesterday. But you, all you do is attack people and suck up to the powerful. You toady to government officials, you oppress good citizens. I have heard that in Wuweijun they call you Bee Sting Huang. Well today I'm going to pluck your sting out."

Bee Sting Huang said: "I recognize my faults, please let me die."

Chao Gai shouted: "You bloody fool, do you think you're not going to die? Today you're going to learn to regret not having acted better from the beginning."

Song Jiang asked: "Which of you will do it for me?"

Iron Ox jumped to his feet at once and said: "I'll do it for you, I'll settle this villain. He's good and fat, I see, he'll make good eating when he's roasted."

Chao Gai said: "That's right, get a sharp knife and a basin of charcoal, we'll cut the bugger into little pieces and have him with the wine. That's the cure for our brother's anger!"

Iron Ox took a knife and said to Bee Sting Huang with a smile: "Now, you bastard, while you were sitting in Governor Cai's back room you could argue the hind leg off a donkey, if it was for the sake of ruining others and getting the Governor excited with pure fabrications. Now you want to die quickly, but I say you shall die slowly." Then with the sharp knife he began cutting pieces from the legs, choosing them carefully, and roasting them on the charcoal to serve with wine. Cut a piece, roast a piece. It wasn't long before Bee Sting Huang expired. Then Iron Ox slit open the chest and took out the heart and liver and handed it to them to make a soup. When the company had seen Bee Sting Huang carved up they all went to the thatched hall to celebrate with Song Jiang. There is a poem about this:

Bee Sting Huang was a toady and a schemer,
Toward better men he harboured jealous hate.
But what he got for scheming was slow death,
To be carved and roasted was his awful fate.

Suddenly Song Jiang knelt on the ground. All the others hurriedly knelt too and said: "Dear brother what is the matter? Please tell us what it is, of course we will listen."

Song Jiang said: "I have no skills. From childhood I studied the classics. When I grew up I tried to make the acquaintance of the world's heroes. But because my strength is slight and my talent weak, I have never been able to entertain them fittingly, as is my life-long wish. After I was banished to Jiangzhou, I have to thank Chao Gai and all of you who tried so hard to make me stay, but I was determined to see my father, that's why I couldn't. Then, since heaven so ordained it, my way took me to the Yangtze river and I ran into a number of other heroes. But fool that I am, I got drunk and in a moment of madness wrote something which put Superintendent Dai's life at risk. I owe my life to your fearlessness, when you braved the tiger's lair, the dragons' pool, to rescue me by force. You even put yourselves out to help me achieve my revenge. Now we have committed a great crime and caused an uproar in two cities, all of which will be reported to the Emperor. So I have no alternative but to seek refuge with our brothers in the Marshes of Mount Liang. I would like to know the views of everyone on this. If you are agreeable, let us pack up and leave at once."

Almost before he had finished, Iron Ox jumped up and cried: "We'll all go, we'll all go. If anyone says he won't, he'll get a fucking taste of my axes, I'll chop him in two!"

Song Jiang said: "You express yourself too violently, we will only go if it is truly and honestly what everyone wants."

Everyone gave their opinion: "We have killed hundreds of officers and troops, we've turned two places upside down, the court is bound to be informed and a force will be sent to take us. Where can we go, if we don't go with you, live or die together?"

Song Jiang thanked them with joy in his heart. The Crocodile and the Door-God in the Clouds were sent on in advance to advise those guarding the stronghold, and the others left afterwards in five parties. The first group to leave consisted of Chao Gai, Song Jiang, Colonel Hua, the Magic Messenger and Iron Ox, the second of the Red-Haired Devil, Skyscraper, Shi Yong, the Pill Monger and the Ape, and the third of the White-Water Dragon, the Executioner, the Little Duke, the Halberdier and the two Tongs. The fourth group comprised the Tamer, White Eel, the Pilot and the Ruan brothers, and the fifth the Dandy, Short-Arse, the two Mu brothers, Whitey and the Daytime Rat. The twenty-eight leaders in their five groups commanded a thousand men. Each man received a share of the booty from Bee Sting Huang's house and loaded it onto the carts. Mu Hong took along the old squire and the household retainers, and also loaded suitable amounts of goods and valuables onto carts. Amongst the retainers there were some who did not want to go. They were all given silver and went their own ways. Some of the servants wanted to go. They were taken along. After the first four parties had left one after another, Mu Hong collected up everything in the house, then got a dozen torches and set fire to the manor. This done, he abandoned his estate and set his course for the Marshes of Mount Liang.

No need to tell of how each of the five contingents fared on their journey, setting off in succession, separated by some seven miles or so. Rather we shall tell how the first of them, that is to say, Chao Gai, Song Jiang, Colonel Hua, the Magic Messenger and Iron Ox, rode forward, accompanied by carts and their company of soldiers, and travelled for three days till they came to a place known as Yellow Mountain. Song Jiang said to Chao Gai as they rode towards it: "This mountain has a wild aspect, do you suppose there are troops waiting in ambush there? Do you think we should wait till the others catch up so that we can all pass at the same time?" He had hardly finished speaking when the sound of gongs and drums broke out in the pass up ahead. "What did I say?" said Song Jiang. "Stay where you are, we must wait for our friends behind to catch up, so we can confront the villains." Colonel Hua meanwhile fitted an arrow to his bow, Chao Gai and the Magic Messenger grasped their halberds, Iron Ox took up his axes and closely surrounding Song Jiang they all spurred their horses forward. Immediately on the hillside four or five hundred troops materialized. From the front ranks four big fellows, all armed, rode out and shouted loudly: "You lot have raised an uproar in Jiangzhou and plundered Wuweijun, you have killed many government troops and civilians, and now you are planning to retreat to the Marshes of Mount Liang. Well, we four have been waiting for you a long time. If you want to get back safely you must leave Song Jiang here and we'll spare your lives."

When he heard this, Song Jiang rode out in front, dismounted and knelt and said: "Song Jiang was caught in a trap, then rescued by all these heroes. He does not know in what way he has offended you, but hopes you will condescend to spare him."

When they saw Song Jiang kneeling before them, the four men hurriedly reined in their horses, threw down their weapons, rushed forward and threw themselves on the ground, saying: "We four brothers had only heard the famous name of Song Jiang of Shandong, the Opportune Rain, we never thought we would live to see the day when we would meet him. We heard how you had been sentenced for something in Jiangzhou and we decided we would come to raid the gaol, only we didn't have accurate information. The day before yesterday we sent some of our men to Jiangzhou to find out more. When they came back they told us a group of brave men had already devastated Jiangzhou and carried out a daring raid on the execution ground to rescue you. They told us you had set off towards Jieyang, but afterwards returned to burn Wuweijun and plunder the residence of Bee Sting Huang. We guessed you would be coming this way. We repeatedly sent out scouts to watch this road. But we feared the report might be false, that is why we tested you with these questions. Please do not hold it against us, now that we have truly found you. To celebrate this good fortune we have prepared a humble feast in our camp, as a most inadequate welcome. We beg you all to come to our humble camp for entertainment."

Song Jiang was delighted and raised them up and politely asked to know their names. The first one was called Ou Peng and was from Huangzhou. He had been a guard on the Yangzi but he had offended his superior officer and had been forced to take refuge in the rivers and lakes and become an outlaw. He had given up his name and changed it to Golden Wings. The second was called Jiang Jing, and he was from Tanzhou in Hunan. He was a failed scholar, who when he did not pass the state examination gave up the pen for the sword. Since he was quite clever and fairly expert in calligraphy and numbers — he could manage six figure sums without the slightest error — and was also adept with spear and staff and good at marshalling and deploying troops, everyone called him the Magic Calculator. The third was called Ma Lin and he was from Jinling in Jiankang. He had once been an insignificant idler, but he could play the flute and was also so quick with a knife that even a hundred attackers could not penetrate his defence. They called him the Magic Flautist. The fourth was Tao Zongwang from Guangzhou. He was from the class of tenant farmers. He was handy with a spade and had great strength. He could also handle a spear and a knife and they called him the Nine-Tailed Turtle. There is a poem about these four:

Sturdy and powerful beyond all compare
He covers the ground as if walking on air,
Golden Wings is exactly the name for Ou Peng,
Head of the Yellow Mountain gang.
In youth he wasted his days with the pen
As an adult in tactics he sought to excel.
A soldier of worth and a demon with figures,
Jiang Jing is both gifted in fighting and letters.
His flute in the mountains rings loud as a bell,
With a couple of knives he can weave quite a spell.
Ma Lin's appearance is ugly as sin,
But he's first of them all when a battle he's in.
Zongwang is like a fierce tiger made,
He lays about him with a spade.
This Nine-Tailed Turtle has tricks beyond count.
These are the leaders of the Yellow Mount.

Such were the 4 worthies who had detained Song Jiang. Soon their men brought boxes of fruit, a big pitcher of wine and two big plates of meat, and cups were provided for everyone. Chao Gai and Song Jiang were served first, then Colonel Hua, the Magic Messenger and Iron Ox. Introductions were made all round and everyone was given wine. A few hours later the next party arrived, and all got handed cups and were introduced. When they had all raised their cups they were invited up the mountain. So the first two groups, consisting of ten leaders, went up to the Yellow Mountain stronghold where the four incumbents had oxen and horses slaughtered for them, and sent a succession of men down the mountain to invite the leaders of the three remaining groups up to join in the feasting. They all arrived within the day and attended the celebrations in the assembly hall.

Whilst he was drinking, Song Jiang spoke thus: "I am at present on my way to take refuge with Leader Chao Gai in the Marshes of Mount Liang and become one of their company. I wonder if you four would be interested in leaving this place and going with us to the great fortress on Mount Liang, to become members of the band?"

The four replied in unison: "If the two noble leaders do not reject us, we would like nothing better than to serve them in whatever they command."

Song Jiang and Chao Gai were delighted with the reply: "In that case, please prepare everything for the journey."

This decision was pleasing to everyone. They stayed for the rest of the day and the following night, and the next morning Song Jiang and Chao Gai still sharing the command went down the mountain and set off first. The rest all set out in due order, the distance between them being only some seven miles. The Yellow Mountain four got together their valuables and other things, collected three or four hundred men, burnt down the fortress palisades and followed behind as a sixth party.

Song Jiang was pleased to have added these four from Yellow Mountain, and he said to Chao Gai as they rode along: "During these wanderings in the rivers and lakes, although I've had some big frights, I've also got to know a good many fine fellows. Here I am now on my way to the mountain retreat with you, and this time I am resolute, together we shall live or die, you and I." They chatted thus as they pursued their way, and without noticing it arrived at the Crocodile's inn.

Now the four leaders who had stayed behind to guard the Mount Liang stronghold, namely the Professor, Taoist Gongsun Sheng, Leopard's Head Lin Chong and Thunderclap, with the two new arrivals, Xiao Rang the calligrapher, alias Magic Hand, and Jin Dajian the engraver, alias the Craftsman, had already been informed of events by the Crocodile and the Door-God in the Clouds, and every day they had been sending a welcoming party of the lesser chiefs over to the inn. They now all went together across to Golden Sands Landing and with much beating of drums and blowing of flutes began the journey on horseback or in sedans up to the stronghold. When they reached the pass, the Professor and the other five welcomed them with wine, and they all went to the assembly hall, where joss-sticks were lit.

Chao Gai now invited Song Jiang to become lord of the mountain retreat and asked him to take the highest place. Song Jiang, of course, refused. "You are absolutely wrong," he said. "It is only thanks to your courageous intervention that I am still among the living. You, my friend, were always the chief of the mountain stronghold, how can you resign that position to someone of no talent? If you insist on this I would prefer to die."

Chao Gai said: "Why do you talk like this? If you hadn't risked everything to rescue me and the other seven in the first place, enabling us to escape to the mountain, this company today would not exist. You are truly the stronghold's patron. If you do not take the seat, who deserves to?"

Song Jiang said: "As far as age is concerned, you are my senior by ten years. How can I take precedence? It would be most dishonourable of me!"

Only at the third instance was Chao Gai prevailed upon to take the seat, with Song Jiang in second place, the Professor in third, and Taoist Gongsun Sheng in fourth.

Song Jiang said: "We shouldn't make distinctions of merit. The original leaders of Mount Liang should all sit in the hosts' places on the left, and the new arrivals should take the guests' places on the right. Later when people's contribution can be judged they can be classified individually."

Everyone responded with one voice: "This is absolutely right."

In a line on the left were Leopard's Head Lin Chong, Liu Tang the Red-Haired Devil, the Ruans, Skyscraper, the Door-God in the Clouds, the Crocodile and the Daytime Rat. On the right according to age, all deferring to each other, Colonel Hua, Thunderclap, the Tamer, the Magic Messenger, Iron Ox, the White-Water Dragon, Mu Hong, the Pilot, White Eel, the Dandy, the Little Duke, the Halberdier, Magic Hand, Short-Arse, the Pill Monger, the Craftsman, Mu Chun, the Executioner, Golden Wings, the Magic Calculator, the Tong brothers, the Magic Flautist, Shi Yong, the Ape, Whitey and the Nine-Tailed Turtle. Altogether forty leaders sat down together at that banquet, amid much tootling of flutes and rattling of drums.

Song Jiang began to speak of the business of Governor Cai and the children's rhyme. "I tell you, that unspeakable bastard Bee Sting Huang, it was absolutely nothing to do with him! Yet he had to go to the Governor with this insane rigmarole! According to him, 'The bane of our land are home and wood' meant that someone who would lay waste the country and its wealth must have in his name the character for wood added to the character for home, that's 'Song,' of course. 'Water and work do us no good' meant that someone with the character for work added to the three dots that stand for water would do great harm — in other words 'Jiang.' So Song Jiang was clearly implied. The following lines 'Thirty-six stand in a row, in Shandong rebellions grow' meant Song Jiang would create an uprising in Shandong. That's why they arrested me. Then the Magic Messenger unluckily delivered the forged letter and that made Bee Sting Huang urge the Governor to carry out the execution first and report it later. If you hadn't come to the rescue I certainly wouldn't be here now."

Iron Ox now jumped up and said: "Dear brother, I think we can see heaven's will in all this. Although you had to put up with a lot from him, he's been repaid by our cutting him up alive. We've plenty of troops, so if we do rise up what have we to fear? Chao Gai will be our emperor, Song Jiang the prince, the Professor will be chief minister, and Taoist Gongsun the senior counsellor. The rest of us will be the army. We'll plunder the capital and capture the bloody throne, and then we can all live a life of ease up there, won't it be grand? Better than staying here in these bloody marshes, surely?"

The Magic Messenger hurriedly shouted: "Iron Ox, you're talking bloody nonsense! Remember where you are, you can't go on behaving like you did in Jiangzhou. You've got to pay attention to our two leaders' wishes and commands. If you go shooting your mouth off again, I'm going to make an example of you and bash your brains out!"

Everyone laughed when Iron Ox answered: "Aiya! If you bash my brains out I don't suppose I'm likely to grow some more in a hurry. I'd better just drink my wine."

Song Jiang also spoke of the first battle when the Mount Liang forces had to repel the government troops. "When I first heard that news I truly feared for you. I little thought that one day I myself would also be in the same situation."

"And yet if you'd listened to us before and remained comfortably in the mountain stronghold, instead of going on to Jiang-zhou, wouldn't you have saved yourself a lot of trouble?" the Professor said. "But it was your fate, that's the only way to explain it."

Song Jiang said: "By the way, where is Brigadier Huang An who led that attack on Mount Liang?"

Chao Gai said: "He didn't last more than a couple of months. He fell ill and died."

Song Jiang responded with a sigh.

Everyone seemed very happy feasting that day. Chao Gai first made arrangements for housing Squire Mu's family. Then he ordered Bee Sting Huang's possessions to be brought and distributed to the men as a reward for their efforts. He also called for the original treasure boxes and offered them to the Magic Messenger. The latter refused and asked for them to be taken to the treasury for general use. Chao Gai asked the troops now to come and pay their respects to the White-Water Dragon and others and there were general introductions. Oxen and sheep were slaughtered and the feasting continued in the camp for days on end. Of this no more.

Chao Gai now assigned lodgings for everyone on the mountain and the construction of houses and repairing of walls recommenced. At dinner on the third day, Song Jiang stood up and addressed the company as follows: "I still have one important matter on which I would like to crave your indulgence. I wish to go down the mountain again and request a few days' leave of absence, if this is agreeable to you all."
Chao Gai said: "Where do you want to go, and what is this important matter?"
Song Jiang calmly explained where he was planning to go. And this was to have important consequences:

Amid a forest of spears and blades, another narrow escape;
Surrounded by wild cliffs, the hero is granted a vision.

Indeed, the Mystic Lady was to give him 3 books and he was to write some pages of history.

In the Bailong Temple there were seventeen leaders including Chao Gai, and ninety brigands. To these were added nine leaders under Zhang Shun, and their forty followers. The latter were all experienced smugglers on the Yangtze River and they arrived in three boats. When they heard that troops were leaving the town to capture them they all followed the lead of Li Kui and left the temple fully armed, a body of over one hundred and fifty men. Song Jiang and Dai Zong were first placed in safety on a boat. Li Jun, Zhang Shun, and the three brothers Ruan remained with the boats, and got everything ready for a rapid flight.
The brigands saw that there were about seven thousand soldiers advancing towards the temple from the town. They all wore helmets, and armor, and were fully armed.
Li Kui stripped himself of all clothing for the fight, and was rushing forward with two axes in his hands in front of the men. Just behind him were Hua Rong, Huang Xin, Lu Fang, and Guo Sheng acting as his bodyguard. Hua Rong saw that all the mounted troops were armed with spears, so he took his bow and shot an arrow at the commanding officer who fell off his horse wounded. The troops seeing this, realized their danger, turned their horses round, and retreated, scattering the infantry about who had been supporting them. The bandits seized the opportunity, and running forward attacked the confused mass. They killed right and left, and soon blood was flowing in all directions. They pursued the troops up to the town gates where the soldiers on the walls threw boulders and logs of wood on Chao Gai's brigands. The troops had retreated into the town, and closed the gates behind them. They were too afraid to even open the gates for several days afterwards.
The men under Chao Gai returned to the Bailong Temple, and embarked on the boats near there. Chao Gai supervised the embarkation, dividing his men equally on the three boats. Sails were hoisted, and as there was a favorable wind, they set out for Old Mu's village. They soon reached their destination and disembarked. The son of Old Mu met them, and took them all to the guest hall where his father received them.
The bandits all found a good resting place for that night. A great feast was prepared and they all partook of same. When the wine was handed round they chatted about their recent exploit. Chao Gai said, "We should have been captured had it not been for the timely arrival of our brothers with their boats."
"But why did you take that road?" asked Old Mu.
"I myself preferred the most crowded road, where I could kill a great number. They followed me. I did not ask them to do so," said Li Kui.
The whole party laughed, and thereupon Song Jiang arose, and addressed them, "if you gentlemen had not arrived both Dai Zong and myself would have been executed. Today your favors are as deep as the sea, so that I can never recompense you. There is only one man I hate, this is Huang Wenbing, because he searched minutely for my smallest fault, and several times tried to put me to death. I must be revenged. May I request you, gentlemen, to do one more act of great kindness and accompany me to Wuweijun to kill Huang Wenbing, and so appease my enmity?"
"We rescued you from the execution ground," said Chao Gai, "but how can we do this second thing? They will now be ready and prepared for us. We had better return to Liangshan Marsh, and come here again with more men including our leaders Lin Chong, Qin Ming, and others."
"If you go to the mountain you will not be able to get back here," said Song Jiang. "First, because it is a long way there, and secondly, the officials will have time to get reinforcements from all quarters. We must not indulge in false hopes, but seize the present opportunity and do the deed before they can get ready for us."
"What you say, elder brother, is quite true," said Hua Rong, "but nobody knows the road or the lay of the land about there. We must first send a spy to the village of Wuweijun, and discover the best way of procedure, and find out where Huang Wenbing lives. Then we shall have no difficulties to begin our work."
Xue Yong now stood up and addressed them, "I have been there for several times and know the village of the Wuweijun very well. Shall I go as your spy and report on the position there?"
"That will be an excellent plan," said Song Jiang.
So Xue Yong bid adieu and left that night.
Song Jiang and the leaders at Old Mu's house discussed their plans for the attack on the Wuweijun and got all implements of warfare ready. After two days Xue Yong returned accompanied by another man.
"Who is this man?" asked Song Jiang.
"He is Hou Jian of Hongdu" (the modern Nanchang, Jiangxi province), replied Xue Yong. "He is an excellent tailor and can use the needle with great speed. He is a pupil of mine in the use of military weapons, and can use the stave and spear with skill. He is thin and also very light and therefore he has got the nickname 'Nimble Monkey.' He works at the home of Huang Wenbing. I asked him to come here."
Song Jiang was much pleased at this, and asked him to be seated for a conference. This Hou Jian was also a baleful star and could easily be induced to help them. Song Jiang asked him many questions about the roads to the village of the Wuweijun and the latest news about Jiangzhou.
Xue Yong said that Prefect Cai Jiu had had a roll call of the army and the people and found that over five hundred had been killed. He did not know how many had been wounded. An urgent messenger had been dispatched to the capital to report the matter. The town gates were now open only in the morning, and all men passing in or out were very closely interrogated. Everybody knew that the Prefect Cai Jiu did not wish to injure elder brother but had been egged on by Huang Wenbing to put you and Dai Zong to death. Since you two had been rescued from the execution ground the whole town was in a nervous state, and everybody was expecting further trouble. "I went to the village of Wuweijun to spy where I happened to see this man Hou Jian and when I talked matters over with him I knew all the particulars."
"Well, Hou Jian, how do you know these?" asked Song Jiang.
"From my youth I have had lessons in the military arts from Xue Yong," said Hou Jian, "and cannot forget his kindness to me. A few days ago Huang Wenbing sent for me to go to his house and make some clothes. I met Xue Yong on the street, and from him I knew your plans. I wanted to come here and report matters in detail. Now, Huang Wenbing has an elder brother, named Huang Wenye, and they are both of the same mother. Huang Wenye is a philanthropist, and is always repairing bridges and roads, redecorating the idols and providing food for the monks, and helping poor people in distress. The people in the town always call him Huang the Buddha. On the other hand, Huang Wenbing has a bad disposition, and is always trying to injure people. He has the nickname 'Stinging Wasp.' These two brothers live in two detached houses in a small alley near the North Gate. I had work to do at Huang Wenbing's house and one day I heard him say that the Prefect Cai Jiu had been cheated, but he had pointed out the deception, and had recommended the Prefect to kill the persons concerned. Huang Wenye then scolded his brother, saying, "You are again doing something that will injure other people. It is not your affair so why do you wish to interfere and injure these people? Heaven will see that your 'crows will come home to roost' very soon." The other day we heard of the affair at the execution ground, and Huang Wenbing went off to Jiangzhou to discuss measures with the Prefect, and so far he has not returned."
"How do their houses stand?" asked Song Jiang.
"They are close together," said Hou Jian, "with only a vegetable garden between them."
"How many people are there in Huang Wenbing's household?" asked Song Jiang.
"Altogether there are about fifty people," replied Hou Jian.
"Heaven tells me to take revenge," said Song Jiang, "and has sent this man to help me. I therefore appeal to all you brothers for your assistance."
"We will all go," the leaders replied. "We will kill these wicked people and assist in your revenge."
"I will deal with Huang Wenbing himself," said Song Jiang, "and I do not want you to injure any of the people at the village as they are not at fault. His brother Huang Wenye is benevolent so under no circumstances must he be injured for otherwise people would rightly abuse me. I have a certain plan and I hope that you will assist me in carrying it out."
All the brigand leaders said, "We will follow your orders."
"Then I will ask Old Mu to prepare for us about ninety sacks," said Song Jiang, "about one hundred bundles of faggots, five large boats, and two small boats. I want Zhang Shun and Li Jun to row the two small boats, while Zhang Heng, the Brothers Ruan, and Tong Wei will manage the five large boats and take with them good sailors. That is part of my plan."
"All the things you require are ready now," said Mu Hong. "and the people of this village are all good sailors. May I ask for further details of the plan?"
"Well, I want Hou Jian, Xue Yong and Bai Sheng to go to the Wuweijun village, and hide there secretly. About 2 A.M. tomorrow we will all reach the village and then release a pigeon with a whistle on its tail. When Bai Sheng hears that whistle he must ascend the wall, and display a piece of white silk to indicate the position of Huang Wenbing's house. Shi Yong and Du Qian will disguise themselves in the village as beggars, and when they hear the signal they must set fire to some house, and then run to the village gate and kill the gatekeepers. Li Jun and Zhang Shun must cruise about on the river in their boats, and wait there for further developments." When Song Jiang had explained his plans all the men concerned left at once to carry out their various duties. The cloth sacks were filled with sand, bundles of reeds and oil were got ready and placed on the boats. The brigands then armed themselves, and took their positions in the bottoms of the boats. The leaders were then divided up, and allocated to their seven boats. Zhu Gui and Song Wan were to stay behind, and got information as to anything that might occur in Jiangzhou. Tong Meng went in advance in a quick boat as a scout. That night all the boats reached the village without any difficulty.
It was the end of the seventh lunar month and the nights were cold. It was a bright moonlight night and the river was calm. The hills were reflected in the river, and even their green color was clearly shown in the water. The boats reached Wuweijun village about 10 P.M. where the bank of the river was covered with thick reeds. Tong Meng, the scout, soon came and reported that all was quiet in the village. Song Jiang ordered that the sand bags, the bundles of reeds, and some firewood should be taken near the village gate. Just then they heard the watchman in the village beating his drum indicating the end of the second watch. The leaders and men all moved near the village leaving only six men on the boats. When they were all assembled near the North Gate Song Jiang gave an order, and the pigeon was released. Soon they saw a bamboo pole on the wall with a white flag fluttering in the breeze. Song Jiang ordered that the sand bags be piled against the wall near the flag, and that the men climb over the wall. Bai Sheng was waiting for them on the wall and pointed out the house where Huang Wenbing lived.
Song Jiang inquired for Xue Yong and Hou Jian and Bai Sheng said that they were already in the house. He was also informed that Shi Yong and Du Qian were waiting near the village gate. Song Jiang then led his men down from the wall to the entrance of Huang Wenbing's house where he found Hou Jian hiding inside the gate. He summoned Hou Jian, and whispered to him, "Go and open the garden gate. Tell the men there to bring all the reeds, oil, and firewood inside. Xue Yong is to set fire to the whole pile and Hou Jian to knock at the door of the house and shout 'Your brother's house is on fire! We want to bring the boxes of his possesions here.'" Song Jiang then divided his men into two parts, one to watch the front gate and the other guard the back door.
Hou Jian carried out his instructions. The servants inside Huang Wenbing's house saw the flames, and at once opened the door. Song Jiang and his followers thereupon rushed forward shouting "Kill." They killed every person they met, and very soon there were over fifty dead men, but so far they had not seen Huang Wenbing. In the house were large stores of wealth which had been extorted from people from time to time, and these were now seized by the brigands and taken away.
When the fire broke out Shi Yong and Du Qian had attacked the gatekeepers and killed them. The neighbors seeing the flames were running with ladders and buckets of water to put out the fire. Shi Yong called out to them, "You people must go back. We are bandits from Liangshan Marsh, and have only come here to help Song Jiang to take his revenge and kill Huang Wenbing. This does not concern you, and you must not interfere. All go back home!" Many people did not believe this, and stopped to look on. But when they saw Li Kui, the "Black Whirlwind," approaching with an axe in each hand, they quickly retreated with their buckets of water and ladders with a shrill outcry.
In a street at the back were some soldiers who now came to help to put out the fire. Hua Rong shot an arrow at them, and Li Kui shouted, "Let those who want to die come forward." But without any hesitation the soldiers retreated.
Xue Yong was now inside the house, setting fire to all the rooms. Li Kui returned to the village gates and hacked them with his axes. The brigands all made their escape, and carried all the loot to the boats.
The people in the village had heard of the fight at Jiangzhou and dared not pursue the bandits.
Song Jiang followed his men to the boats, and was disappointed that he had not met Huang Wenbing.
The fire at the Wuweijun village illuminated the sky all red, and this could be seen in Jiangzhou where the prefectural yamen was soon informed of the incident. Huang Wenbing was staying in the yamen and when he heard the report he hurried to see the Prefect. "My village is in flames! I will go there, and see the remains." The Prefect gave an order for the town gate to be opened, and that an official boat be got ready. Huang Wenbing expressed his thanks and embarked at once. The red flames were reflected in the water. One of the boatmen said that the fire was near the North Gate. Huang Wenbing saw that this was true, and became much more afraid. When the boat was in the middle of the river he saw a smaller boat passing by, and another came towards the official boat. When quite close a big man on the smaller boat held a pole with a double-pronged hook, and called out, "We are going to Jiangzhou to report about the fire."
Huang Wenbing emerged from the cabin, and asked where the fire was.
The man replied that the fire was near the North Gate and that all the people in Huang Wenbing's house had been killed by bandits from Liangshan Marsh who had escaped with all the loot.
Huang Wenbing unvoluntarily heaved a deep sigh, and was almost frightened out of his senses. When the man heard this he drew the boats together with his hooked pole, and jumped on board the official boat. Huang was crafty, and knew at once that they were arresting him so he retreated through the cabin to the stern where he dived into the river. But he was face to face with a man who had dived from the other boat, and who seized him by the waist. He was brought to the side of the boat and was hauled on board and bound with a rope. The man who had captured Huang Wenbing in the water was Zhang Shun, the "White Fish," and the man who had used the hooked pole was Li Jun, the "Muddy Water Dragon."
The boatmen on the official boat all kowtowed and Li Jun told them that they were quite safe as he only wanted Huang Wenbing and that they could go and report to the Prefect Cai Jiu what had happened and tell him that at present the bandits would not trouble him any further. The men were awfully afraid, and went off at once with their boat. Huang Wenbing was on the smaller boat and was taken at once to Old Mu's village. The boats with the loot had arrived there already, and the loot had been unloaded on the bank. Song Jiang and the leaders were pleased to hear of the arrest of Huang Wenbing who was taken to the village. All the leaders assembled near the guest hall where there was a willow tree. Song Jiang stripped the clothes off Huang Wenbing and bound him to the tree trunk. Song Jiang ordered a servant to bring a large pot of wine and offer a drink to all the leaders. This having been done Song Jiang cursed the prisoner.
"Huang Wenbing, you rotter! I had no enmity towards you so why did you try to harm me, and incite the Prefect several times to kill both me and Dai Zong? You have studied books of the sage so why did you do this vile thing? I had not killed your father so why have you insisted on putting me to death? You have the same mother as your brother Huang Wenye and yet he always acts benevolently, and is called Huang the Buddha. Therefore last night I saw to it that he be quite free from any harm. You have a bad reputation; you fawn on the rich and influential, and make presents to them; you oppress good people. No wonder that the people call you the 'Stinging Wasp.' But today I am going to take away your sting."
"I know that I am at fault," said Huang Wenbing, "and request a quick dispatch."
"You donkey!" shouted Chao Gai. "You will soon be dead! If you had only known beforehand what will happen today you would have repented of your crimes before this."
"Who will help me to execute him?" asked Song Jiang.
Li Kui jumped up and said, "I will cut him to pieces. He is very fat, and I think it is better to roast his flesh over the fire."
"Splendid!" said Chao Gai. "Bring a sword and cut him up into small pieces. Get a fire ready for the roast and we will also have some wine to appease the enmity of our worthy brother."
"You want a quick death," said Li Kui, "but I will kill you by slow degrees." Taking the sword he cut Huang Wenbing's leg and then cut slices off other parts and placed them over the fire to roast. At last he cut open the breast and taking out the heart placed it in boiling water to provide a restorative for drunkenness. When the leaders and brigands saw this they all saluted Song Jiang who knelt down to them and then they all did likewise. They then asked whether he had anything to say.
"I was only a clerk, and had no ability," said Song Jiang, "but I have always been trying to make the acquaintance of heroes. I remained poor and uninfluential and therefore could not do much entertaining of friends. I was branded and banished to Jiangzhou and when passing Liangshan Marsh declined the offer of Chao Gai to join you heroes there, because my father had given me definite orders to the contrary. But Heaven favored me and on my journey I happened to meet many fine heroes at Xunyang River. While drunk I wrote some extravagant poetry, which endangered the life of Dai Zong. You gentlemen were not afraid of 'entering the tiger's den and the dragon's pool' in order to save our lives. You all united to help me to get revenge. But we have now committed a great crime, and made rows in two cities, and it will certainly be reported to the Emperor. I cannot help, therefore, but seek refuge with you at Liangshan Marsh, but I do not know whether you would now allow me to do so. If you are willing we will depart today, but if anyone is unwilling let him follow his own desires. If you are afraid of the consequences of what we have done then any delay will only make matters worse."
Interrupting him Li Kui jumped up and shouted, "We must all go! If there is anyone who will not go I will chop him in two with my axe."
"You talk wildly," said Song Jiang, "our brothers here must go willingly or not at all."
Many of the leaders said, "We have killed many soldiers, and have upset the whole district so that it will undoubtedly be reported to the capital. Troops will be dispatched immediately to attack us. If we do not go with you to Liangshan Marsh where else can we go for safety?"
Song Jiang was much pleased and thanked them all for their decision.
That day Zhu Gui and Song Wan were dispatched to Liangshan Marsh to report their plans. All the rest of the bandits were divided into five companies for the march and the loot was distributed equally for each company. Old Mu and all his family and servants loaded up their things to go with the brigands, and then set fire to all the buildings. We need not follow all the five bands of brigands but the leading band under Chao Gai had traveled about seven //on the third day when they came to the Huangmen Mountain.
While riding on horseback Song Jiang remarked to Chao Gai, "This mountain looks queer and hideous and I think there are large bands of highwaymen among it. We had better halt a little, and allow those behind us to catch up to us." Before Chao Gai could reply to this they heard the noise of gongs and drums being beaten at the foot of the mountain where the road passed.
"What do you think of that?" asked Song Jiang. "We must stop here and fight them when those behind arrive here."
Hua Rong took his bow and fitted an arrow to it. Chao Gai and Dai Zong held their halberds while Li Kui got both his axes ready to protect Song Jiang. They all galloped in front of their men. About five hundred brigands came into view with four leaders in front, one of whom shouted, "You made trouble at Jiangzhou, killed many soldiers there, looted Wuweijun village, and are now on your way to Liangshan Marsh. We have waited for you for a long time, and now if you will hand over Song Jiang to us we will leave you alone."
Song Jiang upon hearing this rode forward, dismounted, knelt down, and said, "I was wronged, and had no means for redress. But heroes came from all parts to save my life. I am not aware how I have offended you four heroes so I hope that you will forgive me."
The four men immediately dismounted threw aside their weapons, ran forward, and kneeling before Song Jiang said, "We have heard of the fame of Song Jiang, the 'Welcome Rain,' of Shandong, and have long expected to meet him. We heard of your imprisonment at Jiangzhou and after talking it over we decided to go there to rescue you from the prison. We first sent a spy to Jiangzhou and he returned and reported that you had already been rescued by a number of bandits who had taken you to Old Mu's home. Afterwards we heard that you had destroyed Huang Wenbing's house and looted all his things. We anticipated that you would pass this way, and have been waiting here for several days to meet you. We were afraid that our reports might not be reliable so we decided to challenge your men so as to make sure of seeing you. We hope that you will overlook our rough manner. We have been lucky in meeting you today. We have prepared a feast for you in our stronghold, and invite you all to come and stay with us for a few days."
Song Jiang was overjoyed and raised up the four men asking for their names in turn. The head man was Ou Peng, a Huangzhou man. Previously he had been a soldier, but finding his superior officer very unfair he had left, and become a brigand and had gained the nickname of the "Golden Winged Hawk."
The second was Jiang Jing of Tanzhou in Hunan. He had failed in the government examinations and had then studied military exercises and strategy. He was also very good at calculations on the abacus, and with the most intricate calculation he never made the slightest mistake. Because of this he was known as the "Marvelous Mathematician."
The third was Ma Lin, a Jinling man. He had been a man of leisure and could play on two metal flutes at the same time. He was so swift with the sword that over a hundred men could not get near him, and for this he had got the nickname "Iron Flute Immortal."

The fourth man was Tao Zongwang, and he was a Guangzhou (Henan) man. He had been a farmer and defended himself quite well with a hoe. He had got the nickname of "Nine Tailed Tortoise."
After the introductions the brigand servants offered a big jug of wine and two plates of meat. This refreshment was also offered to the men, and it took nearly two hours before they had all partaken when the second detachment of men arrived. They also took the feast of welcome and then they all proceeded up the mountain. Men were left behind to conduct the third, fourth, and fifth detachments of Chao Gai's men to the stronghold, and it was about half day before they all arrived. A great feast had been prepared for all the men, and during the feast Song Jiang spoke, "I am on my way to take refuge at Liangshan Marsh where I shall throw in my lot with Chao Gai. I do not know whether you four heroes are quite satisfied with this place or whether you would prefer to join our band at Liangshan Marsh."
"If you two gentlemen would accept our small services," said all the four leaders, "we should be delighted to join you."
Chao Gai was much pleased at this, and said that they would be heartily welcomed.
They stayed on the mountain for one day and the new recruits got all their things in order. On the following day Song Jiang and Chao Gai started off in charge of the first detachment as before, and the whole columns covered a distance of about seven //: The four new leaders formed the rear, and altogether they had about five hundred men in their detachment.
On the road Song Jiang spoke to Chao Gai, "I have in my life traveled far and wide, and met a great many dangers, but never have I been in the company of so many heroes. I now give up all my other thoughts in thinking but will follow you until death does separate us."
The band duly reached Liangshan Marsh. After several days of arranging matters a general meeting was held, at which Chao Gai requested Song Jiang to accept the position of chief.
"How can it be?" said Song Jiang. "You overlook that you have faced great risks in saving my life. Why should you ask me to take your position as chief! If you press me any further I should think of committing suicide."
"Why talk like that?" said Chao Gai. "If, in the first place, had you not faced great risk of death in order to save the lives of us seven men we should all of us have been dead long ago. You are our great benefactor. Who could accept the position if you do not?"
"My elder brother," said Song Jiang, "I should be ashamed to occupy the position as you are ten years my senior." He again and again urged Chao Gai to keep the leadership, and at last the latter took his seat with Song Jiang the second, Wu Yong the third, Gongsun Sheng the fourth.
Song Jiang now addressed the men, "We must not now make any distinction of meritorious service, so I will ask all the old leaders of Liangshan Marsh to take their seats on the left, and all the new leaders on the right. When future services are rendered, we will decide the position of each leader."
They all agreed to this and took their seats accordingly. There were altogether nine leaders on the right, and twenty-seven on the left.
During the feast Song Jiang explained in detail how the children's ballad at the Eastern Capital had been interpreted by Huang Wenbing so as to complicate Song Jiang himself. How the false letter conveyed by Dai Zong had been explained by Huang Wenbing who had strongly urged the Prefect to have both Song and Dai executed. "How could we escape death if you gentlemen did not rescue us?"
Li Kui jumped up and said, "My good elder brother! You justly answer the will of Heaven as announced by the boys in the street of the capital. You suffered from Huang Wenbing's ill-favor, but he suffered from the slashes of my sword. We are a strong band here so what have we to be afraid of? Our elder brother Chao Gai can now be made the Emperor of the Great Song Empire, and our elder brother Song Jiang can be the Emperor of Lesser Song. Wu Yong can be Prime Minister, Gongsun Sheng can be Minister of Education. We will form an army, attack the capital, and seize the damned throne. There we shall enjoy ourselves. Would it not be better than living on this stinking marsh?"
"'Iron Ox'!" replied Dai Zong, "you are talking nonsense. You cannot talk wildly here as you used to do at Jiangzhou. Here you should listen to our leaders and await their orders. You are not allowed to talk nonsense and interfere with the affairs. If you are still meddlesome, your head will be cut off as an example to the rest of our band."
"Ai Ya! Ai Ya!" exclaimed Li Kui, "if you cut off my head, how long it'll be before another head grows there? But I'll now confine myself to filling the neck with wine." All the assembled leaders laughed at this. During the next few days all the loot from Huang Wenbing's house and the presents sent by the Prefect Cai Jiu to his father Cai Jin were distributed equally among the brigands. On the third day, Song Jiang at a feast told the leaders that he wanted to ask leave to go to a certain place.

Spears and swords in forest dim,
Our hero will escape;
Excellent, service was prescribed,
By the mountainside.

140
Song Jiang Meets the Mystic Queen of the 9th Heaven & Receives 3 Heavenly Mystic Books in Circular Road Dead-End Village

"You have escorted me to this stronghold and feasted me for several days. I've been happy," said Song Jiang. "But I keep wondering about my old father at home. When Jiangzhou reports to the capital, the imperial court is sure to refer the matter to Jizhou, which will in turn instruct Yuncheng County to put pressure on my family as a means of forcing my arrest. There's no guarantee my father will be able to live through it. I've been thinking. If I could move him up here, I wouldn't have to worry. Would you brothers permit me?"
"This kind of matter is of great importance to all men," said Chao Gai. "I wouldn't have you stay here, revelling, while your old father at home is in difficulty. Of course we'll permit you. But our brothers have had several hard days in a row, and we haven't settled things in the fortress yet. Give us another day or two till we've checked our forces, and we'll go together."
"I could do that, only I'm afraid they'll start pressuring the family very soon. I'd better not delay. Anyhow, I don't want a lot of men. It would be best if I went secretly, alone. With the help of my brother Song Qing I can move my father up here during the night. Man or ghost, no one will know. If I went with a large party we'd only alert the local authorities and make the operation more troublesome."
"If anything should go wrong, there'd be no one to rescue you."
"I'd die willingly, for my father's sake."
Song Jiang insisted on leaving immediately. He wore a broad-brimmed felt hat, carried a cudgel, and hung a dagger at his waist. He went down the mountain, escorted as far as the Shore of Golden Sands by the various chieftains, who then returned.
He was ferried across the river to Zhu Gui's inn, and struck out along the road to Jizhou. He paused only to eat and drink, stopping at night and continuing again at break of day.
When he neared his village it was already evening, too late to go on to the manor. He spent the night at an inn and resumed his journey the following morning. But he reached Song Family Village too early, and he hid himself in a grove. When it was dark he walked up to the manor and knocked on the rear gate. Song Qing opened it. At the sight of Song Jiang he was astonished.
"Brother, why have you come home?" he exclaimed.
"To get father and you."
"They know here all about what you did in Jiangzhou. The county sends two constables every day to hang around and watch us. We're not allowed to leave. As soon as the documents arrive from Jiangzhou, they're going to arrest father and me and put us in jail until you're captured. There are nearly two hundred soldiers patrolling the neighborhood day and night. Don't delay another minute. Hurry back to Liangshan Marsh and beg the chieftains to rescue us."
Song Jiang broke into a cold sweat. He didn't dare enter the manor. He turned and hastened off in the direction of the mountain stronghold.
It was night, and the hazy moon shed little light. Song Jiang stuck to the small secluded paths. He had been travelling about a watch when he heard men shouting behind him. He looked back. A //or two away he saw the light of torches. "Stand where you are, Song Jiang," someone yelled.
He hurried on, "I wouldn't listen to Chao Gai," he thought, "and this is the result. Heaven be merciful and rescue me!"
In the distance were habitations of some sort, and he hastened towards them. The wind blew away the clouds, and in the bright moonlight Song Jiang could see the place clearly. He groaned. It was a desperate situation. For he recognized Circular Road Village. Surrounded by high mountains, with a stream at their foot, it had only this one road. Whether you went left or right within the village, you made a complete circle and returned to your starting point. There was no other way.
Song Jiang turned to retrace his steps. But the men behind had already blocked the road, their torches illuminating it as bright as day.
He plunged into the village and sought refuge. In a grove of trees he discovered an ancient temple. Pushing open the compound gates with both bands, he entered. There, in the moonlight, was a front and a rear building. He looked them over, but could see no place of concealment. Song Jiang was frantic. Outside, a man said: "He must be in the temple."
Song Jiang recognized the voice as Zhao Neng's. He had to hide, but where? The shrine, that was it. He pulled aside the curtain, climbed in, rested his club, and curled up behind the idol, not daring to breathe.
He could see torches entering the building, and pecked out. Zhao Neng and Zhao De, leading forty or fifty men, and all carrying torches, were searching the temple.
"I'm in a dead end," Song Jiang thought. "Spirits of the Nether Region, defend me!"
And the spirits answered his prayer. All the men passed by without examining the shrine.
"Heaven be praised," said Song Jiang.
But then Zhao De advanced towards the shrine with his torch, and Song Jiang thought: "They've got me, for sure."
The constable raised the curtain with his halberd and shone his torch high and low. Suddenly the torch smoked and a piece of soot fell in Zhao De's eye, blinding him for the moment. He dropped the torch to the floor, stamped on it, and extinguished the light. He went out of the building and spoke to the soldiers in the courtyard.
"The varlet's not in the temple. But there aren't any other paths. Where could he have gone?"
"Probably in that grove in the center of the village. He can't get away, Constable. This is Circular Road Village. There's only one road, in or out. On all sides are trackless forests and high mountains. Block the village exit and he can't escape even if he sprouts wings. As soon as it's daylight, we'll make a thorough search and nab him."
"Very well," said the two constables. They led their soldiers out of the temple.
"The spirits are indeed defending me," thought Song Jiang. "If I get away with my life, I swear I'll repair this temple and rebuild our family chapel. Oh, Spirits of the Nether Region, protect me!"
Even before he finished saying this, he heard soldiers outside the temple gate shouting: "Constables, he's here." Zhao Neng, Zhao De and their men hurried back.
"What rotten luck," thought Song Jiang. "I'm sure to be caught."
At the temple entrance Zhao Neng asked: "Where?"
"Look," said the soldiers. "Dirty hand prints on the gate. He must have pushed it open and gone inside."
"You're right. Search again—and carefully." ordered the constable. The men poured into the temple and began probing.
"My fate is against me," thought Song Jiang. "This time I'm finished!"
The soldiers pried everywhere in the two buildings. About the only things they didn't upend were the paving bricks. Again their torches brightly illuminated both the edifices.
"He's probably inside the shrine," Zhao Neng said to Zhao De. "You didn't search thoroughly enough. I'll look myself."
A soldier took his torch, Zhao Neng pulled the curtain aside, and six or seven men put their heads in. If they hadn't, nothing would have happened. But because they did, a gust of evil wind suddenly rose from within and blew out their torches, plunging the temple into darkness. They couldn't see a thing.
"That's funny," said Zhao Neng. "How does an evil wind come out of nowhere? The spirit must be in there. Our torches probably annoyed it. Let's go. We'll guard the village exit and search here again when it's daylight."
"We can't look carefully now, but at least we can poke around with our spears," said Zhao De.
"True," said Zhao Neng.
But as the two men moved forward, a huge gale arose from the rear of the building. Sand and gravel came raining down. The whole structure rocked on its foundations. A black cloud swallowed everything, an icy chill crept in. The men's hair stood on end. Zhao Neng recognized the danger.
"Get out, quickly, brother," he yelled to Zhao De. "The god is angry."
The whole party fled pell-mell. Several tumbled, a few twisted their legs. But they crawled to their feet and frantically bolted through the temple gate.
"Spare us," someone inside bleated. Zhao Neng went back into the compound. Two or three soldiers had fallen down the steps and their clothing had snagged in the exposed roots of some big trees. All their struggles couldn't free them. They had cast aside their halberds and were tugging at their clothes and begging for mercy. Song Jiang, still in the shrine, couldn't help laughing.
Zhao Neng extricated the soldiers and led them outside. "That's a very powerful spirit," the other men said. "You were messing around too much in there, and it sent its little demons after us. We'd better get down to the village entry and make sure that Song Jiang doesn't fly away."
"Right," the constables agreed. "If we hold that, we've got him."
The party marched off to the village entry.

Song Jiang, in the shrine, said to himself: "Although the louts haven't caught me, how am I going to get out of the village?" As he was racking his brain, he heard steps approaching on the rear portico. Song Jiang groaned. "Why didn't I leave here earlier?"
Two boys, clad in green, walked directly to the shrine. "Our Queen invites the Star Lord to speak with her," they said.
Song Jiang dared not utter a word. Again the boys addressed him.
"Come, Star Lord. The Queen invites you."
Song Jiang had not the courage to reply. The boys were insistent.
"Star Lord Song, do not delay. The Queen is waiting."
He heard sounds like the singing of birds. But they were not boys' voices this time. From beneath the idol's throne two girls, also dressed in green, emerged and stood before shrine platform.
Song Jiang was amazed. The girls were Earth Fairies. He heard them say. "Star Lord Song, the Queen awaits." He pulled open the curtain and came out. Their hair piled in spirals on their heads, the green-clad girls stood bent forward at the waist, each with palms together.
"Fairy maids, whence have you come?" Song Jiang queried.
"Our Queen has instructed that we invite the Star Lord to the palace."
"You're making a mistake. My name is Song Jiang. I'm not any 'Star Lord.' "
"Of course we're not. Please come along. Star Lord. The Queen is waiting."
"Which queen? I've never met her. How dare I go?"
"You'll understand when you get there. No need to ask."
"Where is the Queen?"
"In the palace to the rear."
The green-clad girls led the way. Song Jiang followed them out of the building. They went through a door in the comer of the compound wall. "This way, Star Lord," they said.
Song Jiang emerged into the open. The sky had a moon and was full of stars. A fragrant breeze rustled the leaves of the surrounding trees and bamboos.
"I never knew there was a place like this behind the temple," he thought. "I could have hidden here and saved myself all that fright."
He walked on, noting two long walls and tall pines on either side, each so thick that two arms couldn't meet around it. The path between was broad and rounded like a turtle's back.
"Who would have thought there'd be such a good road behind that ancient temple," he mused.
Before they had gone another //: he heard the babbling of a brook. Arching over it was a blue stone bridge with vermilion railings. Along the banks were exotic flowers and strange grasses, hoary pines and dense bamboos, green willows and enchanting peach trees. The brook, emerging from a stone fissure, flowed beneath the bridge like tumbling silver. like rolling snow.
They crossed to the other side. Between two rows of grotesque trees was a large star gate with a vermilion lintel. Passing through it, Song Jiang saw a palace ahead. "I was born here in Yuncheng County, but I never heard of this place." He thought, halting in astonishment.
His green-clad escort urged the "Star Lord" on. They led him through the palace gates. He was confronted by a magnificent courtyard flanked on either side by crimson-pillared esplanades draped with embroidered curtains. Directly ahead was a huge hall, festooned with glowing candles and lanterns.
He followed his guides step by step across the courtyard to a moon terrace. Several boys and girls on the steps of the hall hailed him. They were also dressed in green.
"Star Lord, invited by our Queen, please enter."
As Song Jiang mounted the steps of the hall, he trembled and his hair stood on end in spite of himself. The flagstones were of carved dragon and phoenix. The green-clad youths parted a curtain of a dais, went in and announced: "Star Lord Song awaits without."
Song Jiang kowtowed and prostrated himself before the steps of the dais. "I am only a lowly commoner who has never seen the Celestial One. I beg your Heavenly mercy and forgiveness," he said.
A voice inside invited "Star Lord" Song to be seated. Song Jiang didn't dare lift his head. Four green-clad youths raised him up and helped him to an embroidered pouffe. He sat down awkwardly.

"Roll up the curtain," a voice commanded.
Four youths rolled up the pearl-beaded curtain and supported it with a gold hook.
"I trust you've been well since last we parted?" said the Queen.
Song Jiang rose and again kowtowed. "A servile mortal such as I dares not gaze on your sacred visage."
"Since you are here, Star Lord, there is no need for excessive courtesy."
Only then did Song Jiang venture to lift his head and look. The hall glittered with gold and jade, and was lit by dragon lanterns and phoenix candles. Boys and girls dressed in green on either side held jade wands and pennants and waved large fans. In the center on a bejewelled carved couch sat the Queen. Dressed in filmy golden silks, she held a scepter of white jade. Her eyes were lovely, her countenance divine.
"Please come forward, Star Lord," she said. She ordered that wine be served.
Two green-clad girls poured wine into a jade cup from an intricately carved pitcher of gold. The first girl handed the cup to Song Jiang. He rose, unable to refuse, and accepted it. Facing the Queen, he knelt and drank. The fragrant liquor drifted to his brain like ambrosia, seeped into his heart like dew.
Another girl offered him a platter of fairy dates. Trembling lest he commit some gaucherie, he picked up a date with the tips of his fingers, ate it, and concealed the pit in his hand. Again the green-clad girl poured wine, and again he downed it at one go. The Queen signalled to refill his cup. This was done, and he drank once more.
A fairy maid offered the dates. He ate another two. In all, he imbibed three cups of fairy wine and consumed three fairy dates. He was feeling a little drunk and feared that he might behave improperly.
"I have no capacity for wine," he said. "I hope the Queen will excuse me from taking more."
"Granted," said the Queen, "since the Star Lord is not a drinker. Bring the Three Heavenly Books and present them to the Star Lord."
A youth went behind a screen and brought out a jade tray on which were Three Heavenly Books wrapped in gold silk and proffered them to Song Jiang. The packet was five inches long, three inches wide, and three inches thick. Song Jiang was afraid to open it. He kowtowed, accepted the packet reverently, and put it in his sleeve.
"Star Lord," said the Queen, "we have given you Three Heavenly Books. You must act according to Heaven's behest and show complete loyalty to the emperor. When you become an official, you must defend the country and bring peace to the people. Expel wickedness and pursue justice. Never forget this."
Song Jiang promised, and again kowtowed.
The Queen continued: "Since your heart is not yet pure nor your duties done, the Jade Emperor, as a punishment, has banished you to earth temporarily. Soon you will return to Heaven's Purple Palace, so in no way relax your efforts. If because of new sins you are condemned to Hell I shall not be able to save you. Familiarize yourself thoroughly with these three books. You may show them to the Occult Star, but to no other. After you have completed your mission, burn them. They are not to be left on earth. Remember all I have said. Today, I am a divinity and you a mortal. We cannot remain together. You must go back now, quickly."
The Queen instructed her fairies to send him on his way. "We shall meet again in fairyland's towers of gold and jade," she said.
Song Jiang thanked her, and followed some green-clad girls out of the hall and through the Star Gate. The fairy maids saw him as far as the stone bridge.
"You had a fright not long ago and would have been captured if our Queen hadn't intervened," they said. "Tomorrow, when it is light, you will escape. Oh, look, Star Lord. Two dragons are playing in the water."
Song Jiang leaned over the rail and gazed. Two of the girls gave him a sudden push. Song Jiang let out a yell, and landed in the shrine. He had been dreaming.
He crawled to his feet and looked out. The moon was at its zenith. Song Jiang estimated it to be around the third watch. In his hand he found three date pits. And in his sleeve was the silk-wrapped packet. He opened it up. Sure enough, there were the Three Heavenly Books. He could still taste the fragrant wine.
"A strange dream," he mused. "It seemed so real. Yet if it was only a dream, what are these Heavenly Books doing in my sleeve, why can I still taste the wine, what are these date pits doing in my hand? And how can I remember every word? If it wasn't a dream, why have I fallen into this shrine? The answer is obvious. The spirit here is extremely potent, and manifests itself very powerfully. Which one is it, I wonder?"
He raised the curtain to let some light in. On a throne carved with nine dragons sat a beautiful female figure, exactly the same as the Queen.
"She called me 'Star Lord,' " he said to himself. "Evidently I was no ordinary person in my previous life. These Three Heavenly Books will certainly be useful, and I will not forget the divine instructions. Those green-clad fairy maids said: 'Tomorrow, when it is light, you will escape.' The sky is already turning light. I'm getting out of here."
He groped around until he found his cudgel, brushed the dust off his clothes and cautiously emerged from the building. He walked along the left esplanade and went out of the temple. He looked up at the signboard over the gateway. In letters of gold, it read: "Temple of the Mystic Queen."
Song Jiang placed his fingers on his forehead and bowed his thanks. "How lucky. So it was the Mystic Queen of Ninth Heaven who gave me those Heavenly Books! And she's saved my life, as well. If only I can see that divine face again, I surely will repair this temple and add more halls. I prostrate myself, wise and beneficent Queen, and beg your protection."
He advanced stealthily towards the village entry. He hadn't gone very far when he heard wild shouts in the distance. "Trouble again," he thought, and halted. "I can't get out of the village, and if they see me, they'll take me. I'd better hide behind those trees on the side of the road."
No sooner had he slipped into his place of shelter than several soldiers, knives and lances in hand, ran frantically in his direction, panting and stumbling. "Mystic Spirit, save us," they cried.
"Very peculiar," thought Song Jiang. "They're supposed to be waiting to nab me at the village entry. What are they doing here?"
A moment later Zhao Neng tore down the road. "Spirit," he bawled, "Spirit, protect me!"
"Why is that oaf in such a tizzy?" Song Jiang wondered.
Then he saw their pursuer. He was a huge fellow, stripped to the waist and bulging with fantastic muscles. In his hands were two great battle-axes.
"Halt, you friggin pricks," the man roared.
As he drew nearer, Song Jiang recognized him. It was none other than Li Kui the Black Whirlwind.
"This must be a dream," said Song Jiang. He dared not emerge.
In front of the temple Zhao Neng tripped over the exposed root of a pine tree and fell to the ground. Li Kui caught up, put a foot on his back and raised a big ax. Two other bold fellows also raced up, pushing their broad-brimmed felt hats back onto their shoulders. Each held a halberd. The first was Ou Peng, the second Tao Zongwang. Li Kui, afraid that they would compete with each other for the honor of capturing the knave at the expense of fraternal loyalty, swung his ax and cleaved Zhao Neng from head to chest. Then he chased after the fleeing soldiers, killing left and right, as they ran in all directions.
Afraid to come out; Song Jiang watched as three more gallants appeared. The first was Liu Tang the Red-Haired Demon, the second was Shi Yong the General, the third was Hell's Summoner LiLi. The six men conferred.
"We've killed all those rogues," they said, "but can't find brother. A fine state of affairs!"
"There's a man standing behind that pine," cried Shi Yong.
Only then did Song Jiang step forward. "Thank you, brothers, for rescuing me again," he said. "How can I ever repay you?"
The six were overjoyed. "Brother is here," they exclaimed. "Leader Chao Gai must be told at once."
Shi Yong and LiLi hurried off to report.
"How did you know where I was?" Song Jiang asked Liu Tang.
"When you left the mountain Chao Gai and Wu Yong were uneasy. They told Superintendent Dai to go down and find out what happened to you. But Chao Gai still was worried. He set out with me and these companions as reinforcements. He was afraid you'd get into trouble. On the road we met Dai. 'Two thieving donkeys are after brother to arrest him,' he told us. Chao Gai was very angry. He instructed Dai to go back to the stronghold and say that only Wu Yong, Gongsun Sheng, and a few others were to remain and hold the fort. All the rest were to come out and search for you.
"Then we heard someone say: 'Song Jiang has been run to ground in Circular Road Village.' We slaughtered all the scoundrels patrolling the entry, except for the few who fled into the village. Brother Li Kui gave chase, and we followed. We never thought we'd find you here."
Before he had finished speaking, the others arrived. When all had assembled, Song Jiang thanked them, every one.
"I urged you not to go down the mountain alone, brother, but you wouldn't listen," said Chao Gai. "You nearly lost your life."
"My concern about my father gave me no rest. I had to go and fetch him."
"This will please you, then. I sent Dai Zong with a few others after your father and brother. They've already arrived at the stronghold."
Song Jiang was delighted. He kowtowed to Chao Gai. "For such beneficence, brother, I would die willingly."
All mounted horses and left the village. Song Jiang touched his fingers to his forehead, gazed up at the sky and thanked the Mystic Queen for her protection. He vowed that one day he would prove his gratitude.
The column proceeded back towards Liangshan Marsh. Wu Yong and the other chieftains holding the fortress were at the Shore of Golden Sands to greet them. They went together to Fraternity Hall.
"Where is my father?" Song Jiang asked eagerly.
Chao Gai sent a man to fetch Squire Song. Not long after, the old man arrived, riding in a sedan-chair which his son Song Qing the Iron Fan was helping carry. Everyone assisted him down and escorted him into the hall.
Song Jiang was overjoyed. Smiling broadly, he kowtowed. "Forgive your unfilial son for causing you such alarm."
"Those two wretched constables sent men. They were waiting only for the documents to arrive from Jiangzhou so that they could bring your brother and me into court. When I heard that you were at the rear gate, there were eight or nine soldiers in the thatch-roofed hall up front. Then they disappeared, but we didn't know what drove them away. Finally, at the third watch, over two hundred men opened the manor gates, put me in a sedan-chair, and told your brother to load up our valuables and set fire to the manor. I had no chance to ask why, and they brought me here."
"We owe it all to these brothers that we are together again."
Song Jiang told Song Qing to kowtow and thank the chieftains. Chao Gai and the leaders also kowtowed to Squire Song. Cows and horses were slaughtered and a feast was laid to celebrate the reunion of Squire Song and his sons. The whole day was spent in rejoicing. The next day they feasted again, and chieftains, large and small, joined in the merrymaking.

On the third day Chao Gai once more gave a banquet of celebration. Gongsun Sheng was suddenly reminded of his old mother in Jizhou. It was a long time since he'd seen her, and he wondered how she was. During the drinking, he rose and addressed the chieftains.
"I am deeply grateful for the kindness which you have always shown me. Flesh and blood couldn't be treated better," he said. "I have been happy since I followed our leader Chao Gai here up this mountain. But I have never once gone home to see my old mother. And I imagine my old Taoist teacher also misses me. I wish you would grant me a leave of four or five months to visit them. It would please me mightily, and then I wouldn't have to worry about my old mother."
"I recall your saying that your mother has no one to look after her in your home in the north," replied Chao Gai. "Since you ask, we can't refuse, though we hate to part. When you're ready, we'll see you off."
Gongsun thanked him. All drank freely that day, and in the evening retired to their quarters to rest. The following morning a farewell feast was given for Gongsun Sheng.
He resumed his garb of a wandering Taoist priest, tied one pouch at his side, another over his middle, hung a pair of swords across his back, a coir hat over his shoulders, and held a tortoise shell fan in his hand. The chieftains went with him down the mountain. At the pass a feast was laid and they drank in farewell.
"We cannot keep you, sir priest," said Chao Gai, "Don't disappoint us. Though we didn't want to let you go, we couldn't very well refuse since it's a question of your mother. But we expect you back in a hundred days or so. Don't break your word."
"How could I? You leaders have been so considerate of me for so long. I'll go home, visit my Taoist teacher, see to it that my mother is well provided for, and return."
"Why don't you take a few men with you?" asked Song Jiang. "They could help bring your old mother back. Then you could look after her all the time."
"My mother has always liked peace and quiet. She can't stand excitement. That's why I don't dare bring her to this place. We've got a few fields and some slope land. She can manage. I only want to make sure that she's all right, then I'll rejoin you."
"In that case, so be it. We'll be looking forward to your early return," said Song Jiang.
Chao Gai offered Gongsun gold and silver on a platter for his journey.
"I don't need all that," he said. "Just enough for expenses."
But Chao Gai forced him to take half. Gongsun put the money in his side pouch, placed his palms together and bid the chieftains farewell. After crossing from the Shore of Golden Sands, he set out in the direction of Jizhou.

*

As the chieftains prepared to go back up the mountain they were startled to see Li Kui burst into tears.
"What's the trouble, brother?" Song Jiang hastily inquired.
"A fine life," bawled Black Whirlwind. "This one goes to fetch his pa, that one goes to see his ma. Iron Ox didn't pop out of some friggin hole in the ground!"
"What is it that you want?"
"My old mother is home alone. My older brother is a hired hand. How can he support her? I want to bring her here so she can have a few years of happiness."
"You're absolutely right," said Chao Gai. "We'll send a few men with you to escort her back. An excellent idea."
"It can't be done," Song Jiang interjected. "Brother Li is too irascible. If he goes home, he's sure to get into trouble. Even if we send men with him, that won't be any good either. He's too hot-tempered. He'd quarrel with them on the road. Besides, he's killed a lot of people in Jiangzhou. Everybody there knows Black Whirlwind. Notices calling for his arrest must have been circulated. Of course his native village has been alerted. He's so fierce-looking, he sticks out like a sore thumb. And his home's quite far away. If anything should go wrong, we might not get the news. Better wait till things quiet down, brother Li. There will still be time."
"You're not fair, brother," Li Kui cried impatiently. "You fetched your father here and he's happy. Should my mother stay in her village and suffer? Do you want Iron Ox's belly to burst with rage?"
"Calm yourself, brother. We'll let you go, but on three conditions."
"What're they?" Song Jiang told him, counting the conditions off on his fingers. And as a result, Li Kui with his earth-rocking, heaven-shaking hands fought mountain-climbing, chasm-leaping tigers.

Now when Song Jiang at the feast told everyone that he wanted leave of absence to go down the mountain, he explained: "Here we are, we've been feasting for days and we're having a fine time, but I have no idea how things are going with my old father at home. Since Jiangzhou have informed the Grand Preceptor, in my home district of Jizhou they will be obliged to take action and get the Yuncheng authorities to persecute my family and hold them responsible for my capture. I am afraid my father's life is at risk. I long to see him and, with your approval, I would like to go home to fetch him and bring him here to the mountain, to put an end to my anxieties."
Chao Gai said: "My dear brother, this is an important question of moral obligation. Certainly it is not right for us to be enjoying great pleasures while at home your father is suffering. How could I do other than agree with you? The only thing is, since we've all been celebrating for some days now, none of the troops here are prepared. Why not wait a couple of days till we can equip a detachment and go together with you to fetch him?" "In itself, waiting a few days is nothing," Song Jiang said, "but I fear that the Jiangzhou authorities will send orders to Jizhou to persecute my family, that's why the matter brooks no delay. However, there's no need to send a big force, I shall go alone in secret, and my younger brother, Iron Fan, will help me bring my father here with the utmost haste. That way, not a soul need know in the village. If we took a big troop of men the whole district would certainly be alerted, which could defeat our purpose."
Chao Gai said: "But supposing you should meet with some mishap along the way, there'd be no one to help you out."
Song Jiang said: "For the sake of one's father, even death is worth risking." Nothing they could do would persuade him to stay, he was determined to leave at once. He chose a broad-brimmed hat, picked up a short staff, buckled on a sword, and went down the mountain. The other leaders accompanied him as far as Golden Sands Landing before returning.
After crossing and landing at the Crocodile's inn, Song Jiang took the highway to Yuncheng. On the way he stopped only for food when he was hungry, for drink when he was thirsty, resting late and starting early. Finally he found himself approaching the Song village. Since it was late in the day he went to stay the night at an inn. Next day he hurried on to the Song village, but then it was too early, so he lay low in a wood till evening. When he went and knocked on the back door, Iron Fan came to open it. The sight of his brother appeared to give Iron Fan quite a shock. "Why have you come home?" he said in consternation.
Song Jiang replied: "I have come to fetch father and you."
"But everyone here knows now about that business of yours in Jiangzhou. The district authorities have sent two inspectors, they come looking for you every day. We are under house arrest, we can't move anywhere. They're only waiting for the official order from Jiangzhou in order to arrest us both and throw us into prison until they catch you. There are several hundred soldiers on patrol, night and day. You mustn't waste any time. Go back to Mount Liang and ask all the leaders to come to rescue us."
Song Jiang was so upset by this that he broke out in an icy sweat. Not daring even to enter the house, he simply turned around and left. He raced back along the road towards Mount Liang. It was dark and the moon was misty, so it was hard to find his way. He deliberately chose the smallest and most isolated of roads to travel on. When he had been going almost two hours, he heard shouting behind him. He turned and listened. The pursuit was only about half a mile behind. He could see a forest of torches blazing in the night and could hear shouts of "Don't let Song Jiang get away!"
"If I'd only listened to Chao Gai, this would never have happened!" he thought as he hurried on. "May heaven pity me and come to my aid!"
He could see a place of some kind ahead of him; it was still distant, so he just kept doggedly on. In a little while the wind swept away the thin clouds and the moon emerged fully. Then he knew exactly where he was. It made him cry out in dismay and he nearly fainted. The place where he found himself was known as "Dead-End Village." It was surrounded in fact by high mountains and steep perpendicular cliffs; a deep river ran along the bottom of the valley and there was only the one road. Once you were in this place, search as you might on one side or the other you'd find nothing but the one road, with no other way in or out. When Song Jiang realized where he was, he would have liked to turn back, but escape was blocked by his pursuers. The torches blazing behind him made it almost like broad daylight and he had no choice now but to keep on towards the village and hope to find somewhere to hide. After skirting the edge of a wood he saw an old temple. Here's what he saw:

The walls are in ruins, the roof sags: green moss decks the painted walls of the two galleries, rank grass fills the flower beds. The arms are broken off the demons at the gate and their ugliness no longer impresses; in the main hall the god sits bareheaded in defiance of etiquette. The spider has spun his web on the altar, the mole and ant makes their nest in the incense burner. The fox sleeps nightly in the urn for burning paper offerings, the bat rests undisturbed on the screen before the image.

Song Jiang pushed open the door of the temple and aided by the moonlight entered and looked for a place to hide. He examined the main hall, front and back, but it afforded no hiding-place. He was beginning to panic. Just then he heard voices outside: "Why not have a look inside this temple, chief?" He recognized one of the voices as Zhao Neng's. Desperate for somewhere to conceal himself, his eye fell on a niche or shrine intended for an image. He drew back the curtain, crouched down and hopped inside. He found a place for his cudgel and then huddled on the floor, scarce daring to breathe. As he did so, the light of the torches came inside the building.

When he managed to peep out, he saw Zhao Neng and Zhao De with a troop of fifty men holding torches which they shone about to illuminate every corner of the temple. "This time I have reached a dead end," he thought to himself. "All I can do is pray for the protection of the spirits and the gods' compassion." When after a while they started to leave, one after another, and no one had looked in the shrine, Song Jiang said to himself: "It's a miracle!" But at that very moment, Zhao De approached the shrine with his torch and shone it inside. "Now they've got me for sure!" Song Jiang thought. Using the handle of his halberd in the other hand Zhao De lifted the curtain. As he moved the torch to illuminate the shrine from top to bottom, the smoke swirled about and a speck of black soot fell in Zhao De's eye, blinding him. He threw the torch down and extinguished it with his foot. He left the building, saying to the soldiers: "He's not in the temple — there's no other road, where the devil can he have got to?"

"He's probably hiding in the trees by the village," they said. "But there's no fear he'll get away. This place is called 'Dead-End Village,' the only way out is back along this road. There are high mountains and woods all around, and there's no way up. All you've got to do, sergeant, is block the approach to the village. Then he can grow wings and fly up into the sky, if he likes, but he can't escape. When it gets light we can search the village real good and we'll have him."

"Right!" said Zhao De, and began to depart with his troops.

"Really the gods must be on my side," Song Jiang was just thinking. "If I get out of this alive, I must repair this temple and build a new ancestral hall, it can only be that the spirits protected me."

He had hardly finished this thought when a soldier in front of the temple door shouted: "Sergeant, he's here!"

The Zhaos and their men came racing back.

"What cursed luck!" Song Jiang thought, "Now I'm bound to be caught!"

"Where is he?" Zhao Neng demanded, arriving at the door.

"Take a look at these two handprints in the dust on the temple door, sergeant," said the soldier. "He must have shoved it open just now and dodged inside."

"You're right, we'd better go over it again real thorough."

The whole lot came in again and started searching. Song Jiang was thinking: "What a stupid fate mine is, this must mean I'm finished!"

They searched the place from top to bottom, they did everything but turn over the bricks. After a period of searching and shining the torches around, Zhao Neng said to his brother: "He must be in that shrine there. You didn't search it carefully enough just now. I'm going to have a good look." A soldier held up a torch, while Zhao Neng raised the curtain with one hand and half a dozen heads peered in. But before they could focus properly on everything inside, a gust of foul air burst from within and blew out all the torches, swirling about and obscuring the whole temple, so they even couldn't see one another. "My God!" said Zhao Neng. "Usually when you get a foul wind like this it means there's a god in there, who wants to rebuke us for shining the light around, that's the reason why this kind of foul wind arises. We'd better go. We'll simply set up a block on the road and wait for daylight before searching any more."

Zhao De said: "But we still haven't searched properly inside the shrine. We'd better give it a poke with a halberd."

"You're right," said Zhao Neng.

But as the two of them were about to proceed, the mysterious wind began to blow again from the back of the temple, and it blew till the sand flew up and stones began to move, it came surging forth, causing the roof of the temple to creak to and fro and a black cloud to descend enveloping everyone. The cold draught froze them and their hair stood on end. Zhao Neng didn't at all like this turn of events. "Let's get out brother, the god is angry," he yelled to Zhao De. Everyone fled from the temple in confusion. They didn't stop running till they were outside the gate. Some fell head over heels, others sprained their ankles, but they all scrambled up again and fled for their lives. Someone could still be heard inside the temple compound screaming for mercy. Zhao Neng went back in to look and found one or two soldiers had fallen inside the entrance courtyard and got their clothing caught in the roots of a tree, so that struggle as they might they could not break free. They had thrown away their pikes and were tugging at their clothing and screaming for help. Song Jiang listening in his hiding-place could barely restrain his laughter.

Zhao Neng freed the men's clothing and hustled them out of the door. Several of the soldiers in front said: "We said this god was too powerful, but you lot would stick around in there and you only set those demons off. We'd best go and set up the road block so he can't get away." Zhao Neng and Zhao De both agreed: "That's right, we only need to guard the road securely on every side." With this they all went off to the entrance to the village.

Meanwhile Song Jiang in his hiding-place was assessing his fortunes: "It's true I haven't been caught, but how am I ever going to get out of here?" Just at that moment, as he was vainly racking his brains for a solution, he heard someone moving about outside. "Oh, no! Trouble again!" he thought. "Why didn't I get out before?" However, it turned out to be only two young acolytes in green who stopped beside the shrine and said: "We have instructions from Holy Mother to invite the Heavenly Prince to speak with her." Song Jiang was much too wary to make the slightest sound in answer. So the acolytes repeated: "Holy Mother invites you, Heavenly Prince, please to come with us." Song Jiang still did not dare speak. Again the acolytes said: "Prince Song, please do not delay, Holy Mother has been waiting a long time for you." From the fluting tones Song Jiang knew that these were not men speaking, so he raised himself from the floor of the shrine and looked out. What he saw was two young female disciples dressed in green standing beside the altar. He had quite a shock, because they looked so much like ceramic images.

When they said again: "Prince Song, Holy Mother invites you," he drew aside the curtain and stepped right out. The two acolytes, each with her hair tied in the shape of a shell at the back, bobbed up and down and made him a kowtow. Here is what he saw:

Their skin is like pearls, their hair green, they have white teeth and shining eyes. As they flutter about, not a speck of dust sullies their purity, they radiate heavenly grace and harmony. Styled like a conch shell, their hair rises up like a mountain peak. The phoenix slippers are elegant as lotus petals. Their robes are of dark green, interwoven with silver thread, they are girt with purple sashes and gold clasps. Such perfection of elegance and refinement suggests messengers from heaven.

Then Song Jiang asked: "What is the reason for this heavenly visitation?"

"We come at Holy Mother's behest to invite the Heavenly Prince to her palace."

"You must be mistaken," Song Jiang said. "My name is Song and my given name is Jiang, but I'm not a heavenly prince."

"How can we be mistaken? Please come now, Holy Mother has long awaited you."

Song Jiang said: "Who is this Holy Mother? I've never even met her, how can I presume to visit her?"

"If you come, then you will meet her. Don't ask so many questions."

"Where is she?"

"In her residence at the back."

With the disciples in green leading the way, Song Jiang left the temple. They passed through a gate in the corner of a wall that extended behind and to one side of the temple, and the acolytes said: "Prince Song, this is the entrance." Song Jiang followed them through the gate and looked about him. The sky was bright with stars and the moon shone, a soft breeze whispered and all around were luxuriant groves and bamboo thickets. "So this is what there is behind the temple," Song Jiang thought. "If I'd only known, I wouldn't have hidden in the temple and had to suffer all those shocks."

Where he was walking there were banks on either side planted with great pine trees, so large a man could not encircle them with his arms. In the flat space between was a broad avenue curved like the back of a tortoise. Song Jiang kept thinking to himself: "I had no idea there was such a fine road behind the temple."

When he'd followed the acolytes for less than half a mile, he heard the tinkling of a running stream. Ahead was a bridge of black stone with a red rail on either side. The banks were enlivened with exotic flowers and rare grasses, dark green pines, luxuriant bamboos, jade-green willows, and delicate apricots, whilst under the bridge the water tumbled like scattered silver or billowing snow, gushing from the mouth of a stone grotto. After passing the bridge, two rows of unusual trees appeared and in the middle a tall red star gate. He passed through and lifting his eyes beheld a palace:

The red door is studded with gold nails, there are green tiles and carved eaves. Winged dragons twisting round the pillars play with a bright pearl; paired phoenixes on the screen outshine the sun. The surrounding walls of clay are stained vermilion, and all around the palace flowers bloom among stately willows. The hall is of great splendour, and within it the light from an auspicious lantern casts lovely shadows. Wafted through windows arched like a turtle's back sweet breezes lightly stir the yellow gauze; beyond the curtains tied back with delicate ribbons, the pale moon hangs silently in a sky like purple velvet. If this is not the abode of some heavenly being, it must be at least the dwelling of an earthly queen.

"I was born in Yuncheng," Song Jiang thought, "yet I never knew this was here." He stood there nervously, not daring to go on. The acolytes urged him forward. They led him on through the gates of the palace into the wide forecourt. The two side galleries had vermilion pillars, hung about with embroidered curtains, the great hall in the centre was bedecked with lanterns and candles. The acolytes led him step by step from the courtyard to the platform. Before the steps leading up into the hall were more acolytes in green who said: "Holy Mother welcomes you, please enter." When he arrived at the main hall Song Jiang was trembling all over and his hair was standing on end. He stopped on a brick stairway depicting dragon and phoenix. The acolytes passed through the curtains and the order was given out: "Heavenly Prince Song please approach the throne." On reaching the screen before the throne, Song Jiang bowed low and prostrated himself, saying: "Your humble servant is not worthy. I can only pray for mercy and beg you to favour me with your graciousness."

From behind the screen came the order: "Be seated, Heavenly Prince."

But Song Jiang dared not so much as lift his head. So four of the acolytes raised him and placed for him a seat of fine porcelain, and he was obliged to sit. Order was given for the screen to be rolled back. Several acolytes rushed to roll up the spangled curtain, securing it with golden hooks.

Holy Mother now asked: "I trust you have been well since we parted?"

Song Jiang rose to his feet and bowing said: "Your humble servant dares not look at Your Holiness."

"Now that you are here there is no need for further ceremony."

Now at last Song Jiang ventured to raise his eyes. He saw the throne all glittering and bright, adorned with lanterns and candles. On either side were young green-clad girl acolytes holding sceptres and tablets and servant girls with flags and fans. In the centre, on a throne embellished with precious stones and dragons, sat Holy Mother.

Holy Mother spoke again: "Please approach, Heavenly Prince." She ordered the acolytes to bring wine. Two junior acolytes filled jade cups from a bottle of "Rare Flower" wine. A senior acolyte offered a cup of wine to Song Jiang. Not daring to refuse, he rose to his feet, took the jade cup in his hands and, fixing his eyes on Holy Mother, knelt and drained it. The wine tasted superb and seemed to suffuse his being with a glow of understanding, as if he were bathed in heavenly dew. Another acolyte now appeared with a plate of celestial dates which she offered to Song Jiang. He was terrified of committing a breech of decorum, so he took one with the very tips of his fingers and then having eaten it kept the stone in his hand. The acolyte poured another cup of wine and presented it to him, and again he was obliged to drink. Holy Mother ordered another cup after this, so another was poured and offered and again he drank. The dates were offered again and he ate two. Altogether now he had drunk three cups of wine and eaten three dates. He began to feel the slight flush of intoxication. He was terrified of getting drunk and losing his composure, so he bowed and said: "Your humble servant has no strong head for wine and begs to be excused."

"If the Heavenly Prince cannot take wine, he may desist," was the reply from above. "Fetch me the three mystic books. I shall give them to the Heavenly Prince."

An acolyte slipped behind the screen and returned bearing a jade tray with a package wrapped in yellow silk and containing the three mystic books. They were presented to Song Jiang. When he looked at them, they were as though five inches long, three inches wide and three inches high. He did not dare open them but bowed and took them reverently and bestowed them in his sleeves.

Holy Mother spoke: "Heavenly Prince, I give you these three books that you may always perform heaven's will. Be ever a steadfast proponent of righteousness, preserve your land and people, shun evil and pursue justice. I have a four-line mystic verse for you. Commit it to memory and have it always with you, do not ever forget it."

Song Jiang bowed again and expressed his eagerness to receive the mystic verse. Holy Mother intoned:

Chance lodgings will bring many joys,
Scaling the heights will hold no fears.
Against foes without, bandits within
Many a valiant deed is done.

When he had heard it, Song Jiang again bowed reverentially. Holy Mother spoke again: "Because evil desires are not entirely eradicated from your heart, and your journey is yet unfinished, the Jade Emperor has sentenced you to remain here below for a space. But in a while you will mount again to the Purple Mansions. Meanwhile you must not be in any way remiss. If for some further transgression you are again sent down to the underworld, I shall be unable to save you. These three books you must study attentively and with profit. This knowledge is to be shared only with the Occult Star, it is not for the eyes of others. After your success you must burn them, they must not remain in the world. Commit their injunctions to memory. At present there is a gulf between heaven and earth. It would not be right for you to tarry here long, you must return quickly." So saying, she ordered the acolytes to take him back with all speed. "We will again meet here in the jade halls of the golden palace on another occasion."

Song Jiang thanked Holy Mother and followed the disciples who led him out of the palace and through the star gate as far as the stone bridge. There they said: "The Heavenly Prince has just had a fright. But for the Holy Mother's protection you would have been caught. But when daylight comes you will undoubtedly be delivered from your predicament. Do you see the two dragons playing in the water beneath the bridge?"

Song Jiang leant on the rail and looked over. He did indeed see two dragons playing in the water, but just then the acolytes gave him a push and with a loud cry he fell … and found himself in the shrine. It had all been a magic dream.

He pulled himself to his feet and looked around. The moon was high, he guessed it to be around midnight. When he felt in his sleeves, he found three date stones and the package, which he took out and examined. It contained indeed the three volumes of the sacred books. And he could still taste the wine on his tongue, too.

"This is a very strange dream," he thought. "It is like a dream and not a dream. If it was a dream, how do the sacred books come to be here in my sleeve? And the taste of wine in my mouth and the date stones in my hand? And I remember exactly what was spoken, I haven't forgotten a word. So perhaps I wasn't dreaming. Certainly I am here in the shrine now, it's as if I was catapulted here. The explanation must be quite simple. It must be that this goddess is so potent she can manifest her divine power in this manner. Only I wonder which goddess it was?" He pulled aside the curtain in order to see. On the carved throne sat a beautiful lady, exactly like the one in the dream. Song Jiang thought: "This Holy Mother insisted I was a heavenly prince. It looks as if in a previous life I must have been someone of some importance. These three tomes will surely be useful. I still remember the mystic four-line verse she gave me. The acolyte said, 'When daylight comes you will undoubtedly be delivered from your predicament.' It's getting light already, I'd better be going."

He felt about him till he laid hands on his cudgel, brushed the dust off his clothes, carefully descended from the shrine and made his way via the left-hand gallery to the front of the temple. When he looked up he saw an ancient sign with four gold characters inscribed on it: "Temple of the Mystic Lady." Song Jiang joined his palms and prayed: "Heaven be praised. Of course it was the Mystic Lady of the Ninth Heaven who gave me the three books and preserved me from death. If ever again I am allowed to see the sun, I shall certainly return and restore the temple. I entreat her divine mercy to defend and protect me." After giving thanks, he set off cautiously, heading for the entrance to the village.

He was only a little way from the temple when he heard a tremendous hullabaloo occurring some way ahead of him. "This is no good," he said to himself. "I'd better wait for a bit, I obviously can't get out now. If I go forward I'm bound to be caught. The best thing will be to hide behind this tree at the side of the road."

When he'd slipped behind the tree, he saw a bunch of soldiers approaching in a disorderly rout, out of breath and trailing their swords and spears, all frantically shouting: "Heaven save us!"

Watching from behind his tree, Song Jiang thought: "Strange. They were supposed to be blocking the way out of the village, waiting to catch me. Where are they charging off to?" The next minute Zhao Neng also appeared, shouting as he ran: "We're done for!"

"What is it that's scared him like that?" Song Jiang wondered.

Then he saw a huge fellow chasing behind. On the top half of his body there was not a stitch of clothing, his immense physique was totally exposed. He was waving a pair of double-edged axes and shouting: "Don't let the bastard get away!" If it was not clear in the distance, there was no doubt when he got nearer: it was Iron Ox.

"Am I dreaming?" Song Jiang wondered, still not daring to come out of hiding.

When Zhao Neng reached the temple he tripped over the root of a pine tree and crashed to the ground. Iron Ox caught up with him, planted a foot on his back and raised his axe. He was already about to strike when two more pursuers appeared behind him, their felt hats resting on their shoulders, each wielding a halberd. The senior of these two was Golden Wings, the junior was the Nine-Tailed Turtle. When he saw them Iron Ox, fearing that in defiance of all the rules of brotherhood they might rob him of his glory, chopped Zhao Neng in half with one tremendous blow down the middle that opened up his whole chest, and then raced away to massacre more of the fleeing troops, who were running in all directions.

Behind these, three more heroes could now be seen, doing great destruction: in front the Red-Haired Devil, second Shi Yong, and third the Executioner. All six now paused to confer: "Well, we've routed those bastards, but we still haven't found our brother Song Jiang. What can we do now?" Suddenly Shi Yong shouted: "Who the devil is that, hiding behind that bloody pine tree?"

Song Jiang at last saw fit to reveal himself: "You have just saved my life," he said. "How can I ever repay you?"

They were immensely relieved to see him. "There you are!" they said. "We must go and tell leader Chao at once!" Shi Yong and the Executioner both rushed off.

"How did you know to come here to rescue me?" Song Jiang asked the Red-Haired Devil.

The latter replied: "When you first went down the mountain, Leader Chao and the Professor were anxious. So they told the Magic Messenger to follow you and find out where you were. But Leader Chao still could not rest easy, so he asked me and the others to come and back you up, as he feared something might go wrong for you. On the way we ran into the Magic Messenger, who said, 'Two bloody fools are chasing our brother.' Leader Chao was furious. He sent the Magic Messenger back to the mountain to tell the lot who stayed behind, that's to say the Professor, Taoist Gongsun Sheng, the Ruan brothers, the Little Duke, the Halberdier, the Crocodile and the Daytime Rat, to look after the defence of the stronghold, and told everyone else to come and help look for you. Some one said they'd followed you to Dead-End Village. We killed all the blighters who were blocking the approach to the village, there's no one left there. There was only these few who fled into the village. Iron Ox went after them and we followed. We were afraid you weren't here…."

Before he could finish, Shi Yong arrived with Chao Gai, Colonel Hua, Thunderclap, the Tamer, the Pill Monger, the Magic Calculator, and the Magic Flautist. The Executioner also arrived with the White-Water Dragon, Mu Hong, the Pilot, White Eel, Mu Chun, the Ape, Magic Hand and the Craftsman. This great band of heroes all converged. Song Jiang thanked all the leaders. Chao Gai said: "I implore you brother not to go down the mountain on your own again. You refused to listen to me once more and look what troubles resulted."

Song Jiang said: "My friends, this was all on account of my father. I was intensely worried, I simply could not sit still. It would have been quite impossible for me not to come and fetch him."

"I have news that will make you happy, then," Chao Gai said. "I already told the Magic Messenger to take Skyscraper, the Door-God in the Clouds, Short-Arse, Whitey, and the two Tong brothers and fetch your father and the rest of your family. They should be in the mountain retreat by now."

Song Jiang was overjoyed to hear this and thanked Chao Gai, saying: "After this great favour you have done me, I could die now without regret!"

Chao Gai and Song Jiang, both equally happy with the turn of events, now mounted horses and rode with the others out of Dead-End Village. Song Jiang put his hand respectfully on his forehead as he rode and turning his eyes heavenwards, gave thanks to the gods for their protective power and prayed that he might come again some other day to fulfil his vow. There is an old song which directly describes how Song Jiang's righteousness and honour obtained heaven's grace:

When chaos reigns and fortune's overthrown
Heroes establish an order of their own.
In Shandong now a hopeful dawning pricks;
The four great stars are grown to thirty-six.
Above Yuncheng an auspicious air's observed;
This was the spot for Song Jiang's birth reserved.
In youth the annals and classics are his passion;
Grown up, he turns to charity and compassion:
His are all the virtues of the righteous;
The Mystic Lady adds to them her scriptures.
Roaming the world, with heroes he oft converses,
And suffers many an ill ere his luck reverses.
To the Marshes of Mount Liang he'll then retire,
And raise a host that will expiate Heaven's ire.

So now the whole company left Dead-End Village and returned to the Marshes of Mount Liang. The Professor led the defenders of the camp out to Golden Sands Landing to meet them. They all then went to the assembly hall and formally greeted each other. Song Jiang anxiously inquired: "Where is my father?" Chao Gai requested Squire Song to come out, and in a little while Iron Fan appeared, resting one hand on a mountain sedan which was carrying Squire Song. Everyone helped the Squire down from the sedan and escorted him into the hall. Song Jiang's heart leapt at the sight and he broke into a delighted smile. "You have had too many shocks, father, I have not been a good son to you, I should never have allowed you to suffer these things."

Squire Song said: "It's all the fault of those two dreadful Zhao brothers. They sent people to watch us every day, waiting for the order from Jiangzhou so they could arrest us and clap us into prison. When we heard you knocking on the back door there were already eighty or ninety soldiers in the thatched hall in front. Then they disappeared and we didn't know what had frightened them away! In the third watch two hundred or more men opened the gate and bundled me into that sedan and carried me off. They told your brother to pack our belongings and set fire to the manor. Naturally I couldn't wait to know what was going on. They brought me here."

Song Jiang said: "The fact that our family is reunited here today is entirely due to the valour of our friends here." He told his young brother to express thanks formally to all the leaders. When Chao Gai and the others had all paid their respects to Squire Song, cattle and horses were slaughtered and a grand feast was organized in honour of Song Jiang's reunion with his father. They were all quite drunk when they parted that night. The celebrations continued next day and everyone, great and small, had a good time.

On the third day, Chao Gai had also prepared a feast in honour of Song Jiang's father, when Taoist Gongsun Sheng was suddenly reminded of something which stirred him deeply. His thoughts had turned to his old mother in Jizhou. It was long since he left home and he had no idea how she was. So whilst they were all busy drinking, Gongsun Sheng suddenly stood up and addressed the leaders as follows: "I have to express my deep gratitude to all this brave company for having so long looked after me and shown me such great kindness. But since the day this poor Taoist came with our leader Chao Gai to the mountain, a time filled indeed with feasting and pleasure, not once has he been back home to visit his old mother. My religious teacher will also, I fear, be anxiously awaiting me. I would like therefore to make a visit to my home town, bidding you all farewell for some three or four months, after which I shall return and be with you again. This would fulfil my dearest wish and ensure that my poor mother does not have to wait in vain."

Chao Gai said: "I always listen to what you say, father. Your mother up there in the north has no one to look after her. Now that you tell me this, how can I refuse you? Only it's so hard to part with you. If go you must, just wait till tomorrow so we can send you off properly."

Gongsun Sheng thanked him. They got drunk again that day before the evening ended and everyone went to bed. Early next morning a feast was arranged below the pass to bid Gongsun Sheng farewell.

Gongsun Sheng had dressed in his previous fashion as a wandering Taoist, with a pouch attached to his belt and a bag tied at the waist, a pair of fine swords slung on his back, a hat of palm bark hanging on his shoulders and a fan shaped like a tortoise shell which he held in his hand. Thus equipped he went down the mountain. All the leaders accompanied him and there was a farewell celebration below the pass where everyone raised a cup in his honour. After the first round Chao Gai said: "If we cannot persuade you to stay, father, please do not break faith with us. I part with you most unwillingly, but for the sake of your respected mother we cannot prevent you. After a hundred days I hope the crane will deign to return to this humble abode. Please do not fail to keep your word."

Gongsun Sheng said: "After you have all treated me so kindly for so long, how could I ever break my word to you? I will go home and visit my religious teacher and make proper arrangements for my poor mother, then I will return to the mountain retreat."

Song Jiang said: "Why not take someone with you, father? Then you could bring your mother here to the mountain, so you could look after her all the time."

Gongsun Sheng said: "All her life my mother has loved peace and quiet, she cannot stand shocks. That's why I wouldn't like to bring her. At home we've a little farm on the hillside, my mother manages it well enough by herself. I just want to go and visit her, then I'll be back with you again."

Song Jiang said: "In that case, look after yourself. I just hope you will soon make us happy with your return."

Chao Gai brought out a tray of gold and silver as parting gift and Gongsun Sheng said: "That's far too much. All I need is a little for travelling expenses."

Chao Gai persuaded him to take half. He tied it in his pouch, bowed low, said farewell, crossed from Golden Sands Landing and set off for Jizhou.

The rest were dispersing and were about to return up the mountain when suddenly Iron Ox let out a great cry and burst into tears. "What ever is the matter?" Song Jiang hurriedly asked him. "Fuck it all!" he said between sobs. "This one goes to fetch his dad, that one goes to see his mum, but you'd think Iron Ox simply came out of a hole in the ground!"

Chao Gai asked: "But what do you want?"

"I've got an old mother who's alone, too. My elder brother works on someone else's farm, how can he keep her and make her happy? If I could go and get her and bring her here so she can be happy for a while, that would be really good."

Chao Gai said: "Then let it be so. I'll send some others with you to help bring her back, it's entirely reasonable."

"Impossible!" Song Jiang said. "Our friend Li has a most difficult character. If you let him go home he's sure to get into trouble. If you send anyone with him that won't do either. Since his temper's like a blazing fire, he's bound to clash with someone along the way. He killed lots of people in Jiangzhou. It's not for nothing you know that they call him the Black Whirlwind. Anyway, is it likely the authorities haven't acted already and sent the order for his arrest there? Just look at you, Iron Ox! Your very appearance is wild and dangerous. If something goes wrong, it's a long way off, how can we know about it? You'd better wait a while and when you know everything is quiet you can go, that'll be time enough."

But Iron Ox said impatiently: "You're not such a patient man either. When you wanted to fetch your father you went dashing off down the mountain. If my mother is suffering there in the village because of me, it breaks my heart to think."

Song Jiang said: "Don't be so hasty. If you really want to go and fetch your mother, then you should accept three conditions. If you do, we'll let you go."

Iron Ox said: "Tell me what they are then." On his fingers, Song Jiang listed the 3 conditions. And it was from this that Iron Ox...

Put forth the hand that shook heaven and earth;
And fought the fearsome tiger in the mountains.

WHILE dining one day Song Jiang addressed the bandit leaders as follows: "I am greatly indebted to you for saving my life and receiving me on your mountain. We have been feasting merrily here now for several days, but I do not know how my father is feeling at home. As a result of the affair at Jiangzhou, I expect that instructions have been sent to Yuncheng County for the arrest of my father and family. In that case the worst may happen to him, but I have no information here about it. I think I had better bring my father here, and then I shall no longer be anxious about him. Would you gentlemen allow me to go on that important business?"

"This is an important matter relating to the affection between son and father," said Chao Gai. "We are all enjoying ourselves here so how could we allow your father to be in misery at home? Of course we must allow you to go home. But we have recently had a busy time, and we have not yet quite fixed up our quarters here. Within two days, however, we can summon a band of soldiers to go to bring your father here."

"It sounds all right to wait for a few days," said Song Jiang, "but I am afraid that a summons has already been dispatched from Jiangzhou for the arrest of my father. The sooner I go the better it will be. There is no need for many men to go with me, because I can go secretly, and bring my father here without a single person getting to know about it. If I took many men on such an expedition the people would be startled, and afraid, and it would be difficult to do the business."

"Brother, if you travel alone you would have no assistance in case of trouble," said Chao Gai.

"Shall I die for my father's sake I would not regret it," said Song Jiang.

They would not agree to let him go that day, but as Song Jiang was determined they at last gave him a felt hat, a sword, and a stick, and accompanied him down the mountain where he departed by himself.

He crossed the lake, and started on the road to Yuncheng County, and when not far from that place he stayed one night at an inn. The next morning he arose early, and arrived at the village quite early. But as it was daylight he hid in a wood for the nightfall when he went to his village. When he knocked at the door of his father's home the door was opened by his brother Song Qing who was startled to see him and hurriedly spoke, "Elder brother, why have you returned?"

"I have come to take both you and my father away," replied Song Jiang.

"Everybody here knows of your affair at Jiangzhou," said Song Qing. "The magistrate sends two Inspectors here every day to see that we do not leave, and as soon as a dispatch arrives from Jiangzhou we shall be arrested, and locked up in prison. We shall wait there until you are arrested. Both day and night there are about two hundred soldiers patrolling near our house. You must go at once to Liangshan Marsh, and ask the brigands to come here immediately to rescue our father."

When Song Jiang heard this he was startled, and had a cold sweat all over his body. He dared not enter the house, but at once departed on the road to Liangshan Marsh. That night the moon gave a dim light, and it was not easy to see the footpath. He decided to travel by small bypaths on his way back. He had only been walking for about two hours when he heard behind him the noise of many men. He turned round, and saw many torchlights about half a //away, and even heard one man shout, "Don't let Song Jiang escape." He went on his way and thought, "I am in trouble now because I did not listen to Chao Gai's advice. May Heaven have pity on me and rescue me." Just then the wind blew the clouds away, and there was bright moonlight. He recognized the place which he was approaching. It was a small village called Huan Dao, and was surrounded by high mountains which made it difficult in traveling. Below the mountain there was a stream, and a footpath which was the only way, wherever one approached the village. He wanted to avoid this place, and turned to find another way, but the men close behind prevented him from returning as near them the fields were well illuminated by the torchlights. He therefore went forward, now looking for a spot where he could hide. He came to a wood in which he noticed a temple, so he went there pushed open the door, and looked round inside for a hiding place. He could not find a suitable place in the buildings either at the front or the rear of the temple, and he was getting quite anxious. Just then he heard a man outside call out, "We must all go inside this temple," and he recognized the voice of Inspector Zhao Neng. In the room where he happened to be was a shrine so he raised the curtain and went inside the niche. There he crouched, trembling with fear. The men were now inside the temple, and were searching in the rooms with their torchlights. Song Jiang thought, "I am evidently in a tight corner, and must pray to the gods for protection." He did this and the men went away one after the other, without looking in his hiding place. "Heaven has had pity on me!" he thought, but Inspector Zhao De had not yet left the room, and he now raised the curtain, and looked inside the niche. Song Jiang was terrified. However there was so much smoke from the torchlights and dust on the curtain that Zhao De got some in his eyes, and he could not see clearly. He threw his torch on the ground, stamped out the flame, and then going outside said to his men, "The fellow is not in the temple. But where can he have got to as there is no other path?"

"He must be hiding in the woods," said a soldier. "He cannot escape from this place, and he cannot go up the mountain. We had better guard the road, and even he can fly he cannot get away. We can wait until daybreak, and then make a thorough search."

Inspector Zhao De agreed to this, and led his soldiers out of the temple.

"The gods have protected me. If they save my life this time I will certainly rebuild the temple and images," said Song Jiang to himself. He heard a soldier outside said, "He must be here." Zhao Neng, Zhao De, and the soldiers again entered the temple. Song Jiang was again trembling with fear.

"Where is he?" asked inspector Zhao Neng to the soldier.

"Inspector," replied the soldier, "look at these marks of hands on the door. They were made by somebody who pushed open the door to get into the temple."

"That is so," said inspector Zhao Neng. "We must make another careful search."

The soldiers again went all over the temple looking carefully, but without any result. The men then made a search in the room where Song Jiang was, but when they lifted the curtain in front of the niche there arose a big wind which blew out their torches, and made everything as black as night.

"What a strange thing!" exclaimed inspector Zhao Neng, "The spirit of the Goddess must be here, and she rebukes us in this way for searching in her temple. We must go away at once. We will guard the road till daybreak and then come back."

"But that is the only place in the whole temple that has not been properly searched," said Inspector Zhao De. He took a spear, and was stepping forward when there was a great gust of wind outside the temple which shook the building, and hurled stones about. A dark cloud now filled the room. It was very cold, and hair stood on end. They were horror-stricken. Inspector Zhao Neng gave the order for all to leave as the Goddess was offended. The men all left hurriedly, and when outside the temple they ran for their lives.

Song Jiang, although still afraid, could not avoid laughing at this. But he realized his position. "Those fellows have failed to find me, but they still guard the path." While he was still thinking he heard the steps of people approaching from behind. "Further trouble!" he thought. "I cannot get away!" Looking round the curtain he saw two little figures dressed in blue clothes who said, "We have been commissioned by the Goddess to invite you." Song Jiang dared not speak, and the figures continued, "You may now proceed." Song Jiang dared not move, and the figures repeated, "Star Lord Song, you need have no further suspicion. The Goddess has waited a long time for you."

Song Jiang knew by the tender tone of the voices that these must not be males so he emerged from under the chair of the idol, and looking out he was astonished to see that they were two young maids with blue clothing, resembling the two images made of mud. He heard a voice outside say, "Star Lord Song, the Goddess calls for you." He pulled the curtain to one side, and then saw that the two figures had hair twisted round on the tops of their head; they were standing in a proper, respectful attitude, and had their hands raised in saluting position. He asked, "Where are you two fairies from?"

"We have been sent here by the Mystic Goddess to invite you Star Lord to come to the Heavenly Palace," said Little Blue Clothes.

"There must be some mistake. My name is Song Jiang. I am not a 'Star Lord.'"

Little Blue Clothes replied, "Why mistake? You may now go. The Goddess has waited for you a long time."

"What Goddess?" asked Song Jiang. "I have not worshiped and known before so how dare I go now?"

"If you go there you will soon know her. You need not inquire any further about her," said Little Blue Clothes.

"Where does the Goddess live?" asked Song Jiang.

"In a palace at the back of this temple," replied Little Blue Clothes. The two figures moved off, and Song Jiang followed them. They left the temple, and turning a corner they came to a door in a wall. "Star Lord Song, you may enter through this door," said Little Blue Clothes. They entered, and Song Jiang looked round. The sky was studded with stars, and the breeze was fragrant. There were many trees and bamboos on all sides. He thought, "If I had known of this place before I would have come here to hide, and not have faced all those dangers in the temple." As he advanced he noticed that there were fragrant flowers on both sides of the path, with fir trees of huge dimensions. The path was very smooth, and bore markings like those on the back of a tortoise. He thought, "I did not expect to find such a delightful place behind the old temple." They had not gone very far when he heard the sound of flowing water, and soon came to a bridge made of blue stone, with red balustrades. They crossed this, and on both banks of the stream were numerous strange flowers and grasses; deep green firs; luxuriant bamboos; weeping willows; peach trees with red flowers. The water below was as pure as silver and snow, and evidently flowed from a cave in the rocks. Across the bridge was a long avenue of strange trees leading to a vermilion red starred gate. Upon entering that Song Jiang looked upward, and saw a palace. He thought, "I was born and brought up at Yuncheng County, but I never heard of this place." He was rather afraid, and dared not go any further. Little Blue Clothes urged him to go forward, and they entered the gate. There was a path, now, with dragons carved on the stones, and this led to the hall with large vermilion red pillars on the veranda and richly embroidered curtains hanging between the pillars. In the hall were many lanterns which gave a very brilliant light. Little Blue Clothes went up the dragon carved stone slope, on to the veranda where there were many other Little Blue Clothes who said, "The Goddess requests the Star Lord to enter." Song Jiang was now trembling with fear, and his hair was standing on end. The flags of the floor bore imperial designs of dragons and phoenixes.

Little Blue Clothes went inside the curtain and announced, "Star Lord Song Jiang has arrived, and is waiting outside." Song Jiang bowed his head and saluting said, "I am only a mortal from the earth and have not made the acquaintance of the gods. I pray for your pity, and that you will bestow grace upon me."

A voice inside the screen called out, "Request Song Jiang to be seated." He dared not raise his head. The four little blue-clothed maids brought an embroidered cushion, and he had to sit down quite uneasily. The voice inside again called out, "Roll up the curtain." The Little Blue Clothes did this, and hooked the curtain up. The Goddess spoke, "Star Lord, have you been well since we parted?"

Song Jiang replied, "I am only a mortal, and dare not even look at your divine person."

"As you are here you need not stand on any ceremony," said the Goddess. So Song Jiang raised his head, and saw a large hall filled with glittering articles of gold and jade, with lanterns of dragon and phoenix designs (i.e., imperial symbols). On both sides were Little Blue Clothes with audience tablets in their hands, and holding aloft banners, umbrellas, and fans. In the center of the hall was a couch ornamented with dragon designs and precious stones, and there sat the Goddess. She wore a dark crimson silk robe embroidered with golden threads, and was holding a jade scepter. She had admirable eyes, and a general fairy-like appearance. She said, "Star Lord, you are here by my invitation." She then gave an order for wine to be served, and Little Blue Clothes at once brought it in a precious porcelain vase ornamented with lotus flowers. The chief of the Little Blue Clothes offered a cup of wine to Song Jiang, who dared not refuse it. He arose, took the cup, and facing the Mystic Goddess he drank the wine. The wine was very fragrant, and he had the sensation of his heart being sprinkled with pure dew. Another Little Blue Clothes came forward with a tray of dates, and offered them to him. He was afraid of committing a breach of etiquette, so he tremblingly took just one single date off the tray, munched it slowly, and kept the stone in his hand when finished. Another cup of wine was now offered to him, and he again drank. The Mystic Goddess ordered that more wine be offered, and he drank the third cup. He also partook of two more dates in the same way as before. He now felt slightly intoxicated, and being more afraid of committing a breach of etiquette, he kowtowed, and said, "I do not drink much wine usually, and I request that you do not press me further with your delicious fragrant nectar."

The Mystic Goddess issued an order, "As the Star Lord does not want any more wine, do not offer it. Let the Three Heavenly Books be bestowed on him."

A Little Blue Clothes went behind a screen, and returned with a tray on which was a bundle made of imperial yellow silk containing the Three Heavenly Books which were offered to Song Jiang. The bundle was about five by three inches, and Song Jiang bowed in accepting it, and placed it in his sleeve.

The Mystic Goddess said, "Star Lord Song, I have given you three volumes of the Heavenly Books, and in future you can act as the agent of Heaven. In all affairs be honest and upright. In official affairs support the Emperor and bring peace to the people. When affairs are wrong rectify them. Do not forget this, but do not disclose the source of it to anyone."

Song Jiang bowed, and signified his obedience to these orders. The Mystic Goddess continued, "Because your mind is still depraved, and you have not yet completed the journey fit for your soul, the Jade Emperor has decreed that you must continue your life on the earth. Now live there a good life, and in a short time you will go to Heaven. If you do evil things you will go to Hell, and I cannot save you from that. Read, mark, and inwardly digest the truths contained in those three Heavenly Books. Nobody but the Secret Star may ever see those books. When you have completed your meritorious duties then burn the books so that those who come after you may not get them. Heaven and Earth are wide apart, and as you cannot stay here long you had better return to earth at once." She then ordered the Little Blue Clothes to conduct him back to the earth. Her last sentence was: "We shall meet again at the Imperial Palace in Heaven some other day."

Song Jiang thanked her, and then followed two Little Blue Clothes out of the Star Gate of the Palace. When they reached the blue stone bridge the Little Blue Clothes said, "You have had a shocking experience, but you were protected by the Mystic Goddess so that you were not arrested by the soldiers. It will soon be daybreak when all the danger will have passed with the darkness. Star Lord, look over the balustrades, and watch the two dragons playing in the water."
Song Jiang did this, and saw the dragons. While he was doing so the two Little Blue Clothes pushed him over the balustrades into the water and he suddenly awakened as though from a dream.
Looking round he saw that he was back in the temple and from the position of the moon that it was after midnight. He noticed that he had three date stones in his hand, and feeling inside his sleeve found the Three Heavenly Books there. He had a distinct flavor in his mouth of the fragrant wine. He thought, "What a strange dream! But was it a dream, or the real thing? If it was a dream, how about these books, date stones, and the flavor of wine? I remember so clearly all that she said, and can never forget it. But if I have been asleep all this time in the temple this idol must have great spiritual powers. What is the name of this idol, I wonder?" He raised the curtain, and looked at the idol. It was the image of a beautiful woman just like the Mystic Goddess he had seen. "As the Mystic Goddess called me 'Star Lord,' it is evident that in my former life I was a very important person. I must make use of these Heavenly Books, and not forget what I was told so clearly. The Little Blue Clothes said there would be no danger after daybreak, and as it is quite daylight now, I will go and look round." He stretched his hand into the niche, and took his short stick. He brushed the dust off his clothes, and then slowly walked on to the veranda of the temple. Looking upwards he saw a board over the door with the characters: "Taoist Temple of the Mystic Goddess." He saluted with both hands raised, and exclaimed, "What a pity! But as the Mystic Goddess of Heaven has saved my life and presented me with these Heavenly Books, I will certainly return here when I have made my fortune and will put all things in good condition. I hope that the Goddess will condescend to protect me in the future." This done he cautiously left the temple and made his way towards the entrance to the village. He had not gone far when he heard a great noise in the distance. He thought, "Another calamity! I will stay here. If I go forward they will arrest me. I had better hide in these bushes at the side of the road." He did this, and then saw a great many soldiers hurrying into the wood along the road out of breath, and calling out, "May the Gods spare our lives!" Hiding behind the trunk of a tree, he thought this was very strange. "Why have they come here to arrest me instead of waiting at the entrance to the village as they said they would?" Looking again, he saw inspector Zhao Neng who was also exclaiming, "Ye Gods! Ye Gods! Save me!" Song Jiang thought, "But why are they hurrying along and making such a noise?" Just then he noticed a big man in the rear who was evidently chasing the soldiers. His breast was bare, and he carried an axe in each hand. He called out, "Stop you damned pricks!" As he came nearer, Song Jiang recognized him as Li Kui, "Black Whirlwind." Song Jiang thought, "Is not this another dream? I cannot leave this spot however." Just then he saw that Inspector Zhao Neng had tripped over the root of a fir tree, and had fallen to the ground. Li Kui rushed forward, and planted his foot on inspector Zhao Neng. He raised his axe to deal the death blow. Just at that moment he saw two men after him—Ou Peng and Tao Zongwang—who were armed with halberds, and being afraid that they were coming to get credit for killing his prisoner he at once brought his axe down and chopped Inspector Zhao Neng in half. The soldiers seeing this scattered in all directions. Yet Song Jiang did not dare to leave his hiding place. He saw three other big men coming along, and when they were closer he recognized Liu Tang, Shi Yong, and Li Li. One of them said, "We have scattered the troops, but where is Song Jiang? What shall we do now?"
Shi Yong exclaimed, "Look! There is a man hiding behind that tree."
Song Jiang came out, and said, "I am much obliged to you brothers for again saving my life. How can I ever repay you?"
They were all much pleased at seeing him, and immediately Li Li and Shi Yong went off to inform Chao Gai.
"How did you know that I had come this way?" asked Song Jiang.
Liu Tang replied, "When you had left the mountain Chao Gai and Wu Yong were much worried about you and dispatched Dai Zong to find out what way you had gone. But even then Chao Gai was still anxious, and dispatched us to support Dai Zong in case you were in any danger. On the way we met Dai Zong who said that there were two Inspectors who were trying to arrest you. When Chao Gai heard this he was very angry and sent Dai Zong to Liangshan Marsh to get a large body of men to come and rescue you. When near here a man on the road told us that you had gone to this village. So we came here, and met the soldiers whom we attacked, and killed many of them. Li Kui chased many soldiers in this direction and we followed him. We had no idea that you were here."
Just then Shi Yong returned with about seven of the leaders and Chao Gai who were all pleased te see Song Jiang.
Chao Gai said, "You would not listen to my advice, but left the mountain unattended. If we had not arrived you would have been in a dangerous position."
"As I was anxious about my father's safety," said Song Jiang, "I could not stay."
"I will tell you now some good news," said Chao Gai. "I gave orders for Dai Zong and other leaders to get your father and brother, and they have escorted them to Liangshan Marsh."
Song Jiang was exceedingly pleased at hearing this, and saluted Chao Gai, "Sir, you have done me a great favor, and I shall never forget it in my life."
They then all mounted their horses, and returned from the Huan Dao Village. Song Jiang rode with his hands in a praying position as he was expressing thanks to the gods for his marvelous escape, and promising that he would make sacrifice later as a thank offering. They all duly reached Liangshan Marsh without any further incident. Upon reaching the stronghold Song Jiang met his father and brother at the main hall, and was exceedingly pleased to see them again. He said, "Father, I have been an unfilial son and caused so much trouble to you."
"That hateful fellow Zhao Neng came every day to see that we did not escape," said Old Song. "He was only waiting for a letter to arrive from Jiangzhou then he would have arrested us and taken us to prison. When I heard you knocking at the back door I knew that there were about nine soldiers in front of the house. But they disappeared afterwards. At midnight there came about a hundred men who forced open the gate of our farmyard. They forced me to enter a sedan chair, and told your brother to take with us some things. They then set the farmyard on fire. They took us here without allowing me to inquire who they were or where they were going."
"Today we are all united together again," said Song Jiang, "owing to the exertions of our brothers at this place." He then told his younger brother to salute and thank Chao Gai and the other leaders for their timely action. After this, Chao Gai and the leaders all paid their respects to Old Song. They then all sat down to a great feast to celebrate the union of the father and the son.
On the third day of this feasting Gongsun Sheng recollected that his mother was still at Jizhou in Zhili province, and that he had not heard from her for a long time. During a feast Gongsun Sheng stood up, and addressed the assembly, "I am grateful to you heroes for your kind treatment to me. Since my arrival here we have had many glorious feasts and much pleasure, but all this time I have never once been home to see my mother. I am afraid that my old Taoist teacher will be anxiously thinking of me so I request that you will allow me to leave you for five months so that I can go and see how things are at home."
"I have heard you say before that your mother was in the North," said Chao Gai, "but as you mention this matter today we cannot stand in your way. If you will wait till tomorrow we will arrange matters for your departure."
Gongsun Sheng thanked Chao Gai for granting leave. The next day a special farewell meal was arranged in honor of him. He wore his old Taoist priest robe, with a palm hat. On his back were two swords, and in his hand he carried a fly brush. All the leaders were assembled, and they all drank him toast.
Chao Gai finally spoke to him, "Do not break your promise about returning to us. We would rather not allow you go and we are only allowing you to go because of your anxiety about your mother. After a hundred days we shall be looking forward to your return."
"How dare I break my promise to you when you have treated me so liberally?" said Gongsun Sheng. "When I have visited my Taoist teacher and made proper arrangement for my mother I will return here at once."
"Would it not be better if you took some men with you so that you could bring your mother to our mountain here?" asked Song Jiang.
"My mother likes to live a quiet life," said Gongsun Sheng, "and hates any bustle. She won't agree to come here. We have fields and houses, and my mother prefers to stay and attend to those matters. I will just visit them, and then rejoin you here."
"In that case we will do as you wish," said Song Jiang. "We hope that it will not be long before we see you again."
Chao Gai presented Gongsun Sheng with a quantity of gold and silver to cover his traveling expenses, and the latter said, "I do not want so much." He only took half, and placed it in his belt. He then took his leave and departed.
He had just left when Li Kui, the "Black Whirlwind," entered the main gate crying loudly. "What is the trouble about?" asked Song Jiang.
"I am very angry," said Li Kui. "People bring their fathers here, while others go to see their mothers. I didn't come out from under the damned earth without father and mother!"
"Well, what is your idea?" asked Chao Gai.
"I have a mother at home," said Li Kui. "My elder brother works as a servant at another house, and cannot do much to support my mother. If I bring her here to enjoy her life I should feel much more contented."
"You are right," said Chao Gai, "I will let you have some men to go with you and bring your mother here."
"That won't do," said Song Jiang. "Li Kui has a bad temper, and should he return to his native village it would cause some trouble. If you sent men with Li Kui that would also not do as he has a fiery disposition, and would make some disturbance on the way. He killed many men at Jiangzhou, and everybody knows that he is the 'Black Whirlwind.' There will be a warrant out for his arrest. To look at his face would be enough to arouse suspicions anywhere. He would have a long way to go and in case of danger, how could we help him? You had better stay here until matters have settled down a bit, and then perhaps you could go in safety."
Li Kui was vexed at this, and said, "Elder brother, you are most unfair. You got your father to come here for safety, while my mother is to remain at home in misery. It makes me so angry that my stomach is quite upset."
"Younger brother, do not get vexed," said Song Jiang. "You can go if you will comply with three conditions."

The hand that shook mountains
Fought tigers with boldness.

14

The False Li Kui Robs Lone Travellers on the highway Road; Black Whirlwind Iron Ox Kills 4 Tigers on Yiling Heights Mountain

"You're going to Yishui County in Yizhou Prefecture to get your mother. The first condition is that you don't drink on the way," said Song Jiang. "You've got such a rotten temper no one dares go with you. So the second condition is that you go alone and fetch her quietly. The third condition is that you leave your two battle-axes here. Be careful during the journey. Go soon and return quickly."
"Nothing hard about those conditions. Don't worry, brother. I'll depart today and I won't tarry at home."
Li Kui tied up some belongings, hung a dagger at his waist, and took a halberd, and one large and four or five small silver ingots. He drank a few cups of wine and respectfully bid the leaders farewell, then went down the mountain and crossed at the Shore of Golden Sands.
Chao Gai and Song Jiang, after seeing him off, returned to Fraternity Hall and took their seats. Song Jiang was uneasy in his mind.
"Brother Li Kui is bound to get into a scrape," he said. "Is there anyone among us who comes from his home area? Someone who could go there and keep tabs on him?"
"Zhu Gui is an Yihui County man," said Du Qian. "They're from the same township."
"I forgot about that," said Song Jiang. "Li Kui hailed him as a neighbor when they met at White Dragon Temple."
Song Jiang sent for Zhu Gui. A young brigand flew down the mountain to the inn and fetched him.
"Brother Li Kui has gone home to get his mother," Song Jiang said. "Because he's nasty when drunk, we didn't ask anyone to go along. But we're afraid he'll get into trouble. I hear you're from the same parts. I wish you'd go and keep an eye on him."
"Yes, I'm from Yishui. My brother Zhu Fu has a tavern outside the west gate of the county town. Li Kui is from a hamlet called Dongdian East, which is part of the village of Baizhang. He has a brother named Li Da, a hired hand. Li Kui has always been fierce. He had to leave because he killed a man. He's been knocking about ever since and has never returned home. I can go easy enough, but I've no one to look after the inn. I haven't been back in a long time either. I'll be glad to see my brother again."
"No problem about the inn. I'll ask Hou Jian and Shi Yong to take charge while you're gone."
Zhu Gui bid the leaders farewell, went down the mountain, gathered some belongings, turned the inn over to Shi Yong and Hou Jian, and set out for Yizhou.
Song Jiang dined and drank with Chao Gai every day in the fortress, and studied the Heavenly Books with Wu Yong the Occult Star. Of that, we'll say no more.

*

Li Kui, on leaving Liangshan Marsh, travelled alone and reached the border of Yishui County. As promised, he did no drinking, and kept out of trouble. There's nothing to relate on that. Outside the west gate of the county town he saw people crowded around a proclamation board. He pushed among them and listened to a man who was reading aloud:
"... The first is main culprit Song Jiang, of Yuncheng County. The second is accomplice Dai Zong, former superintendent of the two Jiangzhou prisons. The third is accomplice Li Kui, of Yishui County, Yizhou Prefecture ..."
Li Kui seethed inwardly, his control melting away. A man hastened up from behind and locked him a restraining embrace.
"Brother Zhang," cried the man. "What are you doing here?"
Black Whirlwind turned his head and looked. It was Zhu Gui the Dry-Land Crocodile.
"What about you?" Li Kui demanded.
"Come with me and I'll tell you."
The two went to a nearby tavern outside the west gate of the town and sat down in a quiet room in the rear. Zhu Gui pointed his finger at Black Whirlwind.
"You're very rash. That proclamation offers a reward of ten thousand strings of cash for Song Jiang, five thousand for Dai Zong and three thousand for Li Kui. And you stand there looking at it! Suppose some sharp-eyed, quick-handed fellow hauled you off to the authorities? What would you do then? Because brother Song Jiang was afraid you'd quarrel, he didn't send anyone along. But he was also worried you'd get into trouble. So he ordered me to catch up and keep an eye on you. I left the stronghold a day later than you did but got here a day ahead. Where have you been all this time?"
"He told me not to drink any wine. That's why I couldn't walk very fast. How do you know this tavern? Do you live around here? Where is your house?"
"The tavern belongs to my brother Zhu Fu. I used to live in these parts. I was a travelling merchant. But I went broke and became a bandit in Liangshan Marsh. This is the first time I've been home."
Zhu Gui introduced his brother to Li Kui, and the tavern keeper treated them to wine.
"Brother Song Jiang instructed me not to drink. But now I've reached my home parts. If I drink a bowl or two, what's the friggin difference?"
Zhu Gui didn't venture to stop him, and they drank until the fourth watch. Food was then served, and Li Kui ate. Around the fifth watch, when the moon and the stars were fading and dawn was brightening the sky, he started for the village.
"Don't take the small path," Zhu Gui advised. "Follow the main road east from the big oak tree, straight to Baizhang. That will bring you into Dongdian East. Fetch your mother out and return quickly to the mountain stronghold."
"It's nearer if I go by the path. Who's got the patience to take the big road?"
"There are tigers along that path, and robbers who'll steal your bundle."
"They don't worry me." Li Kui put on his broad-brimmed felt hat, picked up his halberd, hung on his dagger, bid farewell to Zhu Gui and his brother, and headed for the village of Baizhang.
By the time he travelled a dozen li or so, the sky had gradually turned light. A white rabbit popped out of the dew-drenched grass and scampered before him. Li Kui gave chase. "That little animal has guided me a stage forward," he said, laughing.
Ahead was a grove of about fifty large trees. Autumn had just begun, and their leaves were a brilliant red. When Li Kui reached the edge of the grove a big fellow suddenly emerged.
"Shell out money for a safe passage, if you know what's good for you," the man shouted. "Otherwise I'll take your bundle."
Li Kui looked him over. His head was bound in a red silk kerchief, and he wore a padded gown of crude cloth. He grasped a battle-ax in each hand. A black substance was smeared all over his face.
"Who the hell are you, daring to play the robber in this place?" Li Kui roared.
"When you hear my name you'll tremble. I'm Black Whirlwind! Leave your money and your bundle and I'll spare your life and let you pass."
Li Kui laughed. "No such friggin thing. Who are you, oaf? Where are you from? How dare you use my name and play the fool here?" He charged, halberd in hand.
The man realized he had met his match and turned to flee. Li Kui stabbed him in the thigh, felling him to the ground, and planted a foot on his chest.
"Recognize me?"
"Master, spare your servant's life!"
"I am Li Kui the Black Whirlwind, a man among bold men. You've sullied my name, you lout!"
"My family name is also Li, but of course I'm not Black Whirlwind. You're so famous in the gallant fraternity, the very mention of your name frightens demons. So I borrowed it when I became a robber here. I stop only persons travelling alone. When they hear the words 'Black Whirlwind,' they drop their luggage and run. I've made some tidy profits that way, but actually I've never harmed anybody. My real name is Li Gui, and I live in that village yonder."
"You've got a friggin nerve, robbing and ruining my reputation. You've even copied my two axes. Well, I'll give you a taste of one of them." Li Kui raised the weapon.
"If you kill me, master, you'll be destroying two," Li Gui hastily cried.
Li Kui stayed his hand. "What do you mean by that?"
"I didn't want to become a robber. But I've a ninety-year-old mother at home, with no one to support her. So I've been using your renowned name to scare lone travellers and snatch their bundles. That's how I've been able to take care of her. I never really injured anybody. If you kill me, my old mother will surely starve to death!"
Although Li Kui was a fiend who killed without batting an eye, these words gave him pause. "I've come home specially to fetch my mother," he thought. "If I kill a man who's supporting his own mother, Heaven and Earth will not forgive me." And he said: "All right, knave, you can live." He let him up.
Still holding his axes, Li Gui dropped to his knees and kowtowed.
"Just remember that only I am the true Black Whirlwind," Li Kui cautioned him. "You're not to spoil my name from now on."
"Today my life has been spared. I'm going home and changing my profession. I'll never again use master's name here to rob."
"You're a filial son. Here are ten ounces of silver to give you a start in your new business."
Li Kui gave him a ten-ounce silver ingot. The man thanked him and departed. Black Whirlwind laughed.
"He fell right into my hands. Since he's a filial son, he'll have to change his occupation. If I killed him, Heaven and Earth would have been angry. I had to let him go."

With his halberd, he trudged up the mountain path. By mid-morning he was hungry and thirsty. All around were small trails, but there wasn't a tavern or restaurant in sight.
Then, in the hollow ahead, he saw a number of thatched cottages. As he hurried towards one of them, he observed a woman coming out from the rear. A wild flower was tucked into the bun of hair in the back of her head, and her face was rouged and powdered. Li Kui rested the butt of his halberd.
"Sister-in-law, I'm a traveller who's passing by. I'm hungry, but I can't find a tavern. If I pay you a string of cash will you give me food and wine?"
The woman saw how tough he looked, and she dared not refuse. "We haven't any wine," she said, "but I can cook some rice for you."
"That will do. Don't hold back. I'm friggin hungry."
"One measure will be plenty, I suppose?"
"Better make it three."
The woman lit the fire in the kitchen, washed the rice in the stream, and set it on to cook.
Li Kui went to the slope behind the house to relieve himself. He saw a man approaching stealthily around a bend of the mountain. Li Kui returned to the rear of the house. The woman, who was about to go up the slope to pick some vegetables, opened the rear door and saw the man.
"Husband," she called, "how did you hurt your leg?"
"I had a close call. One slip and you'd never have seen me again! Of all the friggin luck! I've been waiting for a lone traveller for half a month, but business has been bad. Then today one came along, and who do you think it was? The real Black Whirlwind! I had to run into that donkey's prick! Of course I was no match for him. He brought me down with one in the thigh from his halberd and wanted to kill me. I put on an act and cried: 'If you kill me you'll be destroying two.' He asked me what I meant, and I said: 'I have a ninety-year-old mother, with no one to support her. She'll starve to death, for sure.' That donkey's prick believed me. Not only did he spare my life, he gave me silver to start a new business and look after my mother. I was afraid he'd get wise and come after me, so I left the grove, found a place for a quiet nap, and came back around the mountain."
"Keep your voice down," said the woman. "A big swarthy fellow arrived just now and asked me to cook him some rice. I'll bet he's the one. He's sitting outside the front door. Take a look at him. If it's him, find me some drug and I'll put it in the vegetables. After he passes out, you and I will dispose of him. We'll take his gold and silver and move to the county town and go into business. That will be better than robbing travellers on the road."
Li Kui, who had heard every word, said to himself: "The rogue! I gave him silver and spared his life, and now he wants to kill me! That's unforgivable!"
He came around to the back door as Li Gui was about to leave and grabbed him by the hair. The woman ran towards the front door. Li Kui threw his captive to the ground, pulled out his knife and cut his head off. He hurried round to the front door, dagger in hand, seeking the woman. But she had disappeared. He went back and searched the house. Beneath some old clothes in two bamboo hampers he found a few pieces of silver and a number of ornamental hairpins and earrings. These he appropriated, and from the body of Li Gui retrieved the silver ingot he had given, and wrapped the loot in his bundle.
The three measures of rice on the stove were steaming hot, but he had no vegetables to go with them. He scooped the rice into a bowl and ate. Suddenly, he grinned. "What a fool I am. There's good meat right before me. Why shouldn't I eat it?"
He whipped out his dagger and cut two pieces of flesh from Li Gui's leg. After washing them in the stream, he cooked them over burning kindling he took from the stove, roasting and eating at the same time. When he was full, he dragged Li Gui's body into the house and set the place on fire. Halberd in hand, he continued along the mountain path.
The sun was already low on the western horizon by the time he reached the hamlet of Dongdian East. He went directly to his home, pushed open the door and entered.
"Who's there?" his mother called. Li Kui saw that she was blind. She was sitting on the bed, murmuring the name of Buddha.
"It's Iron Ox, ma. I've come back."
"You've been gone so long, son! Where have you been all these years? Your brother's working as a hired hand. He scarcely gets enough to feed himself. He can't really take care of me. I thought of you often, and wept till my tears ran dry. That's why I've become blind. What have you been doing with yourself?"
Li Kui thought: "If I tell her I'm a brigand in Liangshan Marsh, ma won't be willing to go with me. I'd better make up a story." Aloud, he said: "Your Iron Ox is now an official. I've come to fetch you."
"That's fine, son. How are you going to take me?"
"I'll carry you on my back to the road, and there we'll find a cart to travel in."
"Wait till your elder brother gets home. Talk it over with him, first."
"What for? We'll just go."
They were about to depart when Li Da, the brother, returned, with a jug of rice. Li Kui kowtowed before him.
"Brother, it's been years."
"Why have you come back, you scoundrel? To get us involved again?"
"Iron Ox is an official," the mother said. "He's come to take me with him."
"Don't believe his bullshit, ma. When he killed a man, I was the one who had to wear fetters and manacles and suffer all kinds of torments. Lately, I heard that, in league with the bandits in Liangshan Marsh, he snatched criminals from an execution ground, ran riot in Jiangzhou, and that he's now a member of the Liangshan gang. A few days ago Jiangzhou notified our local authorities to be on the alert and arrest him. They wanted to take me in first as surety, but my master spoke to the officials on my behalf. 'Li Kui left more than ten years ago and nobody knows where he's gone,' he said. 'He's never returned. It must be someone with the same name who pretends he comes from these parts.' And my master handed out a few bribes. Otherwise I would have to produce the culprit within a fixed time on pain of being beaten. There's a proclamation offering three thousand strings of cash for his capture."
Li Da turned on Iron Ox. "Why haven't you died, instead of coming home and telling a lot of lies!"
"Don't get excited, brother. We'll go to the mountain stronghold together and be happy. It's not a bad life."
The furious Li Da longed to strike him, but he knew he was no match for his younger brother. He thumped the jug down on the floor and went out.
"He's going to report this and bring men to seize me," thought Li Kui. "I've got to get out of here, fast. My brother has never in his life seen a big ingot of silver. I'll leave this fifty ounce piece for him on the bed. When he comes back and finds it he won't pursue me."
He took the big ingot from his waist pouch and placed it on the bed. "Ma," he said, "I'll carry you away on my back and that will be the end of it."
"Where are we going?"
"Don't ask me. I promise you we'll be happy. Toting you will be easy enough."
He hoisted his mother onto his back, picked up his halberd, left the house and strode forth along a secluded path.
Li Da hastened to his landlord master and reported, then, with a dozen or so vassals, rushed back to the house. His mother was gone. On the bed was a big silver ingot.
"He's left me this ingot, but where has he gone into hiding with our mother?" thought Li Da. "He must have other men from Liangshan Marsh with him. If I catch up they'll surely kill me. He's probably carrying ma to their mountain stronghold to enjoy a good life."
Since there was no sign of Li Kui, the vassals didn't know what to do.
"Iron Ox has carried my mother off, but who can say which path he's taken?" said Li Da. "There are so many of them, we'd never be able to find him."
Obviously, Li Da was perplexed. The vassals hung around for a while, then went home. Of that we'll say no more.

Li Kui, his mother on his back, hurried along a small path towards the mountains. Night had fallen when they reached the foot of a slope. His mother, being blind, couldn't tell whether it was morning or evening. Li Kui knew the height ahead was called Yiling Mountain. Only on the other side was there human habitation. He trudged upward with her in the starlight.
"Son," she said, "could you ask someone for some water?"
"After we cross the ridge, ma, we'll find a house where we can rest and eat."
"I had only dry rice at noon. I'm very thirsty."
"My throat is burning too. After I've carried you to the top, I'll look for water."
"Save me, son. I'm dying of thirst."
"And I'm pretty near exhausted."
Li Kui plodded to the summit. He set the old woman down on a large rock beside a pine tree and stabbed the blade of his halberd into the ground nearby.
"Be patient, ma. I'll fetch you some water."
Li Kui could hear the gurgling of a brook, and went in the direction of the sound. He found it, finally, after crossing two or three foothills. He drank several mouthfuls.
"How can I bring this water to my mother?" he pondered. He stood up and gazed around. High on a ridge above he saw a temple. "Good," he thought. Grasping hanging vines and shrubs he clambered up. He walked to the temple, pushed open the courtyard gate and entered. It was a private chapel dedicated to the Great Sage of Sizhou. Before it was a large stone incense burner.
Li Kui tugged at the vessel, but it and its base were carved from a single block. He couldn't budge it. Anger boiled within him. He lifted it up, base and all, and clonked it down on the stone step, knocking the urn free. This he took to the stream, scrubbed it with bunches of grass and washed it clean. He then filled it half with water and, holding it in both hands, retraced his path to the summit.
His mother was not on the big rock beside the pine, though the halberd was still nearby. He called to her to come and drink. There was no sign of the old lady anywhere. He shouted a few more times, without response.
Li Kui became alarmed. He cast aside the incense vessel and peered carefully around. His mother had vanished.
Then, on the grass about thirty paces away, he saw the bloodstains, and he began to tremble. He followed the trail of blood to a large cave. Two tiger cubs outside were licking a human leg. Li Kui couldn't stop shivering.
"I came all the way from Liangshan Marsh to fetch my old mother," he thought. "Did I carry her here on my back, in spite of trials and tribulations, just for you to eat? That leg, which some friggin tiger has dragged here, must be my mother's!"
Li Kui was consumed with fury. His trembling ceased, his reddish whiskers bristled. He prodded the two cubs with his halberd till they snarled, bared their claws and attacked. He stabbed one to death. The other ran into the cave. Li Kui chased it inside and killed it. Crouching in the cave, he looked out. A savage tigress was returning to her lair.
"You are the beast who ate my mother!" he thought. He lay down his halberd and pulled out his dagger.
The tigress sat down at the mouth of the cave, her hindquarters and swishing tail inside the entry. Li Kui examined her carefully. With all his might he drove his dagger up her bunghole with such force that blade and hilt penetrated her stomach. With a roar the tigress leaped over a chasm, the knife still in her. Li Kui snatched up his halberd and gave chase. The tigress, in great pain, charged down the cliff.
Li Kui was about to follow when a sudden gale arising among the trees brought down a shower of leaves and branches, "Clouds herald dragons, gales foretell tigers," as the old saying goes. From the place where the wind blew, a roaring tiger leaped out. It had upward-slanting eyes and a white forehead, and it charged directly at Li Kui.
Coolly, Black Whirlwind thrust his halberd into the neck of the hurtling beast. It halted abruptly, for the blade had pierced its windpipe, staggered back six or seven paces, then fell like a collapsing mountain and expired on the bluff. Li Kui went into the den to see whether there were more tigers, but there was no sign of any. Very weary, he made his way to the private chapel and slept till daylight.
He rose early and collected his mother's leg and whatever other bones remained, wrapped them in his robe and buried them in a grave he dug behind the chapel. He wept bitterly. Finally, hunger and thirst impelled him to gather his bundle, take up his halberd, and proceed slowly across the ridge.
He met half a dozen hunters armed with bows and arrows. When they saw him coming down the slope covered with blood, they were startled.
"Are you a mountain spirit, or what, sir traveller?" they demanded. "How dare you cross the ridge all alone?"
"Yishui County is offering three thousand strings of cash for me," Li Kui thought. "I can't tell them who I really am." Aloud, he said: "I'm a traveller. I was crossing the ridge with my mother last night and she got thirsty. While I was down fetching her water, a tiger dragged her off and ate her. I followed the trail to the den and killed first two cubs, then two big beasts. I slept in the chapel to the Great Sage of Sizhou until daybreak. I've just come from there."
"You, one man, killed four tigers? We don't believe you. Even ancient heroes like Li Cunxiao and Zi Lu only killed one each. You might have done in the two cubs, but two full-grown tigers—impossible! We've been beaten time and again for failing to eliminate those two beasts. Ever since they made their lair on Yishan Mountain three or four months ago, no one has dared cross the ridge. We don't believe it. You must be kidding."
"I'm not from around here. Why should I kid you? Come up and see for yourself. And bring some men to carry the tigers down."
"We'll be very grateful, if it's true. A wonderful thing!" The hunters whistled shrilly. In a few minutes forty or fifty men, armed with barbed spears and cudgels, were following Li Kui up the trail. It was broad daylight by the time they reached the summit. Sure enough, there were two dead cubs at the cave, one outside and one in. The body of a female tiger lay at the foot of the cliff. A dead male tiger was sprawled before the chapel to the Great Sage of Sizhou.
Overjoyed, the hunters tied the legs of the beasts together and carried them down, slung on poles. They requested Li Kui to claim the reward, and sent a man ahead to inform the village head and the gentry. All came out to greet Black Whirlwind and the tigers were brought to the manor of Squire Cao. A retired petty official, Cao was a nasty, unscrupulous type. Through various crooked deals he had recently become very rich.
Cao invited Li Kui to be seated in his thatch-roofed hall, and asked how he killed the tigers. Li Kui repeated his recital. Everyone listened, open-mouthed.
"What is your name, warrior?" Cao asked.
"My family name is Zhang. I have no given name. I'm called Zhang the Brave."
"You're indeed worthy of that title. Otherwise, how could you have killed four tigers?" Cao ordered a feast in honor of his guest. Of that we'll say no more.
When word spread that four tigers had been killed on Yiling Mountain and carried to the manor of Squire Cao, excitement in the village ran high. Everyone, men and women, young and old, flocked to see the dead beasts, and to peer at the hero Squire Cao was entertaining in his hall.
Among the spectators was Li Gui's wife. She had fled to this village of Yiling where her parents lived. Going to view the tigers, she recognized Li Kui. She rushed home and told her parents.
"That big swarthy fellow who killed the tigers is the man who murdered my husband and burned down our house. He's known as Black Whirlwind of Liangshan Marsh."
The parents immediately informed the village head. "If he's Black Whirlwind," the official thought, "then he's Li Kui, who killed a man in Baizhang Village on the other side of the mountain and ran away to Jiangzhou. He made trouble there too, and our county has been directed to arrest him on sight. A reward of three thousand strings of cash is offered for his capture. And here he is!"
The village head quietly sent a man for Squire Cao. On the excuse that he wanted to change his clothes, Cao left the hall and hastened to the home of the village head.
"That tiger killer is none other than Li Kui the Black Whirlwind, from Baizhang on the other side of the mountain. There's a notice out for his arrest."
"Better check carefully," said Cao. "If he's not, you'll be making a big mistake. If he is, it's no problem. We can take him easily enough. But if he's not the man there'll be trouble."
"Li Gui's wife recognized him. He stopped at their house to eat, and killed Li Gui."
"In that case, we'll ply him with wine and ask him whether he wants to go to the county town to claim the reward for the tigers, or whether he'll take some recompense here in the village. If he's unwilling to go to the county office, then we know he's Black Whirlwind. We'll keep toasting him in relays till he's drunk. Then we'll tie him up, inform the county authorities and have them send a constable to come and get him. We can't go wrong."
"Very good," the others agreed.
Squire Cao returned home to dupe Li Kui. As he poured more wine, he said: "Forgive me for having left you. Please remove the pouches around your waist, rest your halberd and make yourself comfortable."
"Fine," said Li Kui. "My dagger is in the belly of the tigress. I've only the sheath here. When you cut her open, I'd like it back."
"Don't give it a thought. I've plenty of good blades. You must let me present you with one."
Li Kui handed his dagger sheath and pouches to vassals to keep for him, and leaned his halberd against the wall. Squire Cao ordered a large platter of meat and a big pot of wine. The gentry, the village head and the hunters toasted Li Kui with large bowls and flagons.
"Will you be going to the authorities to claim the reward for the tigers, or would you prefer to receive some recompense here?" asked the squire.
"I'm a traveller, passing through, and I don't have much time. I happened to have killed a few tigers. There's no need to claim any county reward. If you have a little money here, that will do. If you don't, I'll go on without it."
"We couldn't treat you so shabbily. Our Yiling Village will collect a fund for you. We'll send the tigers to the county ourselves."
"I'd like a cotton robe to exchange for these clothes."
"Of course," said Cao. Li Kui was given a black robe to replace his blood-stained clothing.
Drums pounded and flutes warbled at the door, as everyone congratulated Li Kui with cold wine and hot. He didn't know he was being tricked, and he drank freely, completely forgetting Song Jiang's injunction. In less than two watches, he was so drunk he couldn't stand.
He was helped to a room in the rear of the hall and laid out on a bench. They tied him securely to it with two ropes. Cao told the village head to rush men to report to the county authorities, and take Li Gui's wife with them to file a formal accusation.
The entire Yishui County office was thrown into a turmoil on hearing the news. The astonished magistrate hastily summoned court.
"Where is Black Whirlwind being detained?" he queried. "That man's a rebel. He mustn't get away."

"He's tied up in Squire Cao's manor," the complainant and hunters replied. "But no one can restrain him for long. We haven't tried to bring him here because we're afraid he'd escape on the road."
The magistrate summoned the county constable Li Yun, and said: "Li Kui the Black Whirlwind has been captured in the manor of Squire Cao in Yiling. Take a strong force and bring him in, secretly. I don't want the whole countryside aroused. He might get away."
Constable Li mustered thirty veteran soldiers. Fully armed, they proceeded rapidly towards Yiling Village. Yishui was a small county, and the story couldn't be suppressed. It was the talk of every market-place. "Black Whirlwind, who rioted in Jiangzhou, has been taken. Constable Li has been sent to get him!" Zhu Gui, in his brother's home outside the county town, also heard the news, and hurried to the rear to consult with him.
"That oaf has done it again! How am I going to rescue him? Song Jiang was afraid he'd get into trouble and sent me to keep an eye on him. Now he's been captured! If I can't save him, how am I going to face my brothers when I get back to the stronghold? What a mess!"
"Don't be upset," urged Zhu Fu. "Constable Li Yun has superb skill with weapons. Forty or fifty armed men, together, couldn't down him. What chance would the two of us have, no matter how much we wished? It's brains, not brawn, that will do it. Li Yun is very fond of me. He often teaches me weapons play. I know how to deal with him, though I won't be able to stay here afterwards. Tonight we'll cook twenty or thirty catties of meat cut it into large chunks, prepare a dozen bottles of wine, and mix in a sleeping draught. At the fifth watch we two and a few helpers will carry the stuff to a secluded place along the road. When Li Yun and his party come with their prisoner, we'll offer them wine to celebrate. They'll fall unconscious and we'll free Li Kui. How does that strike you?"
"Very clever. We can't delay. Let's prepare carefully and make an early start."
"The problem is Li Yun doesn't drink much. Even if he passes out, he'll recover quickly. Another thing—if he finds out later, I won't be able to remain here."
"Your tavern business isn't very good anyhow. Why not take your wife and children and go with me up the mountain and join our band? Gold and silver we share and share alike. You'll have whole sets of clothing. You'll be happy there. Have two of your assistants find a cart tonight and sent your family and valuables and luggage on ahead. Let them wait for us at the hamlet of Shilipai. Then we'll all go to the stronghold. I have some knockout medicine in my bag. Since Li Yun doesn't drink, sprinkle plenty on the meat and make him eat. He'll keel over too. After we rescue Li Kui, we'll go up the mountain together. Does that suit you?"
"All right, brother, that's the way it'll be."
Zhu Fu sent men for a cart, made up four or five bundles and loaded them on. Bigger items were left behind. He told his wife and children to ride in the cart, and instructed two of his assistants to escort them and wait at the hamlet.
That night the brothers cooked the meat, cut it into large chunks and mixed in the drug. With the wine, it made up two shoulder-pole loads. They took also twenty or thirty empty bowls and some cooked vegetables, on which they sprinkled the drug as well, for those who didn't eat meat. A couple of assistants carried the two loads. The brothers themselves brought boxes of tidbits. By the fourth watch they were waiting near a crossing along the secluded mountain trail. At daybreak they heard in the distance the approaching sound of drums and gongs. Zhu Gui moved into the crossing.
In Yiling Village, the thirty-odd soldiers had drank half the night. Around the fourth watch, they set out with Li Kui, his hands bound behind him. Constable Li brought up the rear on horseback. They had been marching for a time when Zhu Fu stepped out and barred their path.
"Congratulations, Teacher," he said. "Won't you rest a while?"
He scooped a jug of wine from a bucket and poured it into a large flagon, which he offered to Li Yun. Zhu Gui presented a platter of meat, and the assistants held up the boxes of tidbits. The constable dismounted and hurried forward.
"Young brother, you shouldn't have troubled to come all this way," he said.
"I only wanted to show my respect," Zhu Fu replied.
Li Yun accepted the flagon. Although he touched it to his lips, he did not drink. Zhu Fu knelt before him.
"I know you don't drink, Teacher. But this a victory libation. Have at least half a cup."
Li Yun couldn't refuse. He took a couple of sips.
"If you don't want wine, you must have some meat," Zhu Fu urged.
"I ate my fill tonight. I couldn't eat another thing."
"You've come a long way, Teacher. You must be hungry again. We don't have anything fancy, but do taste a little, or I'll lose face badly."
Zhu Fu selected and proffered two pieces of meat. Pressed with such solicitude, Li Yun had no choice but to eat them. Zhu Fu served wine also to the gentry, the village head and the hunters, filling their cups three times.
Zhu Gui called the soldiers and vassals to come and drink. Those varlets weren't fussy. They didn't care whether the wine and meat were cold or hot, tasty or otherwise—they tucked in. The provisions disappeared as fast as wispy clouds in the wind, as blossoms fallen into a stream.
Li Kui watched with shining eyes. The moment he saw Zhu Gui and his brother he knew it was a ruse. "How about giving me something to eat, too?" he said deliberately.
"Meat and wine for a wicked devil like you?" Zhu Gui barked at him. "The executioner's waiting! Shut your mouth!"
Li Yun faced his soldiers. "Let's march. Quickly," he ordered.
But the men only looked at each other, unable to stir. Lips trembling, legs numb, one by one they fell to the ground.
"I've been tricked," Li Yun cried agitatedly. He tried to press forward. But his own head grew heavy and his legs light, and he melted into a heap, completely out.
Zhu Gui and his brother seized halberds. "Don't think you can get away," they yelled, and rushed at the vassals and onlookers who had not drunk or eaten. The fast runners escaped, the slower were stabbed and killed.
With a roar Li Kui burst his bonds. He grabbed a halberd and charged towards the prostrate Li Yun. Zhu Fu stepped firmly in his path.
"Mind your manners. He's my teacher. A good man. You go on ahead."
Li Kui assented. "But I'll burst if don't kill that old donkey Cao," he swore.
He caught up with the squire and ran him through, then dispatched Li Gui's wife and the village head. His blood lust aroused, he slaughtered a whole row of hunters and all thirty soldiers. The onlookers and vassals, hating their parents for giving them only one pair of legs, fled deep into the wilds. Li Kui started to pursue.
Zhu Gui restrained him. "This has nothing to do with them," he shouted. "Stop injuring ordinary people!"
Only then did Li Kui desist. He stripped some clothing from a dead soldier and put it on. He and the two brothers, halberds in hand, marched on along the path.
"This is no good," Zhu Fu said. "I've condemned my teacher to death. When he awakes, what will he be able to tell the magistrate? He's sure to chase after us. You two keep going. I'll wait for him here. He's always been so kind to me, so loyal to his friends. I'll ask him to go with us to the stronghold and join the band. I owe him that. Otherwise he'll suffer when he returns to the county office."
"You're right, brother," said Zhu Gui. "I'll go on with the cart. Li Kui will stay here to help you. If Li Yun doesn't catch up soon, don't be foolish and wait too long."
"Naturally," said Zhu Fu.
Zhu Gui continued his journey, alone. Zhu Fu and Li Kui sat by the roadside. Sure enough in less than a watch, Li Yun halberd tightly grasped, came flying down the path. "Robbers, stay where you're," he shouted. He rushed forward fiercely. Li Kui was afraid he would hurt Zhu Fu. He jumped up and advanced to meet him with levelled halberd. And as a result, 2 new tigers were added to the company on Mount Liang, 4 men were welcomed in Fraternity Hall.

"Just tell me what those three conditions are, brother," Iron Ox said. And Song Jiang told him: "If you want to go back home to fetch your mother, the first condition is that you do not drink on the journey. Second, given that you're so hot-tempered, we can't send anyone with you, so you must just go quietly by yourself and bring your mother straight back. Third, don't take those two axes with you. Control yourself during the journey, go quickly and come back soon."
Iron Ox said: "There's nothing I can't keep to in that. Don't worry, I'll leave today, and I won't waste any time."
On this occasion Iron Ox's preparations were quickly made. He just stuck a dagger in his belt, shouldered a halberd, provided himself with one large silver ingot and three or four small ones, drank a few cups of wine, shouted out a salute, bade everyone farewell, went down the mountain and across the water from Golden Sands Landing, and was gone.
After they had seen him off, Chao Gai, Song Jiang and the others went back and sat down in the assembly hall. But Song Jiang was still uneasy. "This Iron Ox," he said, "if he's on his own he's sure to get into some trouble. Is there anyone of the company who comes from the same part of the world? Someone who could go there and get news of him?"
Skyscraper said: "There's the Crocodile, he's from Yishui in Yizhou, he's Iron Ox's countryman."
"Of course, I had forgotten," Song Jiang said. "Iron Ox said so himself the other day in the assembly at the White Dragon temple."
So Song Jiang sent for the Crocodile. One of the men raced down the mountain with the message; he arrived at the inn and asked the Crocodile to go up to the fortress. "Our friend Iron Ox has just gone off home to fetch his mother," Song Jiang said to the Crocodile. "I didn't want to send anyone with him, because he gets so aggressive when he's been drinking. But I'm really afraid he may get into trouble on the way. I've just heard that you are his compatriot. Would you mind going there to his district to keep an eye on him?"
The Crocodile replied: "Yes, I am from Yishui district in Yizhou and I've a brother called Zhu Fu who has opened an inn outside the west gate of the city. This Iron Ox lives in the same area, at East Dongdian outside Baizhang village. He's got an elder brother called Li Da, who works on someone else's land — a pretty wild character, who killed a man once and fled to the rivers and lakes and has never gone back home. If you want me to go back there and make some inquiries it's no problem. The only trouble is there won't be anyone to look after the inn. Still, I haven't been home for a long time and I'd very much like to go back and pay my brother a visit."
"There's no need to worry about the inn," Song Jiang said. "I'll get the Ape and Shi Yong to look after it for you for a while."
The Crocodile was satisfied with this. He said goodbye and went back down the mountain to the inn, where he packed his bags, handed over the establishment to the Ape and Shi Yong, and set off for home.
Back at the mountain retreat Song Jiang passed the days feasting and drinking quite contentedly with Chao Gai, and studying the mystic books with "Professor" Wu Yong, the Occult Star. Of this no more.
Meanwhile Iron Ox all on his own left the Marshes of Mount Liang and took the road to Yishui. He diligently abstained from wine on the road, so he did not provoke any incidents and the journey was uneventful. When he reached the west gate of Yishui, he saw a knot of people studying a notice. He placed himself in their midst and heard someone read out: "The first name on the notice is the chief bandit Song Jiang, he is from Yuncheng. The second name is the lesser bandit Dai Zong, he is superintendent of the two prisons in Jiangzhou. The third name is the lesser bandit Li Kui, he is from Yishui in Yizhou." Iron Ox, listening at the back, was on the point of making some totally inappropriate and uncalled-for remark, when someone came thrusting through the crowd, seized him by the waist and cried: "Brother Zhang, what are you doing here?"
When Iron Ox twisted round to see who it was he recognized the Crocodile. "What are you doing here?" he asked.
"I want a word with you," the other said.
They went together to an inn in a district just outside the west gate. They found a clean room at the back and sat down. The Crocodile pointed at Iron Ox and said: "What a foolhardy fellow you are! That notice says clearly that there's a reward of a hundred thousand for the capture of Song Jiang, five thousand for the Magic Messenger, and three thousand for Iron Ox. So why were you standing there looking at it? Suppose someone had been sharp-sighted and quick-handed enough to catch you and hand you over to the police, what would you have done then? Our brother Song Jiang was afraid you would cause a disturbance, so he didn't want to send anyone with you. But he still feared you would do something silly here, and he sent me along to find out how you were getting on. I was a day behind you leaving the mountain, but I got here a day ahead, why's it taken you so long?"
Iron Ox answered: "He told me I wasn't to drink on the way, that slowed me down. How did you know about this inn? You're from here, aren't you, where is your house?"
"This inn belongs to my younger brother, Zhu Fu," said the Crocodile. "Yes, I do come from these parts. I used to do business in the rivers and lakes but I lost all my money, that's why I joined the company on Mount Liang and became an outlaw. So now I'm visiting my home." He called his brother Zhu Fu over and introduced him to Iron Ox. Zhu Fu ordered wine for Iron Ox. "Our brother told me not to drink," Iron Ox said, "but I'm home now, so what's bloody wrong with drinking a bowl of wine?" Not daring to try and stop him, the Crocodile let him drink.
They sat there drinking into the small hours. Some food was ordered and Iron Ox ate. Around dawn, when the moon and stars were fading and a rosy glow was spreading in the east, he set off for his village. "Don't take the short cut," the Crocodile told him. "When you pass the big tree take the highway heading east and go straight to Baizhang. That'll take you to East Dongdian. Find your mother and bring her at once and we'll go back to Mount Liang together."
Iron Ox said: "I most certainly will take the short cut. It's a long way, who wants to waste time taking the highway?"
The Crocodile said: "There's lots of tigers along that small track. And there's robbers too."
Iron Ox replied: "Do you think I'm afraid of them?" He put on his hat, took up his halberd, buckled on a sword, bade farewell to the Crocodile and his brother and set off for Baizhang.
When he'd gone a couple of miles it began to grow lighter. As he was walking through the wet grass, a white rabbit suddenly appeared, hopping along ahead of him. Iron Ox chased after it for a while. Then he laughed and said: "This creature has led me a merry dance." There is a poem which says:
Quiet reigns on the mountain path,
The west wind shakes yellow leaves from the trees.
Chancing upon a hare he chases it too far,
And quite forgets that his journey is urgent.
As he was proceeding on his way, Iron Ox saw in front of him a small mixed wood of big trees. The season was early autumn and the leaves had all turned. When he reached a hut on the edge of this wood, a big man emerged and shouted: "You'd better pay the toll here, if you can. If not, I'll have your baggage."
Iron Ox looked at him. His hair was tied in a red silk bandanna and he wore a robe of rough cloth. He carried a pair of axes and he had blackened his face. Iron Ox shouted back: "Who the fuck are you? And what makes you think you can rob highways here?"
The other said: "Want to know my name do you? Well, it'll frighten you out of your wits! I am the Black Whirlwind, that's who I am! Now, if you put down the money for the toll, and your baggage, I'll spare your life and you can go!"
Iron Ox roared with laughter. "You fucking son of a bitch! What are you, and where have you sprung from? You've even pinched my goddamn name, so you can stand here talking bloody nonsense!" So saying he levelled his halberd and charged. The other offered no resistance whatsoever. Instead he tried to flee, but was brought down by a blow to the thigh from Iron Ox's weapon. Planting one foot on the man's chest Iron Ox shouted: "Do you know who I am?"
The other cried: "Please sir, spare the life of this stupid fool!"
"I am the real Black Whirlwind, famous throughout the rivers and lakes! I am Li Kui and you have abused my name!"
"My name really is Li, but I'm not the real Black Whirlwind. It was because you're so famous in the rivers and lakes that I took your name, which even the spirits are scared of. By purloining your name I was able to rob as I liked on the highway here. If a merchant comes through on his own, just hearing the name Black Whirlwind is enough, he throws down his baggage and runs for his life. I've been able to scrape a living like this. But I haven't really hurt anyone. I gave myself the professional name of Li Gui. I live in the village just down the road."
"The insolence of the bastard! Robbing folk of their bags and baggage on the highway and ruining my reputation! You even copied my trick of using two axes! Well you'd better be prepared for one of my axe blows now." He stretched out his arm and snatched one of the axes and prepared to strike. But the panic-stricken Li Gui cried: "Sir, if you kill me you're killing two people at once!"
Iron Ox arrested his stroke. "If I kill you I'm killing two people? How's that?"
"I would never have had the courage to rob on the highway, if I hadn't got a ninety-year-old mother at home with no one else to look after her. That's why I made bold with your name, sir, to scare people, so I could lay hands on a few goods to support my poor mother. But God's truth, I really never hurt anyone. So now you see, if you kill me, my old mother is going to starve to death."
Now although Iron Ox was a violent character who could murder someone without blinking an eyelid, when he heard this story he thought to himself: "Here's me going home specially to fetch my mother, and if I then go and kill someone who's his mother's sole support, heaven will not look kindly on it. No, I mustn't, I must spare the bugger." So he let him go, and Li Gui, after taking back the axe, bowed deeply and prostrated himself.
Iron Ox said: "But remember, I'm the only true Black Whirlwind, so from now on don't go taking my name in vain."
"I shall change my name at once and go home and change my profession," the other said. "I'll never again take advantage of your name to rob highways."
Iron Ox said: "You have a filial heart. I will give you ten taels of silver as capital to help you change your profession." He gave him an ingot and Li Gui bowed in thanks and departed.
Iron Ox laughed about it afterwards. "The poor sod fell slap into my hands. Anyway, he's a filial son and he's going to change his ways, if I'd killed him it would not have been pleasing to heaven. But now I'd better get going." He took his halberd and trudged on along the small mountain path. There is a poem here:
One seeks his mother: his intention misfires.
One claims a like virtue, but the tale is a liar's.
When sons thus their love for a mother proclaim,
Just ask if the words and the deeds are the same.
Iron Ox had walked till well into the morning, by which time his stomach told him he was hungry and thirsty. There was nothing around him except a proliferation of mountain paths; there was no inn or eating-house in sight. But as he went on he began to catch glimpses in the distance of a couple of thatched cottages nestling in a hollow on the hillside. He headed for one of the houses and was able to observe a woman coming out of the back. A bunch of wild flowers was stuck in her hairdo, and her face was plastered with rouge and make-up. Iron Ox put down his halberd and called out: "Hey, Auntie, I'm a traveller and I'm starving. I can't find any sort of inn anywhere. I'll pay you a good price if you'll get me something to eat and drink."
When she looked at Iron Ox and saw his physique, the woman dared not refuse him. Reluctantly she replied: "There isn't anywhere to buy wine but I can cook you some rice."
"All right. But do plenty. I'm bloody starving."
"Will a litre be enough?"
"Make it three."
The woman went to the kitchen to light the stove and then after washing the rice beside the stream came back to cook it. When Iron Ox went out the back to wash his hands, he saw a man limping down the hill. After he'd gone back into the house he heard the woman open the back door — she was about to go up the hill to get vegetables. Meeting the man, she asked: "What's the matter with your leg, dear? Have you twisted your ankle?"

"I was that close to never seeing you again!" he replied. "Can you imagine how bloody unlucky I was? I went out looking for a lone traveller. I'd been waiting two whole weeks without doing any good. Today, I thought I'd just found myself something, and who do you think it turned out to be? Only the real Black Whirlwind! Well, since it was that fucker I'd bumped into, I naturally hadn't a hope against him. He clobbered me in the leg, in fact. Then he knocked me down, and was just about to do me in, when I got the idea of shouting, 'If you kill me you're killing two!' He asked me why and I told him, 'I got this ninety-year-old mum at home with no one to look after her and she's sure to starve!' The silly bugger actually believed me! He let me go and gave me some silver to start a business with and told me to change my way of life and look after my mother well. I was afraid he might be watching and follow me, so I got out of that wood and found a very lonely spot and slept there a while, before coming back here round the other side of the mountain."

The woman said: "Keep your voice down. Just now a big dark fellow came up and told me to cook him food, I think it might be him. He was sitting out there by the door, you'd better go and take a look. If it is him, go and get the drug to put in his food. When he eats it, it'll knock him out and the two of us can deal with him. If we can make some money out of him, we'll be able to move into town and start a business; we won't have to stay here robbing highways."

When he heard this, Iron Ox said to himself: "The bastard! I just gave him some silver, and spared his life, and now he wants to kill me! That's really a bit too much!" He strolled over to the back door. As luck would have it, the wretched Li Gui was just coming out. Iron Ox grabbed him by the hair. The woman fled through the front door. Iron Ox pinned Li Gui's arms and forced him to the ground. He pulled out his knife and speedily severed his neck. Knife in hand he rushed to the front door to find the woman, but he couldn't discover where she had gone to. He went inside again and searched the house. He found two wicker baskets full of old clothes, and at the bottom he found some loose change in silver and some jewellery. He took it all. He also went and retrieved the silver ingot from Li Gui's body and tied it all up in his bundle. Then he went and looked at the pot. The three litres of rice were about done: all that was missing was some dishes to eat with it. He helped himself to rice and ate it plain for a while. Then he suddenly laughed and said to himself: "I'm an idiot! There's good meat staring me in the face but I didn't think of eating it!" He took out his knife and went and carved two good hunks of meat from Li Gui's leg, washed them in water, put some more charcoal in the stove and proceeded to roast them. Thus cooking and eating as he went along, he ate till he was full. Then he dragged the body back into the house and set fire to it. Shouldering his halberd he departed.

By the time he reached East Dongdian the sun was already setting in the west. He hurried to his home, pushed open the door and entered. His mother was sitting on the bed. "Who is it?" she cried out. He looked and saw that she was blind in both eyes. She was sitting on the bed praying. "Mother, Iron Ox has come home," he said.

"My son, you've been gone such a long time!" she said. "Where have you been all these years? Your brother works on someone else's estate, he just scrapes a living and there's not really enough to feed me. I cried my eyes out, thinking about you, I went blind in both eyes. How have things been with you?"

Iron Ox thought: "If I tell her I'm an outlaw in the Marshes of Mount Liang, she'll never agree to go with me. I'd better make something up." So he said to her: "I've become an official now and I've come to take you back with me."

"That's wonderful," she said. "But how will you be able to take me?"

"I'll carry you on my back for the first part. Later we'll look for a cart."

"Wait till your brother comes, then we can see about it."

"Why wait? We'll go now."

But just as they were about to leave, Li Da appeared with a pot of rice.

When Iron Ox saw him walk in, he prostrated himself and said: "It's been a long time, brother!"

His brother responded angrily: "What the bloody hell have you come here for? I suppose you want to get us into trouble again."

The mother said: "Iron Ox is an official now. He's come to take me with him."

"Mother! Don't believe that shit! The first time when he killed that chap I had to wear a cangue and fetters and suffer a thousand indignities. Now I hear that he's mixed up with that crowd from the Marshes of Mount Liang. They raided the execution ground recently and turned Jiangzhou upside down. He's joined a gang of robbers, do you hear? The other day orders arrived from Jiangzhou, with a warrant for his arrest, and the court wanted to detain me until he's caught. Luckily the chap I work for spoke up for me. He said my younger brother had disappeared more than ten years ago and never returned, and that it might be someone using the same name who had falsified his particulars. My boss paid everyone money on my behalf, that's how I managed to get out of it, otherwise they'd have held me hostage and beaten me. Now there's a notice up offering a reward of three thousand for his capture. You'd better have died, instead of coming back here to tell us a pack of lies!"

"Don't be angry, brother," Iron Ox said. "If you'd just come back with me to Mount Liang, where we can have a fine life, wouldn't it be great?"

Li Da was furious. He would have liked to attack his brother, but he knew he couldn't handle him, so he hurled the pot of rice on the floor and left.

Iron Ox said to himself: "If he's gone like that, he'll go and tell people where I am and they'll come to get me. If I want to get out of this we'd better leave as soon as possible. My brother has never seen a lot of money, so what I'll do is, I'll leave him this big fifty-tael ingot. I'll put it on the bed. When he comes back he'll find it and he'll give up the idea of chasing me." He felt around in his pouch and took out the ingot and placed it on the bed. Then he said: "Mother, I'm going to carry you on my back now."

"Where are you taking me?" she asked.

"Don't ask questions, just remember you're going to be happy. I can easily carry you." So saying, he picked up his mother, took his halberd and left. He chose the remotest of paths.

Li Da, meanwhile, had gone rushing off to his master's house to report the matter. He raced back with a dozen farm-hands, but when he reached home he could see no sign of his mother. But he did see the ingot on the bed. This caused him to reflect: "Iron Ox has left me the silver and taken mother off somewhere. There must be some of his friends from Mount Liang with him. If I follow, they'll kill me. No doubt he's taken mother off to join their idle life in the stronghold on the mountain." The others saw no sign of Iron Ox and had no idea what was going on. Li Da told them: "Iron Ox has carried my mother off. But I don't know which way they've gone. There are so many different paths round here, how can we hope to find them?" Seeing that Li Da didn't know what to do, they hung around for a while and then all went home separately. Of this no more.

We must return to Iron Ox. Fearing that his brother would send people after him, he carried his mother deep into the mountains by narrow, lonely paths. It was getting late:

Evening mist floats across distant hills: the smoke of fires obscures fantastic peaks. Rooks in ragged flocks seek the wood. A hundred bird calls fill the trees. Wild geese in their orderly formations drop and disappear among the reeds. The fireflies' points of light hover over country paths and settle in the rank grass that is their home. The autumn wind sweeps through the trees scattering dead leaves. Frosty air is wafted into the deepest corners of the mountains.

As daylight was fading, Iron Ox and his mother arrived at the foot of a steep ascent. The mother's sight was so bad she knew no difference between night and day. Iron Ox recognized the spot. It was called Yiling Heights. Once past it, they would find human habitations. By the light of the stars and the moon, the two of them, mother and son, slowly proceeded up the mountain, until the mother said: "My son, if you could find me a drink of water it would be so nice."

Iron Ox said: "Wait till we're past this mountain, mother. We'll find someone to give us lodging and something to eat."

"I ate some dry food for lunch, I'm terribly thirsty." she said.

"My throat feels as if it's on fire, too," Iron Ox said. "Just wait till we're at the top and then I'll find you some water."

"My son, I implore you, I'm dying of thirst."

"And I'm completely exhausted, too," Iron Ox said. Near the top he saw there was a big black rock beside a pine tree. He set his mother down on this, stuck his halberd in the ground and said: "Be patient, mother, and sit here for a moment, while I go and find some water." He could hear the sound of water, coming from the bottom of a ravine somewhere, so he followed his ears and after skirting several cliffs, came upon a gully down which a goodly stream of water was running. There's a poem that describes what he saw:

It winds 'twixt the cliffs with such boisterous zest,
You know that its birthplace is up on the peak:
The river runs ever, and never finds rest.
Till it runs to the ocean, great billows to make.

When he reached the bank of the stream he scooped water up in his hands and drank a few mouthfuls. Then he thought: "How am I going to carry this water to my mother?" He stood up and looked around in all directions. Far up the slope he saw a building. "That's it!" he thought. Grasping vines and creepers he hauled himself up the steep incline. He pushed open the gate and looked inside. It was in fact a shrine dedicated to a local god. In front of the main hall there was a stone incense burner. Iron Ox tried to lift this, but it was a solid block and tug as he might it wouldn't budge. Suddenly he lost patience and wrenched the base right out and smashed it against the stone steps in front of the hall. The bowl broke off and he picked it up and went back down to the stream, where he plunged it in the water and got a bunch of grass and scrubbed it clean. He filled it half full with water, raised it in both hands and returning by the way he had come staggered off up the hillside.

But when he reached the pine tree his mother was not on the stone. Only his halberd was there. He called out that he'd brought her water. But still she did not appear or answer his call. He began to get worried. He put down the incense burner and looked around in all directions: still no sign of her. About thirty paces away, however, he found traces of blood. When he saw this his heart misgave him. Following the trail of blood, he came to the mouth of a big cave, where two tiger cubs were toying with a human leg. Truly, we can say that:

The false Black Whirlwind felt the heat:
In life a fake, in death ... roast meat.
Now it's the mother's leg that's savaged:
To man or beast by hunger ravaged
All that's flesh is good to eat.

Iron Ox pondered: "I came back from Mount Liang to get my mother. With enormous effort I carried her this far, and all for you to go and eat her! For if that human leg the fucking tigers have brought here is not my mother's, whose could it be?" He was filled with a great rage, his light-coloured hair stood on end, he raised his halberd and ran at the tiger cubs. Startled by this, the tiger cubs, one big, one small, snarled and lunged at him with all their teeth and claws. He killed one of them at once. The other fled inside the cave. He followed it inside and dispatched it there. From this vantage point, squatting inside the tiger's lair, he saw a big tigress charging towards him, snarling and showing her claws. "You're the monster that ate my mother!" he said to himself. He put down his halberd and took the knife from his belt. When she reached the mouth of the cave the tigress first swept the entrance with her tail, then began to enter backwards. When he saw what she was doing, Iron Ox, employing every ounce of his strength stabbed desperately at the base of the tail, burying the knife in her anus. Such was the strength of his blow that the blade and hilt penetrated right through to her belly. With a deafening roar the tigress sprang away from the cave taking the knife with her, and bounded down the sheer side of a ravine. Iron Ox picked up his halberd and left the cave. The tigress maddened by the pain went on crashing down the rocky incline. Iron Ox was just about to go after her when from behind the trees a sudden gale arose. It blew so furiously the leaves were shaken from the trees like rain. According to the old saying: "Clouds originate from dragons, and wind is produced by tigers." At that moment, amid a storm of wind and by the light of the stars and the moon, a great roar burst out and a huge tiger with sad eyes and a white forehead appeared. This beast sprang furiously at Iron Ox. Calmly taking advantage of the animal's own momentum, Iron Ox held his blade firm and struck under the throat. The tiger never attempted a second spring. Firstly it was only concerned to escape the pain. And in the second place, its windpipe was pierced. It fled no more than half a dozen paces before it collapsed on the mountainside with a sound like half the mountain falling, and expired on the spot.

So Iron Ox had killed a whole family of tigers. But he still went back into the cave with his weapon in hand to have a look, in case there was another tiger. There was no sign of one. Exhausted, he returned to the temple and slept there till dawn. Early next morning he collected up his mother's remains, two legs and some other bones, and wrapped them in a shirt. Then he dug a grave at the back of the temple and buried the bones. He wept for a long while. There is a poem about this:

At Yiling, with the wind in the west, the season autumn,
The tigers, male and female, gather in the forest on the heights.
Soon the sight of his old mother's sparse remains,
Causes the hero to lament her fate.
Oblivious to danger he visits the tiger's den,
And four tigers pay with their lives for his revenge!
Behind the local temple he inters his mother's bones.
This hero's name? Li Kui, the famous Iron Ox!

By now Iron Ox was exceedingly hungry and thirsty. He was obliged to collect his luggage, take up his halberd and slowly make his way down the mountain. Suddenly half a dozen tiger hunters appeared, equipped with traps and bows and arrows. When they saw Iron Ox, strolling down the mountain all spattered with blood, they had quite a shock. "Are you the god of the mountain or something?" they asked. "How do you dare to cross this mountain alone?"

Iron Ox considered his reply carefully. "Recently that notice has gone up in Yishui, there's a reward of three thousand for my capture," he thought. "I daren't tell them my real name. I'd better invent a story." To the hunters he said: "I am a merchant. Yesterday afternoon I was crossing the pass with my mother. Because my mother wanted a drink I went down to the stream to get some water. A big tiger dragged my mother off and ate her. I tracked it to its lair and killed first two cubs and then two big tigers. I slept in the temple till it got light and then came down the mountain."

"Don't believe you!" the hunters shouted in unison. "How could one man kill four tigers? After all, the famous tiger killers in history are each only said to have killed one. Two tiger cubs, that's possible, but the two big tigers, that's really beyond a joke! Goodness knows how many beatings we've all received because of those two beasts. Ever since that den of tigers has been here on Yiling Heights, which is nearly six months now, no one has cared to venture there. We just don't believe you. Who do you think you're going to fool?"

Iron Ox replied: "I'm not from these parts, why should I want to lie to you? If you don't believe me, we'd better go back up the mountain together and I'll try to show you. You can bring some porters along to help carry the tigers down."

The hunters said: "If it's really true, we shan't be able to thank you enough, it will be great news."

The hunters whistled and in a moment thirty or forty men had gathered, all carrying long hooks and staves. They followed Iron Ox back up the mountain. Dawn had broken by now and when they reached the top the two dead tiger cubs by the den were clearly visible — one outside and one in the entrance — and then also the tigress dead on the mountainside, and a big male tiger lying dead in front of the shrine. The sight of four dead tigers sent the hunters into raptures. They got rope and tied them up to carry them down the mountain. They offered to go with Iron Ox to collect the reward, but first they sent someone on ahead to inform the village headman and other notables, who all came out to meet them. The tigers were carried to the house of a rich man, Squire Cao by name. This individual was a retired government official, who devoted himself to mischief and debauchery in the district. He had recently used some kind of skulduggery to add considerably to his fortune. This Squire Cao now came to see for himself and invited Iron Ox to sit in the thatched hall and tell him how he came to kill the tigers. Iron Ox told the story of how he had come to the mountain the night before with his mother and how she wanted a drink and how this led to the killing of the tigers. Everyone was amazed. Squire Cao wanted to know the great hero's name. Iron Ox replied: "Zhang is my name. I have no given name, people just call me Big Zhang."

There's a poem about this:

Everyone knows of the bogus Li Kui;
Nobody speaks of how Li Kui pretended.
But with Li Kui becoming Big Zhang for the day,
Who's true and who's false? It's quite a conundrum!

Squire Cao said: "Big indeed! Only a very big man could kill four monsters like that!" He ordered a feast to be laid in a side-room. Of this no more.

Now when it became known in the neighbourhood that four tigers had been killed on Yiling Heights and taken to Squire Cao's it became a topic of conversation in every local establishment and everyone living in the village or on the surrounding slopes, man, woman or child, flocked to see the tigers and to get a glimpse of Squire Cao entertaining the hero who had killed them, drinking with him in the main hall. Amongst them all was Li Gui's wife who had taken refuge with her parents in her old home in the village. She came with everyone else to see the tigers. When she recognized Iron Ox, she hurried home to tell her mother and father: "That big black fellow who killed the tigers is the one who killed my old man and burnt my house down. He's the Black Whirlwind, alias Iron Ox, one of the robbers of Mount Liang." Her parents went at once and told the headman. The headman said: "If he's the Black Whirlwind, then he's the one who's wanted for the murder of a man in Baizhang, the one that fled to Jiangzhou and got involved in some other business too, and we received an official order for his detention. Recently the authorities announced a reward of three thousand for his capture. So now he's here, is he!" He secretly sent someone to ask Squire Cao to come and see him. Squire Cao excused himself from the company, saying he wanted to wash his hands, and hurried round to see the headman, from whom he learnt that the killer of the tigers was Li Kui, who had killed a man in Baizhang on the other side of the mountain and whose arrest had been ordered by the authorities. Squire Cao said: "Listen carefully. In case we've got this wrong, it wouldn't be a good idea to annoy him. If we're right then there's no problem. We can easily capture him. I'm just afraid it might not be him, in which case we'd be in trouble."

The headman said: "Apparently Li Gui's wife recognized him. He went to their house asking for food, and then killed Li Gui."

Squire Cao said: "In that case all we need do is give him plenty of wine and ask him if he wants to go to the government office to collect the reward for killing the tigers or if he'd rather collect it in the village. If he doesn't want to go to the government office, then he's our man. I'll get someone to change the cups around, we'll get him drunk and then send someone to the magistracy to ask them to send a sergeant to arrest him, it can hardly go wrong." There is a poem about this:

The tiny mustard seed, they say,
Will go through the needle's eye,
And it's always on a narrow road
You meet an enemy.
Li Gui's jealous ghost has not
Yet taken its departure;
And the Whirlwind truly stands
In an unpropitious quarter.
For killing the tigers on the hill
He's earned the official fee;
For the killing of a man he deserves
To be placed under lock and key.

Remember the man that watched the bird
That watched the praying mantis.
Now the best policy it seems is
Don't advertise your prowess.

When the headman and the others had accepted this proposal, Squire Cao went back home. He detained Iron Ox, plying him with wine and saying: "I'm sorry I had to leave you for a moment just now. Let me ask you to undo your belt and put down your halberd, please make yourself comfortable."
Iron Ox said: "Very well, but I'm afraid I lost my knife in the tiger's belly, I've only got the sheath now. If I need to cut anything I shall have to ask someone to lend me a knife."
"Don't you worry about that," said Squire Cao. "I've got plenty of good blades. I shall be happy to give you one."
Iron Ox took off his sword and his belt and gave them to a retainer to put away for him. He leant his halberd against the wall. Squire Cao called for a big platter of meat and a big jug of wine. The rich men and the headman, the hunters and all the rest drank many toasts with Iron Ox taking it in turns and using large bowls and cups. Squire Cao asked: "I wonder, would you prefer to deliver the tigers to the authorities and claim the reward personally, or would you rather just seek some form of recompense from us here?"
"I am just a traveller, passing through," Iron Ox said. "My time is valuable and just because I happened to kill this family of tigers there's no need to go to the government and ask for a reward. If you feel inclined to offer me something here, that will be quite all right; if not, I shall just continue my journey."
Squire Cao said: "We certainly don't want to hold you up. Just wait a little while, and we'll make a collection here in the village towards your travel expenses. We can take the tigers to the authorities ourselves."
"I would be grateful if you could provide me with some clothes, though, so I can change."
"Of course, of course," said Squire Cao. He produced a padded robe of fine black cloth so Iron Ox could change his blood-stained clothing. Then to the sound of drums and flutes, wine was brought. They all pressed Iron Ox to drink, a cup of warm wine, followed by one of cold. Not realizing that it was a plot, Iron Ox drank to his heart's content. He had completely forgotten Song Jiang's instructions. Within a few hours he was drunk as a lord and couldn't even stand on his feet. They carried him into an empty room at the back and tipped him onto a wooden bench. Then they took two ropes and tied him down. The headman was told to send messengers flying to the district office to report the matter. Li Gui's wife was sent along too to make an official statement from which an indictment could be drawn up.
There was great excitement in Yishui. The Governor, greatly concerned, went into session at once. "What have you done with this Black Whirlwind?" he asked. "This is a dangerous conspirator, we must not let him get away."
The plaintiff and the hunters said: "We've got him tied up at the house of Squire Cao, of this district. Since there's no one capable of subduing him, we were afraid something might go wrong and we might lose him on the way, that's the reason we didn't bring him with us."
The Governor sent for his sergeant of police. When the latter presented himself before the bench he barked out a salute. Who this was you can learn from the poem:

His face is broad, his eyebrows thick,
Thick as you've ever seen.
His beard and whiskers red, his eyes
Like a foreigner's jade green.
This is the famous Green-Eyed Tiger,
This is sergeant Li Yun.

The Governor sent for this Li Yun and told him: "They've got the notorious Black Whirlwind, alias Iron Ox, tied up in the house of Squire Cao at the bottom of Yiling Heights. Take plenty of men and bring him here secretly, but don't alarm the public or let him escape."
Green-Eyes left with his orders. He selected thirty experienced men, all well-armed, and hastened off to Yiling.
Now Yishui was only a small place. Nothing could long remain hidden there. Already the rumour was going round the market: "They've caught that Black Whirlwind who created such havoc in Jiangzhou. Green-Eyes has been sent to pick him up."
The Crocodile, who was staying with Zhu Fu's family outside the east gate heard this and rushed to the back room to tell his brother: "This black fellow has got himself into trouble again, how can we rescue him? It's precisely because Song Jiang feared he might get into trouble that he sent me to keep an eye on him. Now he's been caught how can I go back to the mountain fortress and face our leader if I don't rescue him? What are we going to do?"
Zhu Fu said: "Don't worry brother. But I tell you, this sergeant Li is a good fellow. He can hold his own against forty or fifty at once. Even you and I, supposing we made a concerted effort together, could not handle him. No, we've got to use our brains, not just brute force. Green-Eyes and I are normally good friends, he has taught me some useful tricks in martial arts. So I know pretty well how we can deal with him, only I won't be able to stay here afterwards. Tonight we must get twenty or thirty catties of meat cooked, and order a dozen bottles of wine. The meat must be cut in big pieces and then we'll mix a drug in with it. Before daybreak we and some of the inn servants will carry it to a quiet place along the road and wait for them when they're bringing Iron Ox, to offer them wine. When the drug takes them we can rescue Iron Ox. How about that?"
"Great plan," said the Crocodile. "We mustn't waste any time. We must get it all set up and then be off."
Zhu Fu said: "The problem is, Green-Eyes doesn't drink. So even if we can drug him, he'll come round pretty quickly. And one more thing: when this business gets out, I won't be able to remain here."
The Crocodile said: "Listen brother, this inn of yours, you don't make much out of it, do you? Wouldn't it be better for you to get your family and go with me to the mountain? If you join the band you'll have gold and silver galore and as many clothes as you like, it's a great life! Tonight, get a couple of your chaps to look for a cart to take your wife and valuables off with instructions to wait by the tenth milestone so we can all meet up and go to the mountain. Now, I happen to have some of the drug here in my pack. If Green-Eyes doesn't drink, we'll drug his meat and get him to eat a lot. When he passes out we'll rescue Iron Ox and take him back, what's difficult about that?"
Zhu Fu said: "You're right." He gave orders for a cart to be found, made up several bundles and loaded them on the cart, abandoning the rest of his household goods, told his wife and children to get onto the carts and told two of his people to take them on ahead.
That night the Crocodile and Zhu Fu cooked the meat, cut it into big pieces and mixed in the drug. Together with the wine they made two loads of it, and also took along twenty or thirty cups. They even took a quantity of vegetables, also drugged. This was in case there were any who did not eat meat, in order to take care of them too. There were two inn servants carrying a load each. The two brothers took some fruit and nuts and they all set off well before dawn and stopped in a very quiet part of the road. When it was just beginning to get light they heard gongs in the distance. The Crocodile posted himself beside the road.
Now around the fourth watch a party of thirty or forty soldiers, who had been drinking in the village half the evening, brought Iron Ox out with his hands tied behind his back. They set off with Green-Eyes riding at the back. When he saw them coming, Zhu Fu stepped forward and barred the way, saying: "Greetings, Master! I want to invite you to take a break." He ladled out a jug of wine, poured some into a big cup and offered it to Green-Eyes. The Crocodile brought out the meat and the servants offered the fruit and nuts. Green-Eyes hurriedly dismounted, rushed forward and said: "My dear friend, you should not have gone to all this trouble."
Zhu Fu said: "It's just a little token of my respect."
Green-Eyes took the cup but did not drink.
Zhu Fu knelt and said: "I know you do not drink, Master. But this wine is in your honour, so please just this once taste half a cup."
Green-Eyes could scarcely refuse this invitation, so he made a show of taking two sips.
Zhu Fu said: "Since you do not drink, let me invite you to have some meat."
"I am still full from last night," Green-Eyes said. "I couldn't eat anything."
"You have travelled quite some way, you must be hungry. Even if you don't want to eat, please take just a little something, in order not to shame me." He selected two good pieces and proffered them. Seeing him so attentive, Green-Eyes reluctantly ate two pieces of meat. Zhu Fu now offered wine to the local magnates, the headman, the hunters and the rest, whilst the Crocodile went and invited all the soldiers and retainers. This lot didn't care whether it was hot or cold, good or not good, they simply guzzled all that was to hand. Like the wind sweeping away the scattered clouds or the river bearing off fallen blossoms, they made a clean sweep of it.
Iron Ox was watching all this. Seeing the Crocodile and his brother, he knew that there must be some plan, so he said: "Aren't you going to offer me any?"
"You're a criminal!" the Crocodile shouted. "Who'd give anything to you? A murderer like you, you'd do better just to shut your mouth!"
Green-Eyes looked at his men and was about to give the order to move off again, when he saw they were all gaping at each other, quite unable to move. Their lips trembled, their legs had gone numb. They stumbled and fell. "It's a trap," Green-Eyes started to shout, but when he tried to move he too felt his head sinking and his legs floating, and he crashed to the ground. He fell in a flaccid heap and lay there unconscious. The Crocodile and Zhu Fu each took a halberd, and shouting: "You're not getting away!" set upon those who had not yet eaten or drunk and other bystanders. The quickest escaped, those who were slow were killed on the spot.
Iron Ox now gave a great shout. He burst his bonds, grabbed a halberd, and was on the point of killing Green-Eyes. Zhu Fu hurriedly intervened, saying: "Don't harm him, he's my teacher, we're good friends. Just get out of here, quick!"
Iron Ox replied: "If I don't kill that old ass Squire Cao I shall never calm down." He rushed off, brandishing his halberd, and killed Squire Cao and Li Gui's wife. Then for good measure he killed the headman, and since he was now really aroused he slaughtered a crowd of hunters and the thirty or so soldiers. The others, retainers and onlookers, only wished their parents had given them more than two legs. They ran for their lives, fleeing down the remotest paths.
Iron Ox was still busy looking for people to kill. "It's nothing to do with innocent bystanders, stop killing them!" the Crocodile shouted, standing in his way. Only then did Iron Ox desist. From the bodies of soldiers he stripped off two pieces of clothing which he put on.
The three were now preparing to set off, halberds in hand, down the smallest paths. But suddenly Zhu Fu said: "This is not right. I have sentenced my teacher to death. What's he going to say to the Governor, when he recovers? He'll have to follow us. You two go on ahead, I'll wait for him. I can't forget the great kindness he's shown to me. He's always been fair and honest with me. I'll wait and ask him if he'll join us and go to the mountain to join the outlaws. It's my duty to do this. I don't want him to have to go back and face the music."
The Crocodile said: "You're quite right. Now, I'll go on ahead with the cart, but I'll leave Iron Ox here with you to assist you. Only remember, Green-Eyes didn't eat a lot, so he'll come round in less than a couple of hours. If he doesn't appear by then, don't insist on waiting for him."
"Of course we won't," Zhu Fu said.
So the Crocodile went on ahead. Zhu Fu and Iron Ox sat down by the roadside and waited. And of course in under 2 hours they saw Green-Eyes racing towards them, brandishing his halberd and shouting: "Stop, you scoundrels!" Iron Ox seeing him so furious, leapt to his feet, raised his halberd, and charged him, much to Zhu Fu's distress. Well, because of this, 2 more tigers were eventually added to the Marshes of Mount Liang and four heroes were honoured before the great assembly hall.

LI KUI had asked for the three conditions, and Song Jiang replied, "When you go to Yishui County, in Yizhou Prefecture, Shandong province to bring your mother here you must not drink wine on the way. That is the first condition. Secondly, you must go by yourself, because you have a hasty disposition and I am afraid that nobody wants to go with you. Thirdly, you must not take those axes with you, and on the way you must be discreet, and quickly get back here."
"I can easily comply with those conditions," said Li Kui. "You need not worry. I should like to leave today." On that day he got his baggage ready, armed himself with swords. He took one large ingot, and about five small pieces of silver. He drank a few cups of wine, took leave of his companions, and then went down the hill and across the lake.
After his departure the leaders were assembled in the main hall when Song Jiang spoke, "I am afraid that our younger brother Li Kui will get into trouble. I do not know whether there is any man here from his village. If so he might follow him, and report to us what happens on the way."
"Zhu Gui comes from the same village as Li Kui," said Du Qian.
"I had forgotten that," said Song Jiang. "Of course they recognized each other as such at the Bailong Temple near Jiangzhou." He immediately sent a man to summon Zhu Gui, and soon the latter arrived from his inn.
"Our brother, Li Kui, has just gone to Yishui County to bring his mother here. No man was sent to accompany him on account of his bad temper when drunk. I understand that you are from his native district, and therefore I should be glad if you would follow him, and watch what might happen to him."
"I am a Yishui County man," said Zhu Gui. "I have a younger brother who keeps a wine shop in that town just outside the West Gate. This man Li Kui lived near a village called Baizhang in that district. He has an elder brother named Li Da who is in regular employment. Li Kui is a fierce and stupid man. Some time ago he committed murder at his village, and had to leave home, and dared not return. I have no objection to follow him, and look after him, but who will look after my inn while I am away? I have not been home for a long time, and should very much like to meet my brother again."
"You need not worry about your inn as I will send Hou Jian and Shi Yong to look after it during your absence," said Song Jiang.
This was all arranged, and Zhu Gui started off on his way to Yishui County.
Li Kui traveled by himself, and duly reached his destination. He had stuck to the conditions laid down by Song Jiang, and had not taken any wine on the way. At the West Gate he saw a big crowd of men reading a proclamation posted on the wall. He entered the crowd and listened to a man who was reading the proclamation for the information of the illiterate crowd. It read as follows: "(1) There is a thief called Song Jiang of Yuncheng County; (2) Also a jailer named Dai Zong, from the prison at Jiangzhou; (3) Also another thief named Li Kui, of Yishui County." As soon as he heard his own name Li Kui got excited, and did not know what to do when a man embraced him saying, "Elder brother Zhang, what are you doing here?" Upon looking at the man he recognized him as Zhu Gui, the "Dry Land Crocodile," and asked, "And what are you doing here?"
"Come with me and we will discuss matters," said Zhu Gui. They went together outside the town, and stopped at an inn in a small hamlet, where they entered a small room at the back of the premises.
Zhu Gui pointed at Li Kui, "What a nerve you have! That proclamation was offering a reward of ten thousand strings of cash for the arrest of Song Jiang; five thousand strings for Dai Zong, and three thousand strings of cash for your arrest. Why did you stop there looking at such a notice? Should any man recognize you you would be arrested at once. Song Jiang was afraid that you would get into trouble, and sent me here to watch over you. I left the mountain a day after your departure, and arrived here a day before you. What has delayed you?"
"It is due to Song Jiang ordering me not to drink wine," said Li Kui. "I walked slowly because of that. Do you know anyone at this inn? Where is your home in this place?"
"This inn belongs to my younger brother, Zhu Fu, and I used to live here. I was once a merchant, but lost all my capital, and so went to Liangshan Marsh. I have not been here since that time." He called for his brother, and introduced Li Kui to him. Zhu Fu then brought in some wine and invited them to partake of same.
'Our elder brother gave me an order not to drink wine," said Li Kui. "But as I am no longer on the road and have reached my destination, I may drink two cups of wine now."
Zhu Gui raised no objection to this, and they stayed eating and drinking there until nearly 2 A.M. It was a bright moonlight night and Li Kui wished to go, but Zhu Gui said, "You had better avoid the byroad, but turn round to the east when you come to a clump of trees and that will bring you to your home at Baizhang Village. You must bring your mother here, without delay, and we will set off at once for Liangshan Marsh."
"I will go along the byroads, and will lose no time," replied Li Kui.
"By that unfrequented road there are tigers and also bandits," said Zhu Gui.
"What am I afraid of?" asked Li Kui. He then armed himself with his two weapons, and left the two brothers. When he had gone about three //it was getting daylight, he saw a hare leap out of the grass at the side of the path, and race off along the road. He pursued his way, and in about two //came to the clump of trees, with leaves of red autumn tints. As he turned round the trees he met a big man who shouted, "You will be aware that if you pay us money we will not interfere with your baggage."
The man wore a coat of rough cloth and had a red silk turban. His face was sallow, and he held an axe in each hand.
Li Kui shouted, "Who are you that dare commit highway robbery here?"
"If I told you my name you would be frightened. I am called the 'Black Whirlwind.' If you pay our toll we will spare your life."
Li Kui laughed loudly, "How dare you use my own name in this way? Who are you, and where do you come from, you barefaced rascal?" He took his halberd and advanced towards the man.
The man saw that he had a very strong opponent and tried to retreat, but Li Kui struck him with his halberd so that he fell to the ground. Li Kui put his foot on the man's breast and asked, "Do you know me now?"
The man on the ground said, "Please forgive me, sir."
"I am Li Kui, the 'Black Whirlwind.' Why do you use my name in this way?"
The man replied, "My name is Li, but I am not the 'Black Whirlwind.' You have a great name, and if I use it people are afraid of me. It was because I found out the power of your name that I became a highwayman. I only stop single individuals, and as soon as they hear your name they drop their baggage and run away. I do not kill people, and yet I make a little profit. My name is Li Gui, and I live at the village a little up the road."
Li Kui said, "You are a real prick. You seize traveler's baggage, and also carry axes in both hands like me, so that you injure my reputation. You can taste one of my axes," so saying he seized an axe out of the man's hand.
Li Gui , called out, "Sir, if you kill me you will kill two persons."
"How do you make that out?" asked Li Kui, staying the blow.
"At home I support my mother who is ninety years of age, and this is my only means of helping her in her old age," said Li Gui. "I never injure people, but only make them afraid. If you kill me, my old mother will die of starvation."
Li Kui who never twinkled his eyes in chopping off people's heads, paused and thought when he heard this. "Here am I trying to succour my old mother, and yet killing a man who supports his old mother. Heaven will not allow me to live if I do this. No! No! I will forgive this man." He took his foot off Li Gui, who saluted him.
"I will let you off," said Li Kui, "but in future you must not make use of my name."
"As you have spared my life," said Li Gui, "I will give up this kind of life and earn an honest living in some other way."
"You are a filial son," said Li Kui, "so I will give you ten taels of silver to enable you to start a business." He did this, and then went on his way.
Li Kui could not help laughing. "That fellow was quite in my hands, and yet I have started him on a fresh life." He walked on, and about 10 A.M. he was both thirsty and hungry. The footpath was quite isolated without a single house within sight. But after going some distance he saw two small straw huts a long way off. He went towards the huts, and when near he saw a woman come from behind the hut. She had a flower in her hair, and was well rouged. He spoke to her, "Sister, I am a traveler, and cannot come across an inn. I am very hungry. If you can supply me with food and wine I will pay you well."
The woman dared not refuse this when she saw the build of Li Kui. "I have no wine, but can find you a little food."
"That will do," said Li Kui. "Let me have a good meal as I am damned hungry."
"Will a peck of rice be enough?" she asked.
"Three pecks would be better."
The woman took the rice, washed it in the stream, and then boiled it. While she was doing this Li Kui went to the back of the house to relieve his bowels and there saw a man trudging along. Just then the woman came out of the back door to get some vegetables, and she asked the man, "What is the trouble with your leg?"

"You very nearly saw the last of me," replied the man. "Of all the damned luck. I went to that place, and waited nearly a fortnight for a traveler to pass, but there was nothing doing. Today, however, a traveler arrived, but do you think who it was? It was Li Kui, the REAL 'Black Whirlwind'! Of all people it had to be that donkey's prick. He knocked me down with a blow of his halberd, and intended to kill me. But I deceived him by saying, 'If you kill me, you will kill two.' He asked me for an explanation, and I told him falsely that I had an old mother at home who depended on my support. If I was killed she would die of hunger. The fool believed me, and spared my life. He even gave me money to turn over a new leaf. So when he let me go I did not come straight here as he might have found me out, but instead I went up the hills and made a long detour."
"Don't talk so loudly!" the woman said. "A man came here, and asked for some food and it may be the same man. He is sitting outside the front door. You go and have a look at him. If he is the same man then go and get some drug to put in his food, and when it takes effect we can kill him. We can then get his money, which will enable us to live in the town and enter into trade—much better than being mere highwayman here."
Li Kui thought, "What a rascal! I spared his life, and even gave him money, and yet he plans to kill me. Heaven cannot allow such man to live!" He went round the corner to the back door where they were talking. As soon as Li Gui saw Li Kui he tried to escape, but Li Kui seized hold of him. The woman saw this, and went through the house to the front door. Li Kui knocked Li Gui on the ground, and then taking his sword cut off the man's head. He then went inside the house to seize the woman, but she had disappeared. He however searched in the rooms, found the place where they kept the money and woman's ornaments, and he took these. He noticed that the rice was well boiled, but there were no vegetables. Li Kui thought, "There's perfectly good meat here!", and cut off two pieces of meat from Li Gui's leg and roasted them over the stove, eating as he cooked. When he had eaten enough, he placed the corpse in the house and set the whole place on fire. He then continued on his way, and reached his village of East Dongdian about 5 P.M. He soon found his home, pushed open the door and entered. His mother called out from her bed, "Who is that?" Li Kui saw that his mother was blind, and was sitting on the bed reciting her prayers. He called out, "Mother! Your 'Iron Ox' has returned!"
"My boy, you have been absent for a long time. Where have you been employed? Your elder brother works as a servant but the wages he gets are hardly enough to support us. I have often thought of you, and have weeped so much that I have become blind in both eyes. What are you doing now?"
Li Kui thought, "If I tell her that I am a brigand from Liangshan Marsh she will not go with me. I must tell her some fibs." So he said, "Mother. I am in government employment, and have come to take you away with me."
"Splendid! But how can I go?"
"I will carry you on my back to the road where we can find a cart."
"Well, wait until your elder brother comes, and then we will discuss the matter."
"Why wait?" asked Li Kui. "I am going with you."
Just then it happened that his elder brother Li Da entered the room carrying an earthenware jar containing rice for his mother. When Li Kui saw his brother he kowtowed and said, "Brother, I have not seen you for years."
Li Da spoke abusively, "Why have you returned? Much trouble you will bring here again?"
His mother answered, "Your brother is now in government employment, and has specially come to take me away with him."
"Mother! Don't believe his farts," said Li Da. "Some time ago he killed a man, and I was arrested, and wore a cangue for it. I have had much suffering for him. I have heard that he has joined the brigands at Liangshan Marsh, and recently rescued some of them from an execution ground at Jiangzhou. A warrant is out for his arrest, and as they have not found him they wanted to arrest me. My master pleaded for me at the yamen, and said that my brother Li Kui left home ten years ago, and we have not heard anything of him since then. He thought that perhaps the bandits were using the name of Li Kui falsely. My master gave money to the officials at the yamen, and that is why they have not arrested me. A proclamation has been issued offering a reward of three thousand strings of cash for the arrest of my brother, Li Kui. Now, he returns home, and talks nonsense to you."
"Do not worry," replied Li Kui. "How would it be if we all went to Liangshan Marsh, and had a good time there?"
Li Da was angry at this, and tried to strike his brother, but was aware that he could not overcome him. He then threw the earthenware jar on the floor, and ran out of the room.
"He has gone to report my arrival," said Li Kui to himself, "so I must leave at once before they arrive to arrest me. My brother has never seen much money so I will leave fifty taels of silver on the bed for him. When he sees it he will not be so keen to witness my arrest." He did this and said, "Mother! I will now carry you on my back."
"Where are you going to?" she asked.
"You need not ask, anyhow it is a much better place than this," said Li Kui. He then lifted his mother on his back, and left the house with her.
Now Li Da had run and informed his master of the return of his brother, and soon came back with about ten farm laborers. When he entered the room he found nothing but a piece of silver on the bed. He then considered, "My brother has left this money for me. Where can he hide now? He may come with other men from Liangshan Marsh. If I try to overtake him I shall only get into trouble."
As the laborers could not find Li Kui they did not know what to do, but Li Da told them, "My brother has evidently gone, and carried off my mother. There are many byroads about here, but how can we find which way he has gone." The men saw that Li Da did not know what to do so after a rest they all returned to the farm.
Li Kui, carrying his mother on his back, chose the quietest paths, and towards evening arrived at the foot of a range of mountains. He recognized the place as Yiling, and knew that if he crossed the range there were farmhouses on the other side. The moonlight was bright, and he had no difficulty in slowly ascending the mountain path. His mother asked him to find some water as she was quite thirsty, and Li Kui assured her that as soon as they had crossed the mountain he would find a house where they could rest and get food. His mother replied that at the last meal she had had only dry rice without any liquid, and so was very thirsty. He replied, "My throat also burns like a fire, and my breath is like smoke issuing from my mouth. You wait until I get to the summit when I will have a look around for some water."
"I feel as though I must die. I am so thirsty," said his mother.
"I am getting very tired, mother," replied Li Kui.
When he reached the summit he put his mother down by the side of a big green boulder, and left his sword there, and went off to look for water. He soon heard the sound of running water, and after a few turns he came to a small stream. He had a good drink, using his hands as a cup, and then thought, "How can I carry some water to my mother?" He looked around on all sides, and at last espied a temple in the distance. He made his way there through the dense bushes. At last he reached the temple, and saw that it was called, "The Great Sage Temple of Sizhou." In front of it was a stone incense urn, and he seized hold of it with the idea of using it to carry the water. But the stone urn was one solid piece with the base, and he could not move it. At this he got angry and using his full strength at last rooted the stone out of the ground. He then lifted it, and broke the top part from the base on the stone steps leading up to it.
He carried the stone urn off to the stream where he thoroughly washed it, and cleaned it out with grass. He then half filled it with water, and carried it off in both hands. He followed the same way back, but had great difficulties in making his way with such an awkward load. When he reached the big green boulder, however, he was astounded not to see his mother although his sword was still there. He called out aloud for her, but there was no response. He became very anxious, as although he looked all around carefully he could find no traces or clue of her departure. But when he had gone a distance of about thirty steps he found the grass covered with blood. He trembled with fear now, but followed the marks. These at last brought him to a cave where he saw two tiger cubs inside eating a human leg. Shaking with anger he thought, "I came from Liangshan Marsh to take my mother, and carried her here on my back, but it seems that she has been eaten by the tigers." His mind was inflamed with passion, and his face glared with a fierce look—his moustaches standing out like porcupine's quills. Seizing his sword he slashed at the tiger cubs. They growled, showed their teeth and claws as they reared on their hind legs, and rushed at him. He killed one with a single cut of his sword, and the other cub retreated to the cave. Li Kui followed with sword in hand and killed the second cub. He then turned round and saw the tigress outside racing towards the cave. He said, "So you are the damned beast who has devoured my mother." He threw down his long sword, and took the dagger from his waist. The tigress stopped at the entrance, lashing its tail from side to side, and not having seen Li Kui, turned round facing outside. Li Kui jumped forward, and stabbed the beast in its rear, driving the dagger in to the hilt and penetrating its stomach—a mighty lunge typical of the rage that he felt. The tigress roared, and leapt away with the dagger sticking in her body, and galloped away. Li Kui picked up his sword and left the cave. As the tigress had galloped off wounded a strong wind sprung up, shook the trees as in a big storm. There is an ancient saying, "Clouds originate with dragons, whereas winds originate with tigers." At that spot the moonlight was quite bright, and suddenly there was a tremendous roar, and a tiger leapt forth. It rushed at Li Kui, who deliberately and without fear, slashed with his sword, and cut its throat as it sprang at him. The tiger feeling the pain, and finding breathing difficult, retreated a few steps, and then as it expired gave forth its last roar which sounded something like a landslide of half a mountain. Li Kui had now killed four tigers, and he now entered the tigers'den in the cave, looking carefully to see whether there was still another one. Having found nothing there and being tired, he made his way back to the temple, and slept there that night. The next day he collected the remains and torn clothing of his mother, and buried them behind the temple. He could not avoid crying while doing this. He felt very hungry now, and continued his way across the range of mountains. He soon met five hunters armed with crossbows and arrows. Li Kui's clothes were all covered with blood, and this sight startled the hunters. They asked, "Are you a guardian spirit of this mountain? How otherwise dare you cross the range?"
Li Kui thought, "I cannot tell them who I am because there is a reward offered for my arrest." So he replied, "I'm a traveler, and last night I was crossing the mountain with my mother. While I went to get some water for her a tiger attacked and ate her. So I found the tiger's den, and there killed two cubs, and afterwards two fully grown tigers. I slept last night in the Great Sage Temple and have just come from there."
"We don't believe that," cried the hunters. "How could one man kill four tigers? We might believe you killing two cubs, but to kill two fully grown tigers is really a big achievement. We have been beaten by the officials for not killing those two tigers. Those tigers have been on the mountains for a long time, and during the last five months nobody has dared go that way. We do not believe what you say! You need not try to humbug us."
"I do not belong to this district," said Li Kui. "Why should I humbug you? If you don't believe me then I will go and show you the dead tigers, and you can get them carried down the mountain."
"If this is true we shall be much indebted to you," said the hunters. They blew whistles, and soon about fifty men had assembled at that spot. They got poles and ropes, and then all accompanied Li Kui up the mountain. There sure enough they found the bodies of the four tigers, and carried them down the mountain. The hunters reported the matter to the head of the first village they came to, and they then all adjourned to the big house of the local wealthy man—Old Cao. This man was a clerk in the county yamen, and had made his wealth by extortion in his own village. He was disliked and also feared by his own neighbors. Yet he was always talking of loyalty and filial piety so that he was well known as a hypocrite. As soon as he heard what had happened he invited Li Kui into the hall where he asked for full details of the remarkable event. Aftert his had all been recited he asked for the name and home address of Li Kui.
"My name is Zhang," replied Li Kui, "but people generally call me 'Courageous Zhang.'"
"You are certainly courageous," said Old Cao, "if you had not a large gall you could not have killed four tigers." He then gave orders for a big feast to be provided in honor to the "Courageous Zhang."
It was soon known in the villages around that four tigers had been killed by one man and in no time the people were crowding into the village, and into Cao's house to see the tigers There they gazed at the great hero who was being entertained in the hall by Cao. Among the people was the wife of Li Gui, whose husband Li Kui had killed a few days ago. She had run away to her parents' home and when she heard the news about the tigers she followed the crowd. She recognized Li Kui and immediately returned home and reported the matter to her parents. They went at once to the village chief who was given to know that Li Kui was the criminal for whose arrest a reward had been offered. He secretly sent a messenger asking Old Cao to come and discuss a very urgent matter. When Cao received the message he decided not to tell Li Kui, but merely said that he wished to retire and change his clothes, but when outside the room he hurried straight off to the other village.
"This man who has killed the tigers," said the village chief, "is Li Kui, the 'Black Whirlwind' of Baizhang Village, and there is a summon out for his arrest."
"In that case you must make careful inquiries among the people, and make sure of the matter before we act. It will be an easy matter to arrest him when we are sure about his identity. If he is not the man then we should only make trouble by arresting him."
"There is a woman here, Madame Li, who recognizes him," said the chief. "He came to her house and later he killed her husband."
"As that appears to be conclusive," said Cao, "we had better entertain him at the feast, and then ask him whether he prefers to go to the magistrate and ask for a reward for killing the tigers, or whether he prefers to receive the reward in our village. If he objects to go to the magistrate for the reward we can assume that he is guilty. Then we must press him to take plenty of wine and get him drunk when we can easily tie him up. Then we can go to the magistrate's yamen and ask them to send a police inspector to arrest him and so there can be no failure."
The village chief agreed to this and made arrangements accordingly with his men. Cao returned home and there resumed his seat at the table with Li Kui. He said, "I hope you are not offended at my leaving you. Please make yourself quite at home. Loosen your dress and put your dagger at one side."
"I left my dagger in the belly of one of the tigers," said Li Kui, "and only have the scabbard here. When they cut the tiger open I hope they will find my dagger and return it to me."
"Never mind that!" said Old Cao. "I have a very good dagger here which I will present to you."
Li Kui thereupon took off the scabbard, and belt and handed them to a servant. Cao ordered a fresh supply of food and wine. The village chief, the hunters, and several other men were present at the feast, and they each in turn toasted Li Kui. During the feast Old Cao asked Li Kui whether he would prefer to receive the reward for killing the tigers at the magistrate yamen or in that village.
"I am only a traveler," said Li Kui, "and have hardly time to go to the magistrate. I just happened to kill the tigers on my way, and do not care to go to the magistrate. I will receive the reward here, but even if there is no reward I can leave without it."
"We do not care to treat you disrespectfully," said Cao, "so you must at least wait until we have collected the money to present you. We will send the tigers to the magistrate yamen."
"Could you first give me a change of clothing," asked Li Kui, "as these clothes are rather soiled."
Old Cao agreed to this and ordered a servant to bring a suit of blue cloth. Li Kui took the new clothes, and when he had changed he was met outside the door of the hall by many men who also wished to drink a cup of wine with him. One cup of wine was warm, another was cold, and so on. Li Kui did not suspect any plot, and drank freely with great joviality. He had now quite forgotten Song Jiang's order that he was not to drink wine. It was not very long before he was dead drunk. The men then removed him to a small empty room at the back where they stretched him on a bench, and then bound him to the bench with ropes. The village chief then sent urgent messengers to report the matter to the magistrate's yamen. He also had an accusation drawn up for Madame Li who accompanied the messenger to the yamen.
When the magistrate heard the report he was startled and asked, "Where has the 'Black Whirlwind' been arrested? We must not allow this rebel to escape!"
The messenger and the hunters told him that Li Kui was imprisoned in Old Cao's house in their village. They were afraid that he might escape, and did not dare to try to bring him to the yamen. The magistrate summoned Inspector Li Yun to the court, and instructed him to take a large body of policemen to Old Cao's house and arrest the prisoner Li Kui, the "Black Whirlwind." He was to exercise great care, and be sure that the prisoner did not escape.
Inspector Li Yun got together about thirty of his most trusted men, armed them and departed for the village. The county was only a small place so that everybody knew what was happening. Now the news soon reached the village on the east side of the town where Zhu Gui was living with his brother. Zhu Gui spoke to his brother, "That fellow Li Kui is evidently in trouble. What shall we do to save him? I was specially deputed by Song Jiang to come here, and watch the proceedings, Li Kui will be arrested, but if I do not save his life how can I go back and face our elder brother Song Jiang? What shall we do?"
"Do not get excited," said Zhu Fu. "This Inspector Li Yun is a skilled military man, and fifty men cannot rival him. You and I are no match against him although we worked together on the same plan. We must use strategy and not force. Now Inspector Li Yun is a close personal friend of mine, and every day he has been training me in the use of military weapons. I have a plan, but it will prevent our living in this place any more. We must boil about twenty pounds of meat and cut it up into large pieces and prepare about ten jars of wine. In both of these we must, mix some sleeping drug. About 4 A.M. we must start off with our assistants carrying the food and wine and wait in a quiet spot on the road for Li Yun. When he arrives we must offer him and his men the food and wine as a gift, and get them all senseless. Then we can release Li Kui and escape."
"That is a splendid plan," said Zhu Gui, "and we will get things ready at once."
"Inspector Li Yun does not drink wine," said Zhu Fu, "and as he will only take the drugged meat he will probably recover consciousness before the others. As soon as he finds out how we have deceived him it will not be safe for any of us to stay here."
"You are an innkeeper here," said Zhu Gui, "but you do not make much money. It would be better if you can go with me to Liangshan Marsh and join the brigands there, and get much money and new clothing and enjoy life generally. We can tell two of your servants to get a cart, load up your valuables with your wife, and send them on in advance to wait for us at a village called Shilipai."
"Brother, that is a good idea," replied Zhu Fu. He arranged matters accordingly, and it was not long before the cart had started on its way.
That evening the two brothers boiled the meat and mixed the drug in same. They also prepared the wine in the same way. The whole supply was made up into two loads, and they also took about thirty cups with them. The two servants and the two brothers divided the loads. They got away about 4 A.M. and halted when they came to a quiet desolate spot on the road. It was just dawn when they heard the sound of gongs approaching, and Zhu Gui went forward by himself to meet the party. It was Inspector Li Yun with his men escorting the prisoner Li Kui, the "Black Whirlwind," to the town. Inspector Li Yun was riding a horse in the rear of his party. As they came up to Zhu Fu he called out, "Sir, I request you to stop, and accept a little refreshment." He at once offered Li Yun wine while Zhu Gui passed round the meat. Upon seeing this Inspector Li Yun quickly dismounted and hurrying to the front spoke to Zhu Fu, "Friend, why have you come so far as this to entertain us?"
"I wish to give you a little comfort," replied Zhu Fu. He saw that Inspector Li Yun was not drinking the wine so he continued, "I am aware that you are a teetotaler but I particularly request you to take a little liquor this time."
Inspector Li Yun did not like to refuse this pressing offer so he took a few sips. Zhu Fu then pressed him to take a little meat, but Inspector Li Yun declined this as he said he had had a big dinner last night.
"But you have a long way to go," replied Zhu Fu, "and you will be hungry before you reach your destination. Please take a little at least and so save my face with your men."
Here again Inspector Li Yun did not like to cause annoyance by declining the offer, so he ate some of the meat. All the policemen also partook of the wine and the meat, and Zhu Gui even offered it to all the villagers who were following the party. Without making inquiries as to whether it was hot or cold they all set to and had a good feed. They all took it in a happy-go-lucky style and no questions were raised.
Li Kui seeing Zhu Gui and his brother knew that this was some trick so he said, "Are you not going to give me some of this stuff?"
"Why should we? You are only a mere criminal," replied Zhu Gui. "You had better shut your mouth as you have not long to live."
Just then Inspector Li Yun saw that his men were looking at each other stupidly and could not move so he exclaimed, "We have been fooled by a ruse." He tried to move, but instead he also fell down and was soon asleep.
Zhu Gui and Zhu Fu seizing their halberds now shouted out, "Let no man depart!" Some men however tried to get away, but they were soon caught and killed on the spot. Li Kui seeing this burst asunder the ropes and taking a halberd went up to Inspector Li Yun to kill him. But Zhu Fu stopped him, "Do not kill him! He is my teacher, and is an extremely good man."
"Then let me at least kill that ass, Old Cao," said Li Kui. He went forward and found Old Cao and the wife of Li Gui, he killed both of them. He also killed the hunters, the vilage chief, and all the soldiers. He then stripped a soldier of his uniform and put it on himself. The three men then left the scene by a small side path. But Zhu Fu soon stopped and said, "How can I leave like this? Inspector Li Yun was my teacher, but how can he face the magistrate alone when all his men have been slaughtered? He must come to pursue us when he recovers consciousness, and I will wait for him and suggest to him to escape with me and join the bandits at Liangshan Marsh."
Zhu Gui said, "Younger brother, what you say is quite true. I will go forward and join the cart. Li Kui will stop here with you and wait for him. But if Inspector Li Yun will not come with you then you must not insist on waiting for him."
"I agree," said Zhu Fu. Zhu Gui then departed.
Zhu Fu and Li Kui sat down and after about 2 hours they saw Inspector Li Yun rushing towards them with a halberd in his hand and shouting, "You brigands shan't escape." Li Kui saw that Inspector Li Yun was furious and fearing that he might strike Zhu Fu, stood up, with his halberd to fight with Inspector Li Yun.

Mount Liang Marsh gains 2 tigers,
And welcomes and fetes 4 men.

142

The Happy Elegant Panther/Leopard Meets Magic Messenger Dai Zong on a Narrow Road in Byway Path; Morbid Sick Guan Suo Yang Xiong Meets Madcap Shi Xiu on an Avenue in the Big Street

Li Kui and Li Yun fought 6 or 7 rounds, with neither besting the other. "Stop," cried Zhu Fu, separating them with his halberd. "Listen to me." The contestants paused.
"Teacher, please hear me," he said to Li Yun. "You have been much kinder to me than I deserve, and have instructed me in lance and staff. I am very grateful. The problem is my brother Zhu Gui is one of the chieftains on Mount Liangshan. He was ordered by his leader Song Jiang the Timely Rain to look after brother Li Kui here. You were taking him to the authorities. How could Zhu Gui go back and face Song Jiang? We had to play that trick on you. Brother Li Kui wanted to finish you, but I wouldn't let him, and he killed only the soldiers. We were going to put ourselves a long way from here, but I guessed you couldn't return to the county office, and would have to come after us. I remembered how good you have always been to me, and decided to wait for you. Teacher, you're so intelligent. There's nothing you don't know. Today, scores of men have been killed and Black Whirlwind has escaped. How can you report back to the magistrate? You're sure to be put on trial, and there's no one to rescue you. Wouldn't it be better if you went with us up the mountain and joined Song Jiang's band? What do you say?"
Li Yun thought for several minutes. "Suppose they won't have me?" he finally said.
Zhu Fu laughed. "Surely you've heard of the Timely Rain from Shandong? He welcomes bold fellows from all over."
Li Yun sighed. "I've become a man without a home or country. Luckily I have no wife or children, so I don't have to worry about the authorities arresting them. I suppose I'll just have to go with you."
Li Kui chuckled. "Brother, why didn't you say that earlier?" He gave Li Yun a deep bow.
Since the constable had no family or property, the three men set out together after the cart. Halfway, they caught up with Zhu Gui, who was delighted. They had an uneventful journey. As they neared Mount Liangshan they were met by Ma Lin and Zheng Tianshou, who said: "We've been sent down to inquire about you. Now that we've seen you, we'll go back and report." The two scouts went on ahead.
The following day the four gallants, with Zhu Fu's family, arrived at Fraternity Hall in the stronghold on Mount Liangshan. Zhu Gui came forward and introduced Li Yun to Chao Gai and Song Jiang and the other leaders.
"This is Li Yun, a constable of Yishui County. His nickname is the Black-Eyed Tiger."
Then he introduced his brother. "This is my younger brother Zhu Fu. He's known as the Smiling Tiger."
Li Kui kowtowed to Song Jiang, and his two axes were restored to him. He related how he had taken his mother from Yiling, how she had been devoured by a savage beast, and how, because of this, he had killed four tigers. Tears coursed down his cheeks as he told his story. But when he went on to relate how he killed the robber who was masquerading as himself, everybody laughed.
"You killed four tigers," Chao Gai and Song Jiang said, smiling, "and today you are adding two live tigers to our stronghold. That calls for a celebration."
All the assembled bold fellows were pleased. Cows and horses were slaughtered and a feast was laid. Chao Gai gave the two newly arrived chieftains seats on his left, before Bai Sheng.
Wu Yong said: "Our fortress has become quite prosperous recently. Gallant men from everywhere are flocking to join us. This is due to the virtue of brothers Chao Gai and Song Jiang and is the good fortune of you all. Under these circumstances, we instruct Zhu Gui to resume control of his tavern east of the mountain, and let Shi Yong and Hou Jian return. Zhu Fu and his family shall be given a house to live in. Our fortress has many enterprises today. It's not like before. We're going to set up three more taverns. They will keeps tabs on what is going on outside, and aid fighters coming up and going from the mountain. If the imperial court sends out a bandit-catching force they can inform us. If the troops head this way, we can prepare.
"West of the mountain is a wide plain. Tong Wei and Tong Meng will go there with a dozen men and open a tavern. LiLi with another dozen will open a tavern to the south, Shi Yong with the same number will set one up to the north. All will build pavilions overlooking the water and prepare signal arrows and boats to ferry men across. Any military activity, urgent or otherwise, they will report at once.
"Before the mountain we shall build three large gates, and Du Qian will be in charge. He is excused from all other duties and is not to leave his post. Tao Zongwang will supervise all labor—the digging of ditches, channels and canals, repairing the walls and ramparts, the building of a large road in front of the mountain. He originally was a farmer and he knows about these things. Jiang Jing will be in charge of the granary. He'll check everything that goes in and out, and keep accounts. Xiao Rang shall issue all documents and passes for movement within and outside the fortress, up and down the mountain, and through the three gates, and the identifications of chieftains, big and small.
"We'll trouble Jin Dajian to carve all necessary troop tallies, document seals, and stone plaques. Hou Jian will look after clothing, armor, pennants and flags. Li Yun will be in charge of buildings and halls. Ma Lin will surprise the construction and repair of fighting ships, large and small. Song Wan and Bai Sheng will fortify and defend the Shore of Golden Sands. Stumpy Tiger Wang and Zheng Tianshou will do the same at Duck's Bill Shore. Mu Chun and Zhu Fu will receive all money and grain coming into the fortress. Lu Fang and Guo Sheng will take charge of the rest chambers in the two wings on either side of Fraternity Hall. Song Qing will arrange all banquets."
For the next three days everyone fasted. No need to say more. It was a time of peace for Liangshan Marsh. The men trained daily, practicing their military arts. On the water, the chieftains taught navigation and swimming, and fighting aboard ships. Of that no more need be said.

*

One day Song Jiang was chatting with Chao Gai, Wu Yong and the other leaders. "We brothers are all here together," he said. "But Gongsun still hasn't returned. I thought a hundred days would be plenty for him to see his mother and teacher in Jizhou. His time is long since up and we have no news of him. Can he have broken his promise to us? I wish brother Dai Zong would find out what's happened, and why he hasn't come back."
Dai Zong said he would go. Song Jiang was very pleased.
"Only you can travel so quickly. We'll be expecting news from you in ten days."
Dai Zong bid them all farewell. Early the next morning, disguised as a lieutenant of the Imperial Guards, he left Mount Liangshan for Jizhou. He tied the four charms to his legs and performed his magic ritual. On the road he ate only vegetables and vegetable soups. In three days he reached the border of Yishui County. He heard a man say: "A few days ago Black Whirlwind got away and many people were killed. It seems Constable Li Yun was involved. No one knows where they've gone. They still haven't been taken."
Dai Zong smiled coldly.
While travelling that day he observed in the distance a man coming towards him, a lance of hollow iron alloy in his hand. The man halted when he saw how rapidly Dai Zong was moving.
"Marvellous Traveller!"
Dai Zong peered at the person who had hailed him. Standing in a path on the slope was a big fellow with a round head and large ears, a straight nose and a square mouth, fine brows and wide-set eyes, a narrow waist and broad shoulders.
"We haven't met, sir," said Dai Zong. "How do you know my name?"
"Then you truly are the Marvellous Traveller?" The man cast his weapon aside, dropped to his knees and kowtowed.
Dai Zong hastily raised him up and returned the courtesy. "What is your name, sir?"
"I'm called Yang Lin, from the prefecture of Zhangde. Mainly, I live outside the law, and I'm known in the gallant fraternity as the Elegant Panther. Several months ago I met Master Gongsun Sheng in a tavern on the road. We drank together and he told me how chieftains Chao Gai and Song Jiang on Mount Liangshan welcomed bold men, how loyal and fine they are. He wrote a letter on introduction for me and urged me to take it to the fortress. I didn't think myself worthy, but Master Gongsun said: 'At Lijia Entry is a tavern run by Zhu Gui. He gets men across who want to join the band. The recruiting officer who reports new arrivals to the leaders is Superintendent Dai. He's known as the Marvellous Traveller. He can cover eight hundred li in a single day.' You walked so swiftly, I shouted your name, just to see how you'd react. I didn't dream it was really you. Heaven has willed that we should have this chance encounter."
"It's because of Master Gongsun that I'm on my way to Jizhou. I'm trying to get news of him. Chao and Song have ordered me to find out what's happened to him and bring him back to the fortress. I didn't expect to have the pleasure of meeting you."
"Although I'm from Zhangde, I've been to every shire in the prefecture of Jizhou. If you won't scorn my services, I'll be glad to take you around."
"I would consider myself fortunate. After we've found Master Gongsun, we'll go to Mount Liangshan together. There will be time enough."
Yang Lin was very pleased. He kowtowed to Dai Zong and pledged himself his blood brother. The superintendent removed his magic charms and the two continued on slowly. In the evening they rested in a village inn. Yang Lin treated Dai Zong to food and wine.
"When I'm performing my magic I'm not allowed to eat meat," the superintendent said.
They dined on vegetable dishes. The following morning they rose early, cooked breakfast and prepared to set forth.
"I'll never be able to keep up if you walk in your magic manner," said Yang Lin. "I'm afraid we can't travel together."
Dai Zong smiled. "I've a way to take people with me. I'll put two of the charms on your legs, perform the ritual, and you'll be able to walk just as fast. You can travel or halt whenever you like. Otherwise, you certainly wouldn't be able to stay with me."
"I'm just a common mortal. I don't have your spiritual qualities."
"That doesn't matter. Using my magic formula I can take with me anyone I want. I have only to perform the ritual and we travel together. If I stick to a vegetable diet, there's no problem."
He tied two of the charms on Yang Lin's legs and two on his own. Then he performed the ritual, blew on the charms, and they lightly set forth, moving rapidly or slowly, as Dai Zong saw fit. On the road they talked of deeds of the gallant fraternity. Although they proceeded in a leisurely manner, without being aware of it they covered a great deal of ground.
By late morning they arrived at a place surrounded by high mountains. In the middle was a post station for changing horses.
"This is Horse Watering Valley," said Yang Lin. "There used to be a big band of men on the tall mountain ahead. I don't know about lately. It's called Horse Watering Valley because it's so pretty here, with winding streams amid jade-green hills."
As they reached the foot of the mountain a clamor of beating gongs and pounding drums broke out. A hundred or two bandits emerged and blocked their path. Two big fellows in the lead, both carrying halberds, shouted at them: "Stand where you are! Who are you pricks and where are you going? Pay for a free passage, if you have any sense, and we'll spare your lives!"
Yang Lin grinned. "Brother," he said, "watch me knock off these louts." Twirling his lance, he sped forward.
The two big fellows advanced to meet his fierce charge. But as he drew nearer, the one in the lead exclaimed: "Don't make a move. Aren't you brother Yang Lin?"
Yang Lin halted. Only then did he recognize his adversary. The man, weapon in hand, bowed deeply and ordered his tall companion to do the same. Yang Lin called Dai Zong over.
"I'd like you to meet two brothers of mine," he said.
"Who are they? How do they know you?"
"This bold fellow, Deng Fei, is the one who knows me. He's from Xiangyang prefecture in the Gaitian District. Because of his red eyebrows he's known in the gallant fraternity as the Fiery-Eyed Lion. He is skilled with the iron chain weapon. When he flails it, no one can touch him. We operated together many times, but I haven't seen him in five years. I never thought I'd meet him here, today."
Deng Fei indicated Dai Zong. "Who is this brother?" he asked Yang Lin. "He's obviously no ordinary man."
"He's Dai Zong, the Marvellous Traveller, one of the bold fellows of Liangshan Marsh."
"Not Superintendent Dai of Jiangzhou, who can walk eight hundred li in a single day?"
"The same," Dai Zong acknowledged.
The two brigands hastily bowed and said: "We've often heard your great name. Who would have thought that today we could pay our respects?"
"What is the name of this gallant fellow?" asked Dai, indicating the second leader.
"Meng Kang, from Zhending Prefecture. He used to be a boat builder," Deng Fei explained. "He was constructing a large vessel to transport a load of marble. But the official in charge kept hurrying and persecuting him to such an extent that Meng killed him. He abandoned his family and fled to the greenwood where he became a robber. That was some years ago. Because he's tall and fair and powerfully built, he's been given the nickname the Jade Flagpole."
Dai Zong was very pleased.
The four chatted a while and Yang Lin asked: "How long have you two been together?"
"Over a year," said Deng Fei. "Six months ago we met another brother, Pei Xuan, a scribe from the prefecture of Jingzhao. Highly competent at writing complaints, honest and intelligent, he's a man who would never commit the slightest wrong, and was known locally as Ironclad Virtue. He's also skilled with weapons and has more than his share of cleverness and courage. But the imperial court appointed a corrupt prefect to Jiangzhao who framed him and ordered that he be exiled to the island of Shamen. As he was passing through, we killed his escort and rescued him, and he took refuge with us. We formed a band of nearly three hundred. He's excellent with a pair of swords, and since he's the eldest among us, we've chosen him our leader. Won't you come up to our humble stronghold and meet him?"
Deng Fei instructed his men to bring horses. Dai Zong and Yang Lin removed the charms from their legs and swung into the saddles. The party started up the trail. Before long they reached the fortress, where they dismounted. Pei Xuan, who had already been informed, hastened down the steps to greet them.
Dai Zong and Yang Lin looked at him. He was indeed a handsome man, fair complected, stout, with a calm, steady manner. The two were very pleased, and Pei Xuan invited them into the meeting hall. After courtesies were exchanged, he placed Dai Zong in the seat of honor. Then Yang Lin, himself, Deng Fei and Meng Kang were also seated, in that order. Hosts and guests later joined in a feast, and drank to the accompaniment of fifes and drums.
Dai spoke of the recruitment program of Chao and Song, and how they welcomed bold men from all over. He told of their kindness, virtue and benevolence, and their many fine qualities, of how harmony prevailed among the chieftains, of the eight hundred li of territory controlled by Mount Liangshan, of the strength of the fortress walls and ramparts, of the misty waters that surrounded them on every side. He explained how, with their large force of men and horses, they had no fear of attack by government troops.
"We have a mountain stronghold here too," said Pei Xuan, "and about three hundred horses. Our wealth would fill ten carts, not counting our grain and fodder. We've also nearly five hundred men. If you don't scorn us as too inferior, brother, I wish you would take us to your big fortress and let us join your band. Perhaps we could make some puny efforts that would be of use. How does my idea strike you?"
Dai Zong was delighted. "Chao and Song are very straightforward in their dealings with people," he said. "If we can get the assistance of you gentlemen it will be like adding flowers to embroidery. Since you've decided, please pack your belongings. When Yang Lin and I come back from seeing Master Gongsun in Jizhou we'll all disguise ourselves as government troops and march through the night."
Everyone was pleased. They drank until they were mellow, then removed to the pavilion on the rear slope overlooking Horse Watering Valley, where they continued drinking and admired the scenery.
"How beautiful," said Dai Zong. "Lovely and secluded. How did you two happen to come here?"
"Originally this was the lair of a few worthless varlets," said Deng Fei. "We simply took over."
They all laughed. The five soon were very drunk. Pei Xuan performed a dance with his two swords. Dai Zong was fulsome in his praise. The visitors spent the night in the stronghold.
The next morning Dai Zong and Yang Lin announced they were leaving. None of the entreaties of their three hosts could persuade them to remain. The brigand leaders saw them off down the mountain and returned to the fortress. They began packing and getting ready to move. Of that we'll say no more.
Travelling by day and resting at night, Dai Zong and Yang Lin soon reached the outskirts of Jizhou Town. There they put up at an inn.
"Brother," said Yang Lin, "Master Gongsu is a student of Taoism. He's probably in some mountain grove. He wouldn't live in town."
"You're right," Dai Zong agreed.
They walked around the outskirts of Jizhou, inquiring about Master Gongsun, but no one knew him. They went back to the inn. The next morning they tried more distant villages and market-places, again without any success. They returned to the inn once more.
"Could there be someone in the town who knows him?" Dai Zong wondered on the third day.
He and Yang Lin went looking in Jizhou. Every reliable person they asked said: "Don't know him. Are you sure he lives in town? He's probably in some famous mountain monastery in an outlying county."
They came to a large street. Further down, musicians were welcoming an approaching man. Dai and Yang stopped to watch. First came two prison guards. One toted colorfully wrapped gifts. The other carried bolts of satin and brocade. Behind, shaded by a black silk umbrella, walked a prison executioner. A fine figure of a man, he wore a gown of embroidered blue indigo. His long eyebrows extended into his sideboards, his eyes turned up at the corners, his complexion was pale brown, and he had a wispy moustache. He was a Henanese, and his name was Yang Xiong. He had come to Jizhou with a paternal cousin who had been appointed prefect, and had remained ever since. The prefect who succeeded his cousin also knew him, and made him warden of the town's two prisons, as well as the official executioner. Yang Xiong was a first-rate man with weapons, but his complexion was rather pale, and so he was nicknamed the Pallid.
To his rear another prison guard carried a sword with a demon's head hilt. They were returning from an execution, and friends, who had bedecked Yang Xiong with red ribbons and offered him their compliments, were seeing him home.
As the procession was passing Dai Zong and Yang Lin, a group of people, wine cups in hand, stopped it at an intersection. Seven or eight soldiers emerged from a side street, headed by a certain Zhang Bao, better known as Kick a Sheep to Death. He was part of the garrison guarding the town walls. His cronies were impoverished idlers from in and around the town who were always extorting money. Zhang had been reprimanded several times, but to no avail. It irked him that Yang Xiong, not a local man, should be feared and respected.
Now, seeing the Henanese showered with gifts, and himself backed by a gang of half-drunken knaves, he decided to vent his spleen. He pushed his way through the crowd of well-wishers at the intersection.
"My respects, Warden," he cried.
"Come and have a drink, brother," said Yang Xiong.
"It's not wine I want from you, but a hundred or so strings of cash!"
"Although I know you, brother, we've never had any financial dealings. How can you ask me for money?"
"You've squeezed plenty of riches out of the people today. Why not share some with me?"
"It's only that others wanted to give me a bit of face. I didn't squeeze anything. What are you trying to provoke? You're military and I'm civil administration. One has nothing to do with other."
Zhang Bao did not reply, but called to his men, who rushed forward and seized the gifts and brocades. "Mannerless rogues," shouted Yang Xiong, incensed, advancing to intervene. Zhang Bao clutched him by the front of his robe, while two scamps grabbed his arms from behind. The mass attack was too much, and the guards turned and fled. Yang Xiong, held powerless, could only fume, unable to break lose.
While all this turmoil was going on, a big fellow carrying a load of brushwood on a shoulder-pole approached. He saw the scoundrels holding Yang Xiong, and his sense of fairness was offended. He set down his load and pushed through the crowd.
"Why have you attacked the warden?" he demanded.

Zhang Bao glared. “Miserable wretch of a beggar, what business is it of yours?”
The big fellow was enraged. He lifted Zhang by the hair and flipped him to the ground. Before Zhang’s ruffians could come to his defence, one punch apiece from the big fellow sent them reeling. Yang Xiong, freed, brought his own skill into play. His fists flew like shuttles, knocking rascals flat left and right. Things looked bad for Zhang Bao. He crawled to his feet and scooted. The furious Yang Xiong pursued with large strides, Zhang following the men who had snatched the bundles, Yang Xiong chasing after Zhang. They disappeared into a lane.
The big fellow was still slugging away at the intersection. Dai Zong and Yang Lin watched in admiration. “Quite a man.” they said. “Truly ‘He sees injustice and leaps into the fray.’ ” They went up to him.
“Bold fighter,” they urged, “for our sakes, desist.” They hauled him into a lane, Yang Lin carrying his brushwood, Dai Zong holding his arm and guiding him into a tavern. Yang Lin set down the load and followed them inside. The big fellow clasped his hands together gratefully.
“Thank you, brothers, for getting me out of that predicament.”
“We two are strangers,” said Dai Zong. “While we admired your gallantry, we were afraid you might hit someone too hard and kill him, so we pulled you away. Please have a few cups with us. Now that we’ve met, let’s be friends.”
“You not only help me, you invite me to wine. It’s really not right.”
“ ‘Within the bounds of the four seas, all men are brothers.’ You mustn’t speak like that,” said Yang Lin. “Please be seated.”
Dai Zong urged him to sit at the head of the table, but the young fellow wouldn’t consider it. Finally Dai Zong and Yang Lin sat there and their guest seated himself opposite. They summoned the waiter. Yang Lin gave him two pieces of silver. “Never mind asking what we want. Just bring us anything that goes with wine, and put it all on one bill.”
The waiter took the money and left. He returned with vegetable dishes and various tidbits to consume while drinking. The three men downed several cups.
“What is your name, sir? Where are you from?” asked Dai Zong.
“I’m called Shi Xiu. My home is the prefecture of Jiankang, in Jinling. Since childhood I’ve been fond of weapons. Whenever I see injustice I feel I must lend a hand, so I’ve been nicknamed the Rash. I was travelling with my uncle, who was selling sheep and horses, but he died on the road, and I soon lost our capital. I couldn’t go home, and I remained here in Jizhou, selling brushwood for a living. Since you’ve honored me with your acquaintance, what I tell you is the absolute truth.”
“A certain matter has brought us here,” said Dai Zong, “and that has enabled us to meet you and witness your courage. But you’ll never prosper, selling brushwood. Why not join the gallant fraternity, and be happy the rest of your days?”
“I have some skill with arms, nothing more. How can I aspire to happiness?”
“In these times it doesn’t pay to be too proper. The addlepated emperor is kept in the dark by corrupt officials. My understanding wasn’t terribly clear, but on impulse I joined Song Jiang’s band in Liangshan Marsh. Now we all get fair shares of gold and silver, and receive whole sets of clothing. Sooner or later the imperial court will declare a general amnesty and we’ll all be given official posts.”
Shi Xiu sighed. “I’d love to go, but I don’t know how to get in.”
“If you really would like to join, I could write you an introduction.”
“May I have the temerity to ask you two gentlemen your names?”
“I am called Dai Zong. and this brother is called Yang Lin.”
“Not the Marvellous Traveller, famed among bold men?”
“I am that humble person,” Dai Zong acknowledged. He told Yang Lin to take ten ounces of silver from their bundle and give it to Shi Xiu for his business.
Shi Xiu had to be urged repeatedly before he would accept the money. Now that he knew who Dai Zong was, he was eager to talk about joining the band. But just then a search party was heard outside the tavern, making inquiries. Dai Zong and the other two looked. It was Yang Xiong and more than twenty policemen. They started coming in. Startled by the large number, Dai Zong and Yang Lin took advantage of the excitement to slip away.
Shi Xiu rose and greeted Yang Xiong. “Warden, where are you coming from?”
“I’ve been looking all over for you, brother, and you’ve been here drinking wine. Those oafs were holding my arms and I couldn’t go into action until you rescued me. I ran after them to get my packages and had to leave you behind. When these brothers saw me pummeling them, they pitched in to help, and I got my gifts and brocades back. By the time I returned, you were gone. Someone said ‘A couple of travellers pressed him to drink with them,’ and so we’ve been searching the taverns.”
“They’re from out of town, and they invited me to have a few cups. We were just chatting. I didn’t know you were looking for me.”
Yang Xiong was very pleased to have found Shi Xiu. “What is your name, sir?” he asked. “Where is your home, and what are you doing here?”
Shi Xiu related the same story he had told Dai Zong and Yang Lin.
“Where have the travellers gone?” asked Yang Xiong.
“They saw you coming in with a large party and thought there might be trouble, so they left.”
Yang Xiong spoke to the policemen, “Let the waiter bring two jugs of wine and give each of you men three large bowlfuls. Then you can leave me here. I’ll see you again tomorrow.”
The men drank and departed. Yang Xiong turned to Shi Xiu.
“You mustn’t treat me like a stranger. I imagine you have no relatives here. Let’s pledge each other blood brothers. What do you say?”
Shi Xiu was delighted. “May I ask your age, Warden?”
“Twenty-nine.”
“I am twenty-eight. Please be seated and accept my kowtow as your younger brother.”
Shi Xiu kowtowed four times. Yang Xiong was very pleased. He instructed the waiter to bring wine and tidbits and said to Shi Xiu: “Today we must drink till we’re good and soused.”
While they were indulging, Yang Xiong’s father-in-law, Master Pan, entered with half a dozen men. Yang Xiong rose.
“What are you doing here, father-in-law?”
“I heard that you were in a fight, and came to help.”
“Thanks to this brother, I was rescued. He gave Zhang Bao such a drubbing that the rogue’s afraid of his shadow. Shi Xiu and I have pledged each other blood brothers.”
“Excellent. Give these brothers who’ve come with me some wine.”
Yang Xiong ordered the waiter to serve them three bowls each. The men drank and left. Yang then asked his father-in-law to be seated at the side of the table. He himself sat at the head, with Shi Xiu opposite. The waiter poured the wine. Pan saw what a big, heroic type Shi Xiu was, and he liked his looks.
“My son-in-law won’t go wrong with you two helping each other,” he said. “No one will dare pick on him now as he goes about his official duties.” And he asked: “What is your line of business?”
“My father was a butcher.”
“Do you know how to slaughter?”
Shi Xiu laughed. “Of course. I was raised in a butcher’s family.”
“I used to be one, myself, but I’m too old. I’ve only this one son-in-law, and he’s an official. So I’ve had to give it up.”
The three drank until they were mellow, then had the bill added. Shi Xiu gave the tavern the brushwood to cover the wine bill. All went home with Yang Xiong.
“Wife,” he called, when they had entered the door, “come and meet your young brother-in-law.”
From behind the portiere a voice retorted: “Since when have you had a younger brother?”
“Don’t ask. Just come out.”
The door curtain was raised and a young woman emerged. She had been born on the seventh day of the seventh month, and she was called Clever Cloud. Formerly she had been married to a petty official in Jizhou prefecture named Wang. After two years, he died, and she married Yang Xiong. They had been husband and wife for less than a year.
Shi Xiu hailed her respectfully. “Sister-in-law, please be seated.” He dropped to his knees to kowtow.
“I’m much too young,” Clever Cloud protested. “How can I accept your courtesy?”
“I’ve acknowledged him my blood brother, today,” said Yang. “That makes you his sister-in-law. You may receive half the full obeisance.”
Like pushing a golden mountain, like a falling pillar of jade, Shi Xiu kowtowed four times. The young woman returned him two curtsies. He was invited into the parlour while a room was prepared, after which he was urged to rest. But enough of idle chatter.
The next day, as Yang was leaving for his office, he instructed his household: “Have clothes and headgear made for Shi Xiu.” He also told them to fetch his guest’s luggage and bundles from the inn.

As to Dai Zong and Yang Lin, on leaving the tavern they returned to their inn outside the town and rested, continuing their search for Gongsun the following day. But in the two succeeding days they met no one who knew him, nor had they the slightest clue as to where he had gone. After talking it over, they packed their luggage and left Jizhou the same day for Horse Watering Valley. There they rejoined Pei Xuan, Deng Fei and Meng Kang and their men, and all disguised themselves as government officers. They set out for Liangshan Marsh that same night.
Dai Zong made an impressive contribution, bringing such a large force of men and horses to the mountain. A feast was laid in celebration. Of that we’ll say no more.

Master Pan offered Shi Xiu a proposition. He said: “At the rear of a dead-end lane behind our house we have an empty building. There’s well water conveniently at hand. It would make a good butcher shop and you could live there and look after everything.”
Shi Xiu inspected the place. It was indeed an ideal spot. Pan found an old skilled assistant of his to do the heavy work. He said Shi need only keep the accounts. The young man agreed. He had the assistant decorate the tables, the tubs and the chopping blocks in black and green, sharpen all the knives and arrange the counters. Shi Xiu put the pig pens in order and drove in a dozen fat swine. On an auspicious day, he formally opened the shop. Neighbors and relatives arrived to offer congratulations and hang streamers of red. This was followed by two days of festive drinking. Yang Xiong and his family were happy to have Shi Xiu running the shop. Of this, there’s nothing much to be told. Pan and Shi did the buying and selling, and time passed quickly. Soon, two months had gone by. It was late autumn and the beginning of winter. Shi Xiu changed into brand new clothing, inside and out.
One morning, he rose at the fifth watch and went to another county to buy hogs. Returning there days later, he found the shop closed and the chopping blocks and knives all put away. Shi Xiu had a subtle mind. He was a man who kept his own counsel.
“As the old saying goes: ‘Good times don’t last forever, all flowers fade,’ ” he thought. “Brother is often away on official business and doesn’t bother about home affairs. Seeing that I’ve bought new clothes, sister-in-law must be saying things behind my back. And certain persons are sure to be spreading stories about me because I’ve been gone a couple of days. They’re suspicious of me, so they’ve closed the shop. Why should I wait for them to say it openly? I’ll just resign and go home. As the old saying goes: ‘Who wants to do the same thing all his life?’ ”
He drove the hogs into the pens, changed his clothes, packed his belongings, wrote out a detailed account, and entered the family house through the rear door. Master Pan had laid out a modest repast. He invites Shi to sit down and drink.
“You’ve had a long, hard trip, bringing in those hogs,” said Pan.
“I did no more than my duty, old sir. Here are my accounts. May Heaven strike me dead if I’ve kept a penny for myself.”
“What kind of talk is this? There’s no question about it.”
“I’ve been away from home six or seven years. It’s time I went back. I’m handing in my accounts. Tonight, I’ll take leave of brother and tomorrow morning I’ll depart.”
The old man laughed. “You’ve misunderstood. You must stay on. Let me explain.” Pan spoke only a few words. And as a result, in gratitude to his benefactor, a warrior with his three-foot blade dispatched a wicked monk to the depths of Hell.

Let me remind you now how Iron Ox levelled his halberd and charged Green-Eyes and there beside the highroad the two of them fought several bouts and neither had the advantage. Then Zhu Fu, known as Smiler, interposed his weapon to separate them, saying: “Cease fighting and listen to me!”
The two put up their weapons and Smiler said to Green-Eyes: “Hear me out, master. I know I have received from you more honour and love than I deserve, not to mention instruction in the use of spear and staff. How could I ever forget it? But you see, my elder brother, the Crocodile, has become one of the leaders in the Marshes of Mount Liang, and he was entrusted by Song Jiang, the Opportune Rain, with the task of looking after our friend Iron Ox here. Supposing our friend were arrested by you, how would my brother be able to go back and face Song Jiang? That’s why we had to drug you and rescue him. Iron Ox even suggested using this opportunity to finish you off but I wouldn’t let him, so he confined himself to killing some of the troops. We were about to make a clean getaway, when it occurred to me that you wouldn’t go back without giving chase. So remembering how kind you’ve always been to me, I waited for you here. Master, you’re smart, you know the score. A lot of your men have been killed and you’ve let Iron Ox, the notorious Black Whirlwind, escape. How could you go back and face the governor now? You’d be in deep trouble, and there wouldn’t be anyone to come to the rescue. Wouldn’t it be better to come with us to the mountain and join Song Jiang’s band? What do you say?”
Green-Eyes pondered this at some length, before saying: “Suppose he doesn’t want me?”
Smiler dismissed the objection with a laugh. “Surely you know about Song Jiang of Shandong, with his reputation for welcoming all kinds of good men and seeking the friendship of heroes?”
Green-Eyes gave a sigh and said: “I certainly seem to be in the position of having a home I can’t call my own and a country I can’t return to. The one consolation is that I have no wife and children, so I don’t have to worry about reprisals. I’d better go with you.”
Iron Ox was delighted. “Why didn’t you say so in the first place?” he exclaimed, honouring Green-Eyes with a bow.
Green-Eyes in fact had never married and had no family responsibilities or possessions, so right away the three of them set off together to join up with the cart. When he saw them coming the Crocodile was greatly relieved. All four now went on their way with the cart and nothing worthy of narrating occurred. When they were approaching the Marshes of Mount Liang, they met the Magic Flautist and Whitey, who said: “The two chiefs sent us down the mountain to seek news of you. Now we’ve found you we’ll rush back and report.” They did so, and the next day the four travellers together with Smiler’s family found themselves in the Assembly Hall of the stronghold on Mount Liang.
The Crocodile stepped forward and introduced Green-Eyes to the two chiefs and all the other leaders, saying: “This is Li Yun, otherwise known as the Green-Eyed Tiger, sergeant of the Yishui constabulary.” Then he introduced his brother, saying: “This is my own dear brother, Zhu Fu, otherwise known as the Smiling Tiger, or Smiler.” Iron Ox paid his respects to Song Jiang and his two axes were restored to him. He told the story of how he had taken his mother to Yiling Heights and how she was eaten by the tigers and he killed all four of them. He also told how the false Li Kui had tried to rob him and got himself killed, a tale which made everyone laugh. The two chiefs said: “You killed four fierce tigers, and now our stronghold has gained two living tigers. That cer~tainly calls for celebration.” Amid general rejoicing, goats and horses were slaughtered and a great banquet was held in honour of the two new leaders. Chao Gai then gave them seats on the left immediately above the Daytime Rat.
The Professor now spoke. “Recently,” he said, “our enterprise has prospered exceedingly. Our fame, it seems, is drawing good men to us here from all quarters. We must put it down to the quality of our two beloved leaders and to the good fortune of you all. Anyway, I would now like the Crocodile to take up the reins again at the inn, replacing Shi Yong the Guv and the Ape. A house should be prepared for Smiler and his family.
“Our activities have now expanded considerably. It is not as it was in the old days. I think we should set up three more inns to serve as listening posts and to direct good men who wish to join us. If the court sends troops out against us we will have news of their coming and will be able to prepare. Over to the west there is a broad plain. The two Tong brothers, the River Rider and the Cave Dragon, will take a dozen companions and open an inn there, whilst the Executioner will take a dozen to the south side of the mountain and open another, and the Guv will open one on the north. They are to set up the old system of the water pavilion and the signal arrow, backed up by boats, that word may be brought immediately if a military threat arises.
“On the approaches to the mountain we will build three new gates with Skyscraper in overall command of defence. That will be his sole responsibility and he will not be assigned any further duties, but he is to be on call day and night and not absent himself without cause.
“The Nine-Tailed Turtle will be responsible for digging canals and channels and maintaining the waterways, keeping open the access by water, and ensuring that the Place of Many Meanderings is in a proper state of repair. He will also be in charge of the main route up the mountain. Having been a farmer, he must be familiar with this kind of work.
“The Magic Calculator will be responsible for stores and provisioning, for keeping tabs on all our income and expenditure and maintaining proper accounts. Magic Hand will devise security passes for all who need to move within the camp or without, either on the mountain or in the world below, or to pass through the three gates. He will also register all the leaders, greater and lesser. The Craftsman will be so good as to engrave all the necessary identifications, seals, plaques and so on. The Ape will see to the making of clothing and armour and the various banners and pennants. Green-Eyes will supervise the provision of housing and halls for the fortress and the Magic Flautist will be in charge of the building of boats of every kind. The Door-God in the Clouds and the Daytime Rat will move down to the lower camp at Golden Sands Landing. Short-Arse and Whitey will move to the camp at Duck’s-Bill Landing. The younger Mu brother and Smiler will receive all incoming cash and provisions. The Little Duke and the Halberdier will supervise the rest chambers on either side of the Assembly Hall. Iron Fan will be in charge of banquets.”
When all the duties had been allotted, there was feasting for three days, but of this no more. Hereafter things were quiet on Mount Liang. Every day there was drill for the troops, together with martial arts instruction and demonstrations. In the waterside camps the leaders gave instruction in boatmanship, swimming and naval combat. We say no more of this.
Then one day Song Jiang happened to say to Chao Gai, the Professor, and the assembled company: “Here we are, all gathered here today, and there is just one person missing: Taoist Gongsun, of whom there is still no sign. I remember that when he left for Jizhou to visit his old mother and his teacher, he promised he would be back in a hundred days. It’s been a long time now and we’ve had no news of him; I hope he isn’t going to fail us and not return. I would like to ask the Magic Messenger to go and make inquiries for me, to find out if anything has happened to him and why he hasn’t come.”
Song Jiang was pleased when the Magic Messenger cheerfully agreed. “No one could go as quickly as you,” he said, “we’ll expect to hear news in ten days or so.” The Magic Messenger bade them all farewell that same day and left early next morning, disguised as an imperial staff officer. Then it was like this:
Though he goes as a soldier he commands no company of men. But to be a traveller is nothing new to him. His legs eat up the miles. As overseer of income and expenditure he carries a certificate hanging from a rattan cane; as commander of troops he carries a yellow scroll inscribed with orders. Three hundred miles from home, he needs but a day to return; in a military emergency, he’s there in a moment. In the morning he could still be in the far north eating gruel, by evening he’s in the south eating yellow pears.

So the Magic Messenger left Mount Liang and took the road to Jizhou. He fastened the four magic amulets to his legs and initiated his magic walking mode. On the way he paused only for an occasional cup of plain tea and some simple vegetarian fare. After three days he reached Yishui district. When he questioned the people there he was told: "That there Black Whirlwind were in action here t'other day, and he injured a mighty number of people and that Sergeant Li Yun, him as they call Green-Eyes, got mixed up in it. We don't know where he went to, but to this day he's not been caught." This caused the Magic Messenger some amusement. The same day, as he was proceeding on his way, a man appeared in the distance carrying a hollow-shafted steel spear. This character, when he saw the speed at which the Magic Messenger was travelling, stopped and cried out: "Ho there, Magic Messenger!"

The Magic Messenger glanced behind him and saw it was a big fellow, standing on a little path that ran across the hillside. He had a round head and big ears, straight nose and square-cut chin, finely arched eyebrows with the eyes set well apart, narrow waist and broad shoulders. The Magic Messenger turned right round now and said: "I've never met you before, how pray d'you know my name?"

The other answered immediately: "Then you really are the Magic Messenger!" He lowered his spear and prostrated himself. The Magic Messenger hurriedly raised him up and returned the compliment, then said: "May I know your name?"

"I am Yang Lin," the other replied. "I am from Zhangde. I have long frequented the greenwood, and the rivers and lakes fraternity call me 'Elegant Panther.' A few months ago at an inn I met Taoist Gongsun. We spent some time together, eating and drinking, and he told me all about Mount Liang, where the leaders Chao Gai and Song Jiang welcome good men. He wrote a letter for me and told me to go to the stronghold and join the company, only I didn't feel I could go just like that. However, he also said: 'On the road to Leeside there's an inn, it's been there for years, run by one Zhu Gui, the Dry Land Crocodile. All who want to join the stronghold are first received there.' And he told me there was a special messenger in the stronghold, Superintendent Dai, known as the Magic Messenger, who can do three hundred miles a day. When I saw you scorching along just now I gave you a shout, just to see. I didn't know it was really you. What an unexpected piece of luck!"

"It's precisely to look for Taoist Gongsun that I'm on my way to Jizhou right now," said the Magic Messenger. "We've had no news of him and the two chiefs have sent me to Jizhou to make inquiries and to find him and bring him back, so it's quite a coincidence, meeting you like this."

"Although I'm from Zhangde," said Panther, "I've covered every inch of this district of Jizhou. If you've no objection I'll come with you and show you around."

"I'll be delighted to have your services. When we've found Taoist Gongsun we can go straight back to Mount Liang together."

This was most satisfactory to Panther, and he asked the Magic Messenger to treat him as younger brother. The Magic Messenger put away his magic amulets and the two of them went on their way at a leisurely pace. At evening they found a village inn to rest in. Panther ordered wine and wanted to invite the Magic Mess~enger. The latter said: "I have to abstain when I'm in my magic walking mode." So they both ordered vegetarian food.

They were up early next morning, and having breakfasted and packed up they set off again. Panther asked: "If you're going to use your magic walking, how will I be able to keep up? I'm afraid it's not convenient for us to travel together."

"The magic walking will do for a companion too. I'll tie two of the amulets on your legs, and when I start the walking you'll go as fast as I do. When I go, you'll go and when I stop, you'll stop. Otherwise you certainly couldn't keep up with me."

"But I'm just made of ordinary flesh and blood, I haven't got your spiritual powers."

"It doesn't matter," said the Magic Messenger. "In the magic walking mode I can take anyone with me. With the aid of the magic you'll go just like me. So long as I fast and abstain, there'll be absolutely no problem." So saying, he took the two amulets and bound them round Panther's legs. The other two he tied on himself. Then he performed the magic, blew lightly upon the amulets, and the two of them soared off, speeding up or slowing down all according to the pace set by the Magic Mess~enger. As they went they chatted about matters of the rivers and lakes, and although they proceeded so easily they covered a considerable distance without knowing it. Around midday they arrived at a place that was ringed with high mountains, a stage road running through the middle of it. Panther realized where they were and said: "Brother, this is the spot people call Waterworld. A formidable band of robbers used to frequent that mountain up ahead, though I don't know what it's like nowadays. They call it Waterworld because these slopes are full of winding streams and picturesque scenery."

Just as the two men were approaching the hillside, there was a sudden peal of gongs, drums and flutes and a hundred or more bandits rushed out and blocked their way, a couple of stalwarts at their head wielding halberds. "Halt!" they shouted. "Who the hell are you, and where do you think you're going? You'll pay the toll, if you know what's what, and make it snappy if you want us to spare your lives!"

"Just watch this, brother!" said Panther gleefully. "Just watch me flatten the stupid bastards!" He levelled his spear and charged.

Impressed by the ferocity of this onslaught, and with the benefit of a closer look, the more senior of the two shouted: "Hold your hand! Isn't it my friend Yang Lin?"

Panther recognized him. Putting aside his weapon, the first man stepped forward and paid his respects, and then bade his tall companion do likewise.

Panther said to the Magic Messenger: "Please come and let me introduce you to two friends."

"Who is this and how does he come to know you?" the latter asked.

"This is Deng Fei, from Xiangyang in Gaitianjun. Among the rivers and lakes, he is known as the Red-Eyed Lion, because of his bloodshot eyes. The way he handles an iron chain, no one can get near him! We used to be associates, but we parted five years back and I hadn't seen him since. What a surprise to meet him here today!"

Redeye asked: "Tell me please, who is this? He looks to be someone quite out of the ordinary."

"This is my friend Dai Zong, the Magic Messenger, from the company on Mount Liang."

"Would that be Superintendent Dai of Jiangzhou, who can do three hundred miles a day?"

"That's correct," said the Magic Messenger.

Both newcomers hastened to show their respect, saying: "We have often heard your name. We never expected to have the honour of making your acquaintance here today."

Here is a poem to describe this Redeye:

In his hometown the days he just idly wasted,
Until the joys of the vagabond life he had tasted.
Eyes bloodshot from many a cannibal feast,
Deng Fei is the name of this red-eyed beast.

"And may I know his name too?" the Magic Messenger said, indicating the second man.

Redeye said: "This is my friend Meng Kang of Zhending. He's an expert boat builder. One day he was supposed to construct a large boat for transporting marble but the official in charge gave him so much stick that he upped and killed him, so then he had to leave home and take refuge in the rivers and lakes and become an outlaw. That was a long time back. They call him 'Jade Flagpole,' because he's tall and pale, and held to be good-looking."

There's a poem to describe him:

Grasping the bow, he'll lead the charge,
Or build you a trim fighting barge.
This shipwright's name they Meng Kang call,
Or Flagpole, because he's white and tall.

This meeting was most pleasing to the Magic Messenger. As the four of them conversed, Panther happened to ask: "When did you two meet up?"

"I'll tell you," said Redeye. "It was over a year ago. Six months ago we met someone else in these parts called Pei Xuan, from Jingzhao. He was an officer of the district court and he's wonderfully skilled in drawing up legal documents. Being honest and clever and absolutely incorruptible, he's known round here as Sterling. He's also expert with spear and staff, a great exponent of fancy sword play and as brave as they come. But the court sent us a corrupt governor, who picked a quarrel with him and had him exiled to the island of Shamen. When they were passing here we killed his guards and set him free, so he agreed to join us. We've got a band of several hundred. Sterling is a great hand at fighting with two swords and since he's the senior of us we've made him our chief. I'd like you both to come to our stronghold now so you can meet him." With this he ordered his men to bring horses and invited the Magic Messenger and Panther to mount. Together they rode off towards the mountain stronghold.

They soon arrived. As they were dismounting, Sterling, who had been forewarned, hurried out to meet them at the bottom of the steps.

He was an imposing figure. He was pale and somewhat portly, and had a calm and steady manner. There's a poem for him:

In questions of law he knows what is right;
When his brush starts to move, the devils take fright.
To be just and unselfish he'll always aspire:
This sterling official is Pei Xuan the lawyer.

Sterling invited the two heroes into their assembly hall where courtesies were exchanged. The Magic Messenger was honoured with the first place, then Sterling, Panther, Redeye, and Flagpole in that order. They were entertained with a banquet and there was great feasting that day. You must understand, friends, that these were all members of the company of stars, destined to come together when the time was ripe. As the poem says:

For these heroes to meet there's a very good reason,
Each link of the chain its neighbour must seize on.
The founders of Han performed menial tasks,
So why think Mount Liang hasn't got what it asks?

Later, while they were all feasting, the Magic Messenger told them about the leaders Chao Gai and Song Jiang, how they welcomed good men, seeking the acquaintance of heroes from every corner of the empire; he told of their kindness, bravery and generosity and their many other good qualities. He told of the spirit of cooperation among all the leaders and of how secure was the territory of Mount Liang, a hundred leagues in circumference, with the Place of Many Meanderings and Duckweed Marsh in the centre surrounded by vast expanses of misty waters, and he told of the hundreds of troops and the system for raising the alarm if government troops should approach. The three from Waterworld were fascinated by all this. Sterling said: "We've a few troops of our own here too, three hundred or so, and something like a dozen cartloads of booty, as well as ample provisions and fodder. If you don't think it presumptuous, would you consider taking us to join the band on Mount Liang? We would like to offer our humble services. What do you say?"

The Magic Messenger replied with great satisfaction: "The two chiefs welcome every addition, you can stake your life on it. Obtaining your valuable services would be a real plus for us. If you're serious, why not get your things together and wait while Panther and I go and find Taoist Gongsun in Jizhou? Then when we come back with him we'll all disguise ourselves as government troops and march by night to Mount Liang."

Everyone expressed their satisfaction with this arrangement. There was much drinking, and later they moved to the Golden Pavilion so they could enjoy the Waterworld scenery while they continued their carousal. It was indeed beautiful:

A vast expanse of wild water, and all around it the dark blue hills. A number of ancient trees reflect the declining sun, shreds of coloured mist drift among distant peaks. Lonely are the empty fields, there are no children watching cattle here; it is cool at the old ferry, here no one comes to water their horses. There is nothing to be seen but the stockade the robbers have built to protect their camp, and the banners they have hung all about.

The Magic Messenger kept exclaiming: "What beautiful scenery, it's truly sublime! How did you two come here?"

Redeye said: "A pack of useless bastards used to hang out here, but we kicked them out," and everyone laughed.

The five of them were quite drunk that night. Sterling stood up and performed a sword dance, inspired by the wine. The Magic Messenger couldn't stop applauding. When evening fell they all went back to the stronghold to rest. The Magic Messenger and Panther insisted on leaving next morning and the other three, finding there was nothing they could do to make them stay, accompanied them down the mountain to see them off. After this they went back up and set about packing and preparing for their departure. Of this no more.

Meanwhile the Magic Messenger and Panther left the Waterworld stronghold and travelling from dawn till dusk were soon at the gates of the city, where they found themselves an inn for the night. Panther said: "Listen, Taoist Gongsun is a monk, so I assume he will be staying out in the wilds, at some remote little place; he won't be within the city."

The Magic Messenger said: "I'm sure you're right."

So the two of them first made inquiries outside the city, asking everywhere for news of Taoist Gongsun. But no one had heard of him. On the second day they went even further afield to ask, but still found no one who knew of him. They returned to their inn to rest. On the third day the Magic Messenger said: "Maybe there's someone in the city who knows him." So that day they started inquiring in the city. They asked a number of elderly people, but only got the answer: "Never heard of him. Reckon he's not from here. Perhaps he lives at a big temple out in the country, somewhere in the mountains maybe."

Now as they were walking along a certain main street, they saw in the distance a group of musicians greeting someone who was coming down the road. They stopped at the side of the road to watch. Two prison guards led the way, one of them carrying a number of brightly wrapped gifts, the other a quantity of satin and brocade. Behind them, shaded by a black silk umbrella, marched an executioner. This gentleman was a most impressive figure. He was dressed in an embroidered robe of indigo silk, had thick eyebrows stretching right to the temples, slanting eyes and a yellowish skin, and a few whiskery hairs on his chin. He was in fact from He'nan and his name was Yang Xiong. He had come here with a cousin who had been appointed governor and he had remained ever since. The next governor to be appointed was also his friend and made him warden of the two prisons, with the additional duty of serving as the city executioner. Because he was extremely skilled in martial arts and because of his unhealthy complexion, people called him the Morbid Swordsman. There is a poem which details his qualities:

His arms are adorned with carved stones of varying hues, his turban ring elegantly set with gems. Jade hibiscus flowers are stuck in the long hair at his temples. His vest displays his rank of executioner, his robe is dyed scarlet. At an interrogation he officiates with confident skill, his axe bites like the wind. His complexion is a shade yellow, his eyebrows are bushy. This is Yang Xiong, whom men call the Morbid Swordsman.

Well then, this Morbid was marching along amid his followers, a prison officer behind him bearing a blade with a demon-headed handle. At the time when the Magic Messenger and Panther saw them in the street, Morbid was returning from a public execution in the main square and his friends and admirers had decked him with red streamers and were accompanying him home. A crowd of people who had gathered with winecups in their hands at the crossroads blocked their progress. At this point seven or eight armed men also appeared from a side-street. The leader of this group was one Sheepsbane Zhang Bao. He was a member of the city guard and was friendly with a bunch of ne'er-do-wells who spent their time extorting contributions to their own welfare from people within and without the city. Innumerable brushes with authority had failed to persuade Sheepsbane to mend his ways. Because Morbid was a relative newcomer to the city and because many people feared him, Sheepsbane chose to treat him with insolence. On this occasion, seeing Morbid loaded with so many gifts of good silk, and being seconded by this rabble who had all been drinking heavily, he was particularly eager for a confrontation. When the crowd with winecups had brought Morbid to a standstill, Sheepsbane thrust himself forward and shouted: "Greetings, Mr. Gaoler!"

"Come and have a cup of wine, my friend," said Morbid.

"I don't want your wine," Sheepsbane replied. "I've come to ask you for the loan of a few hundred strings of cash!"

"But we're mere acquaintances, we've never had any financial dealings, why ask me for money?" said Morbid.

"I can see you've been robbing the people of a fair old quantity of goods, why shouldn't you lend me some?" said Sheepsbane.

"What do you mean, 'robbing the people,' these are all gifts!" said Morbid indignantly. "You can't threaten me like this. I don't have to answer to you, we have separate jurisdictions."

Instead of replying, Sheepsbane goaded his gang into action. Pressing forward in a boisterous throng they seized all the embroidered silk.

Exclaiming "These hooligans are intolerable!" Morbid tried to move forward to attack them, but Sheepsbane held him by the collar in front, while two others secured his arms from behind. When the mob went into action, the prison guards had melted away. Morbid was so hemmed in by Sheepsbane and his two companions that he couldn't strike a blow. He was obliged to swallow his rage, as he was quite unable to break loose from their hold.

At the height of the confusion, a big man carrying a load of firewood appeared. He saw how Morbid was being obstructed and could not free his arm, and he decided an injustice was being committed. He set down his load, thrust his way through the crowd and said: "What are you doing to the Warden?"

Sheepsbane glared at him and shouted: "You mangy cur, you lousy starving beggar, who asked you to butt in?"

Thus provoked, his temper flaring, the big man responded with a rapid move that threw Sheepsbane down on his back. When some of Sheepsbane's cronies tried to intervene, the big man dealt out blows which sent them flying in all directions. Freed at last, Morbid was now able to deploy his own skills and began to throw some useful punches, and soon after the whole pack of vagabonds were flat on their faces.

Sheepsbane had seen there was no future for him here and crept away. The enraged Morbid now bounded after him. In pursuit of Sheepsbane and the silk thieves Morbid disappeared up a side alley. The big fellow, however, still did not pause but went on chastising the culprits at the crossroads.

Meanwhile the Magic Messenger and Panther were exclaiming to themselves in admiration: "What a fellow! Just look at him: 'He sees an injustice and whips out his sword to set it right!' He's a real hero!" Truly, it was a case of:

To leap from its scabbard the noble blade longs,
Because in the world it can see there are wrongs.
But aiming to right them, just watch how you go:
Are you sure you can tell who's friend and who's foe?

The Magic Messenger and Panther now approached the man and said: "My friend, we beg you now to rest your arm." They led him aside into an alleyway. Panther relieved him of his load and the Magic Messenger took him by the hand and invited him to enter a wineshop. Panther put down the load and joined them in an alcove. Crossing his hands in sign of respect, the man said: "Thank you most kindly for your help, good sirs."

"We are both strangers here," they said. "But when we saw how valiantly you were fighting, we feared lest you hit somebody too hard and accidentally take his life. So we decided to come forward and invite you to drink a few cups of wine with us. Please let us be friends."

"I already owe you for getting me away from there, how can I drink your wine as well? That's really too much!"

"Within the four seas all men are brothers," said Panther. "What is there to feel bad about? Please take a seat."

The Magic Messenger offered him the place of honour, but there was no way he would accept it. In the end the two of them sat down together and the stranger sat on the opposite side of the table. The waiter was called and Panther took out a tael of silver and handed it over, saying: "No need to ask anything, just make sure we're supplied with food to go with our wine, whatever you've got, we'll reckon it all up afterwards."

The waiter took the silver and disappeared for a moment, returning with dishes of vegetables and nuts and stuff to go with the wine. The three men drank several cups, and then the Magic Messenger asked: "May I ask your name and where you are from?"
"My name is Shi Xiu," the other said, "and I am from Jiankang in Jinling. I learnt a little spear and staff play when I was young, and I've always held to one principle: when I see a wrong being committed I do what I can to help. Because of this people call me Madcap. I came here with an uncle to sell sheep and horses, but unfortunately he died on the road. Since I'd spent all my money I couldn't get home, so I had to stay here and sell firewood for a living. Because you've honoured me with your friendship, I have told you the exact truth."
The Magic Messenger said: "And we came here on an affair of our own, my friend and I, that's how we happened to meet you. This business of selling firewood, now, I don't see how it's ever going to get you very far. Wouldn't you be better off if you opted for the rivers and lakes? — you could have a great time, for all the rest of your days."
"But I only know a few tricks with the staff, I've got no other talent; how can I hope to find success and happiness?"
"In these times truth is not honoured. In the first place the Emperor is not clear-sighted, and in addition he is obstructed by corrupt officials. My example may not count for much, but for my part I went and joined Song Jiang's band in the Marshes of Mount Liang, where everyone has their share of gold and silver and clothes come in whole suits. We all hope that there'll be an amnesty later and we'll be given official posts."
Madcap sighed and said: "I'd like to join them, but I've no way to get in."
"If you'd really like to go, I can give you a reference."
"Might I ask the names of you two gentlemen?"
"I am Dai Zong and my friend is Yang Lin."
"I've heard stories in the rivers and lakes about someone called the Magic Messenger, is that you, by any chance?"
"It is," said the Magic Messenger. He told Panther to look in the pack beside him and take out a ten tael silver ingot and give it to Madcap, who refused three times before they prevailed upon him to accept it. Now finally convinced that he was talking to the genuine Magic Messenger from Mount Liang, he was on the point of expressing what he really felt about joining the band on Mount Liang, when they heard someone outside demanding entry. As they were wondering what was going on, Morbid rushed in with a score of others, all police officers. Seeing so many people, the Magic Messenger and Panther took fright and profited by the general confusion to slip away.
Madcap stood up and said by way of greeting: "Well, Warden, where did you get to?"
Morbid said: "I've been looking for you all over the place, my friend. And here you are drinking wine. That bastard had got me jammed in so I couldn't lift a finger until you came to the rescue and got me out of trouble. At first I was too busy chasing the bugger, to make him pay for it, and I forgot about you. These people all heard I was being attacked and came to help. We got all the silk back, everything was fine except I couldn't find you. Then someone said two strangers had taken you to the inn for a drink. That's how I managed to track you down."
"Yes," said Madcap, "two strangers invited me here to have a few cups and some talk. I didn't know you wanted me."
"Please would you tell me your name? And where you come from and why you are here?" said Morbid, with the utmost cordiality.
"My name is Shi Xiu, I am from Jiankang in Jinling. People call me Madcap because it's my nature to rush in and help when I see an injustice. I came here with an uncle who sold sheep and horses. He died suddenly on the journey. I ran out of money and stayed here selling firewood for a living."
Morbid took a good look at him. He was strongly built and everything about him matched:
The physique of a wild mountain tiger, a temper like oil poured on fire. A brave and noble heart, allied to a cool mind; everywhere he renders assistance. He fights with a staff or relies on his two fists. His mighty reputation has spread throughout the world. This is Shi Xiu whom men call Madcap.
Morbid asked Madcap: "What happened to the two strangers who were drinking with you?"
"I suppose they thought something was up when you came in with such a crowd. That must be why they left."
Morbid said: "I see." Then he said to his companions: "Let the waiter bring in two bottles of wine. You can each have three big bowls, then you can leave. I'll see you again tomorrow." The policemen drank up and left.
"Don't think this impertinent of me, but I assume you've got no family here," Morbid said to Madcap, "so I'd like from now on to call myself your brother, how about it?"
Madcap was flattered. He asked: "May I make so bold as to ask your age?"
"I am twenty-nine."
"And I am twenty-eight. So please, sit down and let me pay my respects to you, as the elder."
Madcap kowtowed four times to Morbid, who expressed his pleasure by ordering the waiter to bring some special delicacies to accompany the wine. "You and I are going to get really drunk," he said. Whilst they were drinking, Morbid's father-in-law, Old Pan, appeared with a small search party. Morbid leapt to his feet and said: "Father-in-law! What are you doing here?"
The old gentleman said: "I heard you had got into a fight with someone, so I came to find you."
"Luckily my friend here came to the rescue and beat that scoundrel Sheepsbane so badly he'll be scared of his own shadow from now on. Now Mr. Shi and I have got to know each other and become brothers."
The old man said: "Good, that's fine, you can treat these people to a bowl of wine and then they can go home."
Morbid ordered more wine. Everyone drank three bowls and then left. Morbid made his father-in-law sit down between them, while he took the head of the table and Madcap the other end. When they were seated, the waiter poured for them. Noting with satisfaction Madcap's strong, heroic build, the father-in-law said: "My son-in-law needs a friend like you, so there won't be problems when he performs his official duties. No one will want to mess him about now." He also asked what sort of trade Madcap was involved in.
"My father used to be a butcher."
"Do you know how to slaughter cattle then?"
Madcap laughed: "I was brought up in a butcher's family, of course I know how to slaughter cattle."
"I used to be a butcher, but now I'm too old for it. I've just got this one son-in-law and he joined the government service, so my old trade has to be abandoned."
They drank till they were quite tipsy, then the bill was reckoned up and Madcap left his load of firewood at the inn in payment. They went back to Morbid's house. As he entered, Morbid shouted out: "I want you to come and meet someone, dear!"
From behind the curtain came an answering shout: "Who is it, my love?"
"Don't ask questions, just come and see!"
The curtain was raised and the wife came forth. What was she like then?
Luxuriant black hair, finely arched eyebrows, lustrous eyes, perfumed breath, a true straight nose, tender pink cheeks, perfect complexion, an airy figure, delicate white hands, a reed-like waist, soft full hips, little pointed toes, slippers crowded with embroidery, bounteous breasts, white, white legs, and something more, something narrow, tight and hard of access, crimson, crammed and close — but who can tell what thing that was?
Or as the poem says:

28 summers, a tasty morsel!
Such dangling moons a poor fool's heart can harrow.
No need to have heads roll, for such a force'll
Suck up invisibly the living marrow.

She had been born on the seventh day of the seventh month, and she was called Felicity, because of the festival on this day. She had been married first to an official, a local man, but he had died two years before so then she married Morbid. They had been married for less than a year.
When she came out, Madcap hurriedly stepped forward and bowed. He begged her to be seated and then began to kowtow.
She said: "I am too young to accept this honour."
Morbid said: "This is my new friend, we've just become brothers. As my wife you can accept half the honour."
Accordingly Madcap kowtowed four times, performing the obeisance with a flourish. She returned the compliment gracefully and asked him to come in and sit down. An empty room was prepared for him to rest in. We will not bore you with more of the details.
Next day when Morbid left for the office he told his household: "Prepare Madcap some proper clothing." He also gave instructions for some baggage Madcap had left at an inn to be brought and stored in the house.
As for the Magic Messenger and Panther, when they saw that crowd of officers arrive at the inn in search of Madcap, they had slipped away in the confusion and returned to their inn outside the town. Next day they made further inquiries about Taoist Gongsun and continued for two days, but to no avail. No one knew him or could say where he might have got to. After some discussion, they decided to return. They packed their things and went back to Waterworld, where they were joined by Sterling, Redeye, Flagpole and their troops, and that same night, disguising themselves as a government force, set out for Mount Liang. The Magic Messenger was glad of the opportunity to show proof of his value to the stronghold. His arrival with so many additional troops was celebrated on the mountain with a feast, of which we need say no more.
Meanwhile Morbid's father-in-law had been having discussions with Madcap. What he wanted to do was set up a butcher's shop. "At the back of the house," the old man explained, "there is a cul-de-sac, with an empty building at the end. It's got water, so it would make a fine workshop. I suggest you set things up there and take charge."
Madcap had a look at the place and agreed that it was ideal. Old Pan found one of his former assistants, an experienced hand, to do most of the work so Madcap would only have to supervise the accounts. Madcap agreed and instructed the assistant to paint the meat counter, tubs and chopping block black and green, sharpen the knives, and set up the counters. The workshop having been fitted out, with a pen for the pigs and a dozen fat pigs to go in it, an auspicious day was selected and the shop opened. Neighbours and friends all flocked to the opening when the shop was festooned with red decorations, a deal of celebratory wine was drunk and all of Morbid's family declared themselves well pleased with the new shop under Madcap's supervision. No more of this.
Madcap and Morbid's father-in-law busied themselves with trade. Time sped by and soon it was more than two months since the opening. Autumn was ended and winter approaching. Madcap looked a different man now; he had a whole set of new clothes. One day he rose early, at dawn, and went out into the country to buy pigs from another district. He was away for three days and when he got back he found the shop closed. Arriving at the house he found the chopping block had been put away and the knives locked up in the store.
Now Madcap was not slow-witted. When he'd thought it over, he believed he understood. He said to himself: "No man's happiness lasts a thousand days, no flower blooms for a hundred. My friend must be away on official business and isn't looking after things at home. No doubt his wife saw me having new clothes made and started to say things behind my back. And because I was away for a couple of days tongues started to wag. They decided something was going on and closed the business down. Well, I won't wait to have it out with them, I'll leave before they tell me to and go back home for a bit. Like they say, it's always a mistake to plan too far ahead."
He drove the pigs into the pen and went into the workshop to change. He collected his stuff and carefully drew up a final account. He entered the house from the back door. The old man had arranged some vegetarian food and wine and invited him to sit and have a drink. "You've had a hard journey," he said, "it's a tiring business collecting the pigs."
"I only did what had to be done, sir. But see this, I've drawn up a clear account, and may heaven strike me dead if there's the least gain for me in it."
"Why ever should you say something like that?" said the old man. "No one supposes there's anything wrong."
"Well anyway," said Madcap, "I've been away from home six or seven years, I want to go and spend a bit of time at home now, that's why I've made out the account for you. I'll say goodbye tonight and leave first thing tomorrow."
The old man began to laugh. "You've it all wrong," he said. "You don't need to go. Let me explain." The old man held forth for quite some time, and spoke with emphasis. And as a result of his words,

The avenger draws his deadly blade,
The faithless priest is sent to hell.

LI KUI and Inspector Li Yun fought for about seven bouts, without either gaining an advantage. Zhu Fu at last also took a halberd and rushing between the two stopped the fighting. "No more fighting!" he said, "listen to me! Teacher! I am much obliged to you for your instructions, and shall always think of repaying you for favors received. My brother Zhu Gui received orders from Song Jiang, the commander-in-chief, at Liangshan Marsh to come here to help Li Kui. If you should arrest Li Kui and send him to prison how could my brother face Song Jiang if he had not helped Li Kui to escape? I am responsible for the plan to get you to drink the drugged wine. Our elder brother wanted to kill you, but I interposed and saved your life. We thought that you would pursue us as you would not care to return to the yamen without obtaining your revenge. But when I remembered what favors you had bestowed on me in the past I decided to stay here and speak to you. Teacher, you are an intelligent man and will know how difficult it will be for you to explain to the magistrate how your policemen were killed and the prisoner escaped. You will undoubtedly be tried and nobody will help you. Would it not be better if you come with us to Liangshan Marsh and there join our band? What do you think of that?"
Inspector Li Yun thought the matter over for some time and at last said, "I am afraid that they will not allow me to join their band."
Zhu Fu laughed at this question. "Teacher, have you not heard the reputation of Song Jiang who is famous for welcoming and receiving heroes from all quarters?"
Inspector Li Yun sighed, "I am homeless and without a place of refuge. I, however, have neither wife nor child to be arrested. I will go with you."
Li Kui laughed. "But, elder brother, why didn't you say this before?" He then exchanged salutations. All three men then pursued the cart of Zhu Gui, which they met halfway. They journeyed to Liangshan Marsh, and upon arriving there Li Yun and Zhu Fu were introduced to the leaders by Zhu Gui who mentioned their nicknames, "Blue Eyed Tiger" and "Laughing Tiger." Li Kui then told them of his adventures and of the death of his mother and Song Jiang laughing said, "You are a wonderful fellow. You killed four tigers and have now brought two living tigers to our stronghold." Everybody was pleased at the news, and a feast was arranged to celebrate the occasion.
Wu Yong spoke, "Our affairs have recently been very prosperous and we must have a great reputation everywhere. Great heroes have come here from all quarters because of the great virtue of our two chiefs, Chao Gai and Song Jiang, and also because they have heard of our great happiness. I propose that we establish three more inns in the surrounding country so that we can spy on travelers, and also look out for any more heroes who may pass this way. They can also inform us of any movement of troops so that we shall not be taken by surprise. On the west side there is a very wide area where we can well have an inn in charge of Tong Wei and Tong Meng with about ten men. An inn can be established on the road to the south, in charge of Li Li, with about ten men. Shi Yong and ten more men can start an inn on the north road. We must arrange boats and signaling arrows. We must also establish three barriers on those roads for our outposts, and we can place Du Qian in charge of them. We must also place a number of men under Tao Zongwang to deepen the creeks and waterways, and repair the roads in the surrounding area. He knows how to undertake that kind of work. Our granaries and storerooms must be kept in order by Jiang Jing. Xiao Rang can have charge of all our means of communication between the various units. All engraving work on tablets etc. shall be in charge of Jian Dajian. All clothing armor, flags, etc shall be under the control of Hou Jian. Li Yun shall have charge of all building constructions. Ma Lin in charge of all boats. Song Wan and Bai Sheng to be stationed at our main entrance, the Jinsha Bank, while Wang Ying and Zheng Tianshou be stationed at our outpost at Yazui Beach, Mu Chun and Zhu Fu to be in charge of the treasury, Lu Fang and Guo Sheng to be in charge of the assembly hall; Song Qing to be in charge of all rations." These appointments were agreed to, and arranging the details of all these staff matters took fully three days. Everything went smoothly at Liangshan Marsh and the men were drilled every day.
One day Song Jiang spoke to Chao Gai, Wu Yong, and other leaders, "Just now we are all assembled at this place in the cause of justice, but our Gongsun Sheng is absent. He went to Jizhou, Zhili province, to visit his mother and teacher and said that he would return in a hundred days. He has now been absent for a long time and yet no tidings has arrived concerning him. We had better send Dai Zong to make inquiries, and then we shall know what has happened."
Dai Zong agreed to do this and early the following day he departed for Jizhou. On the way he took only tea and simple food without meat. On the third day he arrived at Yishui County, and there happened to hear a man say that Li Kui had escaped a few days ago after killing many policemen and that inspector Li Yun had disappeared, and nobody knew where he had gone to.
Dai Zong was amused at this. He had left the town, and was proceeding on his way when he saw a man in the distance approaching who was armed with a spear. The man seeing Dai Zong traveling at such a great speed called out Dai Zong's nickname, "Divine Traveler!" Upon hearing this Dai Zong turned his head to look at the man. He saw a big man with a straight nose, and a big mouth, a handsome countenance, a slender waist but broad shoulders. Dai Zong retraced his steps and said to the man, "I do not seem to remember you and yet you have called my name."
The man quickly replied, "You are the 'Divine Traveler,'" and he thereupon kowtowed. Dai Zong returned the compliment and then asked, "What is your esteemed name?"
"I am Yang Lin of Zhangde Prefecture, Henan province. I am a highwayman and people call me 'Gay Leopard.' A few months ago I met Gongsun Sheng at an inn on the road, and he told me that at Liangshan Marsh there are many heroes who are keen for justice. He gave me a written introduction for Liangshan Marsh and urged me to join your band. I did not dare to go there straightway. He also informed me about the inn kept by Zhu Gui who was always looking out for suitable men. He also told me about you. I did not expect that Heaven would favor me and enable me to meet you like this today."
"I have orders from Song Jiang to proceed to Jizhou, and find out what has become of Gongsun Sheng," said Dai Zong, "and I never expected to meet you."
"I know the Jizhou district very well," replied Yang Lin, "and if you like I will accompany you to that place."
"That will suit me very well," said Dai Zong. "After I have found Gongsun Sheng we can proceed to Liangshan Marsh together."
Yang Lin was much pleased at this. Dai Zong now took off his charmed puttees and they both traveled along the road at an ordinary pace. They stopped that evening at an inn, and there Dai Zong told Yang Lin that he was a vegetarian. Yang Lin agreed to eat the same food. The following morning when they had started off Yang Lin said, "I am afraid that I am only holding you back, because I cannot travel at your speed. Would it not be better if we each went our own way?"
"I can fasten two of my charmed puttees on your legs," said Dai Zong, "and then we can both travel quickly."
"I am only a common person," said Yang Lin, "and am afraid that I could not equal your skill in rapid locomotion."
"Never mind!" said Dai Zong, "I have a means whereby any man can travel with me. I myself am a vegetarian but that will not be any obstacle to the other people." He then took two of his charmed puttees and put them on Yang Lin's legs. He had two on his own legs also. He then recited a spell breathed on the puttees, and they both started off. Dai Zong controlled the speed at which they traveled whether slow or fast. They conversed as they traveled and did not notice how far they had gone. About 10 A.M. they came to a post station which was surrounded by hills. Yang Lin knew the place as Yinma Valley, and told Dai Zong that the hill in front was generally infested with brigands, but he did not know whether there were any there now. The hills had a fine appearance with many pointed peaks, and streams winding in all directions. Just as they reached the foot of the mountain they heard gongs and drums being beaten and saw their way obstructed by a body of about one hundred men. In front were two big men armed with swords, who called out, "Halt! Who the hell are you and where are you going? If you pay our road toll we will spare your lives."
Yang Lin laughed and said to Dai Zong, "Elder brother, you can now watch me kill those pricks." Seizing his spear he advanced. The two men noticed the fierce look of Yang Lin and one called out, "No need for fighting! Are you not Yang Lin?"

Yang Lin stood still as he recognized them. The men now advanced and saluted. Yang Lin beckoned Dai Zong to approach and introduced them to each other. "This is Deng Fei, of Xiangyang Prefecture, who is nicknamed 'Fiery Eyed Beast.' He is skilled in the use of a chain, and in fight nobody can get near him. We used to be in the same band but I have not seen him for five years. I never expected to meet him in this place."
Deng Fei asked Yang Lin who his friend was as he was evidently no ordinary person.
Yang Lin introduced Dai Zong, and after the usual compliments he then introduced the second man. "This is Meng Kang of Zhending Prefecture, Zhili province, and he is a boat builder. Once a commander-in-chief was worrying him about the work and he killed the man and then sought refuge in the mountains, and lived as a bandit. Because of his great size people call him 'Flagstaff.'"
Dai Zong was much pleased and asked, "How long have you two gentlemen been doing business at this delightful spot?"
"I will tell you the truth," replied Deng Fei. "We have been here for more than a year. About six months ago we met on the west side of this place a man named Pei Xuan, a Jingzhao Prefecture man, who had been an official clerk and used to write out excellent official indictments in this division. He was well known as an upright official and could not be tampered with, and so he gained the nickname of 'Iron Faced Clerk.' He was both wise and brave. A very covetous Prefect was however appointed to this Prefecture and made false accusations and banished Pei Xuan to Shamen Island. On the way the escort passed this place, and we attacked them, killed most of the men and rescued Pei Xuan. We now have about three hundred men here. Pei Xuan is now our leader, and he is very skillful with two swords, one in each hand. We request you two gentlemen to come with us to our stronghold where we will introduce you to our leader." He then ordered horses for Dai Zong and Yang Lin and the party soon reached the stronghold. Pei Xuan had already been informed by messenger of the newcomers and he met them at the entrance. He was a fine type of man and had a very dignified appearance. After the usual introductions and salutations he invited them to come into the main hall where he asked Dai Zong to take his seat facing him with Yang Lin and the others at the sides. A feast was arranged for that evening and during same Dai Zong gave free accounts of the power of the bandits at Liangshan Marsh, and eventually suggested that they should join them.
"Here we have about five hundred men, and three hundred horses, plenty of food and treasures. But if you do not disdain our humble establishment you might introduce us to your leaders and we might be of some use to you," said Pei Xuan.
"Our two leaders, Chao Gai and Song Jiang, would treat you well, as they are keen on having heroes like you in their band," replied Dai Zong. "If you go it will add brilliance to our present splendor. At present I am on my way to Jizhou Prefecture to find one of our leaders Gongsun Sheng, and upon my return journey I will call here, and if you will be ready we can all depart together to Liangshan Marsh."
They were all pleased with this proposal, and continued with their feasting and drinking.
The next day Dai Zong and Yang Lin went on their way, and the bandits began to make preparations for their early departure to Liangshan Marsh.
Dai Zong and Yang Lin soon reached Jizhou Prefecture and upon entering an inn there Yang Lin said, "As Gongsun Sheng is a keen Taoist moralist it is very probable that he is staying in some secluded spot in the mountains or forests and not in this town."
Dai Zong agreed and they left the inn, and went outside the town. They traveled in the surrounding country and continually inquired for Gongsun Sheng, but nobody had heard of him. The next day they extended their journey, but again without any result.
On the third day of their wanderings Dai Zong said, "Perhaps there will be somebody in the town who knows him. Let us go there." They made inquiries in the town that day, but without success. As they were going along the main street, however, they saw a procession with music. In front were two jailers carrying presents and rolls of silks and at the rear was a large umbrella of blue silk under which walked an executioner. The latter was well dressed in blue silk. His eyebrows were long and his beautiful eyes were tilted upwards. His skin was light brown and his mustache was scanty.
He was a Henan province man, named Yang Xiong, and his cousin had been Prefect of Jizhou Prefecture. The new Prefect knew Yang Xiong and had appointed him superintendent of two prisons and also chief executioner. He was skilled in military exercises, and because he had a yellow skin people called him "Sick Guan Suo" (Guan Suo being the name of a strong man of Tang dynasty). Behind Yang Xiong in the procession was the executioner carrying a sword. An execution had just been carried out in the town at the crossroad, and on his way back to his home many people had congratulated him. He had to stop in many places on the street and drink wine with his numerous friends. Just as the procession reached them Yang Lin and Dai Zong saw a band of about eight men emerge from a side street under the leadership of a man called Zhang Bao whose nickname was the "Goat Kicker." This man was in command of the city guard, but the men with him were a gang of rowdies who lived by demanding money from all classes of people both in the town and outside. The officials had failed to suppress their depredations. Many people were afraid of Yang Xiong, but Zhang Bao was not of the number. Knowing that Yang Xiong would have received many rolls of silk on way Zhang Bao had got these rowdies together in order to create a disturbance on the street. Yang Xiong had stopped to drink wine, and Zhang Bao pressed his way through the crowd and said to him, "Congratulations!"
Yang Xiong returned the salute and replied, "Brother, please join me with wine."
"I did not come for a drink," said Zhang Bao, "but to borrow a hundred strings of cash from you."
"Although I know you," replied Yang Xiong, "I do not remember having been very intimate with you so why should I lend you money?"
"Today you have fraudulently taken valuables from a great many people so why should you not lend me some money?" asked Zhang Bao.
"These things were duly presented to me as gifts by my admirers," said Yang Xiong. "So why do you say they were fraudulently taken from people? You are a military man whereas I am in charge of the prisons so that we have nothing to do with each other, and you have no claim on me."
Zhang Bao did not attempt to reply to this, but turning round told the rowdies to seize the rolls of silk. Yang Xiong protested, saying "You have no manners." He was going to strike the rowdise but was seized hold of by Zhang Bao, but two of the rowdies grabbed hold of his arms. Several men advanced in threatening attitudes, and Yang Xiong's men bolted upon seeing that Yang Xiong could not move, and also had to submit to the indignities. A man in the crowd carrying a load of firewood, however, jumped forward to assist Yang Xiong. He called out, "Why do you beat this official like this?"
Zhang Bao stared at the interrupter and said, "Beggars should mind their own business. This has nothing to do with you." The man was enraged at this insult, and seizing hold of Zhang Bao's hair threw him to the ground. The rowdies came to the rescue of Zhang Bao, but the man fought them with his fists—striking on all sides. This had taken men from holding Yang Xiong, and he, freeing himself, also joined in the fight. The rowdies were soon knocked down, and Zhang Bao seeing the position made his escape. Yang Xiong was now very angry, and pursued Zhang Bao. The men with the booty were in front, and when they turned into an alley Zhang Bao followed them with Yang Xiong running after him.
The man who had changed the position kept on fighting the rowdies who were left behind. Dai Zong nodded to Yang Lin and said, "What a fine man! He draws his sword to help another in trouble on the road." The two advanced and spoke to the man, "Listen to us! There has now been enough fighting." They conducted the man into an alley close by, where they found an inn. Yang Lin had carried in the man's load of firewood.
After the usual salutations Dai Zong said, "We are quite strangers here, but we witnessed your chivalrous action, and being afraid that you might kill one of the men we intervened. Please drink wine with us, and let us become intimate friends."
"I am much obliged to you, gentlemen, for amicably settling that affair," replied the man, "and many thanks for your invitation."
They all sat down. Yang Lin summoned the waiter, and giving him a tael of silver told him to serve whatever food was available. This was soon placed on the table with wine, and answering a question the guest stated, "My name is Shi Xiu, and I am a Nanjing man. I have had some training in military exercises, and I love to help people on the road who are in difficulties. Because of this people call me 'Desperado.' I went with my uncle on a business trip, but he died on the way. I went on with the business, but lost all the money so that I could not go back. Therefore I stayed here, and eke out a livelihood by selling firewood. I tell you all this because of your helping me in that matter on the street."
"We are on business here," said Dai Zong, "and are pleased to meet such a chivalrous hero as you. You merely sell firewood here so how can you hope to become wealthy? Would it not be better if you became a brigand and enjoyed life a little?"
"I am only skilled in the use of stick," said Shi Xiu, "but as I have no other ability how can I improve my position and enjoy life?"
"You need not say you have no other ability," said Dai Zong. "It is only too true that the government is corrupt and the officials are traitorous. I had a friend who through temper got into trouble, but he joined the bandits at Liangshan Marsh where he now has good clothing and plenty of money. When government affairs are put in order he will undoubtedly be recalled and receive a good post."
Shi Xiu sighed, "I would like to go, but I do not see how it could be done."
"If you want to go I could introduce you to the bandits."
"I dare not ask the names of you two gentlemen," said Shi Xiu.
Dai Zong disclosed their names, and offered Shi Xiu ten taels of silver which however the latter accepted only after much pressing. Just then they heard men outside and looking round they saw Yang Xiong with about twenty policemen. Dai Zong and Yang Lin were afraid of the police, and made their escape.
Shi Xiu went forward, and asked Yang Xiong where he was going. The latter said, "Brother, I have been looking for you everywhere. Why did you come in here to drink wine? When I was held up by Zhang Bao and his gang, I could not have got free had you not intervened for which I am much obliged to you. I went to arrest Zhang Bao, and get my presents back and so had to abandon you for the nonce. These men all came to my assistance, and when I had recovered all the stolen things I came to look for you, but could not find you. I however heard that you had come here with two men so I came here to look for you."
"I just came in here with two strangers to drink wine, and I did not think you would be looking for me."
Yang Xiong asked for his name, etc. and Shi Xiu gave him the information, and also his life's short history which we have just read.
Yang Xiong then invited all the men to drink three cups of wine, and this having been done they all departed.
"I think that you have no relatives in this town," said Yang Xiong, "and I therefore suggest that we become sworn brothers."
Shi Xiu asked for his honorable age and upon learning that he was twenty-nine, he said, "Well, I am only twenty-eight, so I must ask you to be seated, and receive my kowtow and salutations." This was done—Shi Xiu giving four kowtows. Yang Xiong was much pleased at this and ordered the waiter to bring more wine. He said, "Younger brother, we will celebrate this by getting drunk."
While they were drinking wine Yang Xiong's father-in-law named Pan came in with about five men, "What do you want, sir?" asked Yang Xiong.
"I heard that you had had a fight on the street," said Old Pan, "and therefore I came to find you and help you."
"My younger brother here came to my assistance," said Yang Xiong, "and we beat our assailant Zhang Bao so that he would run away upon seeing our shadows. Just now I have become the sworn brother of this gentleman, Shi Xiu."
"That is splendid," said Old Pan, "when my men have had a drink they will depart." The men were served with three cups of wine each, and then left. Old Pan then took his seat between the two friends.
"I am much pleased that you have become a sworn brother of my son-in-law," said Pan. "Having your assistance he will fittingly be an employee in the yamen and nobody will dare try to deceive him. What business are you engaged in, may I ask?"
"My father was a butcher," said Shi Xiu.
"And do you follow the same occupation?" asked Old Pan.
"As a boy I, of course, got to know all about the trade,"said Shi Xiu laughingly.
"I followed the same trade," said Old Pan, "until my son-in-law here got a position in the yamen when, of course, I had to give up that trade."
When they had drunk some more wine together Yang Xiong paid the bill, and they took their departure, Shi Xiu shouldering his load of firewood. Upon reaching the door of Yang Xiong's house he called out, "Wife, come and be introduced to my newly sworn brother."
A voice inside the curtain asked, "Who is this new sworn brother?"
"You need not ask questions," said Yang Xiong; "you can come and see for yourself."
The curtain was raised and a woman stepped forth. She had been born on the 7th day of the seventh lunar month, and therefore had the name of Qiaoyun or "Clever Clouds" (the seventh month is called the "clever month"). She had first married an official clerk called Wang, who had died after two years of married life. Her second husband was Yang Xiong and they had been married almost a year.
Shi Xiu saluted her, but she objected, "I am much younger than you, and cannot accept such marks of respect."
"We have become sworn brothers today," said Yang Xiong, "so that you are the elder brother's wife, and therefore can receive at least half of these salutations." Accordingly Shi Xiu kowtowed four times. The woman responded with two kowtows, and then invited them inside. She also prepared a spare room for Shi Xiu's use.
We need not go into many details. The next day Yang Xiong before he left for his office in the yamen told his wife to see that Shi Xiu had whatever clothes he required.
When Dai Zong and Yang Lin had left Shi Xiu in the inn they went outside the town and found an inn there. The next day they continued their inquiries for Gongsun Sheng without any result. So they gave up their search, and returning to Yinma Valley they joined Pei Xuan and his company and started off with them for Liangshan Marsh where they were all duly introduced and placed on the strength.
Old Pan discussed with Shi Xiu the question of reestablishing a slaughterhouse. He said that behind his house there was an alley with a dead end and also an empty house. There was also a well, and he thought it a very suitable place for a slaughterhouse. Shi Xiu could live on the premises.
Shi Xiu was much pleased at the proposal, and agreed at once. Old Pan made inquiries and soon found suitable assistants. He suggested that Shi Xiu should keep the accounts. They soon purchased the stock in trade, knives, benches, etc. and after selecting a lucky day they started business. All the neighbors and relatives came to take part in the feasting on the opening day.
Matters proceeded smoothly for a long time. One day during the winter Shi Xiu went into the country to buy pigs, and upon his return three days later he found that the butchery was closed. Upon going inside he discovered that all the tools and fittings had been removed. He thought, "There is a saying, 'Men cannot be good for a thousand days, and flowers cannot bloom for a hundred days.' Yang Xiong has to go to his office every day, and cannot look after the home affairs. His wife must have been talking behind my back, and finding fault because I have been away for three days. He has suspected me, and has closed the business. I will not trouble to even ask for an explanation, but will just return to my old home." So he made up his accounts, changed his clothes, packed up his own things, and entered by the back door. He found that Old Pan had prepared a vegetarian feast in readiness for Shi Xiu's return. Old Pan said, "You have been a long way, and must be very tired."
"Sir, that's my duty," replied Shi Xiu, "Now I have squared up the account book, and everything is in order. If there is any error may Heaven and Earth destroy me."
"Why do you talk like this?" asked Old Pan. "There is no necessity for it."
"I have not been home for nearly seven years," said Shi Xiu, "and as I must now go I have squared up all the accounts."
Old Pan laughed loudly and said, "You are mistaken. Please listen to me."

Revenge is sought, so toll the knell,
And send an unfaithful monk to hell.

143
Morbid Yang Xiong gets Drunk & Berates & Curses his wife Clever Cloud; Madcap Shi Xiu Shrewdly Plans the Killing of Monk Pei Ruhai & ends the lecher's life

"I know what you're thinking," said Master Pan. "You come home after an absence of two days and find that all the butcher's implements have been put away. Of course you assume we've closed down, and so you want to go. Even if our business wasn't as good as it is now, even if we really did close down, we'd still keep you in our home. The fact of the matter is this: Today is the second anniversary of the death of Wang the Scribe, my daughter's first husband. We're going to have some prayers said for him, that's why we've shut up shop for a couple of days. We've asked monks to come tomorrow from the Grateful Retribution Monastery to conduct a service and we'd like you to look after it. I'm too old to stay up all night. I thought I'd talk to you about it, first."
"In view of what you've said, old sir, I'm willing to remain a while longer."
"Don't let your imagination run away with you, in the future. Just do what's proper according to your station."
They drank several cups of wine and ate a few vegetable dishes, and that was the end of it.
The next morning lay brothers arrived bearing scriptures, and set the scene for the ceremony. They installed idols and sacrificial implements; drums, gongs, bells and chimes; incense, flowers, lamps and candles. In the kitchen, meatless dishes were prepared.
Yang Xiong came home late in the afternoon. "I'm on duty at the prison tonight," he said to Shi Xiu. "I can't be here. May I trouble you, brother, to take care of matters?"
"Don't give it a thought. I'll keep an eye on things for you."
Yang Xiong departed, and Shi Xiu posted himself at the front door. Just as dawn was breaking the following day, a young monk pushed aside the gate screen and entered the courtyard. Palms piously together in the Buddhist fashion, he bowed deeply to Shi Xiu, who returned the courtesy.
"Please be seated, Reverend."
A lay brother carrying two boxes on the ends of a shoulderpole had come in behind the monk.
"Old sir," Shi Xiu called. "There's a monk here to see you."
Master Pan emerged and the monk hailed him: "Godfather, why haven't we seen you at our monastery?"
"I haven't had time since opening this shop."
"I've brought some paltry gifts to commemorate the scribe's passing away. Just some noodles and a few packets of dates."
"Aiya. Reverend, there's no need for you to spend any money," said the old man. But he said to Shi Xiu: "Please take them for me."
Shi Xiu carried the packages inside. He instructed a servant to bring tea and serve it to the monk.
Meanwhile, the girl came downstairs. She wore only light mourning attire and make-up, since more would not be appropriate to a woman who had remarried. "Who are the gifts from?" she asked Shi Xiu.
"A monk who calls your father 'godfather.' "
The girl smiled. "That must be Pei Ruhai, who's known as the Preceptor, a very honest monk. He used to run his family's silk-thread shop before he joined the order in the Grateful Retribution Monastery. Because his superior is a secular prelate, Ruhai is able to call my father godfather. He's just two years older than me. I call him my reverend brother. His name in the order is Master Hai. Wait till you hear him chant tonight. He has a beautiful voice."
"So that's how it is," Shi Xiu thought. He already had a one-tenth inkling of what was brewing.
She went out to meet the monk. His hands clasped behind his back, Shi Xiu followed as far as the door and watched from behind the curtain. The monk rose when the girl emerged, placed his palms together and bowed.
"You had no right to spend money on presents," she said.

“They’re only small things, sister. Not worth mentioning.”
“How can you say that? We shouldn’t take gifts from a man who’s renounced the world.”
“We’ve built a new Hall for the Spirits of the Departed on Land and Sea. We wish you would honor us with a visit and look it over. But perhaps the warden would disapprove.”
“He’s not so petty. When my mother was dying I promised to have prayers offered for those who died in childbirth. I’ve been meaning to go to your temple and trouble you to have this done.”
“But such prayers are my duty. No trouble at all. Whatever you wish me to do, you’ve only to ask.”
“Then please chant a few scriptures for my mother.”
A little maid served tea. Clever Cloud wiped the rim of a cup with her handkerchief, then proffered it respectfully in both hands to the young monk. He stared boldly and greedily into her eyes, and she gazed back at him, smiling.
“Lust engenders boundless audacity,” as the saying goes. Shi Xiu observed all this from behind the door curtain. By now he had guessed two-tenths. “Believe not that in straight forwardness there is only honesty. Beware, rather that evil lurks behind the guise of virtue,” he said to himself. “That girl has dropped me hints several times, but I’ve treated her strictly as a sister-in-law. So that’s the kind of wench she is! If I catch her, don’t think I won’t act on Yang Xiong’s behalf!”
He thought about it, three-tenths sure. He raised the door curtain and went outside. The monk hastily set down his teacup and addressed him.
“Sir, please be seated.”
“This brother-in-law is a new blood brother of my husband,” the girl explained.
“Where are you from, sir?” the monk queried, with polite gravity. “What is your name?”
“Shi Xiu, from Jinling,” was the curt reply. “Because I fight injustice, even when it’s no affair of mine, I’m known as the Rash. I’m a crude fellow without any manners. Forgive me.”
“Not at all, not at all! I must fetch some more monks for the ceremony,” the young man said hastily. He headed for the gate.
“Come back soon, reverend brother,” the girl called.
He hurried away without reply. The girl saw him as far as the gate, then returned to the house. Shi Xiu stood outside the door, his head bent in thought. He was by this time four-tenths sure.
Later, a beadle came and lit the candles and the incense. Shortly after, Hai the Preceptor returned with several monks. Master Pan asked Shi Xiu to receive them. After they drank their tea, they began beating drums and gongs and singing verses in praise of the departed. Hai and another young monk conducted the ritual—ringing bells, burning prayers to the gods, offering sacrificial food to the Defenders of Heaven and the Chief Watcher of the Celestial Altar, entreating that the spirit of the departed Wang the Scribe be allowed to enter Heaven soon.
The girl Clever Cloud, simply adorned, entered the garden. She lit a stick of incense, inserted it in a small burner which she held in her hands, and prayed before the idol. This aroused Hai the Preceptor to greater fervor. He rang his bells and gave full vent to his voice. The sight of the luscious Clever Cloud, piously undulating, caused the other monks to reel and stagger.
When the prayers of entreaty for the dead ended, the monks were invited inside for a meal. Hai sat behind the others. He turned his head, looked at the girl and smiled. She put her hand over her mouth to smother a laugh. Their eyes exchanged loving glances.
Shi Xiu observed it all. He was five-tenths annoyed. The monks were each served a few cups of wine before their vegetarian meal, and were given some money. Master Pan said he was weary, and retired. When they had finished eating, the monks went out for a stroll to aid digestion, then returned to the ceremonial arena.
Shi Xiu’s irritation had reached sixth-tenths. Claiming to have a stomach ache, he lay down in a room behind the partition wall.
Clever Cloud, her passions stirred, didn’t care whether anyone was watching her or not. She brought tea and fruit and cakes to the monks, who were once again beating drums and gongs. Hai abjured them to concentrate on their prayers and supplications. The ritual continued. By midnight the other monks were exhausted, but Hai was only getting into stride. He chanted loud and clear. Clever Cloud, who had been standing for a long time by the door curtain, was inflamed with desire. She instructed her little maid to tell Reverend Brother Hai she wished to speak to him. The scoundrel hastened over. She put her hand on his sleeve.
“When you come for the memorial service money tomorrow you can talk to papa about those prayers for mama. Don’t forget.”
“I won’t. I’ll say: ‘If we’re to fulfil her wish, we should do it promptly,’ ” said the young monk. And he added: “That brother-in-law of yours looks tough.”
The girl tossed her head. “Don’t pay any attention to him. He’s not a real relative.”
“I won’t worry, then,” said Hai. He slipped his fingers inside the girl’s sleeve and pinched her hand.
She made a pretense of pulling the door curtain between them. That rogue of a shaven-pate grinned and went off to continue his prayers for the dead.
Shi Xiu, feigning sleep behind the partition, had missed none of this. He was seven-tenths positive. The ceremony ended at the fifth watch. After the idol was removed and the paper money burned, the monks thanked their hosts and departed, and Clever Cloud went upstairs to bed.
“Brother Yang Xiong is chivalrous, but that wife is a sexy bitch,” Shi Xiu said to himself indignantly. Repressing his anger, he went back to sleep in the butcher shop.
The next day Yang Xiong came home, but Shi Xiu didn’t say a word. After eating, Yang again left and Hai the Preceptor, wearing a fresh cassock, returned once more. On hearing of his arrival, the girl quickly descended the stairs. She hurried out to greet him, invited him into the house and ordered tea.
“You must be exhausted from all those ceremonies last night, reverend brother,” said the girl. “And we still haven’t paid.”
“Not worth mentioning. I’ve come about those prayers your mother wanted read. Just write out what you want me to say and I’ll include it while chanting scriptures at the monastery.”
“Excellent,” said Clever Cloud. She told the little maid to ask her father to join them.
Master Pan entered and thanked the monk. “I couldn’t stay up so late last night, and had to leave you,” he said apologetically. “I didn’t expect Shi Xiu to develop a stomach ache. You were left with no one to look after you. I’m very sorry.”
“Think nothing of it, godfather.”
The girl said: “I want to fulfil mama’s wish to have prayers said for women who died in childbirth. Reverend brother says he can include them in the scriptures which will be chanted in the monastery temple tomorrow. I suggest he go back now, and tomorrow, after breakfast, you and I will visit the temple and attend the prayers. We’ll have done our duty.”
“All right,” said Master Pan. “But I’m afraid we’ll be busy at the butcher shop tomorrow, with no one to handle the money.”
“You’ve got Shi Xiu. What’s there to worry about?”
“Your wish is my desire, daughter. Tomorrow we’ll go.”
Clever Cloud gave Hai some silver and said: “Please don’t scorn this as too small. Perhaps you’ll have some meatless noodles for us when we call at your monastery tomorrow.”
“I shall respectfully await your coming to burn incense.” Hai stood up. “Many thanks. I’ll divide this money among the other monks and look forward to your visit.”
The girl saw him off to the outside of the gate.
Shi Xiu, in the butcher shop, rose and slaughtered hogs and attended to business. That evening, Yang Xiong returned. When he had finished supper and washed his feet and hands, the girl had her father speak to him.
“When my wife was dying,” Master Pan said, “my daughter promised her to have prayers said at the Grateful Retribution Monastery for women who died in childbirth. I’m going there with Clever Cloud tomorrow to see it done. I thought I’d let you know.”
Yang said to the girl: “You could have spoken to me about this directly.”
“I didn’t dare. I was afraid you’d be angry.”
Nothing more was said that night, and all retired. The next day at the fifth watch Yang got up and went to sign in at the office and commence his duties. Shi Xiu also rose and set about his butcher shop business. The girl, when she awakened, made herself up seductively and put on her prettiest clothes. Carrying an incense burner, she bought some paper money and candles and summoned a sedan-chair. Shi Xiu was busy in the shop and didn’t pay much attention.
After breakfast, Clever Cloud dressed up Ying’er the little maid. At mid-morning Master Pan changed his clothes. He went over to Shi Xiu.
“Can I trouble you to keep an eye on our door? I’m going with my daughter to fulfil a prayer wish at a temple. We’ll be back later.”
Shi Xiu smiled. “I’ll look after the house, you look after sister-in-law. Burn plenty of good incense and return soon.” he was eight-tenths sure.
Master Pan and Ying’er walked along with the sedan-chair as it proceeded to the Grateful Retribution Monastery. It was solely because of Clever Cloud that Hai the Preceptor, that sneaky shaven-pate, had adopted Master Pan as his godfather. But due to Yang Xiong’s vigilant eye, he had been unable to get to her. Although he and the girl had been exchanging languishing glances ever since she became his adopted “sister,” it hadn’t gone beyond that. Only the night of the memorial service did he feel he was beginning to get somewhere. The date for their meeting had been fixed and the tricky shaven-pate had, so to speak, sharpened his weapons and girded his loins.
When his visitors arrived he was waiting outside the mountain gate. Beside himself with joy at the sight of the sedan-chair, he came forward to greet them.
“I’m afraid we’re imposing on you,” said Master Pan.
Clever Cloud, as she stepped down from her sedan-chair, said: “Thank you so much for your trouble.”
“Not at all,” replied Hai. “I’ve been reciting scriptures with the other monks in the Land and Sea Hall since the fifth watch without a break. We’ve been waiting for you, sister, so that we could burn the prayers. It will be a virtuous deed.”
He escorted the girl and her father into the hall. Incense and candles and other such paraphernalia had been prepared, and the monks were busy at their scriptures. Clever Cloud curtsied to them in greeting and paid homage to the Three Treasures—Buddha, his teaching, and their propagators. The wicked shaven-pate led her before the idol of the God of the Nether Regions, where she burned the prayers for her departed spouse. Paper money was then also burned, after which the monks were given a vegetarian meal, paid for by Clever Cloud.
Hai summoned a couple of novices to act as servants and asked Master Pan and Clever Cloud to his own apartment to dine. He lived deep within the monks’ quarters. Everything was ready.
“Bring tea, brothers,” he called when they entered his rooms. Two novices served tea in snow-white cups on a vermilion colored tray. The leaves were delicate and fine.
After they finished drinking he said: “Please come and sit inside, sister.” He led the girl and her father to a small inner chamber containing a gleaming black lacquer table and, on the walls, several paintings by famous artists. On a little stand fragrant incense was burning. Master Pan and his daughter sat at one end of the table, Hai at the other. Ying’er stood to one side.
“Ideal quarters for a man who’s renounced the world,” the girl commended. “So quiet and peaceful.”
“You’re making fun of me, sister. How can it compare with your fine home?”
“We’ve wearied you all day,” said Master Pan. “We must be getting back.”
The monk wouldn’t hear of it. “Godfather, it hasn’t been easy to get you here, and we’re not exactly strangers,” he said. “The simple meal I’m offering has already been paid for by sister. Have some noodles before you go. Brothers, hurry with that food!”
Before the words were out of his mouth, two platters were brought in laden with rare fruits, unusual vegetable and all sorts of tidbits, and place upon the table.
“What a spread,” the girl exclaimed. “We’re being too much of a nuisance.”
The monk smiled. “It doesn’t amount to anything. Just a small token of my esteem.”
The novices poured the wine and Hai said: “You haven’t been here for a long time, godfather. You must try this.”
Master Pan sipped. “Excellent. A very strong bouquet.”
“One of our patrons taught us how to make it. We’ve put to brew four or five bushels of rice. When they’re ready we’ll send your son-in-law a few bottles.”
“You mustn’t do that.”
“I’ve nothing really suitable to offer. Sister, at least have a cup of this wine.”
The novices kept filling the cups. Hai also pressed Ying’er to down a few.
“That’s enough for me,” said Clever Cloud finally. “I can’t drink any more.”
“You come so seldom,” said Hai. “You must have one more.”
Master Pan called the sedan-chair carriers and gave them each a cup of wine.
“Don’t worry about them,” said the monk. “I’ve already ordered that places be laid for them outside for wine and noodles. Relax and enjoy yourself, godfather. Have some more wine.”
As part of his scheme to get the girl, the wicked shaven-pate had served a wine that was particularly good and potent. It was too much for Master Pan. A few more cups and he was drunk.
“Put him to bed and let him sleep it off,” Hai instructed the two novices. They supported him to a cool, quiet room and made him comfortable.
“Have no fears, sister,” the monk urged Clever Cloud. “Another cup of wine.”
The girl was willing enough, and the wine was stirring her senses. “Why do you want me to drink so much?” she asked huskily.
In a low voice the monk replied: “Only because I think so well of you.”
“I’ve had enough,” the girl said.
“If you’ll come into my room I’ll show you Buddha’s tooth.”
“That’s why I’m here, to see Buddha’s tooth.”
Hai took Clever Cloud upstairs to his bedroom. It was very neat and clean. The girl was half enchanted already.
“How nice. You certainly keep it spick and span.”
The monk laughed. “All that’s missing is a wife.”
Clever Cloud smiled. “Why don’t you choose one?”
“Where could I find such a patroness?”
“You promised to show me Buddha’s tooth.”
“Send Ying’er away, and I’ll take it out.”
“Go see whether father is still drunk,” Clever Cloud said to the little maid. Ying’er went downstairs to Master Pan. Hai closed the door at the head of the stairs and bolted it. The girl laughed.
“Why are you locking me in?”
Lust surged up in the wicked shaven-pate, and he threw his arms around her.
“I love you. For two years I’ve been racking my brains how to get you, and today you’re here at last. This chance is too good to miss.”
“My husband is a hard man. Do you want to ruin me? If he ever finds out, he won’t spare you.”
The monk knelt at her feet. “I don’t care. Only have pity on me.”
“Naughty monk.” The girl raised her hand. “You know how to pester people. I’ll box your ears.”
Hai chuckled. “Hit me all you like. I’m only afraid you’ll hurt your hand.”
Enflamed with passion, Clever Cloud embraced him. “You don’t think I’d really hit you?” she murmured.
He picked her up and carried her to the bed. Then he disrobed her and had his heart’s desire. Only after a long time did the clouds expend their rain.
Holding the girl in his arms the monk said: “As long as you love me, though I die for it I won’t care. The only flaw is that, while today you’re mine, our joy is quickly past. We can’t revel all night together. Long waits between meetings is going to kill me.”
“Calm yourself,” said Clever Cloud. “I’ve thought of a plan. My husband is on duty at the prison twenty nights out of the month. I can buy Ying’er’s co-operation. I’ll have her watch at the rear gate every night. If my husband isn’t home, she’ll put a stand with burning incense outside. That will mean you can come. Find a friar to beat on a wooden fish at the fifth watch outside our rear gate as if summoning the faithful to prayer. Then you won’t oversleep and will be able to slip away. The friar can both keep watch and see to it that you’re gone before dawn.”
The monk was delighted. “Very clever. Take care of your end. I have just the man. He’s a mendicant friar called Friar Hu. He’ll do whatever I tell him.”
“I’d better not stay too long, or those oafs will get suspicious. I must go home at once. Don’t miss our next appointment.”
The girl got up, straightened her hair, reapplied make-up, opened the stairway door and went down. She told Ying’er to awaken Master Pan, and quickly left the monks’ living quarters. The sedan-chair carriers have finished their noodles and wine and were waiting at the monastery entrance. Hai the Preceptor escorted them as far as the mountain gate, where Clever Cloud bid him farewell and mounted the sedan-chair. With Master Pan and Ying’er she returned home. Of that we’ll say no more.

Hu had formerly worked in the monks' quarters, but he had retired and now lived in a little temple behind the monastery. He was known as Friar Hu because he rose at the fifth watch every day and beat on a wooden fish to announce the coming of dawn and urge the Buddhist faithful to pray. After daybreak he would beg alms for food. Hai summoned him to the monk's quarters, treated him to three cups of good wine, and presented him with some silver.
Hu stood up and said: "I've done nothing to merit this. How can I accept? You're always so kind to me."
"I know what an honest fellow you are. One of these days I'm going to purchase a religious certificate for you and have you accepted into our order. The silver is just to let you buy yourself new clothes."
Hai the Preceptor frequently instructed his monks to send Hu lunch. Or to include him when they went out to perform a religious service, so that he could also receive a small fee. Hu was very grateful.
"He's given me money again," thought Hu. "He must have some need of me. Why should I wait for him to bring it up?" And he said: "If there's anything you want, I'd be glad to do it."
"Since you're good enough to put it that way, I'll tell you the truth. Master Pan's daughter is willing to be intimate with me. She's going to have an incense stand put outside her rear gate whenever it's safe for me to call. It wouldn't be wise for me to check, but it doesn't matter if you go and have a look. Then I can risk it. Also I'd like to trouble you, when you're calling people to prayers near dawn, to come to her rear gate. If there's no one around, bang on your wooden fish and loudly summon the faithful, and I'll know I can leave."
"Nothing hard about that," said Friar Hu. He fully assented.
The next day he went begging alms at Master Pan's rear gate. Ying'er came out and said: "What are you doing here? Why don't you do your begging at the front gate?"
Hu began chanting prayers. Clever Cloud heard him and came to the rear gate. "Aren't you the friar who heralds the dawn at the fifth watch?" she asked.
"That I am. I tell folks not to sleep too much and to burn incense in the night, so as to please the gods."
The girl was delighted. She instructed Ying'er to run upstairs and get a string of coppers for the friar. When the little maid had gone, Friar Hu said: "I'm a trusted man of Teacher Hai. He's sent me to get the lay of the land."
"I know about you. Come tonight. If there's an incense stand outside, tell him."
Hu nodded. Ying'er returned with the copper coins and gave them to him. The girl went upstairs and confided in Ying'er. The little maid saw this as a chance to gain some advantage, and was glad to help.
That day Yang Xiong was on duty at the prison. Before evening, he left with his quilt. Ying'er, who had already received a small emolument, couldn't wait till nightfall, and put the incense stand out while it was still dusk. Clever Cloud hurried to the rear gate and waited. Around the first watch a man, his head bound by a kerchief, suddenly appeared.
Startled, Ying'er called out: "Who's there?"
The man did not reply. Clever Cloud reached out and yanked off the kerchief, revealing a shaven pate. She cursed him fondly.
"Wicked badly. You really know what you're about."
Arms around each other, they went up the stairs. Ying'er took in the incense stand, bolted the gate and went to bed.
That night the two lovers were as close as glue and turpentine, sugar and honey, marrow and bone juice, fish and water, indulging merrily in licentious pleasure. Just as they were falling asleep, they heard the rap-rap-rap of a wooden fish and a voice loudly calling believers to prayer.
The monk and the girl were instantly wide awake. Hai the Preceptor threw on his clothes.
"I'm going. See you tonight."
"Come whenever the incense stand is outside. If it's not there, stay away."
The girl tied the bandanna round his head. Ying'er opened the rear gate and let him out.
From then on, Yang Xiong had only to be on duty at the prison, and the monk came. Master Pan was at home, but he went to bed early. Ying'er was part of the conspiracy. There remained Shi Xiu to be deceived, but by then the girl was so intoxicated with sex she didn't care. As for the monk, from the time he began savoring the charms of Clever Cloud, his very soul seemed to have been snatched away. The moment the friar reported that the coast was clear, the monk would leave the monastery. With the collusion of Ying'er, Clever Cloud would let him in. Joyous love-play went on in this manner for more than a month.
Shi Xiu every evening, after cleaning up the butcher shop, retired to an adjacent room. The problem of Yang Xiong's wife was still troubling him, but he had no proof. He hadn't seen any sign of the monk. When he awakened at the fifth watch each morning he would sometimes jump up and peer outside. There was only a friar in the lane heralding the dawn by beating on a wooden fish and shouting a call to prayers.
Young Shi Xiu was clever. Already nine-tenths sure, he analyzed the phenomenon coolly. "This lane is a dead-end with no other families," he mused. "Why should a friar come here, of all places, to summon people to prayer? He's definitely up to something."
It was then the middle of the eleventh month. One morning, when Shi Xiu woke as usual at the fifth watch, he again heard the friar beating on the wooden fish as he entered the lane. At the rear gate of the house the friar shouted: "May the gods save all living things from misery and hardship."
Shi Xiu hopped out of bed and glued his eye to a crack in the door. A man with a kerchief binding his head slipped out of the shadows and departed with the friar, after which Ying'er closed the gate. Shi Xiu now had the whole picture.
"Brother Yang Xiong is chivalrous, but he's picked himself a wanton for a wife," he thought angrily. "He's completely deceived, and she's playing her own little game."
At daybreak he hung the hog carcasses in the shop and commenced serving the early morning customers. After breakfast he went out to collect some accounts. He headed for the prefectural office at noon to see Yang Xiong, and met him coming over the bridge. "What brings you here, brother?" asked the warden.
"I've been collecting accounts in the neighborhood. I thought I'd drop by."
"I'm always so tied up on official business, I seldom have time to drink with you and relax. Let's go and sit down for a while."
Yang Xiong took him to a tavern, chose a secluded room upstairs and told the waiter to bring good wine and some fresh tidbits. They downed three cups. Shi Xiu sat with lowered head, deep in thought. Yang Xiong was an impetuous man.
"You're unhappy about something," he asserted. "Has anyone at home said anything to offend you?"
"No, it's not that. I'm grateful to you, brother. You've treated me like your own flesh and blood. I've something to tell you, but I don't know whether I dare."
"How can you act as if I were a stranger? Whatever it is, speak out."
"When you leave the house every day, your whole mind is on your official duties. You don't know what's happening behind your back. Sister-in-law isn't a good person. I've noticed signs of it several times, but I didn't dare tell you. Today it was so obvious I had to come and speak frankly."
"I haven't got eyes in the back of my head. Who is the man?"
"When you had that memorial service at home, Hai the Preceptor, that knave of a bald-pate, was asked to officiate. I saw him and sister-in-law making eyes at each other. Two days later, she and her father went to the monastery temple to hear the prayers her mother wanted said, and they both came home smelling of wine. Lately, I've been hearing a friar beating a wooden fish and calling people to prayer in our lane. I thought there was something peculiar about the villain, and this morning I got up at the fifth watch to have a look. Sure enough, there was that scoundrelly bald-pate, a bandanna over his head, coming out of the house. A hussy like that, what do you need her for!"
Yang Xiong was furious. "The bitch. How dare she!"
"Control yourself, brother. Don't say anything tonight. Just behave as usual. Tomorrow, say that you're on duty, but come back at the third watch and knock on the front gate. The knave is sure to sneak out the back. I'll be there to catch him, and then you can dispose of him."
"A good idea."
"Be careful what you say tonight."
"I'll meet you there tomorrow, then."
The two drank a few more cups, paid the bill, went downstairs, left the tavern and prepared to go their separate ways.
Four or five captains hailed Yang Xiong. "We've been looking all over for you, Warden. The prefect is waiting in his garden. He wants you to joust with us with staves. Come on, hurry it up."
"The prefect wants me. I'll have to go," Yang said to Shi Xiu. "You go back first."
Shi Xiu returned home, put the butcher shop in order, and retired to his room.
Yang Xiong went to the rear garden of the prefect and fought a few demonstration rounds with staves. Mightily pleased, the official rewarded him with ten beakers of wine. When the gathering broke up, the others invited Yang out for more imbibing. By evening he was very drunk and had to be supported home.
Clever Cloud thanked his escort. She and Ying'er helped him up the stairs, lit a lamp and toned it on brightly. Yang sat on the bed as the little maid removed his padded shoes and his wife took off his bandanna and cap. The sight of her reaching for his head covering stirred a surge of rage within him. "Sober thoughts become drunken words," as the old saying goes. He pointed at her and cursed:
"Baggage! Strumpet! I'm going to finish you off, come what may!"
The girl was too frightened to reply. She eased Yang down on the bed. He fell asleep the moment his head touched the pillow, but he continued muttering. "Wretch. Dirty whore. Your lover dares spit in the tiger's mouth. You ... You ... You'll pay for this!"
The girl didn't dare breathe. She stayed with him while he slept. At the fifth watch he awoke and asked for a drink of water. Clever Cloud scooped up a bowlful and gave it to him. The lamp was still burning on the table. Yang drank.
"Why haven't you undressed and come to bed?"
"You were stinking drunk. I was afraid you'd want to vomit. How could I take off my clothes? I lay at the foot of the bed all night."
"Did I say anything?"
"You're not bad when you're drunk. You only go to sleep. But I couldn't help worrying about you during the night."
"We haven't had brother Shi Xiu in for drinks in some time. Prepare a few things at home and I'll invite him."
Clever Cloud did not reply. She remained seated on the step of the bed, her eyes swimming with tears. She sighed.
"I was drunk last night, wife, but I didn't give you any trouble. Why are you so upset?"
The girl put her hands over her tear-filled eyes. Yang pressed her for an answer. Clever Cloud, covering her face, pretended to weep. Yang raised her from the step to the bed, insisting that she speak.
"When my parents gave me in marriage to Wang the Scribe I hoped it would be for life. Who expected him to die so soon?" she sobbed. "Now I'm married to you, a chivalrous, bold hero, and you don't even protect me."
"This is crazy. What do you mean I don't protect you? Who's picking on you?"
"At first I wasn't going to say anything, but I'm afraid you'll be taken in by him. I've been wanting to tell you, but I'm also afraid you'll just swallow it and not do anything."
"What the devil are you talking about?"
"I'll tell you. But promise me you won't be too hurt. For a while, after you brought Shi Xiu home and recognized him as a blood brother, everything was all right. But later, he began dropping hints. The nights you were on duty he would say. 'Brother's not coming home again. Won't you be lonely, sleeping by yourself?' I ignored him, though he made such remarks more than once. But never mind about that. Yesterday morning, I was in the kitchen washing my neck when that rogue came up behind me. Seeing that there was no one around, he slipped his hand under and fondled my breasts. He said: 'Sister-in-law, are you pregnant?' I pushed his hand away. I was going to yell, but I was afraid the neighbors would laugh and mock you. Then, back you come, soaked to the gills. How could I speak? 'I hate him so I could tear him apart with my teeth, and you ask sweetly after brother Shi Xiu'!"
Yang was consumed with rage. " 'A tiger's picture shows its pelt but not its bones; you can know a man's face but not his heart!' That villain had the nerve to come to me with a lot of stories about Hai the Preceptor, and all the while there was nothing to it! The lout is scared. His idea was to smear you before you could speak!"
Angrily, Yang said to himself: "He's not my real brother. I'll drive him away, and that'll be the end of it."
At daylight he went downstairs and spoke to his father-in-law. "Salt the animals that are already slaughtered. From today on, we won't do any more of this business," he said. He smashed the counters and tables in the butcher shop.
Shi Xiu, when he was bringing out meat to hang at the front door and open the shop, saw the wreckage. A shrewd fellow, he understood at once. He smiled.
"Of course. Yang got drunk and let the cat out of the bag. His wife turned the tables by accusing me of getting fresh, and got him to close the shop. If I argue, it will only be washing Yang Xiong's dirty linen in public. I'd better retreat a step and try to think of another plan."
He went in and collected his belongings. Yang Xiong, not wanting to embarrass him, left first. Carrying his bundle, his dagger at his waist, Shi Xiu bid Master Pan farewell.
"I've imposed on your household too long. Today, brother has closed the shop and I must go. The accounts are written out in detail. If they're so much as a penny off, may Heaven strike me dead."
Master Pan had received his orders from his son-in-law and couldn't ask Shi Xiu to stay. He let him depart.
Shi Xiu found an inn in a nearby lane, rented a room and moved in.
"Yang Xiong is my pledged blood brother," he thought. "If I don't clear this matter up, I may be sending him to his death. He believes his wife and blames me. At the moment, I'm in no position to argue. I must be able to prove it to him. I'll find out when he's on duty again at the prison, get up at the fourth watch, and see what the score is."
After a couple of days at the inn, he hung around outside Yang Xiong's front gate. That evening, he saw a young guard from the prison taking off with the warden's quilt.
"That means he's on duty tonight." Shi Xiu said to himself. "I can do a little work and see what happens."
He returned to the inn and slept till the fourth watch. He rose, hung on his dagger, quietly left the inn, and concealed himself in the shadows of the lane near Yang Xiong's rear gate. Around the fifth watch the friar, with a wooden fish tucked under his arm, came to the head of the lane and peered stealthily around. Shi Xiu darted behind and grabbed him, pressing his dagger against the friar's neck.
"Don't move. One sound and you're a dead man. The truth, now. What are your orders from Hai the monk?"
"Spare me, bold fellow. I'll speak."
"If you're quick about it, I'll let you live."
"Hai the Preceptor is mixed up with Master Pan's daughter. He comes every night. When I see incense burning at the rear gate, that's the signal to tell him he can slip it in. At the fifth watch I beat on the wooden fish and call to prayers. That's to tell him to pull it out."
"Where is he now?"
"In the house, sleeping. When I bang on this fish, he'll leave."
"Give it to me, and your clothes."
Shi Xiu snatched the fish. As the friar was undressing, Shi Xiu drew the dagger across his throat and killed him. He put on the friar's cassock and his knee-length stockings, sheathed the dagger, and entered the lane, tapping the wooden fish.
At the sound, Hai hurriedly got out of bed, flung on his clothes, and went downstairs. Ying'er opened the rear gate and the monk darted into the lane. Shi Xiu was still loudly clobbering the fish.
"Must you make such a racket?" the monk hissed.
Shi Xiu did not reply, but let him walk to the head of the lane. Suddenly he flung the monk down and pressed him to the ground.
"If you raise your voice I'll kill you. I'll have your clothes first."
Hai the Preceptor recognized Shi Xiu. He dared not struggle or cry out. Shi Xiu stripped him and left him without a stitch.
Silently, he pulled the dagger out of his stocking and finished the monk with three or four stabs. He placed the knife beside the body of the friar, tied the clothes of the 2 men into a bundle, and returned with it to the inn. Softly, Shi Xiu opened the inn gate. Quietly, he closed it. Then he went to bed. Of that, we'll say no more.
An old man called Master Wang who sold gruel in the district was carrying his pots on a shoulder-pole at the fifth watch and holding a lantern, followed by a little boy. They were out to catch the early mounting trade. The old man stumbled over the corpses and fell, spilling the gruel. "Oh," exclaimed the little boy. "There's a drunken monk lying here." The old man groped around. His hands felt blood. He uttered a wild cry and went into hysterics. Neighbors opened their doors and hurried out, striking lights. They saw "bloody gruel" spread all over the place and two bodies lying on the ground. The neighbors seized the old man and hauled him off to court. And as a result, disaster struck from the heavens, flames rose from the earth.

When Madcap returned and saw that the shop was closed he wanted to leave, but Old Pan said: "Wait a minute. I know what you're thinking. You've just got back after two days absence and you see all the butcher's implements have been packed away, so you think we've decided to close the shop and you have to leave. But even if it wasn't such an excellent business, even if we did decide to close the shop, we'd still keep you here and look after you. No, let me tell you how it is. This daughter of mine was previously married to a certain Registrar Wang of this district. Sadly, he died and this is the second anniversary of his death. We are going to have some prayers said for him, that is why we've closed the business for a couple of days. Tomorrow I have asked some monks from the Temple of Divine Favours to come and perform the rites and I'd like to ask you to take charge of it all. I'm an old man and I can't manage late nights. That's why I'm telling you this."
"Now that you've told me," said Madcap, "I shall just be patient."
"Then from now on please don't have any more suspicions. I hope you will carry on as before."
They drank a few cups and ate some vegetarian food, and then cleared up the cups and dishes.

Some lay brothers turned up carrying the scriptures on a pole. They set up an altar and arranged the Buddha images and the dishes for offerings, together with drums, cymbals and gongs, incense, lamps and candles, while vegetarian dishes were prepared in the kitchen. In the afternoon Morbid came home and said to Madcap: "Dear brother, this evening I am on duty at the prison, I won't get home till late. I shall have to rely on you to see to everything."
"Don't worry, brother," said Madcap. "I'll take care of it for you."
When Morbid had left, Madcap went to wait in front of the door. In a little while he saw a priest approaching with a chicken. This is what met his eyes:
A gleaming pate, fresh from the razor, assiduously perfumed with musk; a warm yellow cassock, newly stitched, exuding a heady odour of sandalwood; curling slippers, stained deep green by the craft of Fujian, a sash of nine tassels, dyed with true purple fetched from the west; bold staring eyes, forever turning after beautiful women, a sensual mouth, full of sweet words, apt for seducing young women at funerals. In the extremity of his lust, he searches out the nuns in their convents; when the lecherous fit is upon him, he ambushes pilgrims in the abbot's quarters.
This priest entered and greeted Madcap most reverently. Madcap returned the greeting and said: "Please have a seat, father." An assistant bearing two containers followed immediately behind.
Madcap went to call the old man: "A priest has come, sir." When in due course the old man appeared, the priest greeted him with: "Godfather, why do you never come and see me at the temple?"
"Well, you see," the old man answered, "I've got this shop now, and I haven't had time to go anywhere."
The priest said, "Here are a few poor gifts to celebrate the Registrar's anniversary. Just a few noodles and some dates."
"Oh dear," said the old man. "There was no need for that, it's really too generous of you!" He told Madcap to take the gifts. Madcap took them inside and ordered the servants to bring tea, which was served to the priest at the door.
At this point the woman came downstairs. She didn't have to be in deep mourning, but was just plainly dressed with scarcely any make-up. "Who sent these things?" she asked Madcap.
"A priest," he replied. "He calls your father godfather."
She looked pleased. "It must be Brother Hai — Pei Ruhai that is, a very good man. He used to manage the family silk shop, but then he left the world to enter the Temple of Divine Favours. Since his superior is a secular prelate, he was able to name my father as his godfather. He's just two years older than I am, so I call him elder brother. At the temple everyone calls him Father Hai. Just wait till you hear him chanting the prayers this evening, he's got a lovely voice!"
"I see," said Madcap. But in his heart he felt certain misgivings.
When the woman went down to see the priest, Madcap with his hands behind his back followed her some of the way, but then stood and watched from behind the curtain. He saw the priest rise to his feet and with joined hands greet her most effusively.
"You are really too generous, elder brother," she said.
"Just a few trifling gifts, my dear, nothing to make a song and dance about."
"How can you say that? How can we accept things from someone who has renounced the world?"
"Our temple has just built a new oratory for the souls of those who suffered violent death by land or water. I would have asked you to come and view it, only I wasn't sure if your husband would approve or not."
"My husband's not narrow-minded. Actually when my mother was dying I made a vow to have prayers said for the release of her soul. I have been meaning for some time to pay you a visit at the temple and trouble you to arrange it for me."
"But that is absolutely one of my duties, how could it be any trouble? You have only to say the word and all shall be done according to your wishes."
"Well, then, elder brother, let me request you to read some more sutras for my mother."
At this point a servant brought tea and the woman took a cup and wiped the rim with her handkerchief and offered it with both hands to the priest. Receiving it, he stared greedily at the woman, while she simpered back at him. Lust, as they say, engenders boundless audacity. The fact that Madcap was watching behind the curtain was no hindrance. Madcap said to himself: "'Virtue's not always what it seems, morality is oft a sham.' The hussy likes to use flirtatious language to me, I've observed it more than once. But I always treated her as if she were my true relative. Now it's clear she's no better than she ought to be. Still, if I catch her at it, it's no good her thinking I won't act on behalf of my friend."
Madcap was by now highly suspicious. He drew aside the curtain and made his appearance. The lecherous bonze put down his cup and said: "Please have a seat, sir." The woman said: "This gentleman is a brother my husband has just adopted."
Smiling meekly the priest said: "May I be permitted to ask your name, sir, and where you are from?"
"Shi Xiu from Jinling," he replied shortly. "They call me Madcap because I've a habit of helping people just for the hell of it. I'm a pretty ordinary type, with no airs and graces, I trust you'll forgive me."
"No offence, no offence!" the monk replied. "I'd better go and fetch the other monks for the service," he said and prepared to take his departure.
"Come back soon, brother," the woman said.
"I will, I will," said the priest.
After seeing the priest off, she returned. Madcap was standing by the door with lowered head, lost in thought. No doubt you've heard it said, my friends, that among all the people of this world, it's the priests who are the most lecherous. Why should this be? Seeing that laymen and priests are all men, born of the father's seed and the mother's blood, why should the priests be more lecherous? It's like the story of Pan's donkey in the Three Books. Of all the people in the world it's the priests who have the easiest life. Three meals a day, with good food supplied free by benefactors, a monastery full of spacious rooms and grand halls to live in, no worldly affairs to cause unrest, a comfortable bed with fine covers to sleep on, nothing to tax the brain and all the time in the world to dream. Compare this with the rich man, who even if he lives in plenty, each day has so many tiresome affairs to worry him, and can't sleep at night because his mind is obsessed with money and possessions, not to mention the women who share his bed and trouble him with their demands. Or compare the life of the common man, every day spent in bitter toil, longing when he rises in the morning for evening to come, up at dawn and not in bed till late at night, and when at last it's bedtime unable to go to bed without first feeling around in the rice bin and finding it empty, knowing tomorrow there's no money left. Even if the wife has some charms, he can't work up much enthusiasm. Now, if we bear in mind all these facts about the monks and their easy life, we can understand this kind of affair. People in the old days used to satirize such things, they said the monks were really terrible. Su Dongpo for instance wrote: "A smooth shaven head and poisonous as a snake, the two things simply can't be separated." There's also a little verse about monks:

In one word, you can call him bonze
Or baldpate does as well,
Devil's fiddler if you like,
Or sex-crazed fiend from hell.

Madcap stood in front of the door thinking for a long time. Then he went to help welcome the priests. In a little while a cleric appeared and lit candles and joss-sticks. Then came Father Hai, mustering a whole company of bonzes to attend the altar. Madcap and the old man received them together. When they had been served tea, drums and cymbals began to sound and the singing of the praises of the dead man commenced. Father Hai and another young monk of about the same age officiated, wielding the bells and pestles, dispatching written prayers by burning them, making offerings to the defenders of the faith and the guardians of the altar and praying that the spirit of the departed registrar be soon permitted to enter the kingdom of heaven. At this point the woman appeared, got up in her widow's weeds. She approached the altar with a little incense burner in her hands and lit joss-sticks as she worshipped the Buddha. Father Hai waved his bells and chanted with redoubled vigour. And when the other priests caught sight of Morbid's wife, they were all plunged into confusion. Here's how it was:
The deacon reads the litany crazily, he gets it all back to front; the preceptor makes a thorough mess of reciting the scriptures, you can't make head or tail of it. The acolytes lighting the incense knock over the vase; the brother who's supposed to carry the candle picks up the joss-sticks instead. During the antiphons and the homily, the Song Dynasty is read as Tang; in the penitential ritual Registrar Wang is called Bailiff Wang. The person shaking the bells lets them fly from his hand. The one beating the cymbals falls senseless to the ground. The rhythm blurs, the sounds become harsh. The whole place is in turmoil, the ceremony in chaos. The keeper of the scriptures is so confused he absent-mindedly beats the acolyte's hands instead of the drum, the choir-master's vision is so dazzled he beats out a rhythm on an old monk's bald pate. After ten years of asceticism, they let go for an instant, and then a thousand door-gods would not suffice to hold them back.
Now when those priests saw Morbid's wife at the ceremony, unconsciously their hands began to dance and their feet began to tap and all thoughts of piety and spirituality were scattered to the winds. They were totally unable to control themselves. It's due to this kind of thing that you'll seldom meet a truly virtuous priest!
Madcap was watching from one side. "Talk of piety!" he scoffed. "They say true who say ''tis easier far to put on piety than to avoid sin.'"
In a little while when the ceremony for the dead was finished the priests were all invited inside for a vegetarian meal. Father Hai stationed himself at the back where he could leer at the woman, who laughed back, covering her mouth with her hand. The two of them went on ogling each other, making no attempt to hide their feelings. Madcap observed it all, with considerable distaste. The monks sat down at the table. First a few cups of simple wine were drunk, then the vegetarian food was served and the gift of money distributed. "Please tuck in, fathers," the old man said.
In no time the priests had scoffed their food and stood up to take a post-prandial stroll. After a few turns, they returned to the altar. Madcap was very ill at ease, and complaining of a stomach pain went to rest in the room next door.
Now her lust had been aroused, the woman seemed not to care at all about being observed and went to serve the priests herself. The drums and cymbals sounded again and a little later tea and snacks were served. Father Hai exhorted the monks to pray earnestly, begging the lord of heaven to show his mercy, as they scattered holy water about and worshipped the Three Treasures. The service continued till nearly midnight. The other monks were exhausted, but our friend Father Hai still went on chanting at the top of his voice. As the woman watched behind the curtain in the doorway, her passions blazed up, she was overcome with desire. She told the maid to tell Father Hai she wanted to speak to him. Eagerly the bald lecher approached her. Grasping his sleeve, she said: "Dear brother, tomorrow when you come to receive the fee, please speak to my father about the prayers for my mother. You won't forget, will you?"
"I won't forget. I shall tell him a vow's a vow and ought to be fulfilled," said the priest. Then he added: "That brother-in-law of yours looks pretty fierce."
"You needn't worry about him," she replied. "He's not even a real relation."
"Then I won't. I supposed he was a real brother of the Warden's."
The two of them chattered happily together for a while, until the priest went off to scatter grain for the ghosts. They didn't know that Madcap was in the room next door, pretending to sleep and taking note of everything. That night at three in the morning when the altar had been dismantled and all the paper offerings burnt, the priests gave thanks and departed. The woman went upstairs to sleep. Madcap thought to himself: "My friend has such a noble spirit, it's really bad luck he picked a bitch like that!" But he kept his indignation to himself and took himself off to sleep in the workshop.
No one said anything about all this when Morbid returned next day. After eating he went out again and immediately Father Hai was there knocking on the door, having changed into a smart new robe. When the woman heard he had come, she hurried downstairs to receive him, inviting him to come in and sit down, and ordering tea. She thanked him for the service the day before: "We put you to a lot of trouble yesterday and you still haven't received the fee," she said. "It's nothing," he replied. "I've come to tell you about those prayers for your mother's soul we talked about yesterday, dear sister. When I go back to the temple I shall be chanting the sutras. Just write out the prayer you want said, that's all it needs."
"All right," she said. She told the maid to go and ask her father to join them. When he came in the old man thanked the priest. "I'm an old man and I haven't much staying power nowadays," he said. "I'm afraid I neglected my duties as host last night. It was most unfortunate that Mr. Shi was also indisposed and there was no one to look after you properly. Do please forgive us."
"There's nothing to worry about, godfather," the priest said.
The woman said, "I want to renew the service for mother's soul. Brother Hai says he will be performing a service tomorrow at the temple and will add the prayers for mother. Let him go back to the temple now and recite the sutras and we will go along after breakfast tomorrow and write down her name on the prayers that are to be chanted. It will mean we have fulfilled our duty."
The old man said: "It sounds a good idea, only tomorrow we may have a lot of business and there won't be anyone to look after it."
"We can leave Mr. Shi to look after it. What's the problem?"
"We'll do as you say then. Tomorrow we'll go to the temple."
The girl went and got some money for the offering and gave it to the priest. "I fear this is very little recompense for your pains, Brother Hai. Tomorrow we'll come to the temple and beg a bowl of plain noodles from you."
"I shall await your coming to burn incense." Having received his fee he stood up and thanked them: "It is more than I merit. I shall go back now and share it with the others, and later I shall expect you, sister, for the ceremony."
The woman saw him off. Madcap, after resting a while in the workshop, rose to get on with his work of slaughtering pigs.
When Morbid came back that evening, his wife waited till he had eaten and washed his hands and feet. Then she prompted her father to say to him: "My daughter here promised my old lady on her deathbed to give her a service for the dead at the Temple of Divine Favours. I want you to know that we are going to go and perform the sacrifice there tomorrow. We won't be long."
"Why couldn't you tell me that yourself?" Morbid said to his wife.
"I thought you might be angry if I said it. I didn't dare," she said.
Nothing of importance happened that evening. They all just went to bed.
Next day Morbid rose at dawn and went off to report for duty at the office. As soon as Madcap got up he went to work in the shop. The woman began by painting her face and dressing herself up to the nines. Then she packed some incense, bought paper offerings for burning and candles, and ordered a sedan chair. Madcap was busy with the shop from early morning and he paid no heed to all this. When breakfast was over the maid, Ying, also dolled herself up and a little later the old man, in a new suit of clothes, came to Madcap and said: "I shall have to trouble you Mr. Shi to keep an eye on the place for me while I and my daughter go and fulfil our vow. We won't be long."
"Of course I'll look after everything," Madcap replied. "Take good care of your daughter, burn plenty of incense, and come back soon." But he was full of forebodings.
The sedan set off for the Temple of Divine Favours, with the old man and Ying, the maid, walking beside it. There is an old poem which comments aptly on all this:

You may study your scriptures all morning,
And chant your fine prayers until late
But the finest of prayers and intentions
Can nowise alter your fate.
How can the heart that's not blind
Ask heaven to change its mind?
If it's melons you plant you'll have melons,
And if you plant beans you'll get beans.
So it's what's in the heart from the outset
That determines what everything means.
Is it Hell, is it Heaven, who knows?
Each one of us reaps what he sows.

These words, handed down from olden time, tell us that good and evil get their desserts, as sure as shadow follows substance. Best stick to the six virtues and the ten thousand reasons, respect the Three Pillars — the Buddha, the Law and the Monkhood — and the Five Precepts — kill not, steal not, lust not, gossip not, drink not. Unfortunately the clergy can turn into dogs and swine, a disgrace to their tradition and a legacy of shame to future generations.
Now it was solely on account of this woman that the bald lecher, Father Hai, had asked Old Pan to be his godfather. He had however been so far prevented by Morbid's watchful eye and could not proceed in the affair. Since he and the woman had first been acquainted, eyes and looks had spoken volumes, but as yet nothing of substance had occurred. Nevertheless, on the night of the ceremony he had seen that she was really interested. The appointment was duly made, and now the bald lecher, having sharpened his spear and polished his sword, that is to say, having girded up his loins, went to wait at the main gate of the temple. When he saw the sedan approaching he could scarcely contain himself. He dashed forward to receive them.
"I'm afraid we are giving you too much trouble," Old Pan said.
Descending from the chair, the woman said: "We are very very grateful to you, dear brother."
"Not at all, not at all," said Father Hai. "I have personally been in the oratory with the other monks chanting the sutras since dawn. I took no rest until just now. I have been waiting for you so we can burn the prayers. This is a most meritorious business." He led the girl and the old man into the oratory, where flowers, fruit, incense, candles and the like had been set out and a dozen or so monks were chanting sutras. The woman greeted them reverentially, wishing them all a thousand happinesses, and then paid homage to the Three Treasures. Father Hai led her before the Buddha of the Underworld to offer prayers for the remission of sins. After the chanting of the prayers paper offerings were burnt and then the priests were invited to a meal, in recompense for their services. Father Hai now proposed that his godfather and dear sister take tea with him in his inner sanctum. He was inviting the woman into his room in the heart of the temple buildings. All had been prepared in advance: the moment he called for tea two novices appeared with it. The tea was brewed from the choicest leaves and served in snow-white cups on a vermilion tray. When everyone had put their cups down, he said: "Please come and sit inside for a while, dear sister." He led her into a small chamber where some paintings by famous artists were displayed on a gleaming black table and sticks of sweet incense were burning on a little altar. The old man and his daughter sat at the table, the priest sat down opposite them and the maid, Ying, stood on one side.
The girl said: "What a wonderful place this is, brother, for a holy person like you. So quiet and secluded, so harmonious!"
"Don't make fun of me," the priest replied. "How can this compare with your great mansion?"
"We've troubled you for a whole day, now," the old man said. "We should be going."
The priest wouldn't hear of it. "You come here so seldom," he said. "Besides, you're like part of my family, and my sister paid for the banquet today, so why don't you stay and have a simple bowl of noodles with me before you go? The brothers will have it ready in no time." He had scarcely finished speaking when two platters were brought in, the kind of stuff that's only brought out on special occasions, rare fruit and exotic dishes as well as every kind of vegetarian fare. This food completely covered the table.
"You've prepared a feast, why have you gone to so much trouble?" she said.
"It's not really worthy of you, it's just a small mark of my esteem," he answered with a smile.

The brothers filled their cups and Father Hai said: "It's such a long time since you've been here, godfather. Please try some of this wine."
The old man drank and said: "Excellent wine, really first-class."
"A benefactor showed us how to make it the other day. We made three or four gallons. Another day I'll send over a few bottles for your son-in-law."
"Oh no, you really shouldn't," the old man said.
"I'm sorry I have nothing better to give you, dear sister," Father Hai said. "But do at least taste a cup of this wine."
The two brothers poured wine in turn, and even Ying was encouraged to have a few cups.
"You're a wonderful host, but really I can't drink any more," the girl said.
"You come so seldom, you've got to have a few more cups!"
The old man asked for the sedan chair carriers to be brought in so they could all drink a cup together.
"No need to be concerned about them, godfather," the priest said. "I've already arranged it. They've got a place to sit and drink with the brothers outside. So don't worry, just relax and have a few more cups."
Of course it was on account of the girl that the bald lecher had arranged to have this exceptionally strong wine. Old Pan needed little persuading. He drank two more cups and became irremediably drunk.
Then the priest said: "We'd better send godfather to bed to sleep it off." He called two brothers to lend a hand, and they helped the old man to a nice quiet room where he could sleep. Then he said to the girl: "Now you can sit back and enjoy a few more cups." Well, in the first place the girl was quite willing, but in addition the wine had enflamed her passions. Is it not said that wine provokes passion and lust ruins mankind? With a few cups of wine under her belt, she felt her head spinning. "Oh, brother," she gabbled, "why do you keep wanting me to drink wine?"
"It's because I hold you in such high esteem," he replied, laughing wildly.
"I can't drink any more," she said.
"Please come up to my room and see my Buddha's tooth," said he.
"Ooh, yes, I want to see your Buddha's tooth," she said.
He led her upstairs, to an upstairs room which was his bedroom, beautifully furnished. She was absolutely delighted with it. "What a beautiful bedroom you have, it's so neat," she said.
"The only thing missing is a mistress for it," he said, smirking.
"Why don't you look for one?" said she, with a giggle.
"Where would I find a benefactor like that?" he said.
"Come on, show me your Buddha's tooth," she said.
"Send Ying away and I'll get it out," he said.
"Ying, why don't you go down and see if the master has woken up?" she said to the maid.
As soon as Ying had gone off to see her master, he locked the door. "Ooh, brother, why are you locking me in?" said she.
The bald lecher's lewd heart was beating wildly. He rushed to the woman and embraced her, saying: "I love you passionately. For two whole years you have filled my thoughts. Now you are here at last, there's this wonderful opportunity, surely you are going to make me happy?"
She said: "My husband's not a good man to get on the wrong side of. You just want to ruin me. If he gets to know he won't forgive you."
He knelt and said: "Take pity on me, I implore you."
She raised her hand and said: "You priests just want to get people into trouble. This hand of mine ought to give you a big slap."
He giggled and said: "Go ahead, do, and please don't spare me."
She was fully aroused now. She hugged him tight and said: "Do you really think I should hit you?"
His reply was to hug her back. Then, after removing all clothing and apparel, they embarked on the delights of the shared pillow. Truly we can say:
Where now the teachings of religion, what price moral precept? Crazed with desire, what cares he for the husband's hurt? Consumed by lust, she's out to ensure His Reverence's downfall. In loud pants his breath comes, like an ox snoring under the willows. With coarse meanings her sweet cries blend, like an oriole warbling among flowers. Wanton words and thoughts whispered in the ear by the one, eternal oaths and pillow-vows from the other. The priest's room is transformed into a shrine to pleasure; the Temple of Divine Favours is become a true garden of delights. How shameful to think that the precious seed of enlightenment is all to be spilt in Felicity!
From ancient times until now, people have handed down a verse which compares these priests to woodworm. There is no timber so sound that they won't bore into it. What defence have ordinary people against them? As the old poem says:

Like lascivious monkeys these profligate beasts
Reverse the true sense of their calling as priests.
So leave them like beasts in the jungle to roam,
And never admit them into your home!

After they had both come, the lewd bonze hugged her tight and said: "If you love me, even death has no terrors for me. But although I'm glad you've made me so happy today, it is such a brief instant of happiness! If we cannot prolong our pleasures for a whole night, in the end it is going to kill me."
She said: "Don't worry, I have a plan. About twenty nights every month my husband has to be on duty at the prison. I shall bribe Ying and have her stand at the back door every night. When it gets late, if my husband isn't home, she will set out a little altar and burn incense as a signal. Then you will know it is safe to come. If you are afraid of going to sleep at dawn and not waking in time, you can find one of those lay brothers who wake people up and pay him to come to the back door and beat the wooden fish and sing out a prayer, then you'll know you have to leave. If he is in your employ there are two advantages: one, he can keep watch outside for you, and two, he can make sure you don't oversleep."
The monk thought this was a wonderful idea. "Masterly!" he said. "You do just as you said. And for my part, there's a lay brother here called Brother Hu, I can get him to come and keep watch."
"I daren't linger here now, or those oafs will become suspicious," the girl said. "I'd better be going. Do make sure you arrange everything properly." She quickly rearranged her hair and repaired her make-up. Then she unlocked the door and went downstairs. She told Ying to waken her father and they hurriedly left the temple buildings. The sedan chair carriers had drunk and eaten and were waiting at the temple gates. Father Hai escorted her as far as the main gate of the compound and then she said goodbye to him and got into the chair and together with her father and Ying proceeded home. Of this no more.
As for Father Hai, he went off to find the lay brother who did the morning calls. At the temple this happened to be a lay brother called Hu, who lived like a hermit in a little hut at the back of the compound and was known to everyone as Brother Hu. He rose before dawn each day and came to strike the wooden fish, summoning people to morning prayers. As soon as it was light he would go begging for food. Father Hai called him to his room, where he had prepared a few cups of good wine and some silver to give him. Brother Hu stood there and said: "I haven't done anything, how can I take a reward? I've already received so much kindness from you."
Father Hai said: "I know well that you are very conscientious. One day I shall give you the money to help you buy your monk's certificate, so you can shave your head and become my disciple. For the moment take this and go and buy some proper robes." In fact Father Hai had often instructed the other priests to give Brother Hu food for the midday meal, and to take him along when there was a reading of the sutras so he too could receive some alms. Brother Hu was deeply grateful and had as yet been unable to repay the debt. "Now he gives me more silver," he said to himself, "it must be because he wants me to do something for him, maybe I shouldn't wait for him to say it first." So he said: "If you have something that needs doing, Father, or anything in which I can be of service to you, please don't hesitate to tell me."
Father Hai said: "Brother Hu, I know what a good person you are, so I won't beat about the bush. That daughter of Old Pan's wants to have a relationship with me, and we have agreed that when a little altar with incense is set up outside her back door it will be a signal for me to come. It's a bit difficult for me to hang about round there. But if you were to go along first and check for me if the coast is clear, I'd be able to go. It would also be helpful if when you get up at dawn to call the monks to prayers you could go round to the back door again and after making sure there's no one about strike the wooden fish and sing out a prayer so I'll know it's all right to come out."
"No problem at all!" said Brother Hu.
So it was agreed. When Brother Hu went next day to Old Pan's back door to beg for food, Ying came out and said: "You there, you Taoist, why don't you come to the front door to ask for food, what are you doing coming round the back?"
But Brother Hu began chanting his prayers and Felicity heard him. Having taken a look she went to the back door and asked: "Aren't you the disciple who gives the morning call to prayers?"
"That's right," he answered. "I prevent people from oversleeping, and in the evening I light incense and help people to gain merit."
Scarcely able to contain her excitement, she sent Ying upstairs to get a string of copper cash for the brother. When Ying had gone the brother said: "Father Hai has taken me into his confidence. He sent me here to reconnoitre."
"I know about it," she said. "You can come again tonight, and if you see the altar with incense burning, go and tell him."
He nodded. When Ying returned with the money, she gave it to him and he left. She went upstairs again, and there she unburdened herself to Ying. As they say: "A maid should be your slave." But provided there's something in it for her, why shouldn't she be happy to cooperate, even in an important affair? Likewise, the way things are between mistresses and servants, there's mutual exploitation but not trust. All the same, one can't do without them.
Well, it happened that Morbid was on duty at the prison that night. Before evening he came back to fetch his bedding so he could sleep there. Ying, who had already received some small recompense, didn't even wait till evening before starting to prepare the altar and set it up by the back door at dusk. Her mistress concealed herself to one side where she could watch. Some time after seven o'clock, a figure with its head wrapped in a scarf stole through the doorway. "Who is it?" Ying called. She got no reply. But when the handkerchief came off, a shining bald pate appeared. Recognizing Father Hai, the mistress now gently scolded: "You old devil, you know all the tricks!" They went upstairs together with their arms round each other's waists. Ying put away the altar, locked the back door and went to bed. The other two spent a night of bliss in each other's arms, tight as rubber, close as lacquer, like sugar in honey, like marrow in the bone, like a fish in water. It is said: "Pleasure hates the night to be so short, and only prays the golden rooster will postpone his call." They had only just gone to sleep when the tock-tock of the wooden fish was heard and the loud entoning of a prayer, startling the couple from their dreams. He hastily grabbed his clothes, and said: "I must be going. I'll see you again tonight."
"From now on come any time the altar is at the back door, don't fail me. But if it's not there, you most definitely must not come."
He rose and wrapped his head in the scarf as before and Ying opened the back door and let him out. From now on every time Morbid was on night duty at the prison the priest came to his house. There was no one there but the old man and he went to bed early. As for the maid, Ying, she was already on their side. It was only a question of deceiving Madcap. The woman was so besotted that she took little care. And the priest had tasted woman now — it was as if the two of them were bewitched. Whenever he received word from the brother, the priest was out of the temple like a shot. Felicity had fully involved Ying in the game, instructing her to let him in and let him out. So it was a joyous life for Pan's daughter, secretly entertaining her priest as lover. Soon the affair had been going over a month and the priest had made something like a dozen visits.
Now when Madcap closed the shop each day and bedded down in the workshop, he thought a good deal about this matter. Only he couldn't be sure: he had not actually seen the priest coming and going. Often he would jump out of bed at dawn, hoping to get to the bottom of the affair. All that happened was that he would hear the brother turning into the lane beating the wooden fish and loudly entoning a prayer. Now Madcap was no fool and he already had a pretty good idea what was afoot. This is how he argued to himself. "This lane is a cul-de-sac. Why does this lay brother come here every day, striking the wooden fish and shouting out prayers? There's something fishy about it." Then one day, the tenth of the eleventh month, when Madcap was awake at dawn, he heard the sound of the wooden fish and the brother entering the lane and stopping at the back door to sing out: "O Buddha of all the worlds, rescue all the faithful from hardship and misfortune." His suspicions aroused, he leapt out of bed and went to spy through a crack in the door. He saw someone with a scarf over his head emerge from the shadows and go off with the lay brother. Afterwards Ying came and locked the door. Madcap said to himself: "Brother, you are such a noble soul, this lustful woman is abominable, she's deceiving you, she's carrying on an affair."
As soon as it was light, he hung up his pork in the front of the shop to make some early sales. After breakfast he went to collect some accounts, and then headed for the government offices to find Morbid. He ran into Morbid just as he reached the town bridge. "Where are you going?" Morbid asked him. "I've been out collecting accounts, brother, so I decided to come and see you," he replied.
"I'm always so busy at work," Morbid said, "that I never have time to enjoy a few cups of wine with you. Let's go and sit down somewhere." He took Madcap into a little tavern under the town bridge where they chose a secluded alcove and sat down. Morbid told the waiter to bring a bottle of good wine and some fruit and nuts and seafood to go with it. But even after three cups Madcap remained quiet and thoughtful and Morbid, by nature impetuous, asked: "Is there something troubling you, brother, has something at home upset you or offended you?"
Madcap replied: "I've got no problem with your household. But since you have been so kind as to treat me almost as your own flesh and blood, will you permit me to mention something?"
"Why do you treat me like a stranger today? If you've something to say, then of course there's nothing to stop you."
"Well, when you go out each morning your mind is only on your official duties. You don't notice what is going on behind your back. Your wife is not behaving herself. I've seen things with my own eyes, several times, but I didn't like to say. But what I saw today was so clear I couldn't refrain from coming to find you. Please forgive my bluntness."
"I haven't got eyes behind my back. Who is it?"
"That bloody priest you got to read the service in your house, that Father Hai. He and your wife were making eyes at each other, I saw it all. And three days later when they went to the service in the temple they came back loaded with bottles of wine. Then recently a brother has been coming to our street beating the wooden fish and shouting out prayers. He makes a tremendous din. Well, this morning I got up at dawn to watch. I saw that bloody priest with a scarf round his head coming out of the house. She's a shameless woman, you'd be better off without her!"
Morbid exploded. "The filthy bitch, what's she playing at?"
"Keep calm, brother," Madcap said. "Don't say anything about this tonight. Just behave as usual. Tomorrow morning pretend you're going to be on night duty, then come back after midnight and knock on the door. That blackguard will undoubtedly try to escape by the back door and I'll grab him for you to dispose of."
"Right, that's what we'll do," said Morbid.
"But don't go babbling about it tonight," Madcap warned him again.
"I'll meet you again tomorrow," said Morbid.
They drank a few more cups, then paid the bill, went downstairs together and after leaving the tavern were about to go their separate ways, when suddenly Morbid was hailed by four or five of the Governor's officers. "Warden, we've been looking for you everywhere. The Governor is waiting in his garden; he told us to fetch you for some staff play with us. Hurry up now."
"The boss wants me, I'll have to go," Morbid said to Madcap. "You go on home." So Madcap took himself home, tidied up the shop and went to the workshop to sleep.
But Morbid was summoned by the Governor to the garden of the residence where he fought several bouts with the staff. The Governor enjoyed the spectacle and had wine brought. Ten big cups were drunk off as a prize. After this they left, but Morbid was invited by some of his colleagues to continue drinking with them. It was quite late when they helped him home, by now completely drunk. There's a poem which says:

'Tis said that wine and sex are oft combined;
The drunkard seeks to ease the sexual urge;
But now this hero's something on his mind
To fire a rage which drunkenness won't purge.

When Morbid's wife saw he was drunk, she thanked his friends and then got him upstairs with Ying's help. A lamp was lit and turned up fully. Morbid sat on the bed. Ying went to take off his boots, the wife removed his cap and unwound his turban. Suddenly as Morbid looked at his wife, something arose in his heart. As they say: "In drunkenness the truth will out." He pointed his finger at her and shouted: "You slut, you strumpet, I'm going to do for you, regardless!" She had a great shock and didn't dare answer, but simply helped him into bed. As he drifted off to sleep he continued to mutter: "Slut, filthy whore, that blackguard thinks he can spit in the mouth of the tiger! Don't you imagine I'm ever going to let you off!"
Not daring even to breathe, she waited for him to fall asleep.
Five o'clock. Morbid roused himself from his stupor and asked for a drink of water. His wife ladled out a bowl and gave it to him. On the table the lamp was still burning. Morbid drank and then asked her: "Didn't you come to bed last night?"
"You were dead drunk," she said. "I was afraid you might throw up, I didn't dare undress. I spent the night at the foot of the bed."
"Did I say anything?"
"You can always hold your drink, you just go to sleep, but last night I was worried for some reason."
Then he said: "I haven't had time lately to enjoy a cup of wine with my good friend Madcap. Would you prepare some food so I can invite him here?"
She made no reply, but just sat on the step of the bed with tears welling from her eyes and sighing. Morbid asked: "Listen, I was drunk last night but you say I didn't hurt you, so why are you so upset?"
She pretended to hide her tears and said nothing. So he asked her again and she went on covering her face and pretending to cry. Finally he pulled her up onto the bed and insisted on knowing what was troubling her. Choking back her sobs she said: "When my parents arranged my marriage to Registrar Wang, I thought I was going to be married once and for all. Who would have thought he'd go and leave me in the lurch? Now I'm married to you, such a great hero, and a gentleman to boot, who would have imagined that you couldn't protect me?"
"Great heavens! Who dares to insult you! When have I failed to protect you?"
"At first I didn't want to say anything. I was afraid you'd only listen to him. Then I thought of telling you but I was afraid you'd just let it pass."
"You'd better explain what all this is about!"
"Don't be too upset, then, if I tell you. It all began when you adopted that Madcap and brought him home. It was all right at first. It wasn't till later he began to make insinuations. When he knew you weren't coming home to sleep, he would look at me and say: 'Brother's away again tonight. Won't you be lonely sleeping on your own?' Of course I paid no attention, even though it didn't happen just once. Anyway, never mind that. Yesterday morning, when I was washing my neck in the kitchen, the blighter came up behind me and because there was no one else about put one arm round and touched my breast and said: 'Are you pregnant?' I slapped his hand away and I would have screamed, only I was afraid the neighbours would laugh at us and make up stories about you. I was waiting till you came home. But you came back drunk as a lord and I didn't dare say anything. I hate him, I can't bear him, and you come and ask me about your dear friend!" Well it was a case of:

Smart answers the wanton will never lack,
'Tis the husband's role to be misled.
As the front door closes on Morbid's back,
The back door admits the priest to his bed.

Morbid was outraged. He said: "'You can paint a dragon or a tiger but you can't show its bones; you can recognize the outside of a man but you can't know his heart.' The bugger even came and told me to my face a whole lot of stuff about Father Hai, stories without any foundation. Obviously he was scared. He wanted to get in first with this story about you." He kept muttering angrily: "He's not my brother any more. I'll chuck him out, that's what!"

As soon as it was light, Morbid went downstairs and said to his father-in-law: "Kill all the livestock and salt the carcasses. From today the business is closed." In a trice he had broken up the counter and the workbench. When next morning Madcap went to put out the meat he found counter and workbench smashed.

Madcap was no fool, he couldn't fail to understand. He laughed grimly: "I see," he said. "So Morbid got drunk and couldn't keep his mouth shut, he let the cat out of the bag. He's listened to that hussy's account of things, she's turned it all upside down and said I misbehaved. She's made her husband close the shop. If I try to have it out with him it'll make him lose face. I'd better back off a bit and find a different way." He went back into the workshop and packed his things. Morbid also kept away, reluctant to embarrass him. Madcap shouldered his pack, stuck a sharp knife into his belt and went to say goodbye to Old Pan. "I've bothered you in your home too long already. My brother has closed the shop now, so I shall take myself off. I've drawn up the accounts perfectly clearly, there's not a cent missing. If there's anything not right, may heaven strike me dead." Following his son-in-law's instructions, the old man made no attempt to detain him. The poem says:

Pillow talk always appeals;
What's behind you can't be seen.
The faithful friend he expels,
And lets the adulterer in.

After saying goodbye, Madcap went and found an inn in a neighbouring side-street and rented a room for himself. He was thinking: "Morbid is my adopted brother. If I don't clear this matter up between us, it'll be putting his life at risk. The trouble is that for the moment he's been convinced by that woman and thinks I'm guilty. I can't prove anything, but I've got to try and make him see how things really are. I'd better go and find out which day he is going to sleep at the prison, then get up before dawn and solve the riddle." After two days at the inn he went to watch at Morbid's door. That evening he saw a servant from the gaol carry out Morbid's bedding, and he said to himself: "That means he's on duty tonight. I must get to work now."

He returned to the inn to sleep but rose during the fourth watch. He took his dagger, quietly opened the door of the shop and stole round to the lane which Morbid's back door opened onto. There he hid in the shadows to watch. Exactly at five o'clock the lay brother appeared clutching the wooden fish. When he reached the mouth of the lane he peered around cautiously. Madcap slipped out from his hiding-place and came up behind him. He laid one hand on him and with the other pressed the knife to his neck, whispering: "Don't move; if you make a noise I shall kill you! Just tell me the truth. Why did Father Hai tell you to come here?"

"I beg you, sir, spare my life and I will tell you," the lay brother stammered.

"Be quick then, or I'll kill you."

"Father Hai is having an affair with Old Pan's daughter. Every night he wants me to look and see if there's an altar outside the back door — that's the sign that says he's going to get it in. He told me to come at dawn to strike the wooden fish and pray to the Buddha — that lets him know it's time to pull it out."

"And where is he now?"

"He's still inside, sleeping. When I strike the wooden fish he'll come out."

"Give me your robes and the wooden fish." As the brother started undressing Madcap grabbed the wooden fish. When the brother got his clothes off, Madcap slit his throat. Then he dressed up in the dead brother's robes and knee-length stockings, put away his dagger, and walked into the lane striking the wooden fish.

Father Hai lying in bed heard the tock-tock of the wooden fish and hurriedly rose, threw on his clothes and rushed downstairs. Ying opened the back door and he slipped out. "Why do you keep von beating it?" he hissed to Madcap, who hadn't stopped striking the wooden fish. Madcap made no answer but waited till he got to the mouth of the lane and then threw him to the ground, pinned him down and growled: "Don't make a sound, keep quiet or I'll kill you! Just let me have your clothes."

Father Hai recognized Madcap and was too scared to struggle or open his mouth. Madcap stripped off all his clothes, leaving him stark naked, without a thread. Then silently he pulled the knife out of his stocking and stabbed the priest three or four times, till he was dead. He placed the knife beside the body of the brother, made all their clothes into a bundle and returned to the inn. He opened the door carefully and closed it quietly behind him and went back to bed. Of this no more.

Now in the town there was an old fellow called Wang, who sold rice soup. That morning he had taken up his gruel, and holding a lantern and followed by a young lad set forth to catch the early trade. Just as he came to the place where the corpses lay he happened to stumble and spilt his rice soup on the ground. At the same moment the boy shouted out: "Oh my God! There's a drunken priest lying here." After feeling around with his two hands, the old man discovered them to be smeared with blood. He began to curse loudly. He couldn't think what had happened. Some neighbours who heard all this opened their doors and came out. Torches were shone on the scene, revealing blood and gruel all over the place and two corpses lying on the ground. The neighbours detained the old man and insisted on taking him to the authorities. Truly,

Calamities fall from the skies;
Out of the ground disasters rise.

OLD Pan spoke to Shi Xiu, "Uncle, do not go. I understand your ideas. After an absence of two days you return, and find the butchery closed, and things cleared out, so you thought the business was finished. Even if the business was a failure you could still stay at our home. It is just two years since my daughter's first husband, Wang, died, and she wished to have a memorial service conducted by monks. Therefore we closed the butchery and monks will come from the Baoen Monastery tomorrow. We would like you to take charge of the arrangements made. I am too old, and would be continually falling asleep in the night."

"In that case," said Shi Xiu, "I will stay here for sometime."

"After this I must ask you, uncle, not to have any suspicions of what we do here," said Old Pan.

Early the next day the monk's assistant arrived to arrange the room for prayers. He erected an altar, arranged the drums, cymbals, gongs, and musical stone, and set out the lamps and incense. He then went into the kitchen to prepare the feast.

When Yang Xiong came he told Shi Xiu that he was on duty and would not be back that night. He must therefore not wait for him. He left all the matters in his hands.

"You need not worry about anything," said Shi Xiu. "I will look after everything."

Yang Xiong then departed and Shi Xiu took charge. Shortly afterwards the door curtain was raised and a young monk entered who gave Shi Xiu a Buddhist salutation. Shi Xiu also saluted, and asked the monk to be seated. He then called out to Old Pan in the next room, "Father-in-law, the monk has arrived."

Old Pan came in, and the monk spoke to him, "My adopted father, why have you not been to our temple for such a long time?"

"We have opened a new butchery here so that I have had very little spare time," said Old Pan.

"This is the anniversary of the death of Wang and I have not sent you any presents, but I hope that you will accept this vermicelli and some dates I have had prepared for you," said the monk.

"Why do you spend so much money? How unnecessary!" said Old Pan. He asked Shi Xiu to take them, and the latter carried the tray with the presents into the next room. Shi Xiu soon returned with tea which he offered to the monk.

Just then Madame Yang, Pan Qiaoyun, the "Clever Cloud," came down the staircase into the room. She was plainly dressed, and had no rouge on her face. She spoke to Shi Xiu, "Who has sent the presents?"

"They are from a monk who called your father his adopted father," said Shi Xiu.

Pan Qiaoyun laughed and said, "I know. They are from the monk Pei Ruhai, the monk whose religious name is Master Hai. He is a monastery tutor and a very honest man. He is the son of Old Pei of the silk goods shop, and is now at the Baoen Monastery. He is two years my senior, and therefore I can address him as elder brother; uncle, you can listen to his recital of the prayers this evening, as he has a very good tone."

"Is that so?" said Shi Xiu. In listening to her however, he suspected she had some hidden desire.

Shi Xiu did not follow her, but looked on through the bamboo curtain. He saw that the monk gave her a very elaborate salute. The woman asked the monk, "Why did you spend so much money for the presents?"

"Sister, the presents are so small that they are not worth mentioning," replied the monk.

"As you have become a monk, how can we accept your presents?" said the woman.

"At our monastery we have just begun building a prayer hall for the dead. We should like you to honor us with a vist to see it. I hope that your husband will raise no objections to that."

"I do not think he will mind that," said the woman.

"When my mother was dying I made a vow that I would offer prayers to those who have died in childbirth, and sooner or later I will trouble you to fulfill my vow for me in your temple."

"That's my business; whatever you order me I will do as you desire," said the monk.

"Sometime I will ask you to recite the prayers for my late mother's benefit," she said.

Just then a maid-servant entered with tea. The woman took the cup, wiped it clean with her sleeve, and then offered it to the monk. The monk took the cup, but at the same time he gazed amorously into her eyes. The woman returned his gaze with a smile.

Neither of them suspected that their exchange of flirtation was being closely watched by Shi Xiu behind the bamboo curtain. He now began to understand the woman a little better. He thought, "How deceptive are appearances. She always spoke to me in a very free and open manner, but I thought it was because I was a sworn brother of her husband. Now I think she cannot have been a very virtuous woman. She is now however in my hands, and I must deal with the matter for Yang Xiong." He raised the curtain, and entered the room.

The monk immediately put down his cup of tea and said, "Brother, please be seated."

The woman interposed, "This is the sworn brother of my husband."

The monk had suspicions at once and hurriedly inquired, "Brother, may I ask where you are from, and also your name?"

"Me! My name is Shi Xiu. I am from Nanjing! I help other people to revenge their wrongs and therefore they call me the 'Desperado.' I am however only a stupid fellow, and if I intrude in your affairs I hope that you will not resent it."

"Never mind! Never mind!" said the monk hurriedly, "I am just now going to summon the monks to come and commence the service." He left the room at once.

That fickle woman called after him, "You must soon come back." She then went into the inner room.

Shi Xiu stood near the door with bowed head in deep thought. It was not long before the monks arrived, lit the candles, and began to burn incense. They began their intoning of the prayers accompanied by drum beating, cymbals, etc., when Shi Xiu and Old Pan had supplied them with tea and hot soup.

Soon Pan Qiaoyun entered, lit her incense, and offered her prayers, swaying seductively as she performed the rituals. This aroused Hai the Tutor and her monk increased the sound of his intoning. The other monks were sent reeling and nudged each other as they witnessed this display of the two lovers. When the service was over the monks were asked to dine in the next room. Hai maneuvered his way to the rear of the monks, and turning his head to the woman he laughed. The woman smiled, but placed her hand over her mouth as though to avoid an explosion of laughter. They again exchanged lovers' glances and clearly made known their passions. Shi Xiu had noticed all this and was more upset.

The monks in the other room had all sat down, and partook of the vegetarian food. Old Pan wished them all a good time, and asking to be excused he withdrew to go to sleep. After the meal the monks strolled about the rooms. Shi Xiu said he had stomach ache, and begged to be excused—he thereupon lay down on a bench and pretended to go to sleep.

The woman now felt her passions rising so to divert her own thoughts she busied herself in making tea and serving it to the monks. The service went on until about I A.M. when most of the monks were drowsy, but Hai still continued reading the prayers with great vigor. Pan Qiaoyun, was behind a screen, and noticing this she allowed her passions to arise. She called a maid-servant and sent her to summon Hai to come to her. The young monk continued his intoning as before but slowly made his way towards the screen. When near Qiaoyun she seized his sleeve and said, "You must come here and collect the fees, and do not forget to speak to my father about the vows I made when mother died."

"I will not forget," said the monk. "I will tell him that you wish to redeem your vows as soon as possible. What about your uncle—is he not an awkward man?" Qiaoyun shook her head and said, "You take no notice of him. He is not a blood relation of ours."

"In that case I shall feel more at ease." So saying he clasped the woman's hand under cover of his sleeve and she moved the curtain to cover the act also. He laughed, returned to his place, and continued intoning the prayers as before. They did not realize that all this had been clearly seen by Shi Xiu who was pretending to be asleep on the bench.

About 4 A.M. the service was finished, and the monks departed. Qiaoyun went upstairs to sleep.

Shi Xiu thought, "My adopted brother, Yang Xiong, is a great hero, and it is a great pity that he married a loose woman of this kind." He could not avoid being angry at the position of affairs.

The next day Yang Xiong returned, but Shi Xiu did not speak about the matter. As soon as he had had his meal Yang Xiong however left again. Shi Xiu saw the young monk arrive, but this time he was dressed in his best clothes. Qiaoyun hurried downstairs, received him, and ordered tea to be brought. She said, "I am afraid that we put you to a lot of trouble last night, but we have not repaid you yet."

"That was only a very small affair. Last night we talked about your vows, and now we are reading prayers at our temple. You could just come to our temple, and get a written statement. That would be all right."

She agreed, and sent a girl servant to ask Old Pan to come, and discuss the matter. When he arrived he saluted the young monk, and apologized for retiring so early the previous night, but he had been very tired. "Uncle Shi Xiu fell sick, and also retired early so that there was no one to look after you. I am sorry."

"Do not be so courteous," said the monk.

Qiaoyun now spoke, "I want to redeem the vow I made when my mother died. Our friend tells me that tomorrow there will be a service at the monastery temple, and we might avail ourselves of the opportunity, and attend to pray."

"Very well," said Old Pan. "But I am afraid that we might be busy at the butchery tomorrow, and there will be nobody there to attend the matters."

"You can ask Shi Xiu to look after the business," she said.

"Just so," said Old Pan. "We can go to the temple tomorrow."

Qiaoyun then got the money for the services rendered by the monks, and handed it to the young monk. After returning suitable thanks he left for the temple.

Yang Xiong again returned home, and after supper Old Pan told Yang Xiong of the proposed visit to the temple the following day. Yang Xiong asked his wife why she did not speak to him herself, to which the woman replied that she was afraid that he might refuse her.

The next day a sedan chair was obtained for Qiaoyun and she set off about II A.M. accompanied by Old Pan and the girl servant Ying-er, carrying the candles and incense. The young monk Hai was waiting for them at the monastery gate, and he was much pleased to see them. Qiaoyun emerged from the chair, and thanked the monk for meeting them. The monk said, "The monks have been praying in the temple since early this morning, and we have awaited your arrival. He led the way into the hall where there were still about ten monks reading the scriptures.

Qiaoyun saluted, and gave three kowtows to the Buddha. After burning incense and paper, the monks were asked to go and get their meal, and Hai requested Qiaoyun and Old Pan to go to his private apartments for tea. Tea was duly served in silver cups with red saucers. When tea was finished Hai asked them to go into the adjoining room. It was a very small room with a black lacquer couch, and many pictures on the walls. On a small table was a vase with burning incense. Old Pan and Qiaoyun took their seats on the couch with the monk facing them.

"What a nice place you have," said Qiaoyun, "and how quiet and secluded!"

"Do not joke about my humble bare quarters," said the monk "it is a mere barracks compared to your honorable mansion." Old Pan said, "We have given you much trouble, we will now depart."

"All the food has been provided because of your visit, why do you depart without taking any? He then ordered the servant to bring in the food, and this was soon done. The meal was of the best food.

"Why do you prepare food for us; we give you a lot of trouble," remarked Qiaoyun to the monk.

"I am afraid the meal does not by any means equal my respects and feelings for you," he replied. He then pressed Old Pan to try the wine provided.

"What a fine taste!" said Old Pan.

"Yes, the brewing method I learned from a donor of our temple and used quite five piculs of rice in making it. I will send a bottle of it to your house tomorrow as you like the flavor."

"That is quite unnecessary," said Old Pan.

The servants kept filling Old Pan's cup with wine, and the girl servant who was sitting with them also drank several cups of wine. Old Pan wanted to summon the sedan-chair carriers also to drink of the wine, but Hai the Tutor, said that it was unnecessary as they had already had some with their food outside. In fact the monk had prepared this strong wine especially for Old Pan in order to further his own plans. Very soon Old Pan was drunk, and the monk suggested that he should now have a sleep. He summoned the servants to take Old Pan into another room to sleep on the bed there. Qiaoyun had also drunk some wine, and was feeling rather confused. She asked, "What was the use in getting me merely to drink the wine?"

The monk whispered, "Because I love you. Will you now come into another room to have a look at Buddha's tooth?"

"Very well, I should like to see it," she replied.

They went upstairs to a room which was the monk's private apartment and was nicely furnished. She was much pleased and said, "What a nice chamber, and how clean!"

"Yes, but it is short of the adornment of a woman."

She laughed, "Then why don't you get one?"

"Where is the donor who would present me with one?"

"But you asked me to come here to see Buddha's tooth."

"Well, first send away your girl servant, and then I will show it to you."

She told the girl to go downstairs, and see whether Old Pan had awakened. The girl went, and the monk closed the door after her.
Qiaoyun was now alone with him and she laughed. "Why do you close the door?"
"I am in love with you, and have waited for two years for this opportunity. I hope that we shall now complete our desires." He embraced her.
"You must not forget that my husband would be annoyed. You must not try to cheat me. If he finds out he will never forgive you."
He knelt down and said, "I hope that you will take pity on me."
"You are so skillful in dealing with me but I like to give you big blows upon your face with my hand." He laughed, "You would enjoy beating me."
He then picked her up and carried her to the bed, where he undressed her and had his heart's desire.
Thus they enjoyed themselves for a long time, after which the monk embracing her said, "If I die now I shall have no regrets. But today our pleasure has been brief and I should like to arrange a whole night's assignation."
"You must not worry about that. I have a plan. Twenty days out of one month my husband is on duty at the prison. I will bribe my girl servant and she will wait outside the back door. A table will be placed there with incense, and you can easily get in that way. You must arrange for a wandering monk to come at daybreak, and beat a wooden fish at our back door, and then you can depart in due time. You can, of course, bribe him to keep a lookout to see that no one is coming."
He was much pleased at this proposal and said, "Admirable! That will do. There is a wandering monk here, named Hu, and I will arrange with him to do so."
"I cannot stay here much longer. I am afraid that somebody will suspect me. I must go at once." She quickly combed her hair, rouged her face again, opened the door, and went downstairs. She told the girl servant to see if Old Pan was now ready, and she went into the original room. The chair-bearers were waiting at the gate. The young monk had followed Qiaoyun, and now conducted her to the gate. She entered her chair and with Old Pan and the servant girl returned home.
Master Hai soon arranged matters with the wandering monk named Hu who lived at a small temple close by. His duty at the temple was to arise before sunrise, and beat the wooden fish to summon all the monks to prayers.
The next day the wandering monk went to Old Pan's house, and met the girl servant who asked him, "Why do you come to the back door?"
The monk commenced to recite the prayers. Qiaoyun inside heard this, and coming out said, "Are you not the monk who announces the dawn?"
"Yes, I do that every day. You will also burn some incense to Buddha in the evening."
She was much pleased at this, and sent the girl servant upstairs to get a string of cash for the monk. As soon as the girl had gone the monk spoke, "I am the confident of the monk Hai who asked me to come here, and keep a lookout."
"I understand," she said, "you must come again this evening, and have another look. If there is an incense table here you can report to him and he can visit me."
The monk nodded his head as the girl just then returned, and handed him the money. He went his way.
Qiaoyun went upstairs, and there told the girl servant her plan, and gave her some money.
That evening Yang Xiong left for his duty in the prison. The girl servant duly placed the incense table near the back door, and shortly afterwards a man wearing a hat, contrary to clerical custom, entered the gate, and the girl asked who he was, but the man did not reply, but continued on his way. Qiaoyun who was near, however, took the cap from the man's head, and seeing then the shining skull of the monk she exclaimed, "What an excellent disguise!" They embraced, and went upstairs. The servant took the incense table inside and closed the door. The lovers passed a happy night together. The next morning they were both aroused by the sound of the wooden fish being beaten. Hai the Tutor, quickly dressed and said, "I must go now, but I will come again this evening."
From that day the monk visited Qiaoyun in this way every time that the husband was away from home. Old Pan was always asleep, and they had to hoodwink only Shi Xiu. This affair went on for more than a month.
Now Shi Xiu was attending to the affairs of the butchery and although he had some suspicion about the conduct of Qiaoyun he had not seen anything further to convince himself. He was a very early riser and every day he heard the wandering monk strike the wooden fish at daybreak. But Shi Xiu hearing the sound knew that it meant something.
On the 15th day of the eleventh month Shi Xiu was awake very early, and he listened to the beating of the wooden fish, and then also heard the traveling monk say, "Buddha saves everyone from trouble and difficulties." Shi Xiu got up, and peeping through a crack in the door he saw a man wearing a cap go out by the back door, and depart with the wandering monk. A short time afterwards he saw the girl servant close the back door. He ejaculated, "Why does my adopted brother tolerate such a woman! She is evidently deceiving him, and does some underhand affair." He went about his business in the abattoir as usual, and then in the afternoon went into the town to collect some accounts, but instead went to the yamen to see Yang Xiong. On the way he saw him who asked him, "Where are you going?"
"I came to collect accounts," said Shi Xiu, "and then thought of finding you."
"I have always been very busy, but now we can have a little wine together if you will come with me," said Yang Xiong. He then took Shi Xiu to a wine shop near at hand where they sat down in a quiet corner, and Yang Xiong ordered wine and food.
They drank three cups of wine, and then Yang Xiong noticed that Shi Xiu was hanging his head down as though lost in thought.
Yang Xiong was a quick-tempered man. "I see that you have been upset by something. Is there someone at our home who has said anything against you?"
"There was nothing of that kind at our home," said Shi Xiu. "Elder brother, you have always treated me well as your own brother, but there is something I do not dare to speak to you about."
"Why do you talk, my younger brother, in this unusual way today? Whatever is in your mind you may tell me!"
"Elder brother, you go to your office every day so that you cannot know what is happening at home. Your wife is not a good woman, but although I have known this for some time I did not dare to tell you before this. But today all has been made quite clear so that I can tell you the truth. I hope you will excuse my straightforwardness."
"I have no eye at my back," said Yang Xiong, "so please tell me who the man is."
"Some days ago when you had Buddhist prayers at your house, I noticed that the monk Hai was exchanging loving glances with your wife. Three days afterwards she and Old Pan went to the temple to fulfill a vow, and upon their return I noticed that they were both drunk. Nowadays I have heard a monk striking a wooden fish in the alley behind your house. As I thought it strange, so today I got up very early, and saw the monk Hai leave your house wearing an ordinary cap. What do you want this woman for?"
Yang Xiong was very angry at this, and said. "How dare that bitch do this?"
"Please do not lose your temper," said Shi Xiu. "You must not mention this matter today, and tomorrow you must tell your people that you are going to the office. Then you can return about midnight, and knock at the door of your house. The monk will try to leave by the back door. I will wait there, and seize him and hand him over to you."
"A good idea," said Yang Xiong. "I will do as you say."
After finishing their wine they separated. Yang Xiong spent the afternoon with some colleagues practicing with fencing sticks, and he drank so much wine that he was drunk by evening. When he returned home his wife undressed him, and assisted him to bed. When Yang Xiong saw his wife doing this he remembered what he had heard about her. There is an old saying, "When drunk, people talk of affairs." Pointing at his wife he now said, "You deceiver! I shall kill you some day or other."
She was startled, but did not reply, She waited upon him, and heard his rambling remarks, "You filthy whore! You deserve—deserve—deserve to be killed. I—I cannot— I cannot spare your life."
She dare not take any notice of this, and waited until he fell asleep. About 5 A.M. Yang Xiong awoke out of his drunken sleep, and asked for water which his wife got for him. He asked her, "Wife, why did you not undress?"
"I saw that you were drunk, and being afraid that you might vomit I did not undress to sleep."
"What did I say in my drunkenness?" asked Yang Xiong.
"Previously you have always been quiet when drunk, but last night you seemed to be cross about something."
"For quite a few days I have not drunk with Shi Xiu so I want you to treat him to some wine."
She did not reply to this, but sat down on a couch and cried bitterly.
"Wife, I came home drunk last evening, and yet I did not provoke you. What are you troubled about?"
She did not reply to this, but only put her hands over her eyes. He again asked the question without getting a reply, and she now pretended to cry. He thereupon took hold of her, and carried her to his bed, and repeated his question. Still crying she now answered, "When my parents married me to the clerk Wang they thought that I was settled for life, but who would have expected that in mid-life he would die, and leave me a widow. When I met you, and saw that you were a great hero I married you, but I never expected that you could not protect me."
"You talk in a strange manner. Who has deceived you, and where did I not protect you?"
"I would not say just now, but I am afraid that you have been cheated by him, and if I told you you would only be angry."
"You can say just what you have to say."
"Then if I tell you, you must keep your temper. When you first brought Shi Xiu here he had good manners, but since then he has shown his true habits. Now when you stay away from home he would approach me saying, 'Your husband will not return tonight so that you will find it very dull and cold by yourself.' But I gave him no notice although he said that every day. But what is more important is this. Yesterday morning I was washing my face in the kitchen, and he entered by the back door. Seeing no one else about he came up and fondled my breasts with his hand. I pushed him away, but was afraid to call out as I did not want our neighbors to hear as that would have made them talk about your disgrace. I intended to tell you when you returned, but alas! you were too drunk to understand. I detest that man and yet you ask about his condition."
Yang Xiong was very angry at this, and said, ""In drawing a tiger, you show its skin, but not its bones; in knowing man, you may know his face, but not his heart.' He told me that it was the young monk Hai who was doing this, but it was evidently he himself, who has been guilty. He is no longer my sworn brother, and tomorrow he shall get out." In the morning Yang Xiong went downstairs, and spoke to Old Pan, "That butchery business is finished. I want you to close the business, and take down all the fittings and furniture at once." This was done.
That morning when Shi Xiu came to open the abattoir he found that all the tools, etc. had been removed. But he was very understanding, and soon guessed what had happened. He laughed, "So, this is the way! Yang Xiong has let the cat out of the bag while drunk. He has told his wife what I said, and in order to protect herself, she has manufactured some slander about me, and got her husband to close the business. If I tried to defend myself it would lead to other people knowing of the trouble, and so my friend Yang Xiong would lose face. I will retreat one step and think of some other plan of clearing myself." So he went inside the abattoir, and packed up his things.
Yang Xiong was afraid that Shi Xiu was too ashamed to come to see him, so he went off to his office.
Shi Xiu took his sword and baggage to Old Pan's house and said, "I have given you much inconvenience, and as my sworn brother has now closed the business I will go. I have settled the accounts, and you will find everything in order. Should there be some slight mistakes in the accounts then may Heaven punish me for it."
As Yang Xiong had told Old Pan to close the business the latter could not do anything, and so Shi Xiu departed. He soon found an inn in the town where he engaged a room. There he meditated, "I am an intimate friend of Yang Xiong, and if I do not make the whole affair clear it would ruin his life. Just now he is hoodwinked by his wife, and I am not going to raise any objection. Eventually, however, I must make the matter clear to him. In the meantime I will find out when he is on duty, and then watch what goes on at his home during the night."
After staying in the inn for two days, he made inquiries at Yang Xiong's neighborhood. In the evening he saw a messenger from the jail came to take Yang's beddings so he concluded that Yang Xiong would sleep at the jail that night. He went to the inn and slept until about 3 A.M. when he got up, took his sword, quietly slipped out of the inn and going to the alley at the back of Yang Xiong's house he hid there in a dark spot. About 4 A.M. he saw the wandering monk arrive, and begin looking around. Shi Xiu crept up behind the monk, and seizing hold of him placed the blade of his sword across the back of the monk's neck. He said, "Keep quiet or I will kill you. Speak the truth! Why does monk Hai tell you to come here and do this?"
"Kind sir, spare my life and I will tell you the truth."
"Be quick then! I will not kill you."
The monk said, "The monk Hai comes here every night to stay with Yang Xiong's wife. I come in the evening to report whether there is an incense table outside, and if so he enters the house. At 5 A.M. I come and beat the wooden fish to awaken him to leave the house."
"Where is he now?" asked Shi Xiu.
"He is asleep in the house. If I strike the wooden fish he will come out."
"Well, let us change clothes," said Shi Xiu. The monk took off his clothes, and then Shi Xiu killed him on the spot. Shi Xiu put on the monk's robes, and then struck the wooden fish. Monk Hai in bed heard the sound, dressed and quickly left the house. As Shi Xiu was still beating the wooden fish the monk Hai spoke in a low voice, "That is enough! I am here!"
Shi Xiu took no notice of this, but coming up to the monk Hai, he pushed the monk to the ground. Shi Xiu held the monk down and exclaimed, "Hold your tongue! If you make a noise I will kill you. I am going to take away your gown." The monk now recognized Shi Xiu, and was afraid. He let Shi Xiu take all his clothes so that he was soon stark naked.
Then Shi Xiu took his sword and killed him. He then placed the sword in the hand of the first monk he had killed, wrapped up the dead men's clothes, and made off to his inn. He very quietly opened the door and shut it after him and went to sleep without being seen by anyone. That morning a hawker of cakes and congee happened to pass the dead bodies, and fell over them in the dark. The small boy who accompanied him called out, "Here's a drunken monk." The hawker got up, and found his hands covered with blood, and was much upset. He made such a noise that the neighbors came out with lights, and disclosed the two dead bodies lying in blood. They seized the hawker, and took him to the yamen.

Misfortune dropped from Heaven,
And fell on this poor man.

144
Morbid Yang Xiong gets rough, Goes Wild on Jade Screen Mountain, & Murders his Wife; Madcap Shi Xiu Sets Fire to the Zhu Family Arms Inn & burns it down

The neighbors brought old Master Wang before the prefect of Jizhou who had just convened court. Kneeling, they said: "This old man spilled his gruel upon the ground, and when he looked he saw two bodies lying in it. One was a monk the other a friar. Both were stark naked. Beside the friar was a knife."
"Every day I get up at the fifth watch and sell gruel and muffins for a living," the old fellow said. "This morning I started out a little earlier, with an iron-headed little monkey who helps me. I didn't look where I was going, and tripped and fell. All my bowls and dishes were broken. Have pity, Excellency. The sight of those two bloody corpses really gave me a fright. I roused the neighbors, but they turned me in. Please use your great wisdom to investigate and clear this up."
The prefect had his statement taken, and directed that the local district authorities and coroners proceed with the old man and the neighbors to the scene of the crime, and there examine the bodies and report back. This was done.
"The murdered monk was Pei Ruhai, of the Grateful Retribution Monastery," said the district officers. "The body beside him is that of Hu Dao, a friar who lived in the monastery's rear. The monk is naked, and he died from three or four stab wounds. The murder weapon was found next to Hu Dao. His throat was cut. It would appear that Hu Dao stabbed the monk to death and then, out of fear of punishment, committed suicide by cutting his own throat."
The prefect summoned other monks from the monastery and questioned them, but none of them could throw any light on the matter. He couldn't decide. The clerk of the court offered a suggestion.
"Since the monk was naked, he must have been up to some nefarious activities with that friar, and they fought to the death. The old gruel seller was not involved. The neighbors should be released to await further instructions, after posting surety bond. Turn the bodies over to the monastery for encoffining and removal. Proclaim a judgement that the deceased killed each other, and that will be the end of it."
"We'll do it that way," the prefect agreed. He issued appropriate orders. Of that we'll say no more.
The murders soon became the talk of the town. Some idlers were inspired to compose this ditty:

Bestial unbridled shaven-pate
With a beauty in secret disported.
His crimes besmirched all monk's names.
In a lane his body lay
Naked in a pool of blood.
Cast it off a cliff
In deep snow
To feed the tigers!
He forgot the scriptures the abbot taught him
Mulien rescued his mother
And went to Heaven,
But this thieving baldy
Disgraced his mother in death!

Subsequently, a few young scholars got wind of the story. They took up their pens and wrote this song:

Most evil are monks

Who break the Commandments
And revel in lust
Day after day.
Strange was this fellow's behavior.
He shared the lady's pillow and ne'er with her would part.
Mad like many monks,
Big and small.
You can see it on the streets.
Because someone talked loosely,
Death came to Hai the Preceptor.

Everyone in Jizhou was discussing the matter, and Clever Cloud was scared stiff. But she didn't dare say anything, and could only lament inwardly.

Yang Xiong was in the prefectural office when the murder of the monk and the friar was reported, and he had a pretty good idea of how it happened. "This must be the work of Shi Xiu," he thought. "I was wrong to put the blame on him. I've some spare time today. I'll find him and get the true story."

As he was crossing the prefectural bridge, a voice hailed him from behind. "Brother, where are you going?"

Yang turned around. There was Shi Xiu. "Brother," said Yang, "I was just looking for you."

"Come to my place, and we can talk."

Shi Xiu took him to a small room in his inn. "Well, brother, was I lying?"

"Don't hold it against me. I made a stupid mistake. I got drunk and let something slip. She fooled me. She said a lot of bad things about you. I was looking for you today so that I could apologize."

"I'm an unimportant fellow of no talent, but I'm absolutely clean and honest. I'd never do anything underhanded. I came to you because I was afraid she'd harm you. I have proof." Shi Xiu brought out the clothing of the monk and the friar. "I stripped this from their bodies."

Yang Xiong looked, and rage flamed in his heart. "Forgive me, brother. Tonight, if I don't pulverize that baggage, I'll burst!"

Shi Xiu laughed. "There you go again. You work in a government office. Don't you know the law? You can't kill her unless you catch her in the act. Besides, I may be just making this up, and you'll be killing an innocent person."

"But I can't let her get away with it!"

"Listen to me, brother, and I'll tell you how to behave like a real man."

"How is that?"

"East of town is Jade Screen Mountain, a secluded place. Tomorrow, you say to her: 'I haven't burned incense to Heaven in a long time. Let's go together.' Trick her into going with you up the mountain, and have her bring Ying'er. I'll be there, waiting. We'll have it out face to face and get the facts straight. You can then write a declaration of divorce and drop her. Isn't that a good plan?"

"There's no need. I know you're clean. She told a pack of lies."

"But that's not all. I'd like you also to hear how she managed their assignations."

"Since you're so wise, brother, I can't go wrong taking your advice. Tomorrow, I'll definitely bring the slut. Don't fail me."

"If I'm not there, you'll know everything I said is false."

Yang Xiong returned to his office. That evening when he came home he spoke only, as usual, of ordinary affairs. He rose the next morning at daybreak and said to Clever Cloud: "Last night in my dreams I met a spirit who berated me for not having kept my vow to burn incense in that Yue Temple outside of East Gate. I have time today, so I can do it. I'd like you to go with me."

"You can go yourself. What do you need me for?"

"I made the vow when we were courting, so we must go together."

"All right, then. We'll have a vegetarian breakfast, take warm baths, and depart."

"I'll buy incense and paper money and hire a sedan-chair. You bathe and fix your hair. I'll be back soon. Tell Ying'er also to get ready."

Yang Xiong went to the inn and spoke to Shi Xiu. "We leave after breakfast. Don't be late."

"Have the sedan-chair bearers wait halfway up the slope, and you three come the rest of the distance alone. I'll be waiting in a quiet spot. Don't bring any outsiders."

Yang then bought the paper money and candles, returned home and had breakfast. The girl had no suspicions, and made herself up neatly and attractively. Ying'er would accompany her. Bearers were waiting with the sedan-chair at the front gate.

"Please look after things here," Yang Xiong said to his father-in-law. "I'm going with Clever Cloud to burn incense."

"Burn plenty and come home early," said Master Pan.

The girl mounted the sedan-chair and set out, followed by the little maid, with the warden bringing up the real. After they passed through the East Gate, Yang said to the porters in a low voice: "Go to Jade Screen Mountain. I'll pay you extra."

In less than two watches, they were climbing the slope. Jade Screen Mountain is twenty li outside of Jizhou's East Gate. On it are many scattered graves. Further up you see nothing but green grass and white poplars, but it's devoid of any nunnery or monastery.

Halfway up, Yang told the bearers to halt. He opened the latch, raised the curtain and asked the girl to step out.

"What are we doing on this mountain?" Clever Cloud said.

"Just start walking. Porters, stay here. Don't come up. In a little while I'll give you wine money."

"No problem. We'll await your orders."

Yang led the girl and Ying'er up four or five levels. He could see Shi Xiu sitting above.

"Why haven't you brought the incense and paper money?" Clever Cloud asked.

"I've sent someone on ahead with them."

He helped the girl to an ancient tomb site. Shi Xiu, who had placed his bundle, dagger and staff at the foot of a tree, came forward.

"My respects, sister-in-law."

"What are you doing here, brother-in-law?" Clever Cloud hurriedly replied, startled.

"Waiting for you."

Yang said to the girl: "You told me that he made remarks to you several times, and felt your breasts and asked if you were pregnant. There's no one here but us. You two can get the story straight."

"Aiya! It's past. Why bother?"

Shi Xiu stared at her. "Well, sister-in-law, what do you say?"

"Have you nothing better to do than rake that up now?"

"Sister-in-law, look." Shi Xiu opened the bundle, took out the clothes of Hai the Preceptor and the friar and flung them at her feet. "Do you recognize these?"

The girl blushed. She was unable to speak. Shi Xiu whipped out his dagger and handed it to Yang Xiong. "Question Ying'er."

Yang seized the maid and forced her to her knees. "The truth, little hussy," he shouted. "How did she start her lechery in the monks' quarters? What about the signal with the incense table? And the friar beating on the wooden fish? Tell me, and I'll let you live. One lie, and I'll hack you to mincemeat."

"It wasn't up to me, sir," cried Ying'er. "Don't kill me! I'll tell you everything! We all had wine at the monks' quarters. Then we went upstairs to look at Buddha's tooth, but she sent me down to see whether Master Pan had recovered from his drinking. Two days later a friar came begging alms at the rear gate. She told me to get him a string of copper cash. She must have made the arrangement with him then. Whenever you were on duty at the prison, she had me put a table with incense outside the rear gate. That was the signal for the friar to tell the monk the coast was clear. Hai the Preceptor disguised himself as an ordinary man and wore a bandanna on his head. The mistress snatched it off, and I saw his shaven pate. Every morning at the fifth watch, when we heard the sound of the wooden fish, I had to open the rear gate and let him out. My mistress promised me a bracelet and new clothes. I had to obey. He came dozens of times, before he was killed. She gave me some hair ornaments and instructed me to tell you that brother-in-law had made wicked remarks and got fresh with her. I hadn't seen it myself, so I didn't dare. This is the whole truth, every word!"

"Well, brother," said Shi Xiu, "there it is. This isn't anything I've told her to say. Now please question sister-in-law."

The warden grasped Clever Cloud. "Bitch, the maid has confessed everything. Don't try to deny it. Tell me the truth and I'll spare your wretched life."

"I was wrong. For the sake of what we once were to each other as husband and wife, forgive me."

"Brother, don't let her gloss this over," said Shi Xiu. "Make her confess in detail."

"Speak, bitch," Yang barked. "Be quick about it."

Clever Cloud had no choice but to relate how she and the monk became lovers, beginning with their flirtation the night of the memorial ceremony, and all that followed.

"Why did you tell brother I tried to get fresh with you?" Shi Xiu demanded.

"When he came home drunk the other night and swore at me, he hit very close to the mark. I guessed that you knew, and had told him. Two or three nights before that, Hai instructed me what to say if this should happen. So the following morning, I had a story all prepared. Actually, you hadn't done any such thing."

"Today, the three of us are here together and the facts are clear," said Shi Xiu. He turned to Yang. "What to do about it is up to you."

"Take the ornaments from that wanton's hair, brother, and remove her clothes. I'll attend to her."

Shi Xiu did as bidden. Yang cut two ribbons from the girl's skirt and tied her to a tree. Shi Xiu also ripped off Ying'er's hair ornaments. He took up his knife. "Why leave this little tramp? Get rid of the weeds, roots and all," he said.

"Of course. Brother, give me that blade. I'll do it myself."

Ying'er opened her mouth to scream. With one blow Yang cut her in two.

"Brother-in-law," pleaded the girl at the tree, "reason with him."

"Sister-in-law," said Shi Xiu, "brother will deal with you personally."

Yang Xiong advanced on Clever Cloud, pulled out her tongue and cut it off, so that she wouldn't be able to shriek. He pointed at her in a rage.

"Harlot, you had me confused. I nearly fell for your lies. You've sullied my brother's name and you're sure to kill me if you get the chance. My best bet is to strike first. What kind of heart has a bitch like you? I want to see for myself!"

He sliced her open from breast to belly, hauled out her organs, hung them on the tree, and cut her into seven parts. Then he wrapped her hair pins and ornaments into a bundle.

"Come here, brother," Yang said to Shi Xiu. "We need a long-range plan. A treacherous male and a lecherous female have both been killed by us. The question is where can we find refuge?"

"I have a place. We'll go together."

"Where is it?"

"You've killed a person and so have I. We'll join the band in Liangshan Marsh. Where else could we go?"

"But we don't know anyone there. Why should they accept us?"

"Everyone in the gallant fraternity has heard that Song Jiang, the Timely Rain from Shandong, is recruiting bold fellows from all over. Who doesn't know that? You and I are both good with weapons. Of course they'll accept us."

"It's always better to expect the worst. In that way you don't run into trouble. I'm an official. They'll be suspicious of me, and won't want us."

Shi Xiu laughed. "Wasn't Song Jiang a county clerk? I tell you there's nothing to worry about. Do you remember those two men I went drinking with in that tavern the day we met? Well, one of them is Dai Zong the Marvellous Traveller. The other is Yang Lin the Elegant Panther. They're both from Liangshan Marsh. Dai gave me a ten-ounce ingot of silver. I still have it in my bundle. That means I can go to him."

"I'll go home for some money, then, and we'll leave."

"You mustn't dither so, brother. If you go back into town and are arrested, how will you get away? You've those hair pins and ornaments, and I have some silver. Even if there were three of us, it would be more than enough. Why try to take more? How could I rescue you if anything went wrong? This business will be out in the open soon. We mustn't hang around. I say let's get to the other side of the mountain."

Shi Xiu shouldered his bundle and picked up his staff. Yang Xiong put the dagger in his waist sash and took his halberd. As they started to leave the ancient tomb, a man stepped out from behind a pine.

"So you kill people neath a clear blue sky and then go off to join the band in Liangshan Marsh," he cried. "I've been listening for a long time!" He dropped to his knees and kowtowed.

Yang knew him. The man's name was Shi Qian. He came from Gaotang Prefecture, before settling in Jizhou. He could fly from roof to roof, climb walls, scale fences and steal horses. He had been brought before a magistrate in Jizhou, but Yang had intervened and saved him. He was known as Flea on a Drum.

"What are you doing here?" Yang demanded.

"I haven't had any business for several days, brother Warden, and I came to poke around in some ancient tombs to see whether I could dig up anything of value. When I saw you attending to your affairs, I didn't venture to disturb you. Then I heard you say you were going to join the band in Liangshan Marsh. Around here all I can do is steal chickens and swipe dogs. I'll never amount to anything. How fine it would be if I could go with you two brothers up the mountain. Will you take me?"

"Since you're one of the bold fellows, and since they're looking for recruits in the fortress, they wouldn't object to one more," said Shi Xiu. "Come along."

"I know a good path," said Flea on a Drum.

With him in the lead, the three followed a trail to the rear of the mountain and set out for Liangshan Marsh.

To return to the two sedan-chair carriers who had been waiting at the halfway point. The sun was already in the west, but Yang and the two women still hadn't come down. Their orders were to remain where they were, but they could stick it out no longer, and they plodded up the path. They saw a flock of crows around an ancient tomb. The men draw nearer. The raucously cawing birds were fighting over a piece of human intestine.

Frightened, the porters hurried back to town and told Master Pan, who took them to the prefect. The county sheriff and coroners were dispatched to the scene, where they found and inspected the bodies. They returned and gave their report.

"We discovered beside a pine tree the dismembered corpse of Pan's daughter Clever Cloud. The maidservant Ying'er lies dead before an ancient tomb. Nearby, the clothes of a woman, a monk and a friar are heaped."

The prefect, recalling the killings of the friar and the monk Hai a few days before, carefully questioned Master Pan. The old man told how he got drunk in the monks' quarters and related the events leading to Shi Xiu's departure.

"It looks as if the girl and the monk were committing adultery, and the maid and the friar were acting as accomplices," said the prefect. "Shi Xiu probably was outraged and killed the friar and the monk. Today, Yang doubtlessly slaughtered his wife and the maidservant. That's what must have happened. We'll capture Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu and get positive proof."

He issued notices calling for the arrest of the fugitives and offering rewards for their apprehension. The porters were allowed to go home, pending further notification by the court. Master Pan bought coffins and had the bodies buried. Of that we'll say no more.

On leaving Jizhou, Yang Xiong, Shi Xiu and the Flea travelled steadily, resting at night and continuing the next morning. In a few days they reached the pretecture of Yunzhou. After crossing Fragrant Woods Hollow, they saw before them a high mountain. It was growing dark, and they made for an inn beside a stream. A waiter was in the process of locking up as they reached the gate.

"You must have come a long way to arrive here so late," he said.

"More than a hundred li," Flea on a Drum replied.

The waiter let them in and gave them a room. "Would you like a fire?" he asked.

"We'll attend to it ourselves," said the Flea.

"We've no other guests and there are two pots of boiled water on the stove. You're welcome to use them if you wish."

"Have you any meat and wine?"
"We had some meat this morning, but people from neighboring villages bought it all. There's a jug of wine left, but nothing to go with it."
"That'll do. And bring us five measures of rice. We'll cook it here."
The waiter brought the rice to the Flea, who cleaned it and put it on to boil. Shi Xiu laid out his luggage. Yang gave the waiter one of the hairpins in payment for the wine and promised to settle the full account the next day. The waiter fetched the jug and opened it, and placed a few hot vegetable dished on the table. The Flea carried in a bucket of hot water for Yang and Shi Xiu to wash their hands and feet with.
The wine was poured, and the three asked the waiter to sit down and join them. They drank from four large bowls.
Shi Xiu noticed a dozen good halberds under the eaves.
"Why do you need weapons in this inn?" he asked.
"They belong to the master."
"What sort of person is he?"
"You've been around, sir. Haven't you heard of this place? That big mountain out there is called Lone Dragon Mountain. The high cliff before it is Lone Dragon Cliff. On top of it is my master's residence. All the land around here for thirty //belongs to the Zhu Family Manor. Lord Zhu, my master, has three sons. They're known as the Three Zhu Warriors. This manor has five or six hundred families, all tenants, and two halberds have been issued to each family. You're staying in the Zhu Family Inn. Usually, there are several dozens of our men spending the night here. That's why we keep the halberds handy."
"What use are they in an inn?"
"We're not far from Liangshan Marsh. Those bandits might come to rob our grain. We have to be prepared."
"If I gave you some silver would you let me have one of the halberds?"
"Oh, no. Each halberd has its owner's mark. My master would beat me. He's very strict."
Shi Xiu laughed. "I was only kidding. Don't get excited. Have some more wine."
"I can't. I must go to bed. Enjoy yourselves, sir guests. Drink all you want."
The waiter retired. Yang and Shi Xiu had another round.
"Would you like some meat?" the Flea asked them.
"Didn't the waiter say they don't have any?" Yang replied. "Where would you get meat?"
The Flea chuckled. He walked over to the stove and lifted a cooked rooster out of a pot.
"Where does that come from?" asked Yang.
"I went out in back to relieve myself and saw this rooster in a cage. I thought it would go well with your wine, so I quietly killed it by the stream, brought out a bucket of boiling water, cleaned the bird and cooked it. And here it is, ready for you two brothers to eat."
"Still as light-fingered as ever, you villain," said Yang.
The Flea grinned. "I haven't changed my profession."
The three laughed. They tore the bird apart with their hands and ate it, together with the rice they had cooked.
The waiter slept only a little while. Uneasy in his mind, he got up and looked things over, front and back. On the kitchen table he saw feathers and bones. A pot on the stove was half filled with greasy water. He hurried out to the cage in the rear of the inn. It was empty. He hastened into the room where the three men were staying.
"Is that anyway to behave?" he demanded. "Why did you steal our rooster and eat it?"
"You're seeing ghosts," scoffed the Flea. "I bought that bird on the road. Who's seen your rooster?"
"Where is it, then?"
"Dragged off by a wild cat, eaten by a weasel, pounced on by a hawk—who knows?"
"That bird was in the cage just a short while ago. If you didn't steal it, who did?"
"Don't wrangle," said Shi Xiu. "We'll pay you whatever it's worth."
"It heralds the dawn. Our inn can't do without it. Even ten ounces of silver wouldn't be money enough. Give me back our bird."
"Who are you trying to extort?" Shi Xiu said angrily. "Just for that I won't give you a penny. What are you going to do about it?"
The waiter laughed. "Regular fire-eaters, aren't you? Our inn is different. We'll drag you up to the manor and try you for being bandits from Liangshan Marsh!"
"Suppose we were? Do you think you could capture us and claim the reward?" Shi Xiu demanded.
Yang Xiong was also very irate. "With the best of intentions, we were going to give you some money. Now we won't," he said, "let's see you take us!"
"Thieves, thieves," shouted the waiter.
Four or five big bruisers, stripped to the waist, charged into the room and made for Yang and Shi Xiu. With one blow of the fist each, Shi Xiu knocked them flat. The waiter opened his mouth to yell. The Flea slapped him so hard that his face swelled up and he couldn't utter a sound. The bruisers fled through the rear gate.
"Those louts must be going for help," said Yang. "Let's finish eating, quickly, and get out of here."
The three ate their fill, shouldered their packs, put on comfortable hemp sandals, attached their daggers, and helped themselves to one halberd apiece from the weapons rack.
"A henchman is a henchman," said Shi Xiu. "We can't let any of them off."
He lit a bundle of straw in the stove and set fire to all sides of the inn. Fanned by the wind, the thatched roofs burst into blaze, great tongues of flame leaping into the sky. The three men struck out along the highway.
When they had marched for about two watches, they saw before and behind them innumerable torches. Nearly two hundred men, shouting and yelling, were closing in.
"Keep calm," said Shi Xiu. "We'll take to the small paths."
"No," said Yang Xiong. "Let them come. We'll kill them singly or in pairs. At daybreak, we'll go on."
Before the words were out of his mouth, they were attacked from four sides. Yang was in the lead, Shi Xiu covered the rear, the Flea defended the middle. With halberds they fought the charging vassals, who came at them with staves and spears. The pursuers didn't know what they were letting themselves in for. Yang, wielding his halberd, promptly felled half a dozen. The assault group fled pell-mell. Shi Xiu gave chase and hacked down half a dozen more.
When the other vassals saw this carnage, they decided they wanted to live, and that this was not a very healthy atmosphere. They turned and ran, with the three in hot pursuit. More shouting rose, and two long hooked poles snaked out of the dry grass, fastened onto the Flea and dragged him into the underbrush. Shi Xiu whirled to go to his rescue. From behind, another two hooked poles shot out. The sharp-eyed Yang Xiong swiftly knocked them aside with his halberd and stabbed into the thicket. There were cries, and the ambushers hastily departed. The two saw them pulling away the Flea, but they had no heart for a fight in the depths of the thicket, and could only let him go.
They finally found a path and went on. The glow of the distant torches provided them with illumination, since the path was bare of trees or shrubbery, and they proceeded along it in an easterly direction.
The vassals, after searching for them in vain, collected their wounded. They brought the Flea, his hands tied behind his back, to the Zhu Family Manor.
Yang and Shi Xiu were still walking at daylight. A village tavern lay ahead.
"Let's buy some wine and food, brother, and ask directions," Shi Xiu suggested.
They entered the tavern, leaned their halberds against the wall, sat down, and ordered food and drink. The waiter served a few vegetable dishes and heated some wine. They were about to start, when a big man came in. His face was broad, his eyes bright, his ears large, his appearance rough and ugly. He wore a tea-brown robe, a head kerchief decorated with swastikas, a white silk waist sash, and oiled leather boots.
"His Excellency wants those loads delivered to the manor right away," he shouted.
The tavern host replied hastily: "Everything's ready. We'll send them over very soon."
The man turned to go. "Hurry it up," he said. He was passing Yang Xiong's and Shi Xiu's table on the way to the door. Yang recognized him.
"Young man, what are you doing here?" Yang called. "Won't you take a look at me?"
The big fellow stared. Recognition grew in his eyes. "What're you doing here, benefactor?" he exclaimed. He dropped to his knees and kowtowed. And because Yang encountered this man, the pledge of alliance between the 3 villages became as naught, and the roar of assembled tigers brought down disaster.

When that group of neighbours detained Old Wang, the seller of gruel, they took him straight off to the government office and reported him. The court was in session. They knelt before the Governor and declared: "This old man was carrying a load of gruel and spilt it on the ground and discovered two corpses there: one was a monk, the other a lay brother. Neither body had a stitch of clothing on. There was a knife beside the body of the lay brother."
The old man gave his statement: "I generally go out in the morning to sell gruel. It's how I earn my living. Most times I get going in the fifth watch. This morning I got up a bit early and I was just walking along with this stupid boy of mine, not looking where I was going, when I suddenly tripped up and went and smashed all my bowls and dishes. That's when I saw these two bodies on the ground — swimming in blood, they were. It gave me a right turn, I can tell you. I started screaming, and those people grabbed me and dragged me here to the court. I hope Your Honour will judge me mercifully."
The Governor had his statement taken and signed an order requiring the local authorities and officials from the coroner's office to go with the neighbours, Old Wang and anyone else involved in the affair to inspect the bodies and draw up a detailed account.
When they had made their inspection, they reported back to the Governor: "The dead priest is a canon from the Temple of Divine Favours, Pei Ruhai; the lay brother lying beside him is Brother Hu, who lives at the back of the temple. The priest was absolutely naked, and he had three or four stab wounds which were obviously the cause of death. Next to Brother Hu there was a sharp knife and his throat was cut. It looks as if Brother Hu picked up the knife and killed the priest with it, then horrified by his crime, took his own life."
The Governor ordered the monks at the temple to be detained and questioned to find out the cause, but none of them knew anything. He was quite unable to deliver a verdict. Then the secretary in charge of the case suggested: "It is evident that this naked priest and the brother were up to something utterly improper and illegal. They killed each other. It's nothing to do with Old Wang. Just release the neighbours on security, to be available if needed, while the bodies are delivered to the abbot of the temple to be placed in coffins, prepared for burial, and then removed, and deliver a verdict of mutual killing."
"Yes, that's what I'll do," the Governor said. Later the witnesses were all released. Of this no more. Some young busybodies of Jizhou made up a poem which says:

This bloody bonze, sad to relate
With a lady made a date,
Gave his evil lust its head,
Coveted the marriage bed.
Forbidden pleasures were his aim,
This monk who besmirches monkhood's name;
Now in the gutter he lies dead,
Naked in a pool of blood.
Mulian died to save his mother
Not so this unworthy brother:
The Buddha's law he set aside.
And for a harlot's body died.

Later some literary gents heard all about it and picked up their brushes and produced an account which goes like this:
Lust among the clergy must end in death, when all's clandestine, nothing in the clear. These two clerics' bodies are quite bizarre, lying on the ground without a stitch, victims of the assassin's knife. The monk lies dead in a pool of his own blood, the brother has truly reaped the wind. Are they then so keen to die for each other, these monks? Or was it a fight to the death for possession of a single grave? Whichever way you look at it, it's two funerals for the price of one.
This affair had set the whole town talking. Felicity was scared out of her wits. There was no one she could talk to about it, all she could do was secretly lament to herself.
When somebody told Morbid at work that a monk and a lay brother had been killed he half guessed what had happened. "I'll bet this is Madcap's work," he thought. "The other day I wronged him by thinking him guilty for a while. I've got some free time today, I'd better go and see him and get him to tell me the facts."
When he reached the bridge, he heard someone behind him call out: "Brother, where are you off to?" Turning, he saw that it was Madcap. "You're just the person I wanted to see," he said.
"Come to my place," said Madcap, "I've got something to tell you." He took Morbid to a little room in the inn where he was staying, and said: "Do you still think I was lying?"
"Forgive me, brother," said Morbid. "Sometimes I'm a stupid fool and do something silly. I got drunk and couldn't hold my tongue. The woman fooled me. She said bad things about you and I couldn't see the truth. I've come today to apologize humbly and beg your forgiveness."
Madcap said: "Brother, I may not be very clever, but I'm a man of honour, how could I do something like that behind your back? Now, the reason I wanted to see you was that I was afraid later on you might fall into a wicked trap. I have some evidence I want you to see. I've brought the clothes that the monk and the brother were wearing. Look!"
Morbid was furious. "Forgive me, brother," he said. "Tonight I'm going to tear that harlot to pieces, I've got to relieve my feelings."
Madcap said with a grin: "Listen to you! You are a public official, how is it you don't know the law? How can you kill someone if you haven't caught them in the act? I might have just made it all up, then you'd be killing an innocent person."
Morbid said: "But how can I let something like that go unpunished?"
"You just do as I say and I'll show you how to act like a real man."
"What's your advice then?"
"Outside the east gate there is a hill known as Jade Screen Hill. It's a very quiet spot. Tell your wife tomorrow: 'It's a long time since I burnt any incense. I want you to come with me today.' Get her to go with you to the hill and take Ying along as well. I shall be there waiting for you, right at the top, and we'll ascertain the truth of the matter, once and for all. Then you can sign a divorce document and get rid of her, isn't that the best way?"
"Brother, there's no need for all this. I know you're innocent. What she said was all lies."
"All the same, I want you to know exactly what she's really been up to."
"Well, since you've thought it out so carefully, I won't fail you, I'll get the strumpet to come tomorrow, only don't you let me down."
"If I'm not there, everything I've said is false."
Morbid said goodbye and left the inn and went back to work till evening. When he went home he didn't mention it. He kept his mouth shut and just behaved as usual. Next morning he rose at first light and said to his wife: "Last night I dreamed a spirit came and told me I had not yet fulfilled an old vow. I promised to go at sunrise to the Temple of the Sacred Peaks beyond the east gate to burn incense, and I've never done it. I've some free time today so I want to go and do it now, and you have to come with me."
"You can go by yourself, what's the point of my going?"
"I originally vowed to do it when I got married, so you should come too."
"In that case let's have an early meal of vegetarian food and bathe in hot water first."
"I'll go and buy the incense and paper offerings. You order the sedan and bathe yourself, comb your hair, put in your hair pins and wait for me. And tell Ying to come too, for the outing."
Morbid went next to the inn to tell Madcap they'd be going after breakfast and not to be late.
Madcap said: "Listen, when you're nearly there, all of you leave the sedan chair halfway up the hill and continue to the top on foot. I'll be waiting in a quiet spot at the top. Don't let anyone else come up."
Having settled this with Madcap, Morbid went and bought candles and paper offerings. Then he went home and had breakfast. His wife suspected nothing. She took considerable care over her appearance, getting herself up very neatly, and Ying also dressed herself up. The bearers had already brought the sedan chair and were waiting outside.
Morbid said to his father-in-law: "Please look after the house. Felicity and I are going to burn incense. We won't be long."

"Burn plenty of incense, but don't be too long about it," said Old Pan.
Felicity climbed into the sedan, Ying walked alongside and Morbid followed. As they left by the east gate, Morbid whispered to the bearers: "If you go on a bit further to Jade Screen Hill, I'll pay you extra." In less than two hours they reached Jade Screen Hill, which was six or seven miles from the east gate of the city. Here there were a great many tombs scattered about. On top it was nothing but green grass and white poplars, there were no buildings at all, no temple compound. When Morbid had brought his wife halfway up the mountain he told the bearers to put down the chair, take out the poles and draw back the curtain. He told his wife to get out.
"Why have we come to this hill?" she asked.
"You just keep on going till you get to the top," he said. "Bearers, you wait here. Don't come with us. In a little while, I'll give you money to buy wine."
"Fair enough, we'll just wait here," they answered.
Morbid led his wife and Ying up the hill. After the third or fourth ridge, they were able to see Madcap sitting at the top.
"Where's the paper and the incense?" the wife asked.
"I sent someone on ahead with it," Morbid answered. He hurried them onwards until they came to a place where there were some old tombs. Here Madcap, who had placed his bundle, dagger and staff at the foot of a tree, approached and said: "Greetings, sister!"
She promptly replied: "Why are you here too, sir?" But even while she spoke she was trembling inside.
"I've been waiting here quite a while," Madcap said.
Morbid said: "The other day you told me that Uncle made a habit of using suggestive language to you, and also put his hand on your breasts and asked if you were pregnant. Now it's quite private here, let's hear what you both have to say."
"Oh dear," she said. "What's the point of talking about what's over and done with?"
Madcap scowled and said: "What are you talking about? This is no laughing matter. You've got to give my brother an explanation."
"But why should you want to bring it all up again?" she said.
"It's no good trying to brazen it out. I can show you proof." He went to his bundle and took out the clothing of Father Hai and the brother and threw it on the ground. "Do you recognize this?"
She blushed scarlet. She could think of nothing to say.
Madcap whipped out his dagger and said to Morbid: "You've only to ask Ying and you'll know the truth of it."
Morbid forced the maid down onto her knees in front of them and roared: "Now, you little bitch, tell us everything and be quick about it! How was the adultery committed in the priest's room? How were the meetings arranged with the incense altar as a signal? How was the brother told to come and beat the wooden fish? If you tell the truth I'll let you off. But if you tell a single lie I'll make mincemeat of you!"
Ying cried: "Master, it's not my fault, don't kill me, I'll tell you everything. They were drinking wine in the priest's room and they went upstairs to see the Buddha's tooth. They sent me downstairs to look at the Old Master who was sleeping off his wine. They made a secret agreement. Three days later he sent that brother here to beg food. I was told to go upstairs to get money for him, that's when the mistress arranged with him that when Master was on duty at the gaol I would put the altar outside the back door, it was to be the signal. He'd come and look and then go back to tell the father. That night Father Hai came in ordinary clothes with a scarf over his head. In the fifth watch the brother came and beat the wooden fish and prayed loudly to the Buddha — that was the signal for me to open the back door and let the father out. You see, when the father came, I couldn't not know about it, I had to be told. The Mistress promised me a bracelet and a set of clothes, but anyway I had to do what she said. That's how the affair was set up, he must have come a dozen times, then he got killed. She also gave me a few pieces of jewellery and told me to tell the Master that Mr. Shi had used suggestive language to her. But that's something I didn't actually see, so I didn't like to say anything. That's the whole truth, I haven't made anything up."
When Ying had finished, Madcap said: "Do you see? It's impossible that I should have told her to say all that. Please ask your wife to explain everything fully."
Morbid seized the woman and shouted: "You filthy whore, the maid's told everything, don't try to deny it. Make a full confession and I'll spare your worthless life."
"I've done wrong," she said. "But for the sake of the love we once had for each other, spare me this time."
Madcap said: "You mustn't be left in any doubt, you'd better ask her for a full account."
Morbid shouted: "Speak, you harlot!"
One by one she told him all the details of her secret affair with the monk, from the evening of the service for the dead up to the time of the regular relationship.
"Why did you say I had harassed you?" Madcap asked.
"The other day when he was drunk he shouted at me and I realized he suspected something. I guessed you had seen my fault. That's why I said it. In the morning he started asking about you, so I just slipped in this story. You are not really like that at all."
"Now you've confessed all this in front of three witnesses. It's up to brother now to decide how you should be dealt with."
Morbid said: "Brother, you can take off the strumpet's hair ornaments and clothes. Then I'll attend to her."
So Madcap stripped her of her hair ornaments and clothes and Morbid cut two of her skirts into strips and with his own hands bound her to a tree. Madcap also removed all Ying's hair ornaments. Then he offered Morbid his dagger and said: "Brother, what's the point of leaving this little bitch alive? Get the roots out all in one go!"
"You're right," said Morbid. "Give me the knife and I'll do it."
Realizing her situation was desperate, Ying started to scream but Morbid, with a flourish of the dagger, severed her neck. Thereupon the wife, tied to the tree, began to implore Madcap: "Do something, please, help me!"
Madcap merely said: "It's his business, not mine."
Morbid advanced on her, dug out her tongue with his knife and cut it off, which put an end to the screams. Then he pointed and shouted: "You worthless whore, for a time I got it all wrong, you nearly fooled me. Quite apart from the fact that my brother's reputation was ruined, it's obvious that sooner or later you would have killed me. Isn't it better I should act firmly now? What sort of heart and liver does a woman like you have, I wonder? Let's take a look!" And with one cut he opened her up from breast to belly and took out the five organs and hung them on a pine tree. Having done this, he tied her hair ornaments and clothes in a bundle, and said to Madcap: "Come, brother, you and I must do some serious thinking. An adulterer and his whore have been killed, the thing is now where can you and I take refuge?"
Madcap said: "I've already thought about that and I know where; get ready to start, we must get going at once."
"But where to?"
"You and I, we've both killed someone, where else should we go but to the Marshes of Mount Liang?"
"Wait a minute! Neither you nor I know any of that lot, why would they ever take us?"
"You're wrong, there. Nowadays Song Jiang of Shandong, the Opportune Rain, famous throughout the rivers and lakes, has declared that he welcomes all honourable men and will receive brave men from anywhere, who doesn't know that? We've both of us got good fighting skills. Why should we be afraid they won't let us stay?"
"One ought to be prepared for the worst, to avoid disappointment. One problem is that I'm a government official. They may well be suspicious and refuse to take us in."
This made Madcap laugh. "Have you forgotten Song Jiang himself was a court registrar? But I'll tell you something to put your heart at rest. Remember the day I met you, and the two men who were drinking with me at the inn before you came in? One of them was Dai Zong, the Magic Messenger from Mount Liang and the other was Yang Lin, the Panther. They gave me ten taels of silver, which I've still got in my bundle. So we can go and invest it there with the outlaws."
"Well, if that route is really open to us, I'll just go and collect some cash for our travelling expenses and then let's go."
"Brother, are you still so muddle-headed? If you go back to the city and get yourself arrested, how are you going to escape? In any case, you've got all those bracelets and jewels you just put in your bundle and I've got some silver. Even if there were twice as many of us it would suffice for our needs. What do you want to go and get more for? If you get into trouble, who's going to rescue you? This business will soon be out, so we've no time to waste. We must leave in the opposite direction."
So Madcap shouldered his bundle and picked up his staff, while Morbid tucked away his dagger and took up his pike, and they were just about to leave the tombs when someone jumped out from behind a pine tree and shouted: "Here you go, in this wide world, in these realms of light, you go and murder someone and now you're off to the Marshes of Mount Liang to join the outlaws, I've heard it all!" He prostrated himself as they stared at him.
Now this man was known to Morbid. He was a certain Shi Qian from Gaotang, and this was one of his haunts. His work was walking on rooftops and scaling walls, vaulting fences and doing dodgy deals. He had been in trouble with the authorities in Jizhou, but Morbid had rescued him. People called him "The Flea on the Drum." There's a poem about him:

His limbs are supple, his body stout,
Beneath thick brows bright eyes peer out.
His appearance is a trifle weird,
He floats as smoothly as a bird.
In the dead of night he'll pass through walls,
In the silent hours he roams the halls.
Men hide their goods when they see him come,
Shi Qian he's called, or Flea on the Drum.

"What are you doing here?" Morbid asked him.
"I'll explain, Brother Warden. Recently I just haven't been able to make ends meet. I've had to come here and dig up tombs, in the hope of finding something to live on. When I saw what you were up to here I didn't dare show myself. But then I heard you were planning to go to Mount Liang to join the company. Well, all I've been able to do round here lately is to nick a few chickens and dogs. There's no future in that. If only I could go with you to join the outlaws! The question is, would you be willing to take me with you?"
Madcap said: "I suppose you can be counted among the bold spirits, and nowadays they welcome all good men, so why not, since there's only one of you? Yes, if it's what you want, you can come with us."
"Then I know a good way to go," said the Flea.
With the Flea leading, they took a small path down the other side of the hill and set off for Mount Liang.
Meanwhile the two sedan chair bearers were still waiting halfway up the hill. They waited till the sun was going down in the west, but there was no sign of their three customers. Since they'd been ordered to wait they had not dared to go on up. But in the end they had to climb slowly up the hill to find out what had happened. What they saw was a great flock of crows that had settled on the tombs, squabbling over something. When they got closer they saw that the crows were tearing at a pile of inner organs and intestines, hence all the commotion. Horror-struck they raced off home to tell Old Pan, who went with them to report the matter to the Jizhou authorities. The Governor immediately ordered a district official and the coroner to go to Jade Screen Hill and examine the bodies and then report back to him. They reported: "We found the body of Pan's daughter, Felicity, mutilated and tied to a tree. The servant, Ying, was lying dead at the foot of a tomb. Near the tomb there was a pile of clothes, women's clothes and the clothes of a monk and a lay brother."
When he heard this the Governor remembered the earlier affair of Father Hai and the lay brother. He interrogated Old Pan. The old man told him how he had got drunk in the monks' quarters and the reasons why Madcap had gone away.
"Obviously the woman committed adultery with the monk," the Governor said. "The servant and the lay brother aided and abetted them. I imagine this Madcap, on account of their wrongdoing, killed the brother and the priest; and now without a doubt Morbid has killed his wife and the servant. I'll wager that's the way it is. Arrest Morbid and Madcap and we shall know all."
He issued notices and a reward for the capture of Morbid and Madcap, while the sedan chair bearers were allowed to go home until the court called them. Old Pan went off to buy coffins and bury the bodies. Of this no more.
As for Morbid, Madcap and the Flea, they had left the territory of Jizhou, travelling in great haste. When they reached the province of Yunzhou and passed Sandalwood Bottom, they saw a high mountain ahead, just as the light was beginning to fade. In front of them there was an inn on the banks of a stream. When they got closer they were able to take a good look:
Before it runs the highroad, behind it a broad stream. A thicket of poplars and weeping willows guards the main gate, while one or two white-blossomed plum trees flank the house. A hedge of thorns runs all the way round a pond with reeds and caltrops; in front and behind a reed curtain and barred doorway shield the hearth. On the right an alcove with a line of verse upon the wall: "In the quiet pavilion dawn greets the visitor from the Five Lakes." On the left the matching quotation: "In the rustic abode day welcomes the traveller from the Three Islands." Although this inn is situated out in the wilds, there's many a carriage travels this road.
Night was falling and the waiter was just about to close the doors, when he saw there were three people wanting to come in. He said: "You must have come from far, to be abroad so late."
"We've done more than thirty miles today," the Flea replied. "That's why we're out late."
When he had let them in, the man asked: "Have you eaten yet?"
"We'll take care of that for ourselves," the Flea replied.
"There's no one staying here at the moment," said the man. "There's two clean pots on the stove, you're welcome to use those."
"Have you any wine and meat we can buy?"
"We had some meat this morning, but we sold it all to the locals. We've only got a pot of wine here now, there's nothing to go with it."
"That's all right. Just let us have five bushels of rice, and we'll manage the rest."
The waiter fetched the rice and gave it to the Flea, who washed it and then cooked it. Madcap arranged the luggage inside their room, while Morbid took out one of the women's hairpins and gave it to the waiter saying that if he would fetch the pot of wine for them they'd settle up in the morning. The man took the hairpin and disappeared inside, coming out with the pot of wine which he opened and placed on the table together with a few dishes of hot vegetables. The Flea brought a bucket of hot water and invited Morbid and Madcap to wash their hands and feet. The wine was prepared and they invited the waiter to sit and drink with them. Four large bowls were poured and drunk.
Madcap had noticed that there were a dozen or so good halberds stored under the eaves and he asked the waiter: "Why do you keep these weapons in your house?"
"The landlord left them here," he replied.
"What sort of a man is your landlord?"
"Come on, you're a gentleman of the rivers and lakes, aren't you? How come you don't know about this place? That mountain up ahead is called Lone Dragon Peak. On this side of the mountain there's a cliff known as Lone Dragon Heights. That's where the landlord has his residence. Zhu Castle, they call it, it covers an area of ten square miles. Baron Zhu, that's the owner, has three sons known as the Brothers Zhu. There's six or seven hundred families living on the estate as tenant farmers and each household has to keep two halberds for the Baron. This place is called Zhu Arms. There's often several dozen people staying here at the inn, that's why the halberds are kept here."
"But what's the point of keeping the weapons here?" Madcap asked.
"The Marshes of Mount Liang are not far off. We're afraid those robbers will come here to get provisions, that's why we've got to be prepared."
"If I gave you some silver for it would you sell me one of those halberds?" Madcap asked.
"Certainly not. There's a number on every one of them. I'm not going to get into trouble with my landlord. His rules are very strict."
"I was only joking," Madcap said with a laugh. "Stop worrying and just drink up."
"I can't take any more," the waiter said. "I'm going to bed. But please feel free to drink more yourselves." He left them to it.
They drank another round, and then the Flea said to them: "Would you like some meat?"
"Our host said he hadn't got any meat," Morbid said. "Where do you propose to find it?"
The Flea sniggered. He went to the stove and pulled out a cockerel.
"Wherever did that come from?" Morbid asked.
"When I went round the back to wash my hands, I saw this chicken in a coop. I said to myself, my friends haven't got anything to eat with their wine, so I crept up close and killed it. I got some hot water and plucked it and boiled it and then I brought it here for you."
Morbid said: "You really are a bloody master thief, aren't you?"
"The leopard doesn't change his spots," said Madcap, laughing.
They all had a good laugh as they pulled the chicken apart and ate it, helping it down with plenty of rice.
Now when the waiter went to bed he felt uneasy, so he got up again and went to make a thorough inspection of the premises. On the kitchen table he noticed some chicken feathers and bones. He went to the stove and saw half a pot of stock. Anxiously he went and looked in the coop at the back of the house. No cockerel! He rushed back inside and shouted: "You're really disgusting, you lot! Why have you eaten the inn's rooster?"

The Flea replied: "You're imagining things! Really! I brought the chicken we ate, I bought it on the way. I haven't seen your rooster!"
"You tell me then, where's it gone?" the waiter demanded.
"Maybe it was taken by a wildcat, or a weasel ate it, or a sparrow hawk carried it off, how should I know?"
"It was in the coop. If you didn't take it, who did?"
Madcap said: "Enough of all this fuss. We'll give you money to pay for the cockerel, and there's an end to it."
"It's the rooster I keep to wake me up, we can't do without it here. Even if you gave me ten taels of silver it wouldn't make up for it. I want my cockerel back."
Madcap started to lose his temper. "Who are you trying to fool? Suppose I decide not to pay you anything, what then?"
The waiter laughed contemptuously. "You're playing with fire you know. This isn't just an ordinary inn. I can take you up to the castle and say you're bandits from Mount Liang and have you handed over to the authorities!"
Madcap was furious. "And supposing we were heroes from Mount Liang, how would you be able to capture us and get the reward?"
Morbid was also angry by now. "We generously offered to pay you. But if we don't, how do you think you're going to detain us?"
The waiter set up a cry of "Thieves!" and immediately four or five bouncers, stark naked, dashed out from the interior of the inn and tried to rush Madcap and Morbid. Madcap raised his fist and knocked them all down, one blow to each. When the waiter tried to cry out, the Flea gave him a slap that caused his whole face to swell and rendered him speechless. The bouncers escaped by the back door.
"Friends, those bastards have obviously gone to fetch help," Morbid said. "We'd better eat up and go."
As soon as they'd had enough, they tied their bundles, put on their shoes, and stowed away their daggers. Each of them also picked a stout halberd from the store of weapons under the eaves.
"All the same, we can't let him get off so lightly," said Madcap. He got some straw from in front of the stove, held it in the flames and set fire to the house on every side. Fanned by the wind, the thatched building began to blaze with a merry crackling sound. In no time the flames were leaping up to the heavens. The three of them now set off, heading for the highroad. As the song says:

All on account of a pilfered fowl,
The Brothers Zhu a-hunting go.
On Mount Liang, the storm winds blow,
Zhu Castle is at last laid low.

When they had been going about four hours, they saw an innumerable host of torches, in front and behind. There must have been several hundred people, creating a great hullabaloo, racing towards them.
"Don't worry," said Madcap. "We'll take a smaller path."
"No, let's make a stand," said Morbid. "If there's one, kill one, if there's two kill a pair. We don't want to move on before it's light."
He had scarcely finished speaking when the pursuers closed in on them from all sides. So with Morbid in front, Madcap in the rear and the Flea in the middle, they levelled their halberds and engaged the retainers. The latter at first advanced confidently, whirling their spears and staves. Morbid wielding his halberd quickly downed half a dozen. Those in front fled and those behind did their best to withdraw. Madcap waded in and knocked down half a dozen more. Hearing that a dozen had been killed or wounded, the remainder now, preferring to live than die and judging the situation to be far from favourable, began to retreat, while our three heroes steadily pursued them. At this juncture, there was another burst of shouting and two long hooks reaching out from the undergrowth pinned the Flea and dragged him out of sight. When Madcap turned round to rescue him, two more hooks reached out from behind to catch him. But Morbid spotted them and with a blow of his halberd he cut them off. Then he thrust his halberd into the undergrowth. There was a scream and the hidden enemy fled. The Flea was taken, but the other two decided it was too dangerous to follow and had no heart to continue the fight. Giving the Flea up for lost, they cast about for a way out. They could still see the torches milling about in the distance and there were no bushes or trees around. As soon as they found a path they set off, travelling due east along it. Their assailants lost the trail, so they collected their wounded comrades and with the Flea bound hand and foot withdrew to Zhu Castle.
Morbid and Madcap walked till it grew light and they came to a remote country inn. "Let's go and buy a bowl of wine before we go on, and we can ask the way too," said Madcap. They entered the inn, propped their halberds against the wall and sat down opposite each other. They told the landlord to bring wine and cook something for them. He laid out dishes of vegetables and fruit to go with it, and brought the wine. Just as they were about to start on this, a big fellow rushed in. He was strongly built with a square jaw, piercing eyes, and big ears, an ugly, coarse fellow in appearance. He wore a tea-coloured robe, a cloth decorated with swastikas on his head, a white sash round his waist and a pair of tall boots of oiled leather. "His Honour wants those loads up at the manor right away," he shouted.
The landlord hurriedly replied: "The minute they've loaded up I'll send them along."
The man who had given the order turned to leave, saying "Be quick about it!" On his way out he passed Morbid and Madcap, whereupon Morbid, recognizing him, gave a great shout: "Hey there, young feller-me-lad, what are you doing here? Didn't you see me?"
When he saw who it was, the other shouted: "Benefactor, how did you get here?" Then he prostrated himself in front of Morbid. Now if Morbid had not run into this person, things would have been different. As it was,

The oath of loyalty is to be foresworn;
The roaring of tigers heralds a crisis.

UPON reaching the yamen the neighbors went into the court, and the magistrate soon came and took his seat. The neighbors all knelt down, and made a statement: "This hawker fell down with his load of cakes and congee. When we came we saw two corpses on the ground—one was a monk, and the other a traveling monk—and they were both naked. There was a monk by the side of the traveling monk."
The hawker then stated: "I always go out early every morning selling my cakes and congee. This morning as I was going along I stumbled over something at that spot, and all my food was spilt, and my cups and plates broken. Sir, please have pity on me! I was surprised to see the two dead bodies. When the neighbors came they arrested me, and brought me to your yamen. I request your honor to have the matter carefully investigated."
The magistrate had this statement duly recorded, and issued an order for the neighborhood chief and the coroner to examine the case and report. These men held a post-mortem and duly made their report in detail. They gave their opinions that the traveling monk for some unknown reason had murdered the monk Hai, and then being conscious of his guilt had committed suicide. The magistrate summoned all the monks of that temple to come to court, but when he explained to them the conclusions of the coroner there was not a single one who could throw any light on the mystery.
The magistrate released the neighbors on bail and ordered the temple to arrange for the burial.
On this strange amorous affairs some neighbors composed a song:

We laugh at the monk of Baoen Monastery,
Who loved a woman willing,
And risked their lives for pleasures gay,
The idle moments filling.
For pleasure which was uncontrolled,
The blind, dumb Gods consented,
For well they knew the sin unfold,
They'd both be unlamented.
They should have waited and avoid
The trial—who was stronger;
The ground from blood would have been free,
And they had lived much longer.

Other neighbors listening to this song also composed one as follows:

Lust invites murder,
Without failure;
And lays down the cleaver,
By a naked figure.
Big baldhead died today.
With little baldhead lusty;
Pursued by bosom comrade,
In all faith mighty.

These two songs were sung in every street in that neighborhood. The wife of Yang Xiong heard them with a distracted stare, but she dared not say a word and felt much worried.
Yang Xiong heard of the two murders, and understood who had done the deed. He thought, "I had unjustly condemned him on insufficient evidence. I have leisure today, so I will go and find Shi Xiu, and ask him what he knows about the case."
Yang Xiong left the yamen, and had just crossed the bridge when he heard someone behind him calling out, "Elder brother, where are you going?" Upon turning round he saw that it was Shi Xiu and said, "Younger brother, I was looking for you."
"Elder brother, please come to my place where we can talk matters over." They both went to Shi Xiu's inn where they sat down in a small room. There Shi Xiu asked, "Elder brother, did I not tell you the truth?"
"Younger brother, please excuse me for the mistake I made. I got drunk that day, and accused my wife, and she turned round and said many bad things about you. I was now coming to find you, and was going to confess my fault."
"Elder brother, I may not be without a fault, but I am a perfectly honest man so how could you think of me as capable of doing such things? I was afraid that you had been deceived by some ruse, and therefore, I came to find you, and show you a proof of my innocence." He thereupon spread out the monks' robes.
When Yang Xiong saw the robes he became excited, and said, "Younger brother, excuse me. Tonight I will hack that woman into small pieces, and so appease my wrath."
Shi Xiu laughed, "You are getting angry again. As you work in the yamen you are supposed to know all about the law. How could you kill her when you have not caught her in the act? Also if I have been telling you nonsense, you would make a mistake in killing her."
"Then what should I do?"
"It would be better if you follow my advice. Outside the East Gate there is Cuibing Mountain, a very lonely spot. Tomorrow you can tell your wife that you want her to accompany you to sacrifice at a temple. She can also take her maidservant with her. I will go there beforehand and when you arrive you can confront her with me, and we will go over the whole matter. Then you can sign a bill of divorcement and release her. Would not that be better?"
"You need not go into details. I know your innocence. That woman is the liar."
"Of course I want you to know all that has passed between those two."
"Your plan is admirable," said Yang Xiong. "I will go tomorrow with that slut, and I hope that you must not fail to come."
"If I do not turn up tomorrow then you can assume that I am the liar," said Shi Xiu.
The two friends then took leave of each other, and Yang Xiong returned to his work at the yamen. Upon reaching home that evening he did not say a word, but let everything be as usual. The following morning when he got up he, however, said to his wife, "Last night I dreamt that a spirit accused me of having overlooked some vow. I now remember that I once took a vow at a temple outside the East Gate, and have not yet fulfilled my oath. As I have leisure today, I will go there and would like you to come with me."
"Why not go alone," replied his wife. "What is the use for me to go with you?"
"My oath concerned our marriage so that it is necessary for both of us to go."
"In that case we will get away immediately after breakfast," said his wife.
"I will go and hire a sedan chair, and buy some incense," said Yang Xiong. He also told the maidservant to get ready, and go with them. He then went to the inn and spoke to Shi Xiu of the arrangements made. Shi Xiu asked him to leave the sedan chairs when halfway up the hill, and walk the remainder of the distance, as it was not advisable to have outsiders about the temple. Yang Xiong agreed to this, and then went to buy the incense and paper. When he got back he found that his wife and servant were dressed up in their best. The wife got in the sedan chair, and Yang Xiong and the maidservant walked behind. When outside the East Gate Yang Xiong quietly told the carriers that they were to go to Cuibing Mountain, and that he would pay them well. They duly reached the mountain in about two hours as the place was only about seven //from the town. The mountain was covered with green grass, and tall poplars, but there was no temple there. When halfway up the mountain Yang Xiong stopped, and told the chair carriers to rest at that place while the three of them would walk the rest of the way.
His wife asked, "Why have we come to such a place as this?"
But Yang Xiong told her not to ask useless questions. The three then started off, and soon reached the top of the mountain where they met Shi Xiu.
The wife then asked, "How is it you did not bring the paper and incense up here?"
"I told one of the men to bring that up here," replied Yang Xiong. He took his wife towards an ancient grave that was there. Shi Xiu put his bundle and sword and stick against the trunk of a tree after which he saluted Pan Qiaoyun.
She hurriedly asked, "How is it that you have come here?" As she spoke she stared with fear.
"I have been waiting here for you for a long time," he replied.
Yang Xiong turned to his wife, "A few days ago you made some serious charges against my sworn brother that he laid his hand on your breasts. There is nobody about here so you two can now discuss that matter, and make things clear."
The wife exclaimed, "Ai Ya! Why talk about bygone matters?"
Shi Xiu stared at her, "Madame, why not?"
"There is nothing to talk about unless you yourself have said something," she replied.
"Madame! Is that so?" He then opened his bundle and spread out on the ground the dead monks' clothes. "Do you recognize this clothing?" asked Shi Xiu.
Qiaoyun blushed scarlet, and did not reply.
Shi Xiu seized the sword, and handed it to Yang Xiong, saying, "You had better ask the maidservant."
Yang Xiong seized the girl, and made her kneel down before him. He spoke in a loud voice, "Now you speak the truth and I will forgive you for what you have done. But if you speak only one lie I shall most certainly kill you on the spot."
"Sir," replied the maidservant, "this is not an affair of mine. Do not kill me, and I will speak the truth." She then told him all that had occurred between his wife and the monk, and how she had been bribed to do her part of the plot.
Yang Xiong now seized his wife and called out, "Now bitch, tell me the truth, and if you say no falsehood I will not kill you."
"It was my mistake," said his wife. "As we are man and wife, I beg for your forgiveness."
"We cannot pass this over so easily, elder brother," said Shi Xiu. "Why should she not give a full explanation?"
"I agree! Bitch, give me the whole truth!" shouted Yang Xiong.
The woman then confessed completely, and told all that had been arranged and carried on with the monk.
Yang Xiong then told Shi Xiu to strip his wife naked which was done. Yang Xiong then took his sash and tied her to the tree. Shi Xiu took the ornaments out of the servant's hair, and said to Yang Xiong while he handed him the sword, "Why should we spare this little plotter. If she remains there will always be a source from which trouble might grow."
"That is so," said Yang Xiong; "I will kill her myself."
The maidservant saw that she was in a dangerous position, and attempted to shriek, but Yang Xiong, with one blow, cut her in two.
The woman tied to the tree called out, "Brother-in-law, please intervene!"
"This is not my affair," replied Shi Xiu.
Yang Xiong stepped up to the tree, took hold of the woman's tongue, and cut it off with his sword. He then pointed at her and said, "You whore! I have almost been deceived by you. You nearly estranged me from my sworn brother, and might have put an end to my life some day. I think you must have some strange heart inside you so I am going to have a look at it." He plunged his sword into her breast, ripped open her belly. He took out her heart, spleen, liver, kidneys, and lungs, and hung them up on the tree, and then cut her into seven parts. He then asked Shi Xiu to come near and discuss matters. He said, "Now we have killed the adulterer and the adulteress too. But where shall we now go for safety?"
"We have both committed murder," said Shi Xiu, "and the only thing left for us is both to join the brigands at Liangshan Marsh."

"Stop a bit! Neither of us know a single person at that place so it is unlikely that they will accept us."
"You overlook the fact, elder brother, that Song Jiang is in charge there, and he is famous everywhere as a man who is always on the lookout for heroes. We both have military skill so how could he turn us away?"
"When things are difficult at first and quite easy afterwards there will be no regret. But as I am an official I am afraid that I should arouse their suspicions, and that they would not be willing to welcome us."
Shi Xiu laughed and asked, "Was he not a clerk in a yamen himself at one time? But you must not forget that on the day we first drank in an inn I had been with two men, and they were leaders from Liangshan Marsh. They even gave me a present of silver, and they will remember me."
"Very well, younger brother, you go on the road to Liangshan Marsh, and I will return home and get some money to cover our traveling expenses."
"That will not do, because if you enter the town you would have a difficulty in getting out if they hear of what has happened today. People would undoubtedly inquire about your wife's absence. I have however enough money in this bundle to cover all our traveling expenses. So we had better both go together straightway by the road on the other side of the mountains."
They both then packed up their things and set forth. They had only gone a short distance when they heard a voice behind them, and turning round saw a man emerging from the trees. He called, "I have been listening to all that you have said, and after committing murder in broad daylight you are now escaping to Liangshan Marsh." Yang Xiong recognized the man as Shi Qian, a native of Gaotang Prefecture, who however had lived in that neighborhood for many years. He was well known as a housebreaker, and was particularly good in scaling walls. He was known as the 'Flea on the Drum.'
"What are you doing here?" asked Yang Xiong.
"Nowadays I have nothing to do," replied Shi Qian, "so I came here to open some ancient grave and take the things. I happened to see you arrive, and was a witness of what happened but I dared not intervene. I heard you two talking about going to Liangshan Marsh and joining the bandits. For a long time I have been stealing all kinds of things even chickens, cats, and dogs so I thought I had better join you. Would you mind if I go along with you?"
"I think they would be pleased to have you at Liangshan Marsh," said Shi Xiu. "You can accompany us if you like."
Shi Qian knew a small footpath, and led the other two.
The two sedan chair carriers waited until evening without seeing the three persons return. Although Yang Xiong had told them not to go up the mountain yet at last they went to see what was the cause of the delay. They saw a flock of crows on a grave making a great noise, and upon approaching they saw that the crows were eating the viscera hanging from the tree. They were startled, and immediately hurried down the mountain, and informed Old Pan who went with them to the yamen to report the case. The magistrate heard the reports, and ordered the coroner to investigate the case on the spot.
Upon his return he reported all that he had seen, and gave the names of the victims. The magistrate at once recollected the murder of the two monks, and cross-examined Old Pan who told him all that he knew of the seducing affairs. The magistrate correctly summed up the case that Shi Xiu had killed the monks, and Yang Xiong had killed his wife and the girl servant. He issued summons for the arrest of those two men.
Yang Xiong, Shi Xiu, and Shi Qian continued on their way, and one evening, at dusk when near Xianglin Hollow they stopped at an inn near a stream. They told the waiter that they had walked about thirty //that day and were hungry. The waiter said there were no other guests at the inn, and if they liked they could cook the food themselves as the pans were quite clean.
"Have you any meat here?" asked Shi Qian.
"We had some meat early this morning, but people in the surrounding villages have bought it all during the day," replied the waiter. "We have a little wine left, and also some vegetables."
"All right, that will do," replied Shi Qian. "Give us also some rice and we will do our own cooking."
This was done, and while Shi Qian did the cooking, Shi Xiu arranged their baggage and spread out their beddings. Yang Xiong took a woman's silver hairpin, and gave it to the waiter as payment for the food, etc. Shi Qian got a bucket of water for them to wash their feet and hands. When the wine was ready they asked the waiter to drink with them. Shi Xiu noticed that there were many halberds hanging on the wall under the eaves of the inn so he asked the waiter why they had so many arms.
"Those belong to the landlord of this inn," replied the waiter.
"What kind of man is your master?"
"As you are travelers, why do you not know the name of this place?" replied the waiter. "The mountain here is called the Dulong Mountain. The high ridge is the Dulong Ridge. Our master lives on the top of that ridge. Within a radius of about five //round this place is the Zhu Family Village. Our headman is Zhu Chaofeng, and he has three sons who are known as the three heroes. In this area there are about five hundred laborers who all work for our headman, and he supplies them with these halberds. This inn is called the Zhu Family Inn, and we generally have about ten men staying here who act as a guard, and those are their halberds."
"But what do they use the halberds for in such a quiet place as this?" asked Shi Xiu.
"This place is not very far from Liangshan Marsh, so that we are always afraid of those bandits coming here to borrow grain from us."
"If I give you some money will you sell me one of those halberds?" asked Shi Xiu.
"I cannot do that," said the waiter. "All the halberds are numbered, and I have to account for the lot. If one was missing I should be beaten with sticks. Our master has very severe rules about such matters."
"I was only joking," said Shi Xiu laughingly. "You must not be afraid of us."
"I have now had enough, and will now retire, and go to sleep. You gentlemen can go on drinking," said the waiter.
When the waiter had gone the three men went on drinking, but Shi Qian suddenly asked, "Wouldn't you like some meat with this?"
"The waiter said they had sold all the meat so that there is none left," replied Yang Xiong.
Shi Qian laughed loudly at this, and going to the kitchen came back with a large chicken.
"When I went outside to relieve bowels I noticed this bird in the roost," said Shi Qian. "As I could find no meat, I went and killed this chicken, plucked it and cooked it. So that is how we can have it now."
"You are still a thief when you take things like this," answered Yang Xiong.
"He evidently has not reformed his old habits," said Shi Xiu laughingly.
The three still laughing set to, and soon tore up the whole bird for their meal.
But the waiter could not go to sleep, and very soon he took a stroll round. He saw on the table the bones and feathers, and going to the roost found that the bird was missing. So he hurried back into the room, and asked, "Gentlemen, you seem to have no manners. Why did you steal our rooster?"
"No! No!" exclaimed Shi Qian. "We bought a bird on the way here, and have not seen yours."
"Then where has our bird gone to?"
"Perhaps a stray cat, a weasel or a kite has taken it. But we know nothing about it," said Shi Qian.
"The bird was in the roost when I left you," said the waiter, "so if you have not stolen it who has?"
"We will not wrangle any further," said Shi Xiu; "we will pay for what you have lost."
"But the cock was our dawn announcer so all our affairs will be upset now that it has gone. Even ten taels of silver would not be enough, and I must ask you to return us our cock."
"Who are you trying to fool?" asked Shi Xiu in a temper. "If we do not make up for your loss what would you do?"
The waiter laughed and replied, "You should not make trouble here, as this inn is unlike others, and you might be arrested on a charge of being bandits from Liangshan Marsh."
Shi Xiu cursed the man saying, "Even if we were from Liangshan Marsh how could you arrest us, and get a reward from your village chief?"
The waiter without replying called out, "Robbers," and immediately about five men rushed into the room. But Shi Xiu met them, and one by one he knocked the men down with his fist. As the waiter was still complaining, Shi Qian slapped his face, and stopped his noise. The five men picked themselves up, and retreated through the back door.
"Those men will soon bring others, so we better have a big meal and get away," said Yang Xiong.
The three friends after a hearty eating, picked up their things, and helped themselves to a halberd each from the inn's stock.
Shi Xiu said, "If we are going to be hung we might as well be hung for a house as for a cock," so saying he rushed into the kitchen, lit a torch, and began to set fire to the inn. Very soon the whole place was in flames. The three friends set off, but they had not gone far when they found themselves surrounded in the distance on all sides by many hundreds of men with torchlights.
Shi Xiu said, "Let us keep cool, and try to find a footpath somewhere."
Yang Xiong said, "It would better to stop in one place, and kill these men one by one as they come up to us. We may not go until daybreak."
While he was speaking, some of the men were quite close, and they were armed with sticks. Yang Xiong attacked them, and soon killed about seven men, when the rest retreated. Shi Xiu had done the same thing in another direction with the same result. The three friends continued on their way, but did not notice the men hidden in the grass until one of them grabbed hold of Shi Qian with a hooked pole, and pulled him down into the tall grass. Shi Xiu went to his assistance, but another pole grabbed hold of him. Yang Xiong saw this, struck the pole with his halberd, and freed his friend. He then stabbed in the grass at the hidden men and shouting in pain, they soon all ran away. But Shi Qian was missing and the 2 friends saw no means of rescuing him. They therefore continued on their way, and following any small path, they saw they went towards the east. They soon found themselves outside the circle of flaming torches. They walked during that night and early the following morning they stopped at an inn. There they had just finished their breakfast when they noticed a man outside who had big eyes and ears. He had a rough appearance, wearing brown silk clothes with a white belt. He called out to the waiter, "Our master tells you to go to his village with a load." Yang Xiong recognized the man and asked him what he was doing there. The man then recognized Yang Xiong and saluted.

Union, 'twixt 3 hamlets broken,
Roaring tigers make much sorrow.

145
The Striking Heaven Soaring Skyhawk Eagle Writes 2 Letters Requesting Reprieve & twice invokes the oath of loyalty; Song Jiang's 1st Attack on the Zhu Family Manor/Castle & Village

Yang Xiong raised the man to his feet and called Shi Xiu over.
"Who is this brother?" asked Shi Xiu.
"Du Xing is his name. He's from the prefecture of Zhongshan. Because of his crude features everyone calls him Demon Face. Last year he came to Jizhou as a trader. He killed one of the other merchants in his company in a fight, and was brought before the prefect and committed to my prison. I talked with him and found him very knowledgeable about hand-to-hand fighting and jousting with staves. So I used my influence and got him off. I never expected to meet him in this place."
"Are you here on official business, benefactor?" asked Du Xing.
Yang leaned close to his ear. "I killed a man in Jizhou and want to join the band in Liangshan Marsh. We spent last night at the Zhu Family Inn. Shi Qian, who's travelling with us, stole their rooster and we ate it, and the waiter raised a fuss. We got angry and set fire to the inn and ran away in the night. Pursuers caught up with us and we two knocked down several, but a couple of hooked poles reached out of the thicket and dragged Shi Qian away. We barged around until we came here. We were just about to ask for directions when you unexpectedly arrived, brother."
"Don't let it worry you, benefactor. I'll get them to return Shi Qian to you."
"Sit down and have a drink with us."
The three men sat and drank. Du Xing said: "Since leaving Jiizhou I benefited greatly from your kindness. Here, a big official took a liking to me and appointed me his steward. Every day all the thousand and one things in his household are in my hands. He trusts me completely. That's why I have no thought of going home."
"Who is this big official?"
"Before Lone Dragon Mountain are three cliffs, and on each of these is a village. Zhu Family Village is in the center, Hu Family Village is to the west, Li Family Village is to the east. These three villages and their manors have a total of nearly twenty thousand fighting men. Zhu Family Manor is the strongest. It is headed by Lord Zhu, who has three sons, known as the Three Warriors. The eldest is called Dragon, the second is called Tiger, the third is called Tiger Cub. They have a drill instructor, Luan Tingyu, who's known as the Iron Staff. Ten thousand men are no match for him. The manor has nearly two thousand fearless vassals.
"Hu Family Manor, to the west, is headed by Squire Hu. He has a son named Hu Cheng, the Flying Tiger, who is a powerful fighter. But above all he has a daughter, Hu Sanniang, known as Ten Feet of Steel because of the two long gleaming swords she wields. She's as bold a horsewoman as you'll ever meet.
"My master heads the eastern manor. His name is Li Ying, and he's skilled with a steel-flecked iron lance. On his back he carries five concealed throwing knives. He can hit a man at a hundred paces, quicker than you can blink.
"The three villages have a solemn pact. If one is attacked by evildoers, the others must go to its rescue. They're worried that bold fellows from Liangshan Marsh will raid them for grain, so they've prepared to defend themselves, together. I will take you to meet my master, and we'll request him to write a letter asking for Shi Qian's release."
"Your master Li Ying, isn't he the one known in the gallant fraternity as Heaven Soaring Eagle?" queried Yang Xiong.
"The very same."
Shi Xiu said: "I've heard that Li Ying of Lone Dragon Mountain is a Chivalrous fellow. So this is where he's from. They say he's a remarkable fighter, a real man. We'll go to him."
Yang asked the waiter for the bill, but Du Xing insisted on paying. The three left the tavern. Du led them to the Li Family Manor. It was a huge affair. Fronting on a river cove, it was surrounded by whitewashed walls beside which grew hundreds of willows each thicker than two arms could embrace. They crossed a lowered drawbridge to the manor gates and entered. Twenty racks on either side of the outer chamber of the main hall were filled with gleaming weapons.
"Please wait here a moment, brothers," said Du. "I will inform the master that you've come."
Du Xing went inside. Shortly afterwards he emerged with Li Ying. Du brought Yang and Shi into the reception chamber, where they kowtowed. Li Ying returned the courtesy and invited them to be seated. The two visitors and their host politely argued over who should sit where, but finally took their places. Li called for wine.
Again the two visitors kowtowed. They said: "We beseech you, sir, to send a letter to the Zhu Family Manor, asking them to spare the life of Shi Qian. We shall never forget your kindness, now or in the hereafter."
Li Ying summoned the family tutor, dictated a letter, and affixed his seal. He directed his assistant steward to deliver it at once on a fast horse and return with the captive. The man took the missive, mounted, and left. Yang and Shi expressed their thanks.
"You needn't worry," said Li Ying. "When they get my letter, they'll release him."
The two thanked him again. "Please come with me to the rear chamber," said their host. "We can have a few drinks while we're waiting."
They went with him and found that breakfast had been prepared. When they finished eating, tea was served. Li asked them some questions about jousting with spears. Their replies showed they knew what they were talking about, and Li was very pleased.
At mid-morning the assistant steward returned. Li Ying, in the rear chamber, asked: "Where is the man you were sent to fetch?"
"I sent the letter in," said the messenger, "confident they would let him go. Instead, the three sons came out and were quite unpleasant. They wouldn't answer your letter, and they wouldn't release the man. They're determined to turn him over to the prefectural authorities."
Li Ying was surprised. "Our three villages have a life-and-death alliance. They ought to respect my letter. How can they behave like that? You must have spoken rudely, to provoke such a response." He turned to Du Xing. "Steward, you'd better go yourself. See Lord Zhu personally, and explain the circumstances."
"I will, sir. But I suggest you write a missive in your own hand. Then, they'll have to let him go."
"Very well," said Li Ying. On a flowery sheet of paper he wrote a letter, added his personal seal to the envelope and handed it to Du Xing.
A fast horse was led out from the stable, already saddled and bridled. Whip in hand, Du walked through the manor gates, mounted, struck the animal a sharp blow, and galloped off towards the Zhu Family Manor.
"Don't worry," Li Ying said to his two callers. "When they receive this personal letter, they're sure to let him go quickly."
Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu profusely thanked the squire. He drank wine with them, while waiting in the rear chamber.
Daylight was beginning to fade, and still Du Xing hadn't returned. Li Ying became concerned, and he sent men down the road to meet him. A vassal soon came in and reported: "Steward Du is approaching."
"Who else is with him?"
"He's galloping back alone."
Li Ying shook his head in wonderment. "Very strange. He isn't usually so dilatory. Why is he slow today?"
He left the hall, followed by Yang and Shi. Du had dismounted and was just entering the manor gates. His face was tight with rage and his teeth were bared. For several minutes he was unable to speak.
"Tell us in detail," said Li Ying. "What happened?"
Du Xing controlled himself with an effort. "I carried your letter to their third big gate, and found, by coincidence, the three sons sitting there. I hailed them courteously. 'What do you want?' Tiger Cub snarled. I bowed and said: 'My master has sent me with this letter. I respectfully submit it.' His face darkened, and he replied: 'How can your master be so ignorant? The wretch he sent this morning brought a letter asking us for that Liangshan Marsh bandit Shi Qian. We're going to take him before the prefect. Why have you come again?' I said: 'Shi Qian isn't a member of the Liangshan Marsh band. He's a merchant from Jizhou who's come to see my master. There was a misunderstanding and he burned down your inn. My master undertakes to rebuild it. As a courtesy to us, please be lenient and forgive him.' The three brothers shouted: 'We're not going to let him go.' I said: 'Please, sirs, at least read the letter my master has written.' Tiger Cub took it and, without opening it, tore it to shreds. He yelled for his men to throw me out of the manor. He and Tiger said: 'Don't make your betters angry, or we'll'—I wasn't going to tell you this, but those animals really were too crude—'we'll nab that Li Ying and take him up before the court as a Liangshan Marsh bandit as well!' They yelled for their vassals to lay hands on me, but I jumped on my horse and raced away. I was burning with rage all the way home. What scoundrels! After all these years of close alliance, to behave so churlishly!"

When Li Ying heard this, his fury burst out of control and spurted sky-high. "Vassals," he roared, "bring me my horse!"

"Calm yourself, sir," Yang and Shi pleaded. "Don't spoil the local harmony for our sakes."

But Li would not listen. He put on golden armor with animal-faced discs, chest and back, and over that a voluminous red cape. Behind him, he affixed five throwing knives. He took his steel-flecked spear, donned his phoenix-winged helmet, strode out of the manor gates, and selected three hundred of his toughest vassals. Du Xing also put on armor, got a lance, and mounted. With him were twenty other horsemen. Yang and Shi girded up their robes. Halberds at the ready, they followed Li Ying's horse as the company advanced rapidly on the Zhu Family Manor.

The sun was linking in the western hills when they reached Lone Dragon Cliff.

They spread out in battle formation. The manor was strategically well situated upon a cliff and surrounded by a broad stream. It was enclosed by three sets of walls, one within the other, each twenty feet high and built of sturdy rock. The front and rear gates of the manor were equipped with drawbridges. Within the walls were huts bristling with weapons. In the gate-house atop the wall were war drums and gongs.

Li Ying reined in his horse in front of the manor. "Three sons of the Zhu Family," he shouted. "How dare you slander me!"

The manor gates opened and out rode fifty or sixty horsemen. In the lead, astride a charcoal roan steed, was Tiger Cub, third son of Lord Zhu. Li Ying shook his finger at the youth.

"The smell of milk hasn't gone from your lips. You've still got baby hair on your head. Your father has a life-and-death alliance with me. We've sworn to defend our villages jointly. When your family is in difficulty and needs men, we give them at once. When it needs materials, we never stint. Today, in good faith, I sent you two letters. Why did you tear them up? Insult me? Why have you committed this outrage?"

"Yes, we have a pact with you to defend our mutual interests," Tiger Cub retorted, "and to grab any bandits from Liangshan Marsh and destroy their mountain lair. How is it you're colluding with them? Are you planning to become a rebel too?"

"Who says Shi Qian is from Liangshan Marsh? You're slandering an innocent man. That's criminal."

"He's already confessed. Your lies aren't any use. They can't conceal the facts. Now, get out of here. If you don't, we'll grab you for a bandit and turn you in as well."

Furious, Li Ying whipped up his horse and charged at Tiger Cub with levelled lance. The youth spurred his own mount forward, and the two fought before Lone Dragon Cliff. To and fro, up and down, nearly eighty rounds they battled. Tiger Cub realized he couldn't vanquish his adversary. He turned his horse and ran. Li Ying gave chase. Tiger Cub rested his lance athwart his animal's neck, fitted an arrow to his bow and drew it to the full. Twisting in the saddle, he aimed and let fly. Li Ying dodged, but the arrow struck him in the shoulder, and he tumbled to the ground. Tiger Cub wheeled his mount and started back, intending to seize him. Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu uttered a great shout and dashed in the path of the youth's horse with raised halberds. Tiger Cub knew he was no match for them, and again he hurriedly turned his mount. Yang jabbed the horse in the withers, and it reared in pain, nearly unseating its rider. Zhu Family archers, who had followed after the horsemen, began whizzing arrows at Yang and Shi. They had no armor, and had to withdraw. By then, Du Xing had lifted Li Ying to his steed and ridden away. Yang and Shi followed in the wake of the retreating Li Family vassals. The Zhu Family forces pursued them for two or three //: But daylight was fading, and they returned to their manor.

Holding Li Ying, Du Xing rode home. At the gate he dismounted and helped his master into the rear chamber. The women of the household came in to attend him. They extracted the arrow, removed his armor, and applied a poultice to the wound.

That night, the men conferred. Yang and Shi said to Du Xing: "That rogue has insulted Li Ying. He's wounded him with an arrow and we haven't rescued Shi Qian. It's all our fault for having involved your master. We two will go to Mount Liangshan and entreat Chao and Song and the other leaders to come and avenge him and rescue Shi Qian." They thanked Li Ying and requested leave to depart.

"It's not that I didn't try, but the odds were too great," said Li Ying. "Please forgive me." He directed Du Xing to present Yang and Shi with gold and silver. They didn't want to accept, but Li Ying said: "We're all in the gallant fraternity. No need for courtesy."

Only then did they take his gifts. They kowtowed and bid him farewell. Du Xing saw them to the edge of the village and pointed out the main road, then returned to the Li Family Manor. Of that we'll say no more.

Yang and Shi pushed on towards Liangshan Marsh. They saw in the distance a newly built tavern, its wine pennant fluttering in the breeze. On arrival, they ordered drinks and asked directions. Actually, this tavern was a lookout place recently added by the men on Mount Liangshan. Shi Yong was in charge. He overheard them asking the waiter how to get to the fortress, and could see that they were no ordinary men. He walked over to their table.

"Where are you two gentlemen from? Why do you want to go up the mountain?" he queried.

"We're from Jizhou," Yang Xiong replied.

Shi Yong suddenly remembered. "Then you must be Shi Xiu."

"No, I'm Yang Xiong. This is Shi Xiu. How do you know his name, brother?"

"We haven't met. But not long ago brother Dai Zong stopped here on his way back from Jizhou and told me a lot about him. Today, you two want to go up the mountain. That's very good news."

The three exchanged courtesies, and Yang and Shi told Shi Yong of their encounter with the Zhu Family. Shi Yong directed the waiter to serve them the best wine. He opened the window of the pavilion over-looking the water, bent his bow, and shot a whistling arrow. Instantly, a bandit rowed a boat over from the reeds in the cove opposite. Shi Yong escorted the two on board and delivered them to Duck's Bill Shore. He had sent a man ahead to report, and now Dai Zong and Yang Lin came down the mountain to welcome them. After courtesies were exchanged, they went together to the stronghold.

When the leaders were informed that more bold fellows had arrived, they convened a meeting in the hall and sat in their chairs of rank. Dai Zong and Yang Lin led in Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu and presented them to Chao and Song and the other leaders. Chao questioned them carefully on their backgrounds. The two told of their skill with arms and of their desire to join the band. The leaders were very pleased, and offered them seats.

After a time Yang Xiong said: "There is a man named Shi Qian who also wants to join. But unfortunately he stole a rooster that heralded the dawn at the Zhu Family Inn and we got into a row. Shi Xiu burned the place down and Shi Qian was captured. Li Ying sent two letters requesting his release, but the three sons of the Zhu Family have refused to let him go. They've vowed to take all the gallants in this stronghold, and they've cursed and reviled you in every way. Those varlets have no sense of fitness whatsoever."

If he hadn't told this, nothing would have happened. But he did, and Chao Gai flew into a rage.

"Children," he shouted to the assembled bandits, "take these two out, cut off their heads, and report back."

Song Jiang hastily intervened. "Calm yourself, brother. These two warriors have come a long distance, and with one thought in mind—to help us. Why do you want them executed?"

"Ever since our bold fellows took over here from Wang Lun, we've always placed chivalry and virtuous behavior towards the people first. Brother after brother has gone down the mountain, but none of them has injured our prestige. All our brothers, new or old, are honorable and chivalrous. These rogues, in the name of the gallants of Liangshan Marsh, stole a rooster and ate it, shaming us by association. They must be decapitated, and their heads displayed at the scene of the crime as a warning. I will personally lead our forces down and purge the Zhu Family Village so that our reputation for valor will not be lost. Children, off with their heads!"

"Wait," said Song Jiang. "Didn't you hear what these two brothers just said? Shi Qian the Flea on a Drum has always been light fingered. It was his behavior that provoked the Zhu Family. In what way have these two brothers shamed our stronghold? I've heard many people say that the Zhu Family Manor is hostile to us. Cool down, brother. We have many men and horses, but we're short of money and grain. Although we're not looking for trouble with the Zhu's, since they've started the provocation, this is a good chance to go down and nab them. When we defeat the manor, we'll capture enough grain to last us four or five years. We're not seeking an excuse to harm them, but those oafs are really much too rude. You are the highest leader here, brother. Why sally forth on minor matters? I have no talent, but with a contingent of men and horses, and the help of some of our brothers, I'd like to attack the Zhu Family Manor. If we don't wipe it out, we won't return. For one thing, only vengeance will restore our prestige. Secondly, we must pay those pipsqueaks for their insults. Thirdly, we'll get a lot of grain for the use of our fortress. And fourthly, we can ask Li Ying to come up and join our band."

"A very good idea," said Wu Yong. "We in the fortress shouldn't destroy men who are like our own hands."

"I'd rather you decapitated me than hurt one of our brothers," said Dai Zong.

At the urging of all the leaders, Chao Gai finally pardoned Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu. They thanked him and kowtowed.

"Don't be angry," Song Jiang said to them soothingly. "It's a rule of our stronghold, and we must obey. Even I could be decapitated if I violated it. I could expect no forgiveness. Pei Xuan, the Ironclad Virtue, has recently been made provost marshal, and rules regarding rewards and punishments have been promulgated. Don't hold it against us, please."

Chao asked Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu to take seats after Yang Lin, and all the rank and file bandits were summoned to join in congratulating the new chieftains. Cows and horses were slaughtered and a celebration feast was laid. Living quarters were allocated to Yang and Shi, and ten bandits were appointed to each as attendants.

The banquet ended that evening, and the next day they feasted again. Then the leaders conferred. Song Jiang directed Ironclad Virtue to compile a list of men to go down the mountain, and he invited the other leaders to accompany him in a raid on the Zhu Family Manor. He was determined to demolish it. It was agreed that Wu Yong, Liu Tang, the three Ruan brothers, Lu Fang and Guo Sheng would remain to hold the fortress, in addition to Chao Gai. Those guarding the shore, the gates and the taverns would also remain at their posts. Newly arrived Meng Kang, who had been appointed boat builder, would replace Ma Lin as the supervisor of war vessels. A written announcement was drawn stating that the leaders participating in the raid on the Zhu Family Manor were divided into two units. The first included Song Jiang, and would head a body of three thousand foot soldiers and three hundred cavalry. When armored and equipped, this would go first, as the van.

The second unit would include Lin Chong, and would also head three thousand foot soldiers and three hundred cavalry. This body would follow, as reinforcements.

Song Wan and Zhang Tianshou would continue holding the small forts at the Shore of Golden Sands and Duck's Bill Shore, respectively, and be responsible for supplying the attackers with grain and fodder. Chao Gai saw the raiders off and returned to the stronghold. Song Jiang's party made straight for the Zhu Family Manor. Nothing untoward happened on the way, and they soon were approaching Lone Dragon Mountain. When they were about a //or so away, they pitched camp. Song Jiang's tent was in the middle, and he sat there conferring with Hua Rong.

"I hear the roads to the manor are very tricky," he said, "and that it's difficult to move up on them with soldiers. I'll send a couple of men to scout out which paths are best. Then we can advance and engage the foe."

"I've been idle for a long time, brother," said Li Kui. "I haven't killed a single person. Let me go in first."

"Not you, brother," said Song Jiang. "If we needed a shock assault, I'd send you. But this is careful, delicate work. You're not suitable."

Li Kui laughed. "That friggin manor. Why trouble yourself? I'll take two or three hundred of the lads, and we'll carve our way in and cut all the wretches down. What do you need scouts for?"

"You're talking rot. Get out of here, and don't come till I call you."

Li Kui left, muttering to himself: "All that fuss about swatting a few flies."

Song Jiang summoned Shi Xiu and said: "You've been here before. I'd like you and Yang Lin to scout around."

"Since you've come with a large force, they're of course on their guard at the manor. How should we disguise ourselves?"

"I'll dress up as an exorcist," said Yang Lin, "and conceal a knife in my clothes. I'll carry a prayer wheel as I walk along. The moment you hear the sound of it, come up to me and stay close."

"I sold fuel in Jizhou," said Shi Xiu. "I'll tote a load as if I was selling again. I also will have a concealed weapon. In an emergency I can use the carrying-pole as well."

"Good. We'll work out the details, and prepare tonight. We'll get up at the fifth watch and go."

The next morning, Shi Xiu left first with his load of fuel. Before he had gone twenty //: he encountered a complicated maze of paths which seemed to go round in circles through thick groves of trees. He couldn't figure them out. Shi Xiu set down his load. Behind, he heard the hum of an approaching prayer wheel. Yang Lin, a broken straw hat on his head, wearing an old priest's robe and twirling a prayer wheel, was coming towards him with stately tread. No one else was in sight, so Shi Xiu spoke to him: "These paths all twist and turn. I can't remember which was the one I took with Li Ying the other day. It was nearly dark and they knew the way and travelled fast. I wasn't able to get a good look."

"Stay off the paths, then, and stick to the main road."

Shi Xiu shouldered his load again and continued on. He saw a village ahead, and several taverns and butcher shops. He walked up to the gate of one of the taverns. He noticed that racks of weapons stood in front of every shop, and that all the men in them wore golden vests with the word "Zhu" emblazoned on the backs. People on the streets were similarly dressed. Shi Xiu respectfully hailed the old man who was passing by and bowed.

"May I ask you about a local custom, grandpa? Why are there weapons at every door?"

"Where are you from, stranger? If you don't know, you'd better leave quickly."

"I'm a date-seller from Shandong. I've lost my capital and can't go home. Now I sell fuel. I'm not familiar with your local ways."

"Go quickly. Get out of sight. There's going to be a big battle here soon."

"How can that be, a nice place like this?"

"You really don't know? Well, I'll tell you. This is called Zhu Family Village. It's ruled by Lord Zhu, whose manor is up on that cliff. He's offended the bold fellows in Liangshan Marsh, and they've come with men and horses to kill us all. But the paths to our village are too complicated, and they're camped outside. The manor has directed every able-bodied young man to get ready. The moment the order comes, they're to rush to the said of our fighters."

"How many people have you here in this village, grandpa?"

"Nearly twenty thousand. And we can count on help from the villages to our east and west. The eastern one is ruled by Heaven Soaring Eagle Li Ying. The western one belongs to Squire Hu. He has a daughter called Ten Feet of Steel who's a terror with weapons."

"In that case, you've nothing to fear from Liangshan Marsh!"

"That's right. If we ourselves had just arrived, we too could be easily captured."

"What do you mean, grandpa?"

"We have a jingle that goes:

A fine Zhu Family Village,
Its paths twist round about,
Getting in is easy,
But just try getting out!"

Shi Xiu began to weep. He flopped to the ground and kowtowed.

"I'm a poor trader who lost his capital on the road and can't go home, and now I'm selling fuel," he cried. "This is awful. I've landed in the middle of a battle and can't escape. Pity me, grandpa. I'll give you this load of fuel, only show me the way out!"

"I don't want your fuel for nothing. I'll buy it from you. Come with me. I'll treat you to some food and wine."

Shi Xiu thanked him, shouldered his load, and went with the old man to his house. His host poured out two bowls of white wine, filled another with rice gruel, and set them before him. Again Shi Xiu expressed his thanks.

"Grandpa," he begged, "tell me how to get out of here."

"You just turn whenever you reach a white poplar. Take the path that starts from there, whether it be narrow or broad. Any other path leads to a dead end. No other tree will do. If you take a wrong path, you'll never get out, whether you go left or right. The dead-end trails are strewn with hidden bamboo spikes and iron prongs. You're liable to step on them, and you're sure to be captured. You wouldn't have a chance of getting away."

The young man kowtowed and thanked him. "What is your name, grandpa?"

"Most people in this village have the surname of Zhu. Only my family is named Zhongli. We've always been here."

"I've had enough food and wine. Some day I'll repay you well."

While they were talking, they heard a clamor outside. A voice shouted: "We've caught a spy." Startled, Shi Xiu and the old man hurried into the courtyard. They saw seventy or eighty soldiers escorting a man with his hands tied behind his back. Shi Xiu recognized Yang Lin. He had been stripped naked. Shi Xiu groaned inwardly.

"Who is that?" he made a pretense of asking the old man. "Why is he bound?"

"Didn't you hear them say he's a spy sent by Song Jiang?"

"How was he caught?"

"He's a bold rascal. He came alone, disguised as an exorcist priest, barging into the village. Since he didn't know the way, he could only follow the main road. Left or right would have taken him into dead ends. He'd never heard the secret of the white poplars. Someone saw him wandering off on a wrong turning, and thought he looked suspicious. So he reported to the manor, and they sent men to nab him. The rogue pulled a knife and wounded four or five of them. But they were too many, and he was overpowered. Now he's been recognized as a robber. They say he's called Yang Lin the Elegant Panther."

Down the road a voice exclaimed: "The Third Son of the manor has come on patrol."

Through a crack in the courtyard wall Shi Xiu saw twenty foot soldiers with red-tasseled spears, followed by five mounted men, all with bows and arrows. Behind, another four or five riders on white horses were gathered protectively around a young warrior on a snow-white steed. In full armor, he carried a bow and arrows, and gripped a lance. Shi Xiu recognized him, but feigned ignorance.

"Who is that young gentleman passing by?"

"Lord Zhu's third son, Tiger Cub. He's engaged to Ten Feet of Steel of the Hu Family Manor, west of here. Of the three sons, he's the most terrific fighter."

Shi Xiu again thanked the old man and said: "Please point out which road I should take."

"It's late already, and a battle may be raging ahead. You'll be throwing your life away."
"Save me, grandpa, I beg you."
"Spend the night here. Tomorrow, if things are quiet, you can leave."
Shi Xiu thanked him, and remained. Four or five mounted men were going from door to door and exhorting the populace: "If you see a red signal lantern tonight, use might and main to catch the Mount Liangshan bandits and claim the reward."
When they had gone, Shi Xiu asked: "Who was that official with them?"
"He's our local sheriff. Tonight they're planning to capture Song Jiang."
Shi Xiu gave this some thought. Then he borrowed a torch, said good night, and retired to sleep in a thatched hut in the rear.
Song Jiang and his forces were encamped outside the village. Neither Shi Xiu nor Yang Lin had returned. Ou Peng was sent to the village entrance to check. After a while he reported back.
"People are saying they've caught a spy. Those paths are very complicated. I didn't dare to go further in."
Song Jiang grew angry. "I can't wait for a report any longer. Now the word is they've caught a spy. That means our two brothers have been trapped. We'll attack tonight, regardless. We'll fight our way in and rescue them. How do the rest of you feel about it?" he asked the other leaders.
"I'll go first," said Li Kui. "Just to see what it's like."
Song Jiang ordered all men to arm themselves and put on their gear. Li Kui and Yang Xiong would be the vanguard. Li Jun would command the rear. Mu Hong would take the left flank, Huang Xin the right. Song Jiang, Hua Rong and Ou Peng would lead the central contingent.
Amid waving flags, pounding drums and braying gongs, the raiders, shouting and brandishing swords and axes, marched rapidly on the Zhu Family Manor.
It was dusk when they reached Lone Dragon Cliff. Song Jiang urged the forward contingent to attack the manor. Li Kui, stripped to the buff and brandishing two steel battle-axes, rushed ahead like a streak of fire. But at the manor, he found the drawbridge raised and not a light showing anywhere. Li Kui was going to jump into the moat and swim across, but Yang Xiong stopped him.
"No, don't. If they've closed the manor gates, they must have some scheme. Wait till brother Song Jiang arrives, then we'll decide what to do."
To Li Kui this was unbearable. He smote his battle-axes and shouted up the cliff: "Lord Zhu, you friggin crook, come out! Your master Black Whirlwind is here, waiting!"
There was no response from the manor.
Song Jiang, followed by Yang, arrived with his men. The manor was quiet. He reined in his horse and looked. Not a weapon or a soldier was in sight. Warily, he thought: "I'm wrong. The Heavenly Books say clearly: 'Avoid rashness in the face of the enemy.' I didn't foresee this. I thought only of rescuing our two brothers, and moved my troops up through the night. I didn't expect that when I got in deep, right up to their manor, that the foe's army wouldn't show. They must be up to something."
He ordered his three contingents to withdraw at once. Li Kui objected.
"We've come this far. You mustn't retreat," he cried. "You and I will fight our way in. All of you, follow me!"
Before the words were out of his mouth, the manor knew about it. A signal rocket arched through the sky. On the cliff thousands of torches suddenly flared. Arrows showered down from the gate-house above the wall. Song Jiang hastily withdrew his forces along the road on which it had come. The rear guard under Li Jun set up a shout. "We're cut off! They've laid an ambush!" Song Jiang directed his men to seek other roads. Li Kui, flourishing his axes, dashed about, looking for adversaries, but he couldn't find a single enemy soldier. Another signal rocket soared from the cliff. Before the sound of it had died away, thunderous shouts rang from all sides. Pop-eyed and slack-mouthed with astonishment, Song Jiang was completely at a loss. In spite of his civil and military skills, he had fallen into the net. Truly, a plan for snaring tigers and dragons was being used to catch a heaven-startling, earth-shaking man.

Morbid raised the other man to his feet, and made to introduce him to Madcap. "Who is this fellow?" Madcap asked.
"He's an old friend by the name of Du Xing," Morbid replied. "He's from Zhongshan. Because he was blessed with such a coarse complexion, people call him Uglymug. He was a trader and he came to Jizhou last year on business. But in a fit of rage he killed one of the foreign merchants he was travelling with. He was sentenced and they locked him up. I heard that he was an expert with fists and staff, so I did what I could to help him. It's quite a surprise to meet him here."
Uglymug asked: "What official business brings you here, benefactor?"
Morbid leant forward and said confidentially: "I have killed someone in Jizhou and I'm on my way to the Marshes of Mount Liang to join the outlaws. Last night we stayed at the Zhu Arms and because a travelling companion of ours, known as the Flea, stole the inn's rooster for our supper, we got into a fight with the waiter there. We lost our tempers and burnt the place down. We cleared off immediately, but we had been followed. We did for a number of them, all by ourselves, but some others hidden in the undergrowth stuck out a couple of hooks and collared the Flea. We two ended up here. We were just going to ask the way when we met you."
"Don't you worry, benefactor," said Uglymug. "I'll get them to release the Flea and return him to you."
"Sit down and drink a cup with us, old chap," said Morbid.
They sat down together and as they were drinking Uglymug said: "After I left Jizhou, thanks to your kind assistance, I moved here, and gained the favour of an important man who received me into his household and made me his steward. All his financial affairs are entirely in my hands, he trusts me completely. So I don't plan to go back home."
"What's the name of this man?" Morbid asked.
"Here on the edge of the Lone Dragon mountains," Uglymug began, "there are three bluffs, each with its village. The place in the middle is the Zhu family's estate, to the west are the Hu family and to the east the Li family. Altogether, counting villagers and retainers, there's around twenty thousand fighting men. Chief of the three is the Zhu place: Baron Zhu and his three sons, known as the Brothers Zhu — Dragon Zhu, Tiger Zhu and Wildcat Zhu. They've also got an arms instructor called Luan Tingyu, known as Ironstaff. That man is formidable. In addition the manor has several thousand fearless retainers.
"Over to the west is the manor of Squire Hu. He has one son, Hu Cheng, known as Flying Tiger. He's pretty good, too. But above all he has a daughter, Hu Sanniang, known as Steelbright, because of the two bright swords she wields. She's as bold a horsewoman as you'll ever meet.
"Now the man I serve is the master of the eastern manor, Skyhawk. His name's Li Ying, and his weapon's a solid steel spear. He also carries at his back five throwing knives. With these he can spit a man at a hundred paces, just like that!
"These three villages have sworn an oath of loyalty to each other, to work together, in good times or bad, and to provide mutual assistance. What they fear is that the heroes of Mount Liang may come foraging, so the three villages have made preparations for resisting them.
"I'm going to take you back to my village now to meet Skyhawk and to get him to send a letter requesting the release of the Flea."
Morbid said: "This Skyhawk of yours, would he be the gentleman who's made that name so famous among the rivers and lakes?"
"That's him," replied Uglymug.
"I've heard it many times from the brethren of the rivers and lakes: in the Lone Dragon Mountains there is a certain Skyhawk, who is a bold spirit. So this is where he hangs out! He has the reputation of being a fine fighter and truly a man of parts. Let's go and meet him, then."
So Madcap called the waiter over and asked for the bill. But Uglymug was having none of it, and produced the money himself.
The three left the inn and Uglymug conducted the others to Skyhawk's manor. What Morbid saw was a fine compound, surrounded by a broad piece of water, with a whitewashed wall and hundreds of ancient willows of immense girth. The gate was reached by a drawbridge. Entering the compound, they saw twenty or more arms racks, stacked with gleaming weapons, in front of the main hall.
Uglymug said: "Please wait here a moment while I go in and announce you and ask the master to come and meet you."
He disappeared inside and a few minutes later Skyhawk came out. What met the eyes of Morbid and Madcap was a fine figure of a man, as the poem describes:
Eyes like an eagle and head like a lion; a swallow's neck, ape's shoulders and wolf's waist; this is a man who is open-handed and single-minded, truly heroic. He likes to ride a snow-white charger, and is wont to wear a blood red robe. Five throwing knives he carries at his back, and a barbed spear of steel with inlaid hasp. Such a man is not easily gainsaid. This imposing personage is called Li Ying, otherwise known as Skyhawk.
When Skyhawk came out, Uglymug presented Morbid and Madcap, who prostrated themselves. Skyhawk hurriedly returned the compliment and invited them into the hall. After many modest protestations, all were finally seated and Skyhawk called for wine. Morbid and Madcap again saluted him and said: "Might we ask you to be so kind as to write a letter to Baron Zhu asking him to spare the life of our friend the Flea? We should be eternally grateful to you."
Skyhawk called for the household tutor to perform this business. A letter was composed and duly certificated with Skyhawk's personal seal. It was then handed to the assistant chief steward with instructions to take a fast mount and ride like the wind to Zhu Castle to fetch the gentleman in question.
After the steward had departed on horseback bearing the letter, Morbid and Madcap kowtowed once more. Skyhawk said: "Don't worry, my friends. When they get my letter they're bound to release him." Again they expressed their thanks.
"Come inside and we'll have a few cups together," Skyhawk said. They followed him in, and found a repast awaiting them. After eating they drank tea while Skyhawk quizzed them about shooting and was pleased at finding their answers most sensible.
Halfway through the morning, the assistant steward returned. Skyhawk sent for him and said: "Where's the man I sent you to fetch?"
The steward replied: "I saw the Baron and delivered the letter. I think he was about to release the man when the Brothers Zhu came in and began to kick up a terrific row. They would neither answer your letter nor release the man; they are determined to hand him over to the authorities."
Skyhawk was horrified. "But we've all signed a life or death pact," he said. "They've got to respect my letter. How can they behave like this? You can't have explained properly, that's the problem. Mr. Du," he said, turning to Uglymug, "you'd better go along and see to it yourself, explain carefully what it's all about."
"Of course I'll go, sir," said Uglymug, "only could you write something in your own hand, so when I get there they'll feel obliged to release him?"
"It shall be done," said Skyhawk, quickly taking up a piece of the best paper on which he wrote a letter in his own hand. He stamped it on the front and affixed his personal seal, then handed it to Uglymug. A fast mount was brought round from the stables at the back of the house, saddled and bridled. Uglymug picked up a whip and strode through the gate. Mounting, he applied the whip and shot off towards Baron Zhu's castle.
"Now you two really can relax," Skyhawk said. "When they receive this letter in my own hand he'll be freed in no time."
They thanked him most sincerely, and the drinking continued in the inner room, as they waited for the result.
It was beginning to grow dark, yet still there was no sign of Uglymug. Skyhawk began to have misgivings. He had just ordered someone to go and look out for Uglymug, when a retainer came in and said: "The chief steward, Mr. Du, is coming."
"Is there anyone with him?" Skyhawk asked.
"No, he's riding back on his own," the man replied.
Skyhawk shook his head. "Stranger and stranger," he said. "He's never let me down before, what's the matter with him today?"
Morbid and Madcap went with him to see. As Uglymug dismounted and came through the gate, they saw his expression: he was purple with rage, his teeth bared in a horrible grimace. It was a while before he could even speak. A poem says:

He was born with a face that's already a curse,
But when he's angry it even gets worse,
Not like a human being at all,
More like the black-faced lord of Hell.

Skyhawk said: "Tell us exactly what happened!"
When Uglymug had managed to catch his breath, he said: "Bearing your letter, I went up as far as the third gate. There I came upon Dragon Zhu, Tiger Zhu and Wildcat Zhu. I saluted and Wildcat Zhu shouted out: 'What are you doing here?'
"I bowed very low and said: 'I have a letter here that my master has written to you.'
"His face changed, the bastard, and he yelled: 'What's he playing at, that master of yours? He sent some lousy beggar here this morning with a letter asking for the Mount Liang bandit, Shi Qian. I'm going to hand him over to the authorities. You're wasting your time!'
"I said: 'This Shi Qian is not one of the Mount Liang bandits, he's a merchant from Jizhou. He was coming to see our master when a misunderstanding occurred and he accidentally burnt down your inn. My master vows that he will restore it completely for you. He humbly begs you to show consideration, exercise restraint and pardon the offense.' But they all shouted in unison: 'We won't, we won't!' So then I said: 'Please read this letter of my master's.' Wildcat Zhu took it and without even breaking the seal tore it into little pieces, saying he'd have me kicked out. Tiger Zhu and Wildcat Zhu said: 'Stop provoking us or we'll have that Skyhawk of yours arrested as well, as an accomplice of the bandits of Mount Liang.' I didn't dare press them further. Truly I was treated disgracefully by those three animals and they slandered you vilely. They ended by ordering their people to seize me but I leapt into the saddle and galloped straight back. I can tell you, though, all the way back I was choking with rage. How dare those bastards flout the life or death pact which has existed between you all these years! They've no loyalty at all!"

This talk of friendship's mere hot air,
When genuine loyalty isn't there,
When things go wrong it's an empty word:
To trust in a pact is just absurd.

When Skyhawk heard what had happened anger rose in him like a column of fire, towering and unquenchable. He called for his horse to be saddled. "Please moderate your anger," Morbid and Madcap pleaded. "You mustn't upset everything on our account."
But Skyhawk wasn't listening. He went back in and provided himself with a suit of gilded chain-mail, wrought with animal heads guarding his breast front and back, donned a red robe, and stuck five throwing knives into the back of his kneeguards. He picked up his steel spear and put on a phoenix-winged helmet. He went outside and picked three hundred stalwart retainers. Uglymug also put on armour, took up his spear and mounted. He collected another twenty or more riders. Morbid and Madcap tagged along, wielding their halberds. Led by Skyhawk on horseback, this entire force set off at speed, heading for the castle of Baron Zhu.
The sun was already sinking towards the mountains when they reached Lone Dragon Heights, where horse and foot deployed. The castle was of solid construction, set on an eminence at the foot of the Lone Dragon Mountains and surrounded on all sides by a sizeable moat. Besides being built on a bluff, it had three layers of ramparts constructed from large blocks of stone to a height of about six metres. There were two gates, front and back, each approached by a drawbridge. Within the walls, on all sides, there were sheds simply bristling with spears, swords and other weapons, while the gate tower was full of military drums and gongs.
Skyhawk reined in his horse and shouted up at the castle: "You there, Brothers Zhu, what do you mean by insulting me?" At this moment the gates opened and out charged fifty or more horsemen, led by the Baron's third son, Wildcat Zhu, on a flame-coloured steed.
On his head he wears a helmet in the shape of a golden lotus leaf. He's dressed in armour like plum blossom. At his waist swings an embroidered sheaf with bow and arrows. In either hand he grasps a sword and spear of pure steel. Red tassels hang from his horse's brow. He's a sight to fill the heart with dread!
When Skyhawk saw Wildcat Zhu he pointed a finger at him and said: "Look at you! The mother's milk still wet on your lips and your head still covered in fluff! Your father and I swore eternal loyalty, we agreed to cooperate and made a pact for mutual defence and protection. If there's a problem in your household, if you need extra hands, we send them over at once; if you need supplies we hold nothing back. Today I've twice sent someone to you with a letter asking for something, why did you tear up my letter and insult my honour? What's your game?"
Wildcat Zhu said: "It's perfectly true we have a life or death pact. We vowed to work together, to defend each other against the bandits of Mount Liang and wipe out the mountain stronghold. So why have you gone and joined the rebels, why are you conspiring with them?"
"Who are you calling a bandit from Mount Liang?" Skyhawk said. "Why are you slandering someone, what have you got against him?"
"The bandit Shi Qian has confessed to it himself, so stop talking rubbish," Wildcat Zhu replied. "It's irrefutable. Either you leave now or I'll have you arrested and handed over too as one of them."
Skyhawk was enraged. He settled himself in the saddle, took a firm grip on his spear and charged. Wildcat Zhu likewise gave his horse its head and attacked. Back and forth and to and fro, the pair of them fought hundreds of encounters, there at the foot of Lone Dragon Heights. When Wildcat Zhu saw that he could not prevail, he turned his horse and galloped off. As Skyhawk urged his horse in pursuit, Wildcat Zhu rested his spear on the horse's back, grasped his bow in his left hand and an arrow in his right, fitted the arrow to the string and bent the bow. Twisting in the saddle, he took careful aim and loosed the shaft. Skyhawk tried to dodge but it caught him in the arm and he fell headlong from his mount. Wildcat Zhu then turned his horse and came at him with the spear. When Morbid and Madcap saw this they gave a great shout, twirled their halberds and placed themselves menacingly in the path of horse and rider. This was more than Wildcat Zhu could cope with. He pulled up his horse and galloped off, but not before the horse had taken a blow on the rump from Morbid's weapon. Maddened by pain the animal reared up, almost throwing its rider. The supporting archers however now began to shoot their arrows. Morbid and Madcap had no armour and they were obliged to turn and run for it. Uglymug fled too, once he had rescued Skyhawk and hoisted him onto his horse. Morbid and Madcap escaped with the crowd of retainers. The Zhu forces pursued them for a few miles, but when it began to get dark they went home.
Uglymug reached the manor bearing Skyhawk. He dismounted and took the squire inside and made him sit. All the household came to see. They pulled out the arrow, stripped off his armour and anointed the wound with an appropriate salve. All night there were discussions in the back room. Morbid and Madcap said to Uglymug: "Those villains have insulted your master, they've wounded him with an arrow; the Flea is still being held, and it's all our fault that your master got involved. What we'll have to do is go to Mount Liang, the two of us, and ask for help from the leaders, Chao Gai, Song Jiang and the rest. We'll beg them to come and avenge your honour and rescue the Flea."
Before they left they went to thank Skyhawk.
"I did my best," he said to them. "But it was beyond my power. Please forgive me."
He told Uglymug to get some gold and silver to give them. They didn't want to take it, but Skyhawk said: "Among friends of the rivers and lakes, there's no reason to refuse." So in the end they accepted, thanked Skyhawk and bade him farewell. Uglymug escorted them to the end of the village and then, after pointing out the road, bade them farewell and returned to Skyhawk's. Of this no more.
So Morbid and Madcap set off for Mount Liang. Before long they saw in the distance a newly built inn, with its flag sticking out very straight. They went in and ordered something to eat and drink and asked for directions. This inn was one of the newly established lookouts for Mount Liang and the landlord was none other than Shi Yong, the Guv. As they drank they kept questioning the waiter about the route to Mount Liang, and this drew the Guv's attention: "Where are you two from and why do you keep asking about the way to Mount Liang?" he asked.
"We are from Jizhou," Morbid replied.
The Guv suddenly had a thought: "You're not Madcap by any chance, are you?" he asked.
Morbid replied: "I'm Morbid. My friend here is Madcap. But how do you know about him?"
"I don't know you myself," the Guv said eagerly to Madcap. "But when my friend Dai Zong, the Magic Messenger, returned from Jizhou, he was full of your praises. I've heard so much about you and now you want to go up the mountain. I'm very pleased to hear it."

Having exchanged the usual courtesies, Morbid and Madcap told the Guv about recent events. The Guv ordered his waiter to serve them with the best wine. A window was opened at the back of the inn, a bow was pulled and a whistling arrow fired off. Immediately from the reeds on the other side of the water two soldiers rowed out in a boat. The Guv invited the others to embark and they were rowed across to Duck's-Bill Landing. Messengers had already been sent up the mountain and almost at once the Magic Messenger and Panther appeared to welcome them. When the introductions had been completed they went together up to the fortress where all the leaders, hearing of the arrival of some brave men, had assembled in the great hall. The Magic Messenger and Panther brought the newcomers into the hall to meet the two leaders and all the others. After greeting them, Chao Gai asked them all about their travels. But first they spoke of their experience in martial arts and their wish to enter the company. This pleased everyone and they were invited to sit down. Morbid recounted little by little how a comrade known as the Flea, who also wanted to join, had unfortunately stolen the Zhu inn's cockerel and caused a rumpus as a result of which Madcap had set fire to the inn and the Flea had been taken and Skyhawk had written two letters asking for his release but the Brothers Zhu had refused point-blank to let him go and vowed that they would capture all the heroes of the mountain stronghold, whom they had roundly insulted. "They're a bunch of unmannerly scoundrels," he concluded.

It would have been well if Morbid had held his tongue, but he blurted all this out and Chao Gai flew into a great passion. "Take these two outside and cut off their heads!" he ordered. As the poem says:

Before they recounted the Flea's misdemeanour,
Morbid and Madcap should have thought twice.
Though the heart of a hero may burn like a fire,
The law of the greenwood is rigid as ice.

Song Jiang hurriedly intervened. "Calm yourself, brother," he said. "These gentlemen thought nothing of travelling a long way to join us, why do you want to cut their heads off?"

Chao Gai replied: "Here on Mount Liang, ever since we put paid to Wang Lun, we have been ruled by honour and have always treated the people decently. No one who has gone down the mountain has ever disgraced us. Everyone, whether a new recruit or an oldtimer, has a heroic spirit. These two villains, in the name of the heroes of Mount Liang, have stolen a chicken. Thus they have shamed us all. First we will cut off their heads, then we will take the heads down there with an escort of troops and show them to the villagers to cleanse our name and prove that we are not common thieves. Let them be executed at once!"

"But brother," Song Jiang objected again, "did you not hear what they said? This fellow Shi Qian, the Flea, has always been that way inclined, and it's he who got that bloody Zhu family so worked up. Do you really think these two friends wanted to bring disgrace on our company? Anyway, I've often heard people saying that the Zhu crowd want to fight us. At present, what's more, our numbers are great and money and provisions are getting short. We wouldn't have gone to seek them out deliberately, but since they'll always be looking for a pretext to attack us, we'd better take this opportunity to have a go at the bastards. If we capture their place there's three or four years' supplies there for us. It's not our aim to make trouble for them, but they're really getting too big for their boots! So calm down, please, brother, because whatever my limitations as a commander, I intend to ask for volunteers and assemble a force to go down the mountain and attack the Zhu domain. If we don't make a clean sweep, I vow never to return to the mountain. In this way we'll wipe out any slur on our name, and at the same time avenge all the insults and obtain much-needed provisions for the camp. And we can even ask Skyhawk to join our company."

Professor Wu Yong said: "What Song Jiang says is right. Why should we execute our brothers?"

The Magic Messenger said: "Better you cut off my head than send such a signal to other brave men who might want to join us!"

In the end, after everyone had had a say, Chao Gai relented. Morbid and Madcap kowtowed to express their thanks. Song Jiang tried to reassure them by saying: "Don't be surprised friends. This is the rule of Mount Liang. We all have to submit to it. If I myself commit a fault, I must have my head cut off. There can be no mercy. The lawyer Pei Xuan, known as Sterling, who just joined us, was recently appointed provost marshal and has drawn up the code and established the penalties. So please don't harbour any resentment."

Morbid and Madcap responded by kowtowing and expressing their thanks all over again. Chao Gai then allotted them seats below Panther Yang Lin. All the troops on the mountain were invited to celebrate the arrival of new leaders, cows and sheep were slaughtered and a feast prepared. The two newcomers were allotted quarters so they had somewhere to live, and each was given ten men to serve him. There was more feasting next day, and then a conference to discuss plans.

Having asked Sterling to make a list of those who were going, Song Jiang requested volunteers to accompany him on his raid against Zhu Castle, which he was bent on destroying. It was determined that, apart from Chao Gai who would remain in charge in the mountain stronghold, those who were to stay to defend it were Professor Wu, the Red-Haired Devil, the three Ruan brothers, the Halberdier and the Little Duke. Others were appointed to take charge of the landings, the main gates and the inns. Flagpole, the new arrival, was put in charge of boat-building, replacing the Flautist as supervisor of war vessels. Orders were written out and those who were to go down the mountain and attack Zhu Castle were divided into two contingents: the first consisted of Song Jiang, Colonel Hua, the White-Water Dragon, the elder Mu brother, Iron Ox, Morbid, Madcap, Tamer, Golden Wings and the Panther, with three thousand infantry and three hundred horse. They armed themselves and set off first down the mountain. The second contingent consisted of Leopard's Head, Thunderclap, the Magic Messenger, White Eel, the Pilot, the Flautist, Redeye, Short-Arse and the Daytime Rat. They too would lead three thousand infantry and three hundred horse and would follow on in support of the others. Finally Golden Sands Landing and Duck's-Bill Landing were left in the hands of the Door-God in the Clouds and Whitey, to guard and secure their lines of supply.

Chao Gai saw them all off down the mountain, and then went back to the stronghold.

So Song Jiang and the other leaders pressed on towards Zhu Castle and nothing occurred on the way. Soon they were nearing Lone Dragon Heights. With less than a mile to go, the leading party pitched their camp. Song Jiang sat in his tent in their midst, conferring with Colonel Hua. "I have heard that the roads through the Zhu domain are very confusing and it's difficult for troops to advance there. Before we launch our attack we should send in two scouts to learn the various turnings of the road and find out the best route."

Iron Ox said: "Brother, I've been idle for a long while. I haven't killed anyone recently. Let me go first."

"Absolutely not." Song Jiang said. "When it comes to open fighting, you can go first. But this is a job which calls for attention to detail, you're not suited to it."

Iron Ox laughed contemptuously. "Why all this trouble for the sake of a fucking farmhouse? Just give me a few hundred men and I'll go ahead and kill all those fucking peasants, what need is there to send in scouts?"

Song Jiang shouted angrily: "You're talking rubbish! When we want to storm the place, we'll call for you."

Iron Ox took himself off, muttering: "What a lot of fuss just to swat a bloody fly!"

Next Song Jiang called Madcap and said: "You've been there before, so I'd like you to go with Panther."

Madcap said: "Since we've come here in such force, I can't believe they won't be ready for us. How should we disguise ourselves, in order to get in?"

Panther said: "I shall disguise myself as an exorcist. I'll be carrying a hidden knife and holding a rattle and I'll just amble along quietly till I'm inside. You just listen for my rattle and stay close."

"When I was in Jizhou I used to be a seller of firewood," Madcap said. "I'll take a load of firewood in to sell. I'll carry a concealed weapon too, and in an emergency I can also use the carrying-pole."

"Good," said Panther. "We'll work it all out and make our preparations tonight. We'll start at dawn."

So all because of a row over a chicken, the tigers came out to fight. There's an old poem that says it all:

Often it's the weak who have an easy time, the strong are too prone to stir up trouble. Still, though it's good to live without strife, show me the man that's always blameless! A blunt axe serves to smash a brick; with the sharpest knife you can't cut water. The hair turns white, the teeth decay, the tongue's the only part that lasts.

Madcap went in first, with his load of firewood. He had gone no more than five miles or so when he found he was lost in a maze of pathways that seemed to twist and turn in every direction, obscured by trees and thick undergrowth — impossible to know which way was right. Madcap stopped and set down his load. Behind him he heard the sound of the rattle approaching, and Panther appeared, a battered straw hat on his head. He was wearing an old exorcist's robe and holding the rattle, and he drifted along as if without purpose.

After checking that there was no one around, Madcap called out to him: "It's impossible to find the way among all these turnings, and I can't remember which way we went when I came here the other day with Skyhawk. It was getting dark at the time and the others all knew the way so I didn't pay attention."

Panther said: "Don't worry about all the turnings. Just keep to the main path."

Madcap picked up his load and went on, always following the widest path. Presently he came to a village with several inns and shops. Still shouldering his load he stopped at the door of an inn. The customers had all left their weapons in front of the door and each man wore a yellow singlet bearing the character Zhu. Everyone was the same. Seeing an old man, he saluted him and respectfully asked: "Can you tell me something about your customs, sir? What are all those weapons doing in front of the door?"

"Where have you come from?" the old man said. "If you really don't know, you'd better get out of here at once."

"I'm from Shandong and I used to trade in dates," Madcap said. "But I lost my capital and couldn't get home, that's why I've come here to sell firewood. I don't know the local customs and geography."

"You'd better go somewhere else at once and hide," the old man said. "There's going to be a massacre here, before very long."

"It seems to be such a fine place! Why should there be killing?"

"If you really don't know," the old man said, "I'd better tell you. This is called Zhu village, and that place up there at the top is Baron Zhu's seat. Something has stirred up the bandits of Mount Liang recently, and now they've brought a force down to the edge of our territory. They plan to attack us and kill us. The only thing that bothers them is that the roads here are very confusing and they're afraid to advance. That's why they've stopped outside the village. The order's just come down from the castle that every fit man and youth in every household must be prepared, and as soon as the order comes we are to go and help them."

"How many men do you have then, sir, in the village?"

"There's a couple of thousand in this village alone," the old man replied. "And there's two more villages, to the east and the west. The place to the east belongs to Skyhawk Li Ying, as he's called. To the west is Squire Hu's place — he's got a daughter, Miss Hu, known as Steelbright, who's an expert fighter."

"In that case, surely there's nothing to fear from Mount Liang?"

The old man assented: "If we were coming here ourselves for the first time, without knowing the roads, we'd fall into the trap too."

"Why do you say that, sir?" Madcap asked.

"We've a poem about these roads of ours," the old man said.

A grand old place is Zhu,
Its roads they coil about.
Though 'tis easy to get in,
Once in you can't get out.

After listening to all this, Madcap began to lament. He threw himself down on the ground in front of the old man. "Poor me," he wailed. "I'm just a poor wanderer who's lost all his money and can't get home. Isn't it a bit hard, if I'm just trying to sell a bit of firewood and I meet up with a lot of murderers and can't find any way to escape? Kind sir, have pity on me. I beg you to accept this firewood and tell me how to get out of here."

The old man said: "Why should I take your firewood for nothing? I'll buy it from you. But come inside and let me offer you something to eat and drink."

Madcap thanked the old man and still carrying the firewood followed him into the house. The old man poured two cups of clear wine and filled a bowl with rice gruel. He bade Madcap eat. Madcap thanked him again, saying: "But please tell me how to get out."

The old man said: "As you go towards the village, you'll notice a white willow. That's where you should turn. Don't worry about whether the path is wide or narrow, just look for the turnings where there's a white willow, then there's a way through. If you don't see the tree, it's a dead end. If there's another kind of tree, it also means there's no way through. If you make a mistake you can turn this way or that way, but you'll never get through.What's more, in the dead end paths there's pointed bamboos buried in the ground and barricades of iron spikes, one false step and you'll set off flying arrows, you're sure to get yourself caught."

Madcap thanked him and asked: "Would you please tell me your name, sir?"

"Most people in this place are called Zhu. But I've got a double-barrelled name, Zhongli. This is where I live."

"I've eaten and drunk well. Some day I must repay you."

At this moment a great commotion arose outside. Madcap heard people shouting: "A spy's been caught." Anxiously he followed the old man outside to look. Eighty or so soldiers were carrying a captive towards them. He was soon able to make out that it was Panther, stripped naked and bound hand and foot. Madcap kept his distress to himself and innocently asked the old man: "Who is that they're bringing? Why is he tied up?"

"Can't you hear them saying it's a spy sent by Song Jiang?" said the old man.

"How did they catch him?" Madcap asked.

"They say he was very daring. He came here all on his own to spy on us, slipped into the village disguised as an exorcist. But he didn't know the roads. He always chose the widest paths, turning this way and that till he was caught in a dead end — he didn't know the system of turning at the white willow, you see. People saw he kept making mistakes and behaving strangely, so they reported him to the Baron's people up there, who came to get him. The villain pulled out a knife and proceeded to wound four or five of them. But there were a lot of people around who joined in and so he was taken. There were some who recognized him as a notorious robber, named Yang Lin the Panther."

He had hardly finished speaking when an outcry arose ahead. Voices were heard saying it was the third son from the castle on patrol. Madcap watching through a crack in the wall saw twenty men with tasselled spears and half a dozen horsemen behind them, all equipped with bows and arrows. There was also a group of three or four on grey horses and in their midst a young fellow seated on a pure white horse, fully armed with a bow and a gleaming spear in his hand.

Madcap recognized him, but he deliberately asked the old man: "Who is that young gentleman passing by?"

"That's Baron Zhu's third son. He's known as Wildcat Zhu and he's betrothed to Steelbright, from the Hu village to the west. Of the three brothers he's the bravest."

Madcap bowed and said: "Please now would you point me in the right direction to get out of here?"

"It's getting late," the old man said. "Suppose they're fighting out there, you'd just be throwing your life away for nothing."

"Then please tell me what I can do to save myself," Madcap said.

"You'd better stay the night with me," the old man said. "If we hear it's all quiet tomorrow morning you can leave then."

So Madcap gratefully remained with the old man. In a little while half a dozen mounted messengers came knocking on doors and shouting: "People of the village, tonight you must look for the red signal lanterns. If you all do your best we shall catch those Mount Liang brigands, hand them over and get the reward." When they had gone, Madcap asked: "Who was that?"

"The officer was the chief of our local anti-brigand squad," the old man said. "They plan to capture Song Jiang tonight."

Madcap thought about this for a while. Then he asked for a light, retired to the bedroom, covered himself and slept.

Now as for Song Jiang, encamped with his troops outside the village, he had waited in vain for Madcap and Panther to return from the village and report. So in the end he sent Golden Wings who got as far as the outskirts and then returned and reported: "I heard the people talking there. They're saying a spy has been caught. Seeing that the roads are so devious and confusing I didn't dare go further in."

Song Jiang was extremely disturbed by the news. "How can we wait for a report now before we attack? If they're saying a spy has been caught it must mean our two friends have fallen into a trap. We must attack tonight. We must go in and fight to rescue our companions. What do the rest of you say?"

Iron Ox jumped up and said: "I shall be the first. Now we'll see what's what!"

Song Jiang issued orders, telling them all to arm themselves. Iron Ox and Morbid were to lead the first group, spearheading the attack, the White-Water Dragon and some others were to bring up the rear. The elder Mu brother was given the left flank and the Tamer the right. Song Jiang, Colonel Hua, Golden Wings and others commanded the centre. Thus with waving banners and loud cheers, with thundering drums and piercing gongs, wielding great swords and broad axes, they advanced on Zhu Castle. By the time they had fought their way to the foot of Lone Dragon Heights it was dusk.

Song Jiang ordered the first group to press home the attack on the castle. Iron Ox, in the vanguard, had stripped naked and was brandishing his two axes of tempered steel. His progress was swift as a forest fire. He reached the castle gates and paused to take stock. The drawbridge was raised on high, and no lights showed in the gate tower. Iron Ox was about to dive into the water but Morbid stopped him, saying: "No way! The gate is closed, it must be a trap. Wait till the chief arrives, we'll discuss it with him."

Iron Ox was most reluctant to give up. He stood by the bank, waving his two axes, and shouted: "Come on out, Baron Zhu, you lousy old fox, the Black Whirlwind wants a word with you!" But there was no reply from the castle.

When Song Jiang came up with his troops, Morbid drew near to him and reported that they could see no defenders in the castle, and no sign of movement. Song Jiang reined in his horse to look for himself: no swords, no spears, no men and no horses. Now he began to be afraid. "I've been a fool," he said hoarsely. "The mystic books state categorically that when engaging the enemy one should not act hastily. I had a moment of blindness. I was too anxious to rescue our two companions, that's why I attacked at once, without waiting for scouts to make a reconnaissance. We've reached their castle and there's no sign of the enemy, so they must have something up their sleeves. Order the three columns to retreat immediately!"

Iron Ox shouted: "Brother, now all our troops are here, don't order a retreat. We'll go in and smash them, you and I. Everyone follow me!"

Before he finished speaking the castle seemed to hear him: a rocket went off, soaring into the sky, and on Lone Dragon Heights above them thousands of torches were lit simultaneously, while from the gate tower crossbow bolts began to rain down. Song Jiang hurriedly tried to turn back the way he had come, but an outcry arose from the White-Water Dragon's troops in the rear. "The way we came in is blocked!" they were shouting. "It's an ambush!" Song Jiang ordered his troops to cast around in all directions for a way out. Iron Ox went on brandishing his axes, searching for someone to kill, but he could not find a single enemy.

Then on Lone Dragon Heights, there was a second loud report. The sound seemed to reverberate forever, as thunderous shouts rang out on all sides, causing Song Jiang to stand and gape in helpless amazement. For all your political and military acumen, how will you escape such a comprehensive scheme? For it was a real plan to trap the tiger and catch the dragon that had been devised, to seize the man of whom heaven and earth go in awe.

YANG XIONG raised the man and then introduced him to Shi Xiu as Du Xing of Zhongshan Prefecture. He had a fierce face, and therefore people called him the "Demon Face." Previously he had come to Jizhou Prefecture, and had entered into business with some other men. During a quarrel with his partner he had lost his temper and killed him. He had been arrested and tried, but Yang Xiong, knowing that he was very skillful with the cudgel and lance, had saved his life by getting a light sentence passed.

The man asked, "On what official business do you come here, my benefactor?"

Yang Xiong whispered in his ear, "I committed murder at Jizhou, and am now escaping to Liangshan Marsh, where I shall join the brigands." He then told him about all the trouble at the inn and how Shi Qian had been captured.

"You need not worry about that matter," said Du Xing, "because I can arrange for Shi Qian to be released."

They asked him to join them at the wine. Du Xing then explained that at that village he was entrusted by the headman with important matters, and he had great influence there. There were three villages in close alliance, and altogether they supported an armed force of about 20,000 men. The most influential man was Zhu Chaofeng who had three valiant sons named "Dragon," "Tiger," and "Tiger's Cub." They had a drill instructor named Luan Tingyu, nicknamed "Iron Staff," who was invincible. In the western village was a headman who had a son called Hu Cheng, nicknamed "Flying Tiger," who was very courageous. His sister, Hu San Niang, nicknamed "Ten Feet of Green," was a skilled rider, and could fight with a sword in each hand. At the village on the east side was a man Li Ying, nicknamed "Striking Hawk," who was his master who always carried five thowing knives on his back, and could throw these a hundred paces, and kill men at that distance. These villages supported each other whatever the risk or danger, and were prepared to fight gainst the brigands of Liangshan Marsh when they came to command the grain. Du Xing offered to take them to Li Ying and get him to release Shi Qian.

They accepted this offer, and settled their accounts with the innkeeper. They then followed Du Xing to the Li Family Village. Yang Xiong noticed that it was a big village, with a moat all round. The banks of the moat were very high, and on the top were many hundreds of large willows. They crossed a drawbridge and passed through a gate in a wall. They came to the principal hall in front of which were over twenty racks filled with spears, swords, etc., all of which were polished bright and in good order.
Du Xing asked the other two to wait outside while he went inside to announce their arrival. It was not long before Li Ying came out, and after being introduced invited Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu to come inside. When they had had some wine Yang Xiong explained the object of their visit, and as a result Li Ying told his scribe to write a letter asking for the release of Shi Qian, and sent a mounted messenger with it to the neighboring Zhu Family Village. It was not long before the messenger returned and reported that the headman had at first been willing to release Shi Qian. But when his three sons heard of it they objected, and insisted upon Shi Qian being sent to the magistrate for trial.
Li Ying was surprised at this, and wondered what was the use of the alliance when even his urgent letter had been ignored. He asked Du Xing to go there himself, and try to secure the release.
Du Xing agreed to go, but asked Li Ying to write a letter by his own hand which he would take with him. This was done, and mounting a horse Du Xing galloped off.
It was almost night time before Du Xing returned. As he dismounted they saw that he was in a towering rage. His face was red with passion, and as he raised his lips he showed the tightly set teeth. For some time he could not speak.
"Take your time and tell us all about it," said Li Ying at last.
Du Xing slowly repressed his anger, and then spoke, "I took your letter to the village and dismounted at the third gate where the three sons of Zhu Chaofeng were seated. I saluted them separately and then 'Tiger's Cub' called out, 'Well, what do you come here for?'
"I replied in a respectful manner, 'I have here a letter from my master.' I presented it. 'Tiger's Cub' showed annoyance as he replied, 'Why does your master not understand human affairs? Early this afternoon he sent some fellow here with a letter asking for that brigand Shi Qian to be released. Just now we are going to send him to the magistrate so why have you come here?'
"I replied that Shi Qian was not a bandit, but was a guest on his way to visit my master. He made a mistake in setting fire to his inn. That you would go tomorrow and make full compensation for the damage done, and hoped that they would overlook the offense and accept a full apology.
"Then all replied, 'That cannot be done.' So I requested them to kindly read your letter, but 'Tiger's Cub' simply took it from me, and tore it into bits without reading it. He then ordered me to get out of their village at once. They also warned me not to incite them to anger any further or they would ... I would not dare to speak their exact words—they were really crude—but they said they would arrest you, sir, also as a bandit of the Liangshan Marsh, and send you to the yamen. They told their servants to seize me but I jumped on the horse and galloped off. It is evident that the sworn alliance between our villages is no longer of any value, as those fellows are quite unreasonable."
While Li Ying listened to this he became more and more annoyed, and at last called out, "You men! Quickly get my horse ready."
Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu asked him to keep cool as they did not wish to see the peaceful relations between the villages disturbed by what they had done. But Li Ying took no notice of this, went indoors, put on his armor, with a large silk gown over it, put his five throwing knives on his back, and took a spear in his hand; put on his iron helmet; and summoned three hundred men to accompany him. Du Xing also put on his armor, and got twenty horsemen to follow him. Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu took their halberds, and also followed.
It was late in the afternoon when they reached the other village, and there the men stood in ranks. The village was situated on raised ground and had three protecting walls, one inside the other. The walls were built of stone, and were about twenty feet high. The village was surrounded by a moat, over which were two drawbridges in front of the north and south gates. In the towers at the gates were drums, gongs, etc. for summoning the men to fight.
Li Ying reined in his horse before the bridge, and shouted, "Why have you three sons of the Zhu family defamed me?" At once the gate of the village was opened, and a body of about fifty horsemen galloped out. In front rode the third son, "Tiger's Cub," on a roan-colored horse.
Li Ying pointing at him shouted, "You fellow still have your milk teeth and childhood's tufts of hair. Your father entered into a sworn alliance with me to defend these villages. If your family had trouble we would render unlimited assistance, or if short of something we would supply it. Today I sent a letter which you tore up. Why did you insult my messenger in that way? Have you no decency?"
"Tiger's Cub" replied, "Our family entered into an alliance with you so that we could together resist the encroachments of the bandits at Liangshan Marsh. But now you have become intimate with them and intended open rebellion."
"Why do you say that I am intimate with bandits? Why have you arrested an ordinary man, and falsely accused him?" "The prisoner has already confessed that he is a thief so why do you talk in this wild disorderly manner? You cannot hide his crime. You clear off at once, or I will arrest you also."
Li Ying was now very angry, and whipping his horse he galloped forward. "Tiger's Cub" crossed the bridge, and did the same. They met in combat, and charged each other about eighteen times. As the "Tiger's Cub" could not overcome Li Ying he at last turned his horse round and retreated. Placing his spear on the horse he took his bow and arrow, and turning his body shot at Li Ying who was following close behind. Li Ying tried to avoid the arrow, but it struck him in the shoulder, and he fell off his horse. "Tiger's Cub" pulled his horse round, and rushed forward to seize Li Ying.
Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu seeing the danger of Li Ying shouted, seized their halberds, and rushed towards "Tiger's Cub," who seeing that the odds were against him retreated. As the horse turned, however, Yang Xiong struck it, and the animal reared with the pain. "Tiger's Cub" was almost thrown off, but kept his seat. The villagers now rushed forward, and as Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu were not wearing their armor they now retreated along with Du Xing, Li Ying, and their followers. They were pursued for about a li when the villagers returned to the village as it was getting dark.
Upon reaching their village Li Ying had his wound dressed, and then the four men discussed the position. Yang Xiong expressed regret that all this trouble had arisen through their affairs, and considered that there was no way of obtaining the release of Shi Qian. They thought that the best thing was for them to proceed to Liangshan Marsh, where they would petition Chao Gai to send an expedition to avenge the insult to Li Ying.
Li Ying agreed to this, and pressed the two men to accept some silver to cover their expenses. At last they accepted the money and left at once for Liangshan Marsh. Li Ying and Du Xing remained behind.
Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu soon reached the neighborhood of Liangshan Marsh, and stayed at the inn kept by Shi Yong as an outpost. When they inquired about the road to Liangshan Marsh, Shi Yong asked where they came from, and what business they had at the stronghold. When Yang Xiong said they came from Jizhou, Shi Yong immediately asked if his name was Shi Xiu, and when they had all been introduced Shi Yong explained that he had heard all about Shi Xiu from Dai Zong who had just returned, and was staying at the stronghold. Shi Yong then shot a whistling arrow across the lake, and soon a party of bandits appeared in boats. They crossed the lake, and were taken up to the stronghold where they were duly introduced to all the leaders. They explained fully all that had occurred at the Zhu Family Village, and how Li Ying had been grossly insulted.
When Chao Gai had heard all the details he was angry, and said, "We have gathered here many loyal and brave men, and have bestowed much benefit on the people in the surrounding country. When we go on any expedition we are never deficient in valor. All our brothers here are great heroes. But these two men have been implicated in a petty theft of a chicken, and if we associate with them we shall lose our great reputation. So we must kill these two men, and send their heads to the village to show the people that we have nothing to do with robbers. Then as the people in the village have reviled us we must go there and destroy their village. Thus we shall preserve our reputation for valor."
Song Jiang however spoke, "That will not do. These two men did not take part in the theft as that was the affair of Shi Qian who was traveling with them. What they have done was not disgraceful. We have heard several times that the Zhu Family Village has been unfriendly to us. Elder brother, restrain your anger. We have not got a big stock of grain or money, but let us not make too much of that. As they however have insulted us we can go and punish them for that. If we defeat them we shall have food supplies for at least five years. You cannot go yourself because you are our leader, but I will go and command the punitive expedition. If I fail then I will not return. I finally propose that Li Ying be admitted to our numbers."
"What you say is extremely proper," said Wu Yong. "It would not do to kill our brothers who are willing to join us."
"It would be better if you kill me instead of these men," said Dai Zong.
All the other leaders expressed their support of these views, and Chao Gai agreed. Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu expressed their apologies.
The following day Song Jiang took three thousand bandits, three hundred mounted men, and nine other leaders. He also placed a similar number of men in charge of Lin Chong and nine other leaders, and these were to be his reserves. They soon reached the neighborhood of the Zhu Family Village and encamped. A tent was erected for Song Jiang, and there he discussed matters with Hua Rong. "I have heard that round this village there are numerous small roads so that it would not be advisable to send our men there at present. We must first send two spies to find out all about the roads, and then we can advance with greater security."
Li Kui offered to go as a spy, as he said he had not killed a man for a long time.
"You must not go now," said Song Jiang, "because we shall want you when the fighting commences."
Li Kui laughed at this. "There is no need to send spies. If you let me have two hundred men I could enter the village, and settle this matter quite easily."
"Don't talk nonsense!" shouted Song Jiang. "You can wait outside until I call for you."
As he went out however Li Kui called out, "Those villagers are only like flies. Why are you so nervous?"
Song Jiang summoned Shi Xiu, and instructed him to go into the village with Yang Lin.
"The people will already be on the qui vive as your men are here," said Shi Xiu. "How can we enter the village without being seen?"
"I can get into the village disguised as a monk," said Yang Lin. "I will carry the prayer rings, and shake them as I go along. You can follow me some distance behind."
"At Jizhou I sold firewood," said Shi Xiu, "and I think that I may get in the village with a load of firewood."
Yang Lin thought this a good idea, and they both agreed to start off that evening. They started off about 5 P.M. and had about three li to go. They noticed the numerous paths and roads on all sides, and that the country was well covered with dense trees. Shi Xiu put down his load, and spoke to Yang Lin as there was no one about. "There are so many footpaths about that I have not yet recognized the road I was on with Li Ying. As it is now getting dark we cannot make out our way very clearly."
"We need not worry about that," replied Yang Lin. "Let us follow what appears to be the main road."
They continued their way, and soon came to a place where there were shops and inns, and Shi Xiu stopped in front of an inn. There were many men there with uniforms bearing the character "Zhu." He spoke to an old man, "Sir, what is the reason for these swords being stacked at every door?"
"Where do you come from?" asked the old man. "As you do not know you had better go on your way."
"I am from Shandong, and having no money I brought this firewood into the village to sell it. I do not know the customs of this place."
"You had better get away at once and seek refuge," said the old man. "It will not be long before there is big fighting here."
"What will the fighting be about?"
"You evidently do not know, but I will tell you. This village hates the bandits of Liangshan Marsh, but they are now encamped just outside the village. Our chief has summoned all the men to assemble here."
"And how many men are there in this village?"
"In this village there are about ten thousand men, but the other village would also join us in any fighting."
"Why are you afraid of Liangshan Marsh brigands when you have so many men?"
"Even I myself was nearly seized when I first came here. There is an old saying that the roads round this place are so well arranged that men might enter the village, but they could not get out."
Shi Xiu burst into tears, and bowing said, "What hard lines for me! I cannot go back even if I sell my firewood. So I will give you this firewood if you will tell me how I can get away."
"I cannot accept your offer, but I do not mind buying the firewood from you. Please come inside my house, and take a meal before returning."
Shi Xiu thanked him for this, and followed the old man into the house. After partaking of the congee offered, Shi Xiu again asked to be shown the way out.
"You just go your way in the village until you come to a poplar tree where you can turn. You must not turn if there is no poplar tree, or there would be death. No other trees will do—take no notice of them. If you make one mistake your position will be hopeless, as on the other roads there are hidden pointed stakes and hooks."
Shi Xiu thanked him for the information, and asked for his name. The man's name was Zhongli. Shi Xiu then departed promising to reward him for the food, and wine some other day. Just then there was a great uproar outside, and voices were calling out, "A spy is seized!" Looking out Shi Xiu saw about eighty armed men with a prisoner whom he recognized as Yang Lin. Shi Xiu was much surprised, and turning to the old man asked, "Who is the man? Why have they bound him?"
"Have you not heard them say that he is a spy? He has evidently got in the village in the disguise of a monk, and not knowing the roads he has taken the wrong road and has been captured. Somebody has recognized him as the bandit, Yang Lin." Just then a patrol of about fifty men came up in charge of a young man on a white horse. Shi Xiu recognized him, but asked the old man who he was.
"That is the third son of Old Zhu, our village chief, and is named 'Tiger's Cub.' The girl 'Ten Feet of Green' is betrothed to him."
Shi Xiu again thanked him, and asked to be shown the road. The man urged him not to go that day, as there was great danger and it was getting dark. After further pressing, Shi Xiu again went indoors. Shortly afterwards there was knocking at the street door, and a voice called out, "The red lamp will be the signal tonight, and when you people see it, you must join the attack on the brigands." When the man had gone Shi Xiu asked who he was, and was informed that he was the local police inspector and that that night he hoped to arrest Song Jiang. Shi Xiu thought matters over, and then taking a fire, he bade the old man good night and went to the room at the back, and sleep there.
Song Jiang was waiting in his tent for a long time, and at last as Shi Xiu and Yang Lin had not returned he sent out Ou Peng to see whether he could get any news. When he returned he reported that he had heard cries in the village about a spy. The paths were so numerous and complicated that he dared not go any farther.
Upon hearing this Song Jiang was very angry. "Evidently they have captured our two brothers so why should we wait here any longer as we cannot get any inside information. We must attack at once, and try to save the lives of our brothers. What do you think of that?" he asked the other leaders.
"I will fall on slaughtering," offered Li Kui.
Song Jiang issued orders that all the men should prepare for an immediate advance. Li Kui and Yang Xiong were to be in charge of the vanguard; Li Jun in charge of the rear guard; Mu Hong on the left wing; Huang Xin on the right wing, while Song Jiang, Hua Rong, and Ou Peng took charge of the main body. There was at once a great hubbub, waving of flags, beating of drums and gongs, and a great display of swords and axes. It was evening. Upon reaching the Zhu Family Village Li Kui found that the bridge had been drawn up, and as there were no lights showing in the village he thought of going through the water. But Yang Xiong held him back, and said, "As the village gates are closed it may be only a plot or trap for us. We will wait until the other leaders arrive, and then we will discuss matters."
Li Kui could not endure any delay so lifting aloft his two axes he yelled, "Old Zhu you damned crook! You come out! The 'Black Whirlwind' is waiting here for you."
No reply came from the village to this challenge. Just then Song Jiang and the other leaders came up, and were told of the position. Song Jiang was surprised not to see even a single man on the other side, and also became suspicious. Suddenly he remarked, "I have made a mistake. In the three Heavenly Books I received it was stated quite clearly, 'In warfare make no undue haste.' I forgot about this in my haste to save the lives of our comrade and have brought troops here without proper plans for entering the village. Now that I am here the enemy hides. There is evidently a plot, and I must at once give orders for a retreat."
Li Kui said, "But as we have come so far we cannot retreat without doing something. I will go forward, and you can follow me."
While he was speaking a skyrocket went up from the village, and instantly on all the hills surrounding the village there were numerous lights from torches. From the tower above the village gate came a shower of arrows. Song Jiang gave the orders for retreat, but Li Jun, leader of the rear guard, came and said, "The road we arrived by is now all obstructed and there's probably an ambush." Song Jiang gave an order for a number of equestrians to try to find some other road. Just then, another skyrocket went up on one of the surrounding hills, followed by loud shouts from all sides. Song Jiang was quite perplexed. Even the strategist with the most elaborate plans could not avoid getting into a tight corner?

Plans to catch a tiger,
Or a dragon in its den,
Are ready to capture,
The extraordinary men.

146

10 Feet of Steelbright Green Alone Captures Short-Arse Stumpy Tiger Wang Ying; Song Jiang's 2nd Attack on the Zhu Family Manor/Castle & Village

Song Jiang, on his horse, gazed around. Enemy troops were lying in wait in every direction. He ordered his men to fight their way towards the main road. Soon, he again heard cries of consternation. When he asked the cause, the men said: "These paths all wind in circles. No matter how we turn, we keep coming back here."
"Advance to where you see torches and people's dwellings," he said.
Before long, the vanguard once more set up a cry. "We can't head for the torches. The paths are strewn with bamboo spikes and iron barbs and blocked with sharp-pronged branches like deer antlers."
Song Jiang groaned. "Heaven has forsaken me."
Just then there was a stir in the left flank contingent under Mu Hong. A messenger reported: "Shi Xiu is here." In a moment, Shi Xiu, twirling his blade, rushed up to Song Jiang's horse.
"Don't be alarmed, brother," he said. "I know how to travel these paths. Pass the word, quietly: Take any path, whether narrow or broad, which starts at a white poplar."
Song Jiang issued the appropriate order. When they had proceeded another five or six li, he saw ahead a large concentration of enemy men and horses. He shouted for Shi Xiu and asked: "Why are there so many of those rogues up there, brother?"
"They use a lantern as an assembly signal."
Hua Rong peered from his saddle. He pointed and said to Song Jiang: "You see that lantern with a candle in it among the tress? Whichever way we go, east or west, it moves in that direction, and their troops gather at the lantern to meet us. It's their signal, all right."
"How can we deal with the lantern?"
"Easy," said Hua Rong. He fitted an arrow to his bow, urged his mount forward, and let fly. He hit the red lantern squarely, knocking it out.
With no lantern to guide them, the ambushing foe was thrown into confusion. Song Jiang told Shi Xiu to lead the way, and they fought their way out of the village.

There were shouts on the mountain ahead and a wildly dancing row of torches. Song Jiang ordered a halt. He sent Shi Xiu to investigate. Before long, Shi returned and reported: "It's another contingent from our fortress, come to reinforce us and scatter the enemy troops."
Song Jiang urged his men forward into the fray, forcing a passage away from the village. The Zhu Family Manor soldiers dispersed and withdrew.
The forces of Lin Chong and Qin Ming joined up with Song Jiang's men, and they all halted outside the village. By then it was daylight. They pitched camp on high ground and counted their men and horses. Huang Xin, Suppressor of the Three Mountains, was missing. Startled, Song Jiang asked about him. The men who had been with him the night before explained.
"When Commander Huang received your order, he went to seek a path. But two hooks shot out of the reeds and tumbled his horse. Half a dozen men seized the commander and pulled him away. We couldn't rescue him."
Song Jiang was enraged. He wanted to kill Huang's soldiers for not having reported this earlier. Lin Chong and Hua Rong finally cooled him down. The others were upset.
"We haven't taken the manor," they said, "and we've lost two brothers besides. What are we going to do?"
"The three villages have an alliance," said Yang Xiong. "But Li Ying, who rules the east village, was wounded by Tiger Cub Zhu the other day, and he's resting at home. Why don't you go and consult with him, brother?"
"I'd forgotten about that," said Song Jiang. "He knows the terrain and the situation well." He ordered that two bolts of silk, two sheep and two jugs of wine be prepared as gifts, along with a good riding horse, complete with saddle and bridle. He set out to deliver them personally, leaving Lin Chong and Qin Ming to guard the camp.
Hua Rong, Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu and three hundred cavalrymen mounted and went with him towards the Li Family Manor. At the walls, they found the gate-house close and the drawbridge raised. Soldiers lined the ramparts. Within the gate-house, a battle drum thundered. Song Jiang shouted from his horse.
"I am Song Jiang, a warrior from Mount Liangshan, here to call on your lord. I have no other purpose. You needn't be on guard against me."
When Du Xing saw that Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu were among the party, he opened the manor gate, came across the moat in a small boat and hailed Song Jiang respectfully. Song Jiang dismounted and returned the courtesy. Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu drew near.
"This is the brother who introduced us to Lord Li," they said to Song Jiang. "He is known as Demon Face Du Xing."
"Ah, Steward Du. Could I trouble you to tell Lord Li that Song Jiang of Liangshan Marsh has long known of his fame, though we have never had occasion to meet. Because we are in conflict with Zhu Family Manor, we are passing by here. I would like to present him with some colored silk, a fine horse, two sheep and some wine-trifling gifts—and request the pleasure of meeting him. I want nothing else."
Du Xing took this message into the manor. Li Ying was seated in bed in his hall with a quilt draped over his shoulders, recovering from his wound. Du Xing told him what Song Jiang had said.
"He's a rebel from Liangshan Marsh. How can I receive him?" Li replied. "Though groundless, I would become suspect to the authorities. Say that I am sick in bed, that I can't get up and meet him. I hope to have the honor another day. As to the gifts, I cannot presume to accept them."
Du Xing again crossed the moat. "My master sends his respects," he said to Song Jiang. "He was hoping to welcome you in person, but because of his wound he is ill in bed and is unable to greet you. He will make a special point of it some other day. The gifts which you so graciously present, he dares not accept."
"I know what's in your master's mind. I want to see him because I've been unsuccessful in my attack on the Zhu Family Manor. He won't see me because he's afraid they would resent it."
"No, that's not the reason. He's really ill. Although I'm originally from Zhongshan, I've been here many years, and I know something of the local situation. The Zhu Family Manor is in the center, the Li Family Manor to the east, the Hu Family Manor to the west. They have a solemn alliance to help one another in time of danger. Because the Zhu's wounded my master, he hasn't gone to their aid. But the Hu's probably will. They're not much to worry about, except for their woman general, who's called Ten Feet of Steel because of the two shining swords she wields. She's a remarkable warrior. She and Tiger Cub of the Zhu Family are engaged, and one of these days they'll marry. When attacking the Zhu Family Manor the east needn't concern you, but watch your west.
"The manor has two gates, one facing the front of Lone Dragon Cliff, the other facing the rear. It's no use assaulting only the front gate. Both gates must be attacked simultaneously. That's the only way you can break in. The paths to the front gate are twisted and complicated. They wind round and round and are of different widths. Only those with white poplars at their starting points are through paths. The rest are dead-ends."
"What if they cut all the poplars down?" said Shi Xiu. "How will we be able to travel?"
"The stumps will still be there, won't they? Those will be your markers. Attack only in daylight. Don't try to advance at night."
Song Jiang thanked Du Xing and returned to camp with his party. Lin Chong and the others met them on the way, then all went to the camp and conferred. Song Jiang told of Li Ying's refusal to meet him, and of the advice given by Du Xing.
"With the best intentions in the world we send him gifts, and the oaf doesn't even come out to greet brother!" Li Kui blurted. "Give me three hundred men and I'll crack open his friggin manor and drag the varlet over by the head and make him pay our brother his proper respects!"
"You don't understand, brother," said Song Jiang. "He's virtuous and law-abiding. He's afraid of the authorities. How could he meet us?"
Li Kui grinned. "Shy, like a child."
Everyone laughed.
"Nevertheless, two of our brothers have been captured, and we don't know whether they're alive or dead," said Song Jiang. "I hope you brothers will do your utmost and join with me in another attack on Zhu Family Manor."
The other leaders rose to their feet. "Give the orders. We'll obey. Who do you want to go first?"
"If you're afraid of children, why not send me?" cried Li Kui.
"You're not suitable for the van, not this time," said Song Jiang. While Li Kui fumed with lowered head, he selected Ma Lin, Deng Fei, Ou Peng, and the Stumpy Tiger. "You four and I will go first," he stated.
For the second contingent he chose Dai Zong and seven others, and told them to prepare to attack via water. The third group was to be led by Lin Chong, Hua Rong, Mu Hong and Li Kui, and would be divided into two columns to serve as reinforcements.
The order of battle decided, the leaders ate, then put on their armor and mounted their horses.
Since Song Jiang himself was leading the van which would launch the first assault, it flaunted a large red banner inscribed with the word "Marshal." He, the other four leaders, a hundred and fifty cavalrymen, and a thousand foot soldiers marched rapidly on Zhu Family Manor.
Before Lone Dragon Cliff Song Jiang drew rein and stared at their objective. Two white banners floated over the ramparts. Brightly embroidered on them were the rallying calls: Fill in the Marsh and nab Chao Gai. Level the Mountain and catch Song Jiang.
Angrily, Song Jiang vowed: "If I don't take Zhu Family Manor I'll never return to Mount Liangshan!"
The other leaders were equally enraged. When the second contingent arrived, Song Jiang left them to attack the front gate, while he and his unit went round to the cliff's rear. There, the manor was as solid as a wall of bronze, and heavily fortified.
While he was examining it, an enemy force came charging from the west, shouting fiercely. Song Jiang left Ma Lin and Deng Fei to hold the rear gate. With Ou Peng and Stumpy Tiger and half the men, he went forward to meet the foe. Riding towards him down the slope were about thirty horsemen. In their midst was the girl warrior known as Ten Feet of Steel, astride a black-maned steed and whirling her shining swords. Followed by four or five hundred armed vassals, she was coming to the aid of Zhu Family Manor.
"A formidable-looking adversary," said Song Jiang. "That must be the famous daughter of the Hu Family. Who dares to give her battle?"
Wang the Stumpy Tiger was a lecherous fellow. When he heard that the warrior was a lady, he immediately hoped to capture her for his own. With a yell, he urged his mount forward, his lance levelled. Both armies shouted. The girl smote her horse and galloped towards Stumpy Tiger, flourishing her blades. A superb artisan with the double swords and an outstanding veteran with the single lance clashed in scores of rounds.
Song Jiang soon could see that Wang was no match for the girl. The short-legged man had longed to catch her quickly, but by the tenth round his hands were trembling and his legs were paralyzed with fatigue, and his skill with the lance was faltering. If they weren't in a battle to the death, Wang would gladly have yielded.
Ten Feet of Steel was an intelligent, sensitive girl. "That's a crude varlet," she thought. She closed in, swinging both blades. It was too much for Stumpy Tiger. He turned his horse and fled, pursued by the girl warrior. She hung up her right sword, stretched forth her lovely arm, and plucked Wang from the saddle. The vassals rushed forward, grabbed him by the feet, and dragged him off, a prisoner.
With levelled lance Ou Peng hurried to his aid. Ten Feet of Steel urged her mount forward to meet him, swords at the ready. They fought. Ou Peng was descended from generations of military men, and was first-rate with the iron lance. Song Jiang observed his skill admiringly. But despite Ou Peng's excellence, he was unable to gain the slightest advantage over the girl.
Deng Fei had seen from afar the capture of Stumpy Tiger Wang, and now witnessed the failure of Ou Peng to vanquish the girl. He galloped towards the contestants, shouting and brandishing his iron chain. The warriors of the Zhu Family Manor, who had been watching for some time, feared for the girl's safety. Quickly, they lowered the drawbridge and opened the gate. The Dragon, leading three hundred men, rode lickety-split, lance in hand, to seize Song Jiang.
Ma Lin galloped, with twin swords, to head off the Dragon. Deng Fei was worried about Song Jiang. Keeping close to him, he watched the clashes raging on both sides amid wild shouts. Song Jiang realized that Ma Lin couldn't defeat Zhu the Dragon, and Ou Peng clearly was making no headway against Ten Feet of Steel.
Song Jiang was growing extremely anxious when a troop of horsemen appeared, riding in rapidly from an angle. He looked, and was delighted to recognize Qin Ming. When the Thunderbolt had heard the noise of battle at the manor, he had decided to join in.
"General Qin," Song Jiang called, "help Ma Lin!" Qin Ming had a low flash point. The Zhu Family had captured his disciple Huang Xin, and his temper hadn't improved. He clapped his steed forward and unlimbered his wolf-toothed cudgel, riding directly at the Dragon. With raised lance, the Dragon advanced to meet him. This left Ma Lin free to lead a body of men after Stumpy Wang's captors. Ten Feet of Steel promptly abandoned Ou Peng to attack Ma Lin. Man and girl both used double swords, and their clash on horseback was like jade snowflakes swirling in the wind. Song Jiang stared, positively dazzled.
The Dragon and Qin Ming fought ten rounds or more, but the Dragon was no match for the Thunderbolt. Drill instructor in the Zhu manor, Luan Tingyu, mounted and rode forth with his hammer. Ou Peng cantered towards him. But Luan, instead of coming on directly, swerved as Ou Peng gripped his lance, and appeared to flee. Ou Peng gave chase. Luan threw his hammer, hit Ou Peng squarely and knocked him from his mount.
"Children, to the rescue," roared Deng Fei. He charged at Luan, swinging his iron chain.
Song Jiang shouted for his men to get Ou Peng back in the saddle. The Dragon, being bested by Qin Ming, smote his horse and ran. Luan left Deng Fei to engage Qin Ming. They fought nearly twenty rounds, with no result. Luan feinted, then galloped into the wilds, with Qin Ming, brandishing his cudgel, hot on the trail. Luan raced his steed into the deep grass. Unaware that this was a ruse, Qin Ming pounded after him. Men of the Zhu Family Manor were lying in ambush. When Qin Ming appeared, they pulled taut a rope across the path and sent horse and rider tumbling to the ground. Yelling, they grabbed him. Deng Fei galloped heedlessly to save the Thunderbolt. He saw the trip rope rising before him, and pulled frantically on the rein to turn his steed.
"Get him," cried voices on either side. Hooked ropes landed on Deng Fei like a tangle of hemp, and he too was captured, still seated on his horse.
Song Jiang groaned. The rescued Ou Peng mounted once more.
Ma Lin sped from Ten Feet of Steel to protect Song Jiang. He rode south, chased by the girl, Luan and the Dragon. He knew he couldn't get away, and was reconciling himself to being taken when he saw a bold fellow on horseback galloping towards him from due south, followed by about five hundred men, mounted and on foot.
Song Jiang recognized the rider as Mu Hong the Unrestrained. From the southeast came another three hundred fighters, preceded by two racing gallants—Yang Xiong the Pallid and Shi Xiu the Rash. From the northeast came another bold fellow, who shouted: "Let that man alone!" It was the master bowman Hua Rong.
The rescuers converged from three directions. Song Jiang was overjoyed as they joined to do battle with Luan and the Dragon and his men. Concerned for the two, the manor command directed Tiger to hold the gates, while the young gentleman Tiger Cub sallied forth on a fiery steed, holding a long lance and leading five hundred infantry and cavalry. These plunged into the fray.
Before the manor Li Jun, Zhang Heng and Zhang Shun crossed the stream which served as a moat, but were prevented from advancing by a shower of arrows. Dai Zong and Bai Sheng, on the opposite bank, could only shout in frustration.
Daylight was fading. Song Jiang instructed Ma Lin to escort Ou Peng safely from the village. Then he ordered that the gongs be beaten as the signal for his gallants to converge and fight their way out. He whipped up his horse and made a circuit of the combat area, worried lest any brothers had become lost.
Suddenly, he saw Ten Feet of Steel galloping towards him. He had no time to defend himself. He smote his steed and raced east, with the girl in close pursuit. Eight hoofs drummed the ground like inverted bowls as the two animals sped deep into the village. Ten Feet of Steel was catching up, and was preparing to strike when a voice boomed from the slope.
"Why is that friggin female chasing my brother?"
Song Jiang looked. Li Kui the Black Whirlwind, whirling his battle-axes, was striding towards them, leading seventy or eighty brigands. The girl reined her mount, turned and headed for the woods. But from the glade a dozen horsemen came directly at her. Foremost among them was Panther Head Lin Chong. "Where do you think you're going?" he shouted at Ten Feet of Steel.
The girl charged him with flying swords. Lance levelled, he met her and they fought more than ten rounds. Lin Chong feinted and deliberately let the girl close in. Parrying her blades with his lance, he stretched forth an arm as strong as an ape's, grabbed her and, with the twist of a waist as sinewy as a wolf's, yanked her over to him. Song Jiang cheered heartily. Lin told his men to bind the girl and cantered over to Song Jiang. "Are you hurt, brother?"
"No, I'm all right," Song replied. He instructed Li Kui to go into the village and bring out the remaining leaders. "Tell them we'll confer at the edge of the village. It's getting late. They're to stop fighting."
Li Kui and his party left. Lin Chong, protecting Song Jiang, proceeded to the village entry, with Ten Feet of Steel mounted and under guard. The Liangshan leaders won no gains that evening. All hastened to the edge of the village.
The Zhu Family forces returned to the manor, leaving behind countless dead. They put their prisoners in cage carts. If they could capture Song Jiang, they intended to deliver the whole lot to the authorities in the Eastern Capital and claim the reward. The Hu Family had already turned Wang the Stumpy Tiger over to the Zhu Family Manor.
Song Jiang, having regathered his forces, went to the encampment at the edge of the village. He directed that Ten Feet of Steel be brought forth, and ordered twenty veteran brigands and four mounted chief to seat the bound girl on a horse.
"Take her to Mount Liangshan tonight and deliver her to the care of my father, squire Song, then report back to me. We'll decide what to do with her when I return to the fortress."
The leaders thought Song Jiang wanted the girl for himself, and took special care in escorting her. They sent the wounded Ou Peng on ahead in a cart to recuperate in the stronghold. The escort party set out immediately. Song Jiang brooded in his tent. He didn't sleep all night. At dawn he was still seated there.
That day a scout reported: "Military Advisor Wu Yong is coming with the three Ruan brothers, Lu Fang and Guo Sheng, and five hundred men."
Song Jiang welcomed them outside the camp and led Wu Yong to his tent. When they were seated, Wu had wine and food laid, and toasted Song Jiang and congratulated his commanders.
"Chieftain Chao Gai has heard that you had some difficulty during your first assault. He sent me with these five leaders to lend a hand," Wu Yong said. "How have you been getting on?"
"It's hard to put it briefly. Those rogues of the Zhu Family have a pair of white banners over their manor gate which read: Fill in the Marsh and nab Chao Gai. Level the Mountain and catch Song Jiang. What brass! In our first assault, because we didn't know the terrain, we lost Yang Lin and Huang Xin. Near dusk we tried again, and Ten Feet of Steel took Stumpy Tiger Wang, Luan Tingyu wounded Ou Peng with his hammer, and trip ropes unhorsed Qin Ming and Deng Fei. Both were seized. That's how bad it's been. If Lin Chong hadn't captured Ten Feet of Steel, we'd be deflated completely. We can't seem to make a dent in this place. I'll vanquish the Zhu Family Manor and rescue our brothers, or die in the attempt. I couldn't go back and face brother Chao Gai, otherwise."
Wu Yong smiled. "Heaven has ordained that the Zhu Family Manor shall fall. This is a good opportunity for us. I think we can bring it about very soon."
Song Jiang was amazed. "What do you mean?" Calmly smiling, Wu Yong held up 2 fingers and explained. Truly, a hand extended from the clouds and snatched to safety those who had landed in the net.

So there was Song Jiang seated on his horse and he looked around him and saw that he was in the midst of an ambush. He gave the order to force a way through along the main paths, but at that moment came news that the fifth detachment had been brought to a complete standstill, and despairing cries arose from his men. "Now what's the problem?" Song Jiang asked.
"The roads in front are a complete maze," they replied. "We keep on going and just get back to where we started."
Song Jiang said: "Tell them to look for the way out by following the torches, the places where there are houses and people."
But they had not gone far before the cry arose again from the troops in front: "We took a route which leads towards the torches and lights, and there's sharp pointed bamboos and barbed wire, and they've stuck deer's horns everywhere to block the way."
Song Jiang said: "Is Heaven bent on destroying me?"
At this moment of crisis there was a commotion among the elder Mu brother's troops on the left flank and someone reported: "Madcap is here!" And sure enough Madcap arrived in front of Song Jiang's horse, gripping his blade. "Don't worry," he said. "I know the way. Pass the word quietly to all your forces that they should only take a turning where they see a white willow tree, tell them not to worry about whether the way is wide or narrow."
Song Jiang instructed his men to look for a white willow before turning. They had progressed a little under two miles when it became apparent that the number of enemy troops in their path was continually increasing. Song Jiang was very concerned. He shouted to Madcap: "How is it that the enemy forces ahead keep growing?"
Madcap said: "They're using the lamps as a signal."
Colonel Hua, on horseback beside Song Jiang, pointed and said: "Do you see that lamp in the dark spot under the tree? When we head east the lamp points to the east, if we head west it points west. That must be it! It's obviously a signal."
"Can't we do something about that lamp?" Song Jiang said.
"No problem," said Colonel Hua. He took his bow and fitted an arrow to it. Then urging his horse forward he loosed an arrow into the dark. Just the one shot sufficed, it sped straight to the target and shot the red light out. All around them the troops of the ambush, not seeing the red light any longer, fell into confusion.
Song Jiang ordered Madcap to lead the way and they fought their way through to the edge of the village. At this point a hubbub arose on the hillside and a line of bobbing torches was seen moving confusedly in from one side. Song Jiang ordered the foremost troops to halt and sent Madcap to investigate. He returned soon after and reported: "The second contingent from Mount Liang have arrived to reinforce us and they've routed the enemy." Song Jiang now encouraged his troops to redouble their efforts to break out of the village, as the Zhu troops fled in disarray. After meeting up with Leopard's Head, Thunderclap and the others they bivouacked on the outskirts.
When it was fully light, they built a stockade on top of a high mound and positioned their forces. The Tamer, Huang Xin was not seen among them. Highly disturbed by this, Song Jiang asked why. Some soldiers who had been with the expedition the day before came and said: "In accordance with your orders, General Huang went ahead to reconnoitre. He rashly entered some thick reedbeds where his horse was brought down by two concealed hooks, and half a dozen of them took him alive. There was just nothing we could do!"
Song Jiang was furious. He would have killed the bodyguards for not having reported this before, but Leopard's Head and Colonel Hua restrained him.
The mood was grim. Everyone was saying: "We've failed to take the castle and we've lost two of our comrades into the bargain. What is going to come of all this?"
Morbid said: "We're dealing with three villages that have united. But the one to the east is Mr. Li's, who was shot in the arm the other day by that villain Wildcat Zhu. At present he's at home recovering. Might it not be a good idea to go and consult him?"

"I had forgotten all about him," Song Jiang said. "He must know the local geography and conditions." So he told them to collect a quantity of silk, horses, goats and wine. Then, choosing a good mount, saddled and bridled, he went himself to request an audience with Skyhawk, leaving Leopard's Head and Thunderclap to guard the camp. He took with him Colonel Hua, Morbid and Madcap. They mounted and with three hundred horsemen set off for the Li manor.

When they reached their destination they found the gates bolted and the drawbridge raised, while a good many troops were ranged along the wall. From the gate tower a drum began to beat.

Song Jiang shouted up: "I am Song Jiang of Mount Liang. I have come to consult your master. I have no bad intention, you have nothing to fear from me."

When Uglymug looked down from the gate tower and saw Morbid and Madcap were there, he quickly opened the gates and crossed the moat in a small boat to greet Song Jiang. Song Jiang hurriedly dismounted and returned the courtesy. Morbid and Madcap came forward and said: "This is our friend Du Xing, known as Uglymug, who took us to meet Mr. Li."

Song Jiang said: "So this is Mr. Du! I should be most grateful if you would tell Mr. Li that I, Song Jiang of Mount Liang, am well acquainted with his great reputation, although it has not been my good fortune to meet him yet. Today, because the people of Zhu want to fight with us, I have come here to offer a few little gifts, some silk and a few thoroughbreds, some goats and some wine, and to beg an audience with him, not for any other purpose."

Bearing this message Uglymug rowed back and went to the main hall, where Skyhawk was sitting on a bed, swathed in bandages. When he reported Song Jiang's request for an interview, Skyhawk said: "He is one of the Mount Liang rebels, how can I talk to him? It's out of the question. Go back and tell him that I'm lying in bed wounded and can't move, so it's impossible for me to see him now. Tell him he can visit me another time. As for the gifts, don't accept them."

Uglymug went back across the water to Song Jiang and said: "My master greets you most respectfully and says he wishes he could receive you, but being gravely wounded he is obliged to keep his bed and is unable to grant you an interview. He hopes it may be possible to meet some other day. As for your most generous gifts, it is quite impossible for him to accept them."

Song Jiang said: "I understand your master's meaning. I have failed to capture Zhu Castle. I wanted to meet him, that's all. But he doesn't want to upset Baron Zhu and his clan, that's why he refuses to see me."

Uglymug said: "That's not how it is at all. He truly is seriously indisposed. But I have lived here a number of years, although I'm a native of Zhongshan, and I know pretty well how things stand. Zhu Castle is situated between our manor here to the east and the Hu domain to the west. These three estates have signed a life or death pact guaranteeing mutual assistance. Now they have injured my master and he will not go to help them. It is likely, though, that the people over to the west, the Hu family, will come to their assistance. Most of that lot aren't up to much, but Miss Hu, the daughter, known as Steelbright for the two bright swords she uses, has true worth. She is betrothed to Baron Zhu's third, Wildcat Zhu, and sooner or later they'll be married. If you want to attack Zhu there's no need to watch out to the east, but you must seal off the roads to the west. There are two ways into Zhu Castle, a front way and a back way. One can be approached from the front of Lone Dragon Heights, the other from the far side. If you only attack from the front it won't be enough. It needs a concerted assault from both sides, that's the way you'll smash them. The front gate is a problem. The approach is complex and difficult, the paths winding and turning all the way, and their width keeps changing. You must only take the turnings where there is a white willow. If there isn't such a tree it's a dead end."

Madcap said: "Suppose they've gone and cut down the trees, how are we going to remember the way?"

"Even if they've cut down the trees, they can't eradicate them completely. There's bound to be a stump left. But you've got to attack by day, it's no good trying to go in there in the dark."

Song Jiang thanked Uglymug for all this information and returned with his troops to the base. When Leopard's Head and his force joined them, they held a meeting in the main camp. Song Jiang told the others about Skyhawk's refusal to see him and the information Uglymug had given them. Iron Ox burst out: "After we'd sent them all those presents, that motherfucker wouldn't even come out and receive you! I'll take three hundred men and smash up his fucking manor. I'll force the bastard to come out and pay his respects."

Song Jiang said: "Don't talk nonsense, brother. He's an honourable gentleman and he doesn't want to get on the wrong side of the law. It's obvious he wouldn't be in a hurry to see us."

Iron Ox muttered: "It's bloody childish. He's just scared." Everyone began to laugh.

"Be that as it may," Song Jiang said, "we've lost two comrades and we don't even know if they're still alive or not. I must ask you all to do your utmost, and renew the attack on Zhu Castle with me." They rose to their feet as one man and said: "You are the leader, no one would dream of disobeying! Who shall go first?"

Iron Ox said: "I shall go first, since all the rest of you are scared of little children!"

"It's no good having you in the vanguard," Song Jiang said. "We can't use you for this."

Iron Ox lowered his head, swallowing his anger. Song Jiang then ordered the Flautist, Redeye, Golden Wings and Short-Arse to march with him in the vanguard. Next he instructed the Magic Messenger, Thunderclap, Morbid, Madcap, the White-Water Dragon, the Pilot, White Eel and the Daytime Rat to muster a band of sailors. Finally he told Leopard's Head, Colonel Hua, Mu the Unstoppable and Iron Ox to form two supporting forces. When all the duties had been allotted, they armed themselves and mounted.

Song Jiang had decided to lead from the front, commanding the vanguard. Preceded by a large banner with characters in red, and followed by the other four leaders, with a hundred and fifty cavalry and a thousand foot, he marched on Zhu Castle. Scouts went in front of them to check the route. Soon they stood before Lone Dragon Heights. Song Jiang reined in his horse to have a good look at the castle. It was indeed a brave sight. There is a poem in praise of it which will tell you what it looked like:

In front of the mountains is Lone Dragon Heights
Where Zhu Castle stands, most wondrous of sights;
On all sides defended by a broad moat,
With clusters of willows scattered about.
Inside the ramparts are weapons in stacks;
In front of the gates there are spears in their racks.
The enemy leaders are strong and aggressive,
Three valiant youngsters whose ardour's excessive:
Dragon is one who'll be hard to defeat;
Tiger's another you won't want to meet;
Wildcat has mastered war's arts most fully,
Shouting insults and curses like a great bully.
Baron Zhu is a man of astuteness and more;
Of gold, silver and silk he has a great store.
A pair of white banners flutters on high,
Proclaiming in words that no clarity lack:
"We shall level the Marshes and capture Chao Gai;
We shall flatten Mount Liang and get Song Jiang the Black!"

Song Jiang was filled with anger when he saw those banners. "If I don't defeat Zhu I shall never return to Mount Liang," he vowed. The other leaders were also outraged. When Song Jiang knew that the rest had all come up behind him, he left the second force to attack the front gate of the castle whilst he led the first force round to the back of Lone Dragon Heights. Seen from this side the castle was a solid mass of ramparts, strongly fortified. As they were surveying it, a column of troops was observed in the west, coming up behind them with a great deal of shouting. Leaving the Flautist and Redeye to seal off the rear approach to Zhu Castle, Song Jiang took Golden Wings and Short-Arse and half the troops to meet the oncoming force. This consisted of around three hundred cavalry, who came streaming down the mountain. In their midst was a woman warrior, exceedingly handsome:

A pair of gold pins subdue the curls; phoenix slippers thread the stirrups. Chain mail overlays a robe of red silk; an embroidered belt girds the willow waist. Here is a frosty blade that will strike down the fiercest warrior, a slender force to vanquish the wildest opponent. Radiant as the crab-apple in flower is Steelbright who leads the charge.

Steelbright it was, Squire Hu's daughter. She rode a horse with a bluish mane, and she twirled a pair of glittering blades. Behind her came three or four hundred retainers. They were on their way to relieve Zhu Castle.

Song Jiang said: "They told me the Hu manor has a woman warrior who's very brave. This must be her. Who wants to fight her?"

Before he'd even finished, Short-Arse, who was a notorious womanizer and reckoned, on hearing talk of a woman warrior, that a single bout would suffice to capture her, cheered and galloped out in front, readying his lance for the charge. There were cheers from both sides as Miss Hu, slapping her horse and brandishing her two swords rode to the encounter.

What you had now was an expert swordswoman pitted against an outstanding lancer. They fought a dozen bouts, until it became evident to Song Jiang that Short-Arse's technique with the spear was failing and he was losing the strength to parry. The fact was that when Short-Arse first saw the girl he just couldn't wait to get his hands on her. He never thought that after a dozen bouts his arm would weaken, his legs grow stiff, his spearsmanship go all awry. He hadn't been looking for a fight to the death, he had just thought to have some fun.

But Steelbright was not to be trifled with. "This fellow's a lout," she thought to herself. Then she went in with her two swords, lunging at once both high and low. Short-Arse had more than met his match. He turned his horse and tried to flee. But Steelbright was on him again at once. Sheathing the sword in her right hand she stretched out a long agile arm, plucked him from his embroidered saddle and made him captive. The retainers gathered round and unceremoniously dragged Short-Arse away. There's a poem about this:

The power of lust outweighs discretion.
His life he sets at nought.
The sex destroy his self-possession,
By a woman he'll be caught.

When Golden Wings saw Short-Arse taken, he levelled his lance and charged to the rescue. Steelbright galloped towards him, waving her swords, and the two began to fight.

Now Golden Wings came from a family of famous soldiers and was an expert with the steel lance. Song Jiang watched, silently urging him on. But brilliant as his spearsmanship was, he could not get the slightest advantage over the woman warrior. Redeye, who was watching from afar and had seen Short-Arse taken prisoner and Golden Wings unable to subdue the woman, now urged on his mount and charged to the rescue, whirling a steel chain and letting off a tremendous shout. Meanwhile in Zhu Castle, where they had been watching for some time, they began to fear that Steelbright might lose. They hastily lowered the drawbridge and opened the gates and Dragon Zhu himself, leading out three hundred men, galloped with levelled spear at Song Jiang, hoping to capture him. The Flautist saw this, and waving his two swords galloped to encounter Dragon Zhu. Redeye fearing for Song Jiang's safety stuck by his side, as the fight raged on amid a tumult of shouts. As Song Jiang began to be really concerned that the Flautist could not handle Dragon Zhu and Golden Wings could not get the better of Steelbright, another column of troops came charging in from the side. To Song Jiang's delight it was Thunderclap Qin Ming, who had heard the sound of fighting and was coming to lend a hand. Song Jiang shouted out: "General Qin, look to the Flautist!"

Now Thunderclap was an impetuous man. Moreover, the Zhu forces had captured his friend and disciple the Tamer. He was not in a good mood. He gave his horse a slap and flew at Dragon Zhu, his face set in a terrifying grimace. Dragon Zhu readied his lance to receive the onslaught. The Flautist now led his troops away to try to recapture Short-Arse. Steelbright saw them coming and turned away from Golden Wings in order to receive the Flautist's attack. This encounter, since both were wielding two swords, gave the appearance of wind whirling up powdered jade, of snowflakes scattering among fairy petals. Just to watch it blurred one's vision.

On the other side Thunderclap and Dragon Zhu fought a dozen bouts. Dragon Zhu was no match for Thunderclap, but among his men was Ironstaff, who charged forward with steel chain and lance. Golden Wings rushed to meet him. Before the horses clashed, the instructor put up his lance and rode away to one side. As Golden Wings galloped after him, Ironstaff's flying chain caught him and knocked him headlong from the saddle. Redeye gave a great shout: "To the rescue, lads!" and charged after Ironstaff, whirling his chain.

Song Jiang told his men to save Golden Wings and get him on a horse. Meanwhile Dragon Zhu, unable to withstand Thunderclap, slapped his horse and fled. Ironstaff also broke off combat with Redeye and engaged Thunderclap. The two of them fought some twenty bouts and neither had the advantage. Eventually Ironstaff feinted and then slipped away. Thunderclap gave chase, whirling his mace, as Ironstaff galloped into a thicket. Unsuspectingly Thunderclap followed. Of course the Zhu force had positioned men in ambush in all such places. As soon as they saw Thunderclap they stretched out ropes to trip his horse. Horse and rider crashed to the ground and amid a tumult of shouts Thunderclap was taken.

Redeye saw Thunderclap fall and rushed to his assistance. Too late he saw the trip-wires and tried to turn back, but with much cheering on either side of him a tangle of hooks snaked out and he too was taken.

All that Song Jiang watching from afar could do was curse his luck and see to it that Golden Wings was put on a horse. The Flautist broke off the fight with Steelbright and rushed to support Song Jiang. They rode away southward, with Ironstaff, Dragon Zhu and Steelbright all in pursuit. They could see no way out and they were fully expecting to be captured when they saw away to the south a horseman was galloping towards them with five hundred troops behind him. It was Mu the Unstoppable. Another three hundred or more cavalry with two leaders were racing up from the southeast. One of the leaders was Morbid and the other was Madcap. From the northeast came yet another horseman, who was shouting out: "Get away from them!" It was Colonel Hua, the Archer. These three groups of cavalry converged on Song Jiang, who was immensely relieved to see them.

They now joined forces against Ironstaff and Dragon Zhu. Those watching from the castle feared for the safety of their two champions, so leaving Tiger Zhu to guard the gate the youngest brother, Wildcat Zhu, rode out from the rear of the castle. Mounted on a mettlesome charger and wielding a long lance, he was the leader of over five hundred cavalry, who now flung themselves into the fray.

Meanwhile in front of the castle, the White-Water Dragon, the Pilot and White Eel had crossed the water, but came under a hail of arrows from the castle and were unable to make any progress. The Magic Messenger and the Daytime Rat could only give encouragement from the other bank.

It was beginning to get dark, so Song Jiang hurriedly told the Flautist to get Golden Wings to safety outside the village. He also gave orders for the gongs to be sounded, as a signal to all his commanders to break off the fight and withdraw.

Song Jiang himself slapped his horse and galloped here and there to round up his men. He was afraid some of them might get lost. As he was doing so, he saw Steelbright charging towards him. He was unprepared for this, so he galloped off to the east with Steelbright in hot pursuit.

Eight hooves beat the earth like upturned cups. The chase took them deep into enemy territory. Steelbright was gaining on him and Song Jiang was about to turn and fight when a shout rang out from the mountainside: "What does that bloody woman think she's doing chasing our leader?"

It was Iron Ox, whirling his two axes, racing towards them at the head of a force of seventy or eighty. Steelbright reined in her horse and rode off towards the forest. Song Jiang also halted, and was able to observe another few dozen cavalrymen emerging from the forest. At the head of them rode a fellow who was bravely built and nobly accoutred.

It was Leopard's Head, who shouted as he rode forward: "Where do you think you're going, you bitch?" Steelbright whirling her swords charged him. Leopard's Head levelling his long curved spear rode to meet her. Before they had fought ten bouts he feinted. When Steelbright came in close to slash at him with her two swords, he parried with his spear and reaching out with an easy movement of his agile arm and a bend of his supple waist, plucked her from her horse.

Song Jiang applauded loudly, his delight knew no bounds. Ordering his men to tie her up, Leopard's Head galloped over to Song Jiang and asked: "Are you hurt, brother?"

"No, I'm not hurt," the latter replied.

Iron Ox was now ordered to rush round the village rounding up all the leaders and ordering them to come to the camp outside the village for a conference. He rode off with his troops behind him. Leopard's Head, protecting Song Jiang, with Steelbright in custody, headed back to the camp outside the village.

That night all the leaders gathered anxiously in the camp, worried at not having prevailed in the fight.

The Zhu forces likewise withdrew to the castle. They had suffered countless casualties. Dragon Zhu ordered all the prisoners to be confined in prison carts, to be taken together to the capital, once Song Jiang had been captured, and exchanged for the reward. The people of Hu had already handed over Short-Arse to Zhu Castle.

Having assembled most of his forces on the outskirts of the village, Song Jiang set up camp. He first ordered Steelbright to be brought and instructed twenty experienced soldiers and four leaders on fast mounts to deliver her with all speed, bound hand and foot and also on horseback, to Mount Liang and hand her over to his father, Squire Song, to look after, and then report back. He told them that he would dispose of her when he returned to the mountain. The others all thought Song Jiang wanted the woman for himself, so the mission was carried out with great care. Golden Wings was also to be sent in a cart back to the mountain to recuperate. Everyone carried out these orders, travelling with all speed. But Song Jiang grieved in his tent all night, unable to sleep. He watched till morning.

Next day scouts came to report that Professor Wu Yong was on the way, with the three Ruan brothers, the Little Duke and the Halberdier, and five hundred cavalry. Song Jiang went out to meet him, and then took him back to the tent. The Professor had brought food and drink with him, and drank a toast to celebrate with Song Jiang and reward the leaders of the expedition.

"Back in the mountain stronghold," he said, "our leader Chao Gai has heard all about your first unsuccessful expedition and has sent me and five others to lend a hand. How did you fare today, well or badly?"

"It's not easy to say in a word. That unspeakable Zhu crowd had erected two white banners over their gate, saying 'We shall level the Marshes and capture Chao Gai, we shall flatten Mount Liang and get Song Jiang the Black!' They are insolent! In our first attack the topography was against us and we lost Panther and the Tamer. We launched an assault in the evening and Short-Arse was captured by Steelbright, while Golden Wings was injured by the instructor's chain. Then Thunderclap and Redeye were unseated and captured by means of trip-wires. With losses like these our morale would have been severely damaged if Leopard's Head had not managed to capture Steelbright. With things as they are, I don't know what we can do next. I'd sooner kill myself right here than fail to destroy Zhu Castle and rescue our comrades. I certainly wouldn't be able to go back and face our friend Chao Gai again."

But the Professor only laughed. "This Zhu Castle," he said, "has really been tempting heaven. And now there's a wonderful opportunity. I should say it will only take us a day and a night to destroy it."

Song Jiang was both astonished and delighted. "How'd it take only a day and a night to destroy it?" he asked eagerly. "What's this opportunity?" Smiling patiently, the Professor laid 2 fingers together and explained what he meant by an opportunity. Truly, this was a case of:

He reaches up into the sky and pulls down the clouds;
He delivers them from the snares of heaven and earth.

WHEN Song Jiang gave the orders for retreat there soon arose from his men many cries, and when he inquired the reason he was told that the roads were like a maze, and although they had retreated they had all got back to where they started from. He then gave orders that they were to advance to those places where there were torches displayed. Very soon further cries were heard, and he was then informed that his men had tried to get to the lighted torches, but had found the roads studded with bamboo spikes and iron pricks so that they could not advance.

Song Jiang was very much distressed and had no plans. Just then, however, a cry arose in the left wing of his armed men, "Shi Xiu has returned!" Very soon Shi Xiu appeared, and spoke to Song Jiang, "Keep cool, sir! I know the road. Tell our men to follow the road, and when they come to white poplars they must turn there, and not at any other place."

Orders were given accordingly, and when the men had gone about two //they found themselves face to face with a large body of armed villagers.

Song Jiang asked Shi Xiu about the position.

They have a lamp as a signal," replied Shi Xiu.
"Do you see that lamp among the trees? I have noticed that as we go eastward that lamp also moves eastward, and if we go westward the lamp moves in the same direction. That is evidently done to indicate our directions and movements," said Hua Rong.
"How can we stop this movement of the lamp?" asked Song Jiang.
"That is quite easy," said Hua Rong. Running forward in front of the vanguard he shot an arrow at the lamp and brought it down. The village guard not seeing the lamp any longer did not know where to go, and were soon in confusion. Song Jiang gave orders for a speedy advance. Shortly there was a great uproar in front, and the torchlights were moving in all directions. Song Jiang called a halt, and sent Shi Xiu to find out the position. He soon returned, and reported that the relief party from Liangshan Marsh had now arrived, and was attacking the village guard in front. Song Jiang ordered an attack so that the village guard was soon between two fires. The villagers soon gave way, and scattered. The united bandits now halted, and encamped on some high ground to await the dawn. The roll was called, and they discovered that Huang Xin was missing. His men said that during the night attack they had got on the wrong road, and Huang Xin had been dragged off his horse by hooks from tall grass.
Song Jiang was very angry with the men because they had not duly reported this, and threatened to kill those responsible for this dereliction of duty.
Yang Xiong tried to pacify Song Jiang, "There are three villages in alliance here, but Li Ying's village is now free from that alliance. Why not go there and talk matters over with Li Ying?"
Song Jiang admitted that he had forgotten about Li Ying, and at once decided to go to see him. He left Lin Chong and Qin Ming in charge of the temporary camp. Song Jiang took three other leaders and about three hundred cavalry with him. Upon reaching the village they found the drawbridge raised and the gates closed. A drum was sounded on the tower over the gate. Song Jiang called out, "I am Song Jiang from Liangshan Marsh, and have come here only to pay a visit to your chief Li Ying."
Du Xing was on the tower, and he recognized some of the leaders. He at once had the gate opened, and taking a boat came across the moat. Upon landing he saluted Song Jiang, and was introduced by Hua Rong and Shi Xiu. Their object in visiting the village was explained, and Du Xing agreed to go back, and report the matter to the chief, Li Ying. When he reached the village hall he found Li Ying seated on a bed with a blanket over his shoulders nursing his wound. When Du Xing had delivered his message Li Ying replied, "Song Jiang is a bandit of Liangshan Marsh so I cannot agree to receive him here. I am above disloyalty, but if I saw him, people would suspect a double game. You can go back, and tell him that I am sick, and as I cannot leave my bed I cannot meet him now, but may see him at some future date. I request him to take back his presents, as I cannot receive them."
Du Xing returned, and duly conveyed this message to Song Jiang who understood Li Ying's meaning. Du Xing then told Song Jiang of the girl Hu San Niang who was betrothed to "Tiger's Cub," and was famous as a great warrior. She lived in the Hu Family Village, and that was the place that Song Jiang must be on guard against as Li Ying would remain neutral on account of having been wounded and discourteously treated by the Zhu Family Village. The last-named village had two gates, and to succeed he must attack both gates at the same time. To attack one gate only would lead to disaster. The roads near the front or main gate had been specially made to confuse strangers, but the clue was in following the poplar trees.
Here Shi Xiu interrupted, "But those poplar trees have all been cut down now, so that clue will be missing."
"Even if they have cut them down there will still be the stumps left," replied Du Xing, "so that there would be no difficulty in broad daylight."
Song Jiang thanked Du Xing for the information, and then rode back with his cavalry to the temporary camp. There the leaders had a conference, and heard the news. They all agreed to join in an attack on the Zhu Family Village. Li Kui was very keen on again going in front of the attack, but Song Jiang ordered him to stay behind which rather upset Li Kui, and he sat with head bowed down. Song Jiang selected Ma Lin and three other leaders to accompany him in the vanguard. Dai Zong and eight other leaders were to take men by the moat. While Lin Chong, Hua Rong, and two other leaders were to bring the reserves by two separate roads. After all the men had had their food Song Jiang started off displaying a large red flag with the character "shuai," i.e., commander-in-chief. Upon reaching the Zhu Family Village, Song Jiang halted his men, and noticed that over the gate were two white flags bearing the announcement, "We will fill up the lake and capture Chao Gai. We will tear down the hill at Liangshan Marsh and seize Song Jiang." Song Jiang was very angry upon reading this, and swore, "If I do not raze this village to the ground I will never go back to Liangshan Marsh." The other leaders were also angry. Song Jiang waited until he saw that all his men had arrived, and that the two reserve bodies were there, and then gave the order for a general assault on the front gate. He then led part of his men to the other gate. The rear gate was strongly guarded. Approaching from the west, outside the village wall, was a large body of armed men who were shouting and making a great noise. Song Jiang ordered Ma Lin and Deng Fei to take half the men and guard the gate while he took the other half under Ou Peng and Wang Ying to oppose the advancing force. As the force came round a small mound it was seen that it consisted of about thirty horsemen under the command of a young girl—the "Ten Feet of Green"—who rode in front, and carried a sword in each hand. This body was followed by about five hundred armed men on foot.
"I suppose this must be the powerful daughter of the Hu family we have heard so much about," said Song Jiang. "Who is willing to meet her in single combat?"
Wang Ying came forward and shouted, "I will go," and spurring his horse he dashed forward. Now this man had a weakness for women, and when he saw this girl his only desire was to make her his prisoner.
Hu San Niang, the "Ten Feet of Green" whipped her horse, and rushed forward for a fight. She was very skillful with the sword, whereas Wang Ying was a superior spearman. They met and after about ten bouts Song Jiang perceived that Wang Ying could not overcome the girl. Wang Ying had thought that he would seize her at once, and at first had only played with his spear. But when he realized that he could not take her easily, he began to use his extreme strength and skill, but found that she was nonplused.
The girl was quite well educated and intelligent. She thought, "This fellow is very crude, and treats me too lightly," so she attacked him very strongly. Wang Ying could not stand this, and he pulled his horse round to retreat.
The girl was however too quick for him. Placing her sword in a rest she raced her horse after Wang Ying, and seizing hold of him pulled him out of his saddle. The villagers rushed forward, and seizing him led him away as a prisoner. Ou Peng seeing this galloped forward to try to save Wang Ying, but found himself in mortal combat with the girl. Ou Peng was the son of a military officer who had instructed him in the use of the lance with which he was very skillful. Song Jiang watched the fight with secret satisfaction. But in spite of his skill Ou Peng could not overcome the girl, he had met his equal. Deng Fei considering the position critical now rushed forward armed with an iron chain. Zhu, the 'Dragon,' in command of the Zhu family villagers now rushed forward to assist Hu San Niang by capturing Song Jiang, but was met by Ma Liu with whom he fought. Seeing this Deng Fei returned to protect Song Jiang. Song Jiang seeing these two deadly combats was nonplused, but just then a detachment of horsemen came in view led by Qin Ming who hearing the noise of combat had brought up the reserves. Song Jiang called out, "Qin Ming, you take the place of Ma Lin in this fight!" Now Qin Ming was very hasty, and was already irritated because these people had arrested Huang Xin who had been one of his pupils. Seizing his mace he whipped his horse, and rushed forward to attack Zhu, the 'Dragon.' Ma Lin seeing Qin Ming retired, and went off to try to rescue Wang Ying. The girl Hu San Niang, the "Ten Feet of Green" seeing this movement left Ou Peng, and rushed to attack Ma Lin. These two were armed with two swords each, and now there was a brilliant flash of steel as the four swords were lashed, and thrust backwards and forwards. Song Jiang could not distinguish any particular sword as they were so quickly crossed and withdrawn. Qin Ming and Dragon Zhu fought about ten bouts without either gaining an advantage. There now came on the scene another combatant—Drill Instructor Luan Tingyu, who emerged from the village gate on horseback, armed with a lance and a heavy iron mace. Ou Peng was free, and advanced to fight this new man. Luan Tingyu retreated, and Ou Peng galloped after him. Luan Tingyu seeing his opponent near at hand flung the iron mace and knocked Ou Peng off his horse. Seeing this Deng Fei called out, "To the rescue!" and galloped up to engage Luan Tingyu. Song Jiang ordered his men to go and rescue Ou Peng. "Dragon" Zhu had retreated as he could not overcome Qin Ming, and that individual now charged forward also to attack Luan Tingyu. After about twenty bouts with Qin Ming, Luan Tingyu watched his opportunity and also retreated. As Qin Ming was pursuing, Luan Tingyu went into a place where the grass and reeds were very tall and dense. Qin Ming followed him, never suspecting that he was merely going into a trap. Suddenly his horse was pulled down by a lasso, and as he fell he was seized by men who had been waiting in ambush. Deng Fei had seen Qin Ming disappear from his horse, and galloping into the tall grass to rescue him met the same fate, and was also made a prisoner. Song Jiang seeing this, called off Ou Peng and Ma Lin as he saw that they could not overcome their opponents. The three leaders then galloped off in retreat followed by their men. They were pursued by "Dragon" Zhu, Luan Tingyu, and Hu San Niang the "Ten Feet of Green."
Song Jiang saw in the distance a horseman approaching followed by about five hundred men. He soon recognized him as Mu Hong. There was also another large body of men to the east of these who he saw were led by Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu. He also was pleased to see another body of men approaching in charge of Hua Rong. Song Jiang gave orders for his men to fight a rearward action, but not to delay their retreat too much as it was getting dusk. Song Jiang was in advance finding the proper road, and while by himself he found that Hu San Niang was chasing him to cut him off from his men. Not being a match or her, Song Jiang retreated, and now there was a very speedy race between the two. Just as they reached a small hillock a man appeared who called out. "Why is that woman pursuing my elder brother?" He was none other than Li Kui. The girl seeing this rescue party turned her horse towards a wood near at hand. Just then Lin Chong also appeared accompanied by about ten horsemen. Lin Chong shouted, and the girl without hesitation galloped towards him waving her two swords. They fought for about ten bouts, and then Lin Chong saw her weakness. He allowed her to strike at him with both swords, and warding off the blows with his spear he at the same moment dropped his spear and seized hold of the girl with both hands. He held her firmly, and soon had her bound by his men with ropes. Song Jiang issued an order for all the men to fall back to the place they had started from, and sent Li Kui to carry this order to all the leaders.
It was now evening. Song Jiang and Lin Chong with their men and prisoner soon reached the rendezvous. The villagers had all withdrawn into the village for the night.
Song Jiang summoned four sergeants, and about twenty men, all mounted, and gave them instructions to take the girl Hu San Niang to Liangshan Marsh, and hand her over in the custody of his father. Most of the leaders concluded from this that Song Jiang wanted the girl for himself, but they said nothing.
The following morning a scout came to the camp, and reported that another body of about five hundred men under the commander of Wu Yong was approaching. Song Jiang went out of the camp to receive Wu Yong. Wu Yong had brought a large quantity of rations for the troops.
Wu Yong said, "Chao Gai heard that you had not been successful yesterday, so he dispatched me with these men, and rations to help you. How did the fight get along these days?"
"That is a long story," replied Song Jiang.
He then explained what had taken place the previous day. He added that he had no plans but that if he could not succeed in defeating those villagers and rescuing the four comrades he would prefer to die at that place instead of returning to Liangshan Marsh. He dared not face Chao Gai after being in such disgrace. Wu Yong laughed at this, and said, "The Zhu Family Village ought of course to be defeated. Just now we have a fortunate opportunity and we can succeed very soon."
"But how can we defeat those people?" asked Song Jiang surprisingly. Wu Yong still laughed, and took his time to explain matters. Holding up 2 fingers, he explained the position.

A hand stretching forth to seize a cloud,
Just helped a man enmeshed in net.

147

The 2 Suns, Colonel Sun Li & Blackface Sun Xin attack the prison, Break Open the Jail, & Rescue Men from Prison; The Xie Brothers Snake Zhen & Scorpion Bao are sprung from gaol & Make their Escape from Prison

"A friend of Shi Yong who wants to join our band is very close to Luan Tingyu. He's also on excellent terms with Yang Lin and Deng Fei." said Wu Yong. "He knows you're having difficulty in attacking the Zhu Family Manor. He's offering this plan as a kind of entry gift, after which he will join us. We can carry it out in five days. Doesn't that please you?"
"Marvellous," cried Song Jiang. His face was wreathed in smiles.
About the same time the first attack on the Zhu Family Manor was in progress certain things were happening in the Shandong coastal prefecture of Dengzhou. Outside the prefectural town was a mountain infested with wild animals. These did considerable harm to human life. The prefect therefore summoned the local hunters and ordered them to kill and produce the body within a fixed time of a tiger which was roaming the mountain. The village chiefs in front of and behind the mountain were also directed to take part. If the hunters did not get results in the time allotted they would be severely punished and cangues placed around their necks.
At the foot of the mountain lived two brothers who were hunters. The elder was called Xie Zhen, the younger Xie Bao. Both used two-pronged spears of steel-flecked iron and were remarkably skillful fighters. They were considered the best huntsmen in the prefecture. Xie Zhen's nickname Was Two-Headed Snake, Xie Bao's was Twin-Tailed Scorpion. Their parents were dead, and they had never married. The elder was tall, ruddy complected, with a narrow waist and broad shoulders. The younger, an even tougher fellow, was still taller, with round face, swarthy skin, and two flying demons tattooed on his legs. When possessed by one of his terrible rages, he wanted to pull up trees, shake mountains, and turn earth and sky upside down.
After hearing the prefect's edict, the two brothers returned home and made ready their snare-bow, poisoned arrow, crossbows and forked obstacles, put on their panther skin pants and tiger pelt capes, took their pronged spears and went up the mountain. They set their snare-bow, climbed a tree and waited all day. Nothing happened. They dismantled the bow and went home.
The next day they took some dry rations and again mounted the slope. They waited until dusk, then again set the snarebow and climbed a tree. By the fifth watch, there still wasn't any activity. They moved the bow to the western side of the mountain and sat until daylight, at which time they decided not to wait any longer. Both men were growing worried. They said: "We've been give three days to catch the tiger. If we don't, we'll be punished. What are we going to do?"
At the fifth watch of the third night of their vigil, weariness overcame them. Sitting back to back, they began to doze. No sooner had they closed their eyes than they heard the twang of the snare-bow. They leaped down, grabbed their pronged spears and peered into the darkness. A tiger had been struck by the poisoned arrow and was writhing on the ground. The hunters approached, spears in hand. When the beast saw them it ran, arrow and all. The brothers gave chase. Halfway down the mountain, the poison did its work. With a roar of anguish, the tiger rolled down the slope.
"Good," said Xie Bao. "That's Squire Mao's rear garden below. We'll go to his place and collect the tiger."
The brother descended the mountain to the manor and knocked on the gate. By then it was dawn. A vassal opened the gate and went in to report to the squire. Before long, Squire Mao emerged. The brothers set aside their spears and hailed him respectfully.
"Uncle!" they said, "we haven't seen you in a long time. Sorry to have to trouble you."
"What are you doing here so early, nephews? What's on your minds?"
"If it weren't important, we wouldn't dare disturb your slumbers," said Xie Zhen. "Because of the prefect's edict, we've been out after a tiger. For three days we've been hunting, and this morning, at the fifth watch, we finally shot it. He's rolled down the slope into your rear garden. We'd like your permission to get him."
"Of course. But why not sit a while, first? You must be hungry. Have some breakfast." The squire instructed his vassal to bring food and wine, and urged the two brother to help themselves.
After eating they rose and thanked him. "We appreciate your kindness. We'd like to go and get that tiger, if we may."
"Since he's in the rear part of my manor, what's there to worry about? Have some tea. There's plenty of time."
The Xie brothers couldn't very well refuse. They sat down again while the vassal served them tea.
"And now," said the squire, "you can collect your tiger, nephews."
"Thank you, uncle," said the brothers.
Squire Mao led them to the rear garden and instructed a vassal to unlock the gate. But no matter how the man tried, he couldn't budge it. "It hasn't been opened for a long time," the squire explained. "The lock is probably rusty. Use a hammer."
The vassal took a hammer and smashed the lock. They all entered the garden and walked towards the part near the mountain. There was no tiger.
"Could you be mistaken, nephews?" queried the squire. "Maybe you didn't watch carefully. Maybe it didn't land in my garden."
"How could we be mistaken?" said Xie Zhen. "We were born and raised here. Wouldn't we know where we were?"
"Search for yourselves. If you find it, you can take it away."
"Brother, look at this," cried Xie Bao. "This patch of grass has been rolled flat, and here are bloodstains. Who says this isn't the place? Some of uncle's vassals must have carried it off!"
"Don't talk like that," said the squire. "How would our household's vassals know there was a tiger in the rear garden? And carry it away? You saw that we had to break the lock open. We went into the garden with you and let you search. How can you say such things?"
"Uncle," said Xie Zhen. "You'd better give us back our tiger. We have to turn it over to the authorities."
"You two are completely unreasonable. I invite you to breakfast and you invent a story that we've stolen your tiger."
"Invent, nothing. Your family was also informed of the authorities' time limit. You hadn't the skill to catch your own tiger, so you took ours. Now, you'll claim a reward while we two brothers will be beaten."
"What's it to me if you're beaten?"
The young men glared. "Do you dare let us make a thorough search?"
"Is this your home or mine? Every family is entitled to its privacy. You beggars have no manners whatsoever."
Xie Bao forced his way into the hall. No tiger. Fury rose in his heart and he started fighting. Xie Zhen smashed the railing in front of hall and barged in with him.
The squire set up a howl. "Xie Zhen and Xie Bao are robbing us in broad daylight!"
The brothers pulverized the furniture. They saw the whole manor was getting ready to come at them in force, and they left with quick strides through the front gate.
They pointed accusingly and shouted: "You've stolen our tiger! We'll let the court decide this!"
At that moment two or three riders approached the manor, leading a band of men. Xie Zhen recognized Mao Zhongyi, the squire's son.
"Your vassals have stolen our tiger, and your father refuses to return it! In fact he wants to beat us up!"
"Those rustics are very ignorant. My father must have been deceived by them. Don't be angry. Come in with me and I'll see to it that you get it."
The brothers thanked him. Mao Zhongyi shouted for the vassals to open the gate, and he asked Xie Zhen and Xie Bao to enter. Then he ordered that the gate be closed, and he yelled: "Grab them!"
From porches on both sides of the courtyard twenty or thirty vassals converged on the two brothers, joined by the men who had arrived with the riders. These latter were police. The brothers were overpowered before they could defend themselves, and bound.
"Our household shot a tiger last night," Mao Zhongyi asserted. "How can you make false claims against us? And you force your way in, rob our valuables and smash our furniture. That's criminal. Turn them over to the authorities. We'll be ridding our prefecture of a scourge!"
Actually, Mao Zhongyi had delivered the tiger at the fifth watch to the prefectural office. He brought police back with him to size the Xie brothers. The two were fooled by his ruse more easily than he expected, and now no one would listen to them. The squire put a bag of "loot" with their pronged spears and added a number of pieces of wrecked furniture as "evidence." These and the prisoners, who were stripped naked and their hands tied behind their backs, were taken into the prefectural town.
Wang Zheng, the court clerk, was the squire's son-in-law. He spoke first to the prefect. Xie Zhen and Xie Bao were then brought before the court. They were not permitted to say anything, but were bound and beaten. The prefect insisted they admit that "on the pretext of seeking a tiger, we entered with pronged spears and forceably committed armed robbery." When the brothers could stand the beating no longer, they confessed as demanded. The prefect ordered that a cangue of twenty-five catties be fixed around the neck of each man and that they be confined to prison.
Father and son returned to the manor and conferred. "Those two varlets mustn't be released. The best thing would be to kill them, to avoid any future trouble."
They went into town and gave private instructions to the clerk Wang Zheng: "We want this grass pulled up by the roots so that it won't sprout again. We will see to it that inducements are paid on every level, from the prefect right on down."
Xie Zhen and Xie Bao were delivered to the prison's section for the condemned, and men were brought to a pavilion to meet the warden. His name was Bao Ji, and he had already received Squire Mao's silver and instructions from Clerk Wang to kill the two brothers. Bao was seated in the center of the pavilion.
A keeper said to the young hunters: "Go quickly and kneel before him."
"So you're the so-called Two-Headed Snake and the Twin-Tailed Scorpion, are you?" Bao snarled.
"Those are nicknames others have given us," said Xie Zhen. "But we've never harmed any good people."

"Animals," the warden barked. "I'm going to turn you into a One-Headed Snake and a Single-Tailed Scorpion! Take them and lock them up."
The keeper led them back to their cell. He looked to see that no one was around, then said: "Do you know me? I'm the brother of your brother's wife."
"We are our family's only sons. We don't have any brother," Xie Zhen said.
"Aren't you brothers of Major Sun?"
"He's the brother of our paternal cousin's husband. We've never met you. Could you be Yue Ho?"
"The same. My name is Yue Ho. We're originally from Maozhou Prefecture, before my ancestors moved here. My older sister married Major Sun. I work in this place as a jailkeep. Because I sing well people call me Iron Throat. My brother-in-law, seeing that I like weapons play, has taught me a few styles of fighting with the lance."
This Yue Ho was a quick and clever fellow. He had easily learned to play many musical instruments, and was orderly and thorough. As for lances and staves, they were like sugar and honey to him. He saw that the two brothers were gallant lads and he wanted to save them. But you can't spin a rope with one strand, you cannot applaud with one hand. He could only give them a bit of news.
"I'll tell you something," he said. "Bao Ji the warden has been bribed by Squire Mao. He's sure to try and kill you both. What are you going to do?"
"If you hadn't mentioned Major Sun I wouldn't have thought of it," said Xie Zhen. "But since you have, I'd like you to deliver a message."
"To whom?"
"To a woman relative on my father's side. She's married to the brother of Major Sun. They live outside East Gate in the hamlet of Ten Li Marker. Actually, she's a cousin, and she's known as Gu Dasao the Tigress. She and her husband run a tavern. They also have a slaughter-house and a place to gamble. When she fights, no twenty or thirty men can touch her. Even Sun Xin, her husband, can't vanquish her, skilled as he is with weapons. She's very fond of my brother and me. And my mother is Sun Xin and Sun Li's aunt. So they're also cousins, but on my mother's side. If you would be good enough to let them know, secretly, I'm sure our cousin the Tigress would come and rescue us."
"I'll attend to it, kinsmen, rest assured."
Yue Ho went out and got some buns and cooked meat, which he sneaked into them. Then, on the excuse of urgent personal business, he locked the prison door, entrusted the key to a minor keeper and hurried out of the town's East Gate to the hamlet of Ten Li Marker. He soon found the tavern. Slabs of beef and mutton were hanging outside its door. In the rear of the tavern was a gambling room. A woman sat behind the counter. Confident that this was Gu Dasao, Yue Ho approached and hailed her respectfully.
"Is this the Sun place?"
"It is. Would you like some wine, sir? Or do you want to buy meat, perhaps? If you'd like to gamble, we've a room in the back."
"My name is Yue Ho. I'm the younger brother of Major Sun's wife."
"So it's you, cousin Yue Ho." Gu Dasao smiled. "You look just like her. Do come in and have some tea."
Yue Ho followed her inside and was seated as a guest.
"I heard you were working in town," said Gu Dasao. "But we're poor and have little spare time, so we've had no chance to meet you. What wind blows you here today?"
"I wouldn't dare disturb you if it weren't important. Two new felons were brought to our prison today. Although we had never met, their names were well known to me—Xie Zhen the Two-Headed Snake and Xie Bao the Twin-Tailed Scorpion."
"They're my cousins. Why have they been put in prison?"
"They killed a tiger, and a rich landlord, Squire Mao, stole it from them. Then he had them seized as thieves and armed robbers, and taken before the prefect. He's bribed everyone, high and low. Sooner or later, Bao Ji the warden is going to have them murdered. It's unfair, and I don't like it, but I can't save them on my own. Since we're related, and chivalry comes first, I told them what I knew. They said no one but you can rescue them. That may be, but only if you act fast."
Gu Dasao uttered a cry of lamentation. She shouted to her assistants to fetch her husband. Several of them ran out, and soon returned with Sun Xin, who was introduced to Yue Ho. Sun's family had been military men for generations. They came from Qiongzhou. Because their unit was transferred to Dengzhou, the two Sun brothers had moved with it.
Sun Xin was big and strong. Having learned his skill with arms from his army brother, he was deft with a ribbed rod, and was known as the Junior General. His wife told him the story.
"You'd better go back, cousin," he said to Yue Ho. "They're already in prison. We'll need you to look after them. As soon as my wife and I think out a plan, we'll join you directly."
"Any way I can be of service, I'll be glad to do my best."
Gu Dasao served Yue Ho wine and gave him a bag of silver. "Spread this around among the minor keepers," she said, "to make sure they take good care of our cousins."
Yue Ho thanked her, took the silver, returned to the prison and put the money to use. Of that we'll say no more.
Gu Dasao conferred with Sun Xin. "Any ideas on how to save them?" she asked.
"That scoundrel Squire Mao has money and power. He wants to prevent your cousins from ever coming out. He won't quit till he's made sure. He certainly will see to it that they're killed. They have to be snatched out of that prison. There isn't any other solution."
"I'll go with you tonight," said Gu Dasao.
Sun smiled. "You're too rash. We must have a long-range plan. We need a place to go after the jailbreak. We can't carry it off, anyhow, without the help of my brother and two other men I have in mind."
"Who are they?"
"An uncle and a nephew who are mad about gambling—Zou Yuan and Zou Run. At present they are robbers on the Mountain in the Clouds. We're on very good terms. If I can get them, we can do it."
"The Mountain in the Clouds isn't far. Go immediately and invite them here for a conference."
"I'll do that. You get some wine and tasty dishes ready. They'll come if I ask them."
Gu Dasao instructed her assistants to slaughter a hog, and she laid the table with wine and platters of fruit and delicacies.
By dusk Sun returned with two bold fellows. The first was Zou Yuan. A Laizhou man, he loved gambling since childhood, and had always been an idler. But he was loyal and generous, and skilled with several weapons. He could be forceful and relentless, too, when the occasion arose. In the gallant fraternity he was known as the Dragon from the Forest.
The second man was his nephew Zou Run. The two were about the same age, and there was not much difference between them. Big and tall, Zou Run had a peculiar feature—a tumor on the back of his head. Whenever he lost his temper in a fight, he would butt his opponent. One day he suddenly butted a pine tree and snapped it in two, astonishing his watchers. From then on everybody called him the One-Horned Dragon.
Gu Dasao invited them into the inner room and urged them to be seated. She told the whole story and raised the question of raiding the prison.
"I have eighty or ninety men under my command, but only about twenty I can trust," said Zou Yuan. "And we won't be able to stay in these parts after we do the job. There's a place I've been thinking of going for a long time. I wonder whether you two would be willing to join us."
"We'll go anywhere you like, as long as you save my cousins," said Gu Dasao.
"Liangshan Marsh is thriving, and Song Jiang is very agreeable to accepting new members. There are three friends of mine under his command—Elegant Panther Yang Lin, Deng Fei the Fiery-Eyed Lion, and Shi Yong the General. They joined the band a long time ago. After we've rescued your cousins, we'll all go to Mount Liangshan and join up, too. What do you say?"
"Couldn't be better," cried Gu Dasao. "Anyone who tries to back out I'll puncture to death with my lance!"
"There's one thing, though," Zou Run reminded them. "When we've got our men, what if Dengzhou sends troops and cavalry after us?"
"My older brother is a major in the prefectural garrison, and he's the best fighter they have," said Sun Xin. "Whenever bandits attack the town, he's the one who kill and scatters them. His reputation is known all over. I'll invite him here tomorrow and get his promise to help."
"I'm afraid he won't want to turn outlaw," said Zou Yuan.
"I have an excellent way to convince him." Sun Xin replied.
They drank till half the night was gone, then retired till the following morning. Sun kept his guests at home with him, and dispatched an assistant and a couple of men to town with a large cart, which they pushed. "Go quickly to the garrison and see my brother Major Sun and his wife Madame Yue. Say: 'My mistress is very ill and hopes you will come at once.' "
To which Gu Dasao added: "Say my condition is critical, that I have something important to tell them. Say they must come, that this is their last chance to see and hear me."
The assistant went off with the cart and Sun Xin waited at the doorway. Around lunch time, he saw the cart in the distance, bringing his sister-in-law, with his brother on horseback, followed by a dozen foot soldiers. As the procession neared Ten Li Marker, Sun Xin reported to his wife: "They're coming."
"Now this is what I want you to do," said Gu Dasao. In an undertone, she gave her instructions.
Sun Xin went out and greeted his brother and sister-in-law. As Madame Yue got down from the cart, he asked her to come in and see the patient. Sun Li dismounted and also entered. He was indeed a fine figure of a man. Very tall, with a full beard, he was known as the Sickly General because of his yellow-tinged complexion. But he pulled a stiff bow, rode a spirited horse, and wielded a long lance. From his wrist hung a steel rod with tiger eyes and ridged like a bamboo. People turned faint at the very sight of it.
As he walked through the gate with his brother, Sun Li asked: "What's wrong with sister-in-law?"
"She has a very peculiar ailment. Let's talk about it inside."
Sun Li entered. Sun Xin told his assistant to take the soldiers to the tavern opposite and give them drinks, and to bring the horse into the yard. He urged Sun Li to be seated.
After a while, Sun Xin said to his visitors: "Please come in and see the patient."
He led them to an inner room, but no one was there.
"What room is she resting in?" Sun Li asked.
Just then, Gu Dasao entered, followed by Zou Yuan and Zou Run.
"What ailment have you, sister-in-law?" queried Sun Li.
"Brother-in-law, my respects. I'm suffering from a need to rescue cousins."
"This is very strange. Rescue which cousins?"
"You're not deaf and dumb. Surely you know those two in town are my cousins. And yours, as well."
"I don't understand. Which two do you mean?"
"The matter is urgent. I'll come straight to the point. Squire Mao at the foot of the Mountain in the Clouds and Clerk Wang are plotting against Xie Zhen and Xie Bao, and sooner or later are going to have them killed. I've talked it over with these two bold fellows. We're going to raid the prison, rescue them, and all join the band in Liangshan Marsh. Since you'll probably be implicated, I feigned illness and invited you and sister-in-law here to tell you of our plan. If you don't want to go with us, we'll go alone. What justice can we expect from the imperial court? If we leave, nothing will happen to us. If we stay, we'll be prosecuted. 'The nearest to the flames is the first burned,' as the saying goes. You'll be made the scapegoat and go to prison, and there'll be no one to send you food and rescue you. What do you think of our idea?"
"I'm a military officer of Dengzhou Prefecture. How dare I do such a thing?"
"Since you refuse, you and I must fight to the death, right now!"
Gu Dasao produced two sabres, and Zou Yuan and Zou Run both pulled out daggers.
"Wait, sister-in-law," Sun Li shouted. "Not so fast. I'm thinking of the future. Let's talk this over."
Madame Yue was so frightened she couldn't utter a word. "Even if you won't go, at least send sister-in-law on ahead," said Gu Dasao. "We'll stage the raid without you."
"Let me go home and pack some things first and see how the land lies, since you're going through with it. Then we'll go into action."
"This news was leaked to us by your brother-in-law Yue Ho. You can get your luggage together while we're raiding the prison. There'll still be time."
Sun Li sighed. "If that's how you people want it, I can't prevent you. The authorities would surely prosecute me after you'd gone. All right, then. Let's talk this over and get started."
It was arranged for Zou Yuan to go to his stronghold on the Mountain in the Clouds, collect his valuables and horses, and come back with twenty trusted men. Zou Yuan departed. Sun Xin would go into town, find out what news Yue Ho had, fix a time for the raid, and get word secretly to Xie Zhen and Xie Bao.
The next day, having gathered his gold and silver on the Mountain in the Clouds, Zou Yuan returned with his men. These, plus the seven or eight loyal assistants of Sun Xin, and the dozen soldiers Sun Li had brought, made a total of over forty. Sun Xin slaughtered two pigs and a sheep, and saw to it that everyone ate his fill. He instructed Gu Dasao to carry daggers concealed on her person and enter the prison disguised as a woman delivering food. The forces were divided into two groups and proceeded towards town. Sun Xin went with Sun Li. Zou Yuan led Zou Run.
Bao Ji, the warden of the Dengzhou prison, had received money from Squire Mao and was waiting for a chance to murder the two young hunters. Yue Ho, holding his staff of office, was standing in the passage of the prison gateway, when he heard the entry bell ring.
"Who's there?" he called.
"A woman with food," Gu Dasao replied.
Yue Ho guessed it was she, and opened the gate and let her in. Then he closed it and led her along the corridor. From the pavilion, Bao Ji spotted her.
"Who is that woman?" he yelled. "How dare she deliver food here? 'No outside contact is allowed in prisons' since ancient times."
"She's the Xie brothers' sister. She's bringing them something to eat."
"Don't let her in. Give it to them yourself."
Yue Ho took the food, opened the cell door and handed it to the hunters.
"What we talked about last night, how's it going?" they asked.
"Your cousin is already in. We're just waiting for the others to get set."
Yue Ho opened their fetters. They heard a keeper announcing: "Major Sun is knocking at the gate."
"He's a garrison officer," said Bao Ji. "What does he want in my prison? Don't let him in."
Gu Dasao moved swiftly towards the pavilion.
Outside, someone called: "Major Sun is pounding on the gate."
Angrily, Bao Ji came down from the pavilion.
"Where are my brothers?" Gu Dasao shouted at him. She pulled out two gleaming daggers.
Bao Ji could see that he was in danger, and he started to hurry from the courtyard. He ran right into the Xie brothers, who had dashed out of their cell, the cangues in their hands. Before Bao Ji could defend himself, Xie Zhen struck him heavily with the corner of his cangue, crushing the warden's skull.
Gu Dasao had already stabbed four or five keepers. Yelling, she and the two hunters fought their way out. Sun Li and Sun Xin were at the gate. When they saw four figures emerging, they all went quickly towards the front of the prefectural office. Zou Yuan and Zou Run were just coming out, carrying Clerk Wang's head.
Shouting fiercely, the whole company marched off, those on foot in the lead, Major Sun riding his horse, and arrow fitted to his bow, covering the rear. People along the street closed their doors. No one dared show himself. The prefectural police recognized Major Sun and were afraid to intervene.
Crowded around Sun Li, the party sped through the town gate and went directly to Ten Li Marker. There, Madame Yue was helped onto a cart, Gu Dasao mounted a horse, and the procession continued.
"Why don't we take our revenge on that old crook Squire Mao?" Xie Zhen and Xie Bao proposed.
"A good idea," said Sun Li. To Sun Xin and Yue Ho he said: "Escort the cart and keep going. We'll catch up with you."
The two did as they were instructed. With the Xie brothers, Zou Yuan, Zou Run, and the rest of his cohorts, Sun Li proceeded directly to Squire Mao's Manor. Mao Zhongyi was giving a feast in honor of his father's birthday. They were completely unprepared when a host of bold fellows came charging in, shouting and killing. Squire Mao, his son and their entire family, old and young, were slaughtered. In the bedrooms, the raiders collected gold and silver and other valuables and wrapped them into a dozen bundles. They led out seven or eight good horses from the stable in the rear, and on four of these loaded their loot. Xie Zhen and Xie Bao also selected some fine clothes and put them on. They set fire to the manor and mounted their horses.
Hurrying for thirty /; they caught up with the cart. The whole party then continued together. They took another four or five good horses from a manor house along the way, marching swiftly through the night towards Liangshan Marsh.
In a day or two they reached Shi Yong's tavern. Zou Yuan asked him about Yang Lin and Deng Fei.
"They went with Song Jiang to attack the Zhu Family Manor, but two assaults both failed. I hear that Yang and Deng were captured. I don't know what's become of them. It's said that the three sons of the manor are brave warriors, and that they were helped by their weapons teacher Iron Staff Luan Tingyu, and that's why our two attacks were defeated."

Sun Li laughed. "We plan to join your stronghold, but we haven't shown the slightest merit. Suppose we offer a plan for cracking the manor for you? How will that be as an entrance gift?"
Shi Yong was delighted. "I'll be pleased to hear it."
"Luan and I both learned our skill with arms from the same teacher. We each use weapons in the same way and know the same military arts. If I were to say I was being transferred from the Dengzhou to the Yunzhou army garrison and wanted to drop in to see him while passing by, he surely would invite me in. With me and my party striking from within, and your forces attacking from without, we'd be certain to win. How does that sound?"
While Sun Li was speaking, a junior officer reported: "Our Military Advisor Wu Yong has come down from the mountain and is heading for Zhu Family Manor."
Shi Yong directed the messenger to request the Military Advisor to come and meet the new arrivals. Before the words were out of his mouth, several mounted men trotted up to the tavern. They were Lu Fang, Guo Sheng, and the three Ruan brothers. Behind came Wu Yong, at the head of five hundred troops. Shi Yong escorted the leaders into the tavern, then brought in Sun Li and the others and introduced them. He told of their intention to join the band, and of Sun Li's plan.
Wu Yong was extremely pleased. "Since you bold fellows are willing to join us," he said, "I suggest you don't go up the mountain yet, but come with us to the Zhu Family Manor and carry this meritorious scheme to a successful conclusion. Will that suit you?"
Sun Li and the others gladly consented.
"I will go ahead with my men," said Wu Yong. "You gallants follow after."
Wu Yong went first to Song Jiang's camp, where he found him frowning and depressed. He drank with him to cheer him up and told him the news.
"Shi Yong, Yang Lin and Deng Fei know the major of the Denzhou garrison, Sun Li the Sickly General. He and Luan Tingyu, the weapons instructor in the Zhu Family Manor, both learned from the same teacher. Sun Li is here with seven men to join our band. As an entrance gift he's offering a plan, in which he'll take part, for attacking the manor from within and without. He's on his way here to see you."
Song Jiang soared out of his dark mood to the highest joy. He ordered that wine be prepared and a feast be laid, and waited for his guests. Sun Li told his entourage to find a place to rest. He brought the Xie brothers, the two Zou's, Sun Xin, Gu Dasao and Yue Ho, to call on Song Jiang. After courtesies were exchanged, Song Jiang wined and dined them. Of that we'll say no more.
Wu Yong quietly notified his forces of secret signals. On the third day, they would do this... on the fifth day they would do that... The plans finalized, Sun Li and his party, with their cart, and people on horse and on foot, advanced towards the Zhu Family Manor. To Dai Zong, Wu Yong said, "Please go up to the fortress and bring back four leaders. I need them." Dai Zong departed on his mission that same night. And as a result, new wings were added to the land of the Marsh, and the mountain stronghold changed forever its original garb.

What the Professor told Song Jiang was as follows: "We've an excellent opportunity today because someone recommended by the Guv who wants to join our company is a good friend of that Ironstaff's, besides being an intimate of Panther and Redeye. He knows about your not having managed to capture Zhu Castle, and has offered us this scheme in return for our allowing him to join us, as a joining gift so to speak. He'll soon be here. The plan can be carried out within five days. How about that?"
Song Jiang's face broke into a smile of relief. "That's wonderful!" he said.
Now all this, including the plan itself, you shall hear about, friends, all in good time. Just store it up in your memory, because at the same time as Song Jiang started the attack on Zhu Castle something else had happened. It's awkward to describe a little bit of this and then a little bit of that, so for the moment just keep in mind that there are two themes connected with the storming of Zhu Castle and let us concentrate on this someone wanting to join the company and the business of providing an excellent opportunity. Later we will get back to the other story.
On the coast of Shandong there is a provincial capital called Dengzhou. Outside the city there is a mountain. On this mountain there is an abundance of wild animals, wild boar, wolves, tigers and leopards, which often attack people. For this reason the governor had rounded up hunters and charged each of them with catching a tiger on Dengzhou mountain within a certain time-limit. Village headmen on both sides of the mountain were also roped in and told to catch a tiger within the time-limit or suffer the severest penalties.
Now there were on Dengzhou mountain two hunters who were brothers, the elder called Xie Zhen and the younger Xie Bao. These two brothers both liked to use solid steel tridents and their skill in a fight was truly awesome. The local hunters all reckoned they were the best. The elder was nicknamed Two-headed Snake, the younger Two-tailed Scorpion. They were orphans and unmarried. The elder was tall with a red complexion like a crab-apple, a slender waist and broad shoulders. The younger was tremendous: he was equally tall, and his face was round and very dark. Two flying Rakshasas were tattooed on his legs, and when he was angry he seemed about to leap up to the heavens, or to pluck up trees and shake the mountains.
When these two brothers were presented by the authorities with the unwelcome task, they went home and got out their trap with the poisoned arrow, their crossbows and tridents, dressed themselves up in animal skins and set off, steel tridents in hand, for Dengzhou mountain. There they set their trap and waited for a whole day, but to no avail. They picked up the trap and left. Next day they took some provisions with them, climbed the mountain again and waited. When it began to get dark they set the trap and climbed a tree. They waited till just before dawn, but nothing stirred. They picked up the trap and moved it to the western flank of the mountain. There they waited till it was fully light, but again with no success.
They began to be worried. "The time-limit's only three days," they said to themselves. "If we miss it we'll have to pay the penalty. What are we going to do?"
On the night of the third day, in the small hours, despite their cramped and weary limbs, they fell asleep, leaning back to back. But they had scarcely closed their eyes when there was a sudden sound from the trap. They both leapt up, grabbed their tridents and began to look in all directions. What should they see but a tiger wounded by a poisoned arrow and rolling on the ground! They rushed towards it with their tridents at the ready, but at their approach the beast fled, with the arrow still stuck in it. They gave chase. Nearly halfway round the mountain the poison began to take effect and the tiger, maddened by pain, gave a mighty roar and went plunging down a steep slope.
"That's all right," said Scorpion. "I know this mountain. It'll be in Squire Mao's back garden. Let's go down and ask him to let us get it."
They shouldered their tridents and went down to Squire Mao's house and knocked on the door. It was still early in the morning. They were let in and someone went to tell the master. After a long wait, Squire Mao appeared. The brothers put down their tridents, saluted and said: "It's a long time since we've seen you, sir. We come to greet you."
"But why come so early?" Squire Mao asked. "Is there something you want to say to me?"
Snake said: "Of course we wouldn't dream of disturbing you if there wasn't a reason. We've been ordered by the authorities to catch a tiger, and there's a strict time-limit. We've been lying in wait three days, and this morning at dawn we wounded one, but then suddenly it fell down the mountain and landed in your garden. We were hoping you'd allow us to come in and get it."
"Of course you may, if it fell in my garden," said Squire Mao. "Why don't you just sit down for a bit? I expect you're hungry. Have some breakfast before you go and get the tiger."
He told the servants to get breakfast for them. But when he urged them to have more, they stood up, thanked him and said: "We truly appreciate your kindness, sir. But please would you let us go and get our tiger now?"
"If it's in my garden, what are you worried about?" said the Squire. "Do sit down and have some tea. Time enough to get it afterwards."
The brothers could hardly refuse. They sat down and the servants brought tea for them. At last the Squire said: "Now we'll go and get the tiger." "We are truly grateful," they said.
Squire Mao took them to the back of the house and told a servant to get the key to open the garden door. Try as he would to open it, it wouldn't budge.
"We seldom go into this part of the garden," the Squire said. "I expect the lock is rusty, that's why it won't open. Go and get a hammer to break it open."
The servant brought a hammer and they broke the lock and everyone went into the garden. They searched the whole hillside, but nothing did they find.
"Are you sure you weren't mistaken?" the Squire said to the brothers. "Perhaps you weren't watching carefully. Maybe it didn't fall into my garden."
"How could we be mistaken?" said Snake. "We were born and bred here. We know the district well."
"Well, just go on looking," said the Squire. "If it's here, finish it off and take it away."
"Look at this, brother," cried Scorpion. "There's a patch of grass here that's been rolled completely flat. And look, there's traces of blood. Who says it wasn't here? The Squire's people must have finished it off."
"What are you talking about?" said the Squire. "How would my people even know there was a tiger here, let alone finish it off? You saw for yourselves that we had to break the lock, and we all came in at the same time as you. You're talking absolute nonsense!"
"Just give us back our tiger, sir," said Snake. "So we can take it to the authorities."
"You're both crazy," said the Squire. "Out of the kindness of my heart I offer you breakfast. Then you go and make a false accusation about our stealing your tiger!"
"What false accusation?" said Scorpion. "You are also a headman in your household and the time-limit for catching a tiger applies to you too. Only you haven't the ability to catch one for yourself, so when you see we've got one you decide to take it to get the reward and let us pay the penalty!"
"What's it got to do with me, if you have to pay a penalty?" said the Squire.
Glaring ferociously, Scorpion said: "Do you want us to search the place?"
"This is my house, not yours," said the Squire. "Everyone has a right to privacy. Really! The impudence of these two beggars!"
But Scorpion had already charged into the hall to look. He found nothing. His anger grew inside him and he began to smash everything in sight. Snake likewise pulled out the balustrade and began to hammer things with it.Squire Mao let out a shout: "Help! They've come to rob me in broad daylight!"
The two brothers smashed up all the furniture in the hall and then as the servants were preparing to attack them, strode out of the front door, pointing accusingly and saying: "You've cheated us of a tiger! We'll denounce you to the court!"

At catching beasts, they're most astute;
But the Squire's art is trapping men.
Because a tiger's in dispute,
Mount Liang will take two dragons in.

As they were engaged in this slanging match, some horsemen rode up to the house, followed by a band of men. Snake recognized Squire Mao's son, Mao Zhongyi.
He went over to him and said: "Your people have stolen our tiger, and your father won't give it back. He even wants them to beat us up!"
"They're just an ignorant bunch of peasants," said Mao Zhongyi. "My father must have been deceived by them. Don't be angry. Now I'm home I'll get them to give it back."
The brothers thanked him. He ordered the door to be opened and took them inside. Once they were in, he ordered the doors to be shut and yelled: "Get them!" From the corridors on either side thirty or forty men sprang out, the Squire's retainers plus the group that came with the riders, who turned out to be policemen. The brothers could do nothing. The whole lot fell on them at once and tied them up.
Mao Zhongyi now said: "We shot a tiger yesterday, why did you pretend it was yours? You made it an excuse to come in here looting and destroying our property, what sort of punishment do you suppose that deserves? Well, we're going to hand you over to the court. That'll rid the district of a public menace."
What had happened, of course, was that Mao Zhongyi had already delivered the tiger to the authorities in the early morning, and had returned with a group of policemen to arrest the brothers. The latter, unfortunately for them, had not understood the situation at all and had fallen into his trap. It needs no further explanation. Squire Mao had the steel tridents they had used brought, and a bag of alleged stolen goods; some pieces of broken furniture and other household objects were slung on carrying-poles; the brothers themselves were stripped naked and their hands tied behind their backs. Then the whole lot was sent to the court.
Now in this district there was a clerk of the court called Wang Zheng, who was Squire Mao's son-in-law. Wang had already gone to the magistrate and told him about the case. When the two brothers were brought before the court they were allowed to say nothing in their defence. They were thrown down and beaten, to make them confess that they had cheated over the tiger and that it was all a pretext for them to come armed with tridents to rob the household. Unable to withstand the beating, they were forced to confess to the charges as required. The magistrate ordered them to be fitted with twenty-five catty cangues and thrown into the main prison.
When Squire Mao and his son got back home they considered the affair: "It'll be a problem for us if they release those two fools. Wouldn't it be best to finish them off once and for all, to avoid any further consequences?" So they went back to the government office and made it known to registrar Wang Zheng that they would like him to cut the weeds and pull out the roots so they wouldn't sprout again. They promised they would take care of the magistrate.
The two brothers were assigned to the cells for condemned criminals. They were taken to the central area of the prison, where they met the head warder. This important personage was called Bao Ji. He too had received silver from Squire Mao and had Wang's instructions to finish them off. He was already sitting in the centre of the hall. The junior warder said to them: "Go and kneel down there in front of him, quickly."
"You're supposed to be some kind of two-headed snake and two-tailed scorpion, is that it?" Bao Ji roared at them.
"People have given us some such nicknames," said Snake. "But we've never done any kind of harm to innocent people."
"Well you two animals are in my hands now, and I know how to turn a two-headed snake into a one-headed snake, and a two-tailed scorpion into a one-tailed scorpion! I've got you here in my prison now."
When the junior warder took them to their cell, he looked around to see there was no one and then said: "Do you recognize me? I'm your elder brother's brother-in-law!"
Snake said: "There's only the two of us. We haven't got an elder brother."
The warder said: "Surely you are brothers of Colonel Sun?"
Snake said: "Colonel Sun's younger brother is married to a cousin on my father's side. But I've never met you. Are you by any chance Yue Ho?"
"That's right, I'm Yue Ho. I'm from Maozhou. My family moved here, and my elder sister became Colonel Sun's wife. I got a job here as a warder. I've a good singing voice, so people call me Lungs. My brother-in-law taught me some tricks with the staff, because he saw I had an aptitude for martial arts." There's a poem to say what Yue Ho is like:

He's smart and he's stylish, his get-up is choice;
He's as lucid a speaker as any on earth.
They call him the Lungs for the power of his voice:
Quick-witted Yue Ho is a hero from birth.

This Lungs was indeed quick and ingenious. He knew every kind of weapon, for whatever he studied he could master. He never did anything by halves. As for the art of staff and spear, he loved it like sugar and honey. He could see that Snake and Scorpion were good fellows and he was determined to help them, only you can't make cloth from a single thread, nor can you clap with one hand. The most he could do on his own was give them some information.
So he said: "There's something I think you ought to know: Chief Warder Bao has been taking money from Squire Mao. It must mean they want to finish you off. Do you have any useful connections?"
Snake said: "Well, now you've mentioned him there's Colonel Sun — if you would approach him, I could give you a letter to take."
Lungs said: "Who should I give the letter to?"
"Like I said, there's this cousin of ours, on our father's side, who's the wife of Colonel Sun's younger brother. She lives outside the east gate, at the third milestone. Although she's really a cousin, we call her Auntie Gu. She runs an inn, but it's also a butcher's and a gambling house. Auntie Gu is a match for twenty or thirty men. Her husband, Sun Xin, is skilled in fighting, but even he can't get the better of her. She's the one person we really get on with. Actually our mother also was the aunt of Colonel Sun and his brother, so they're cousins on our mother's side too. If you would be so good as to secretly carry a letter to her explaining our situation, I'm sure she will come to the rescue."
After hearing all this Lungs said: "No need to worry now friends." He first went and got some provisions — pancakes and meat — and went back to give them to the brothers. Then on the pretext of having some business to see to he locked up, asked another gaoler to keep the door, and set off towards the third milestone outside the east gate. He soon came to an inn. Carcasses of buffalo and sheep were hanging outside the door. Inside, in an inner room, a group of men were gambling. There was a woman sitting at the counter. Here's what she looked like:
Thick eyebrows and big eyes, a chubby round face, a whole headful of outlandish hairpins and rings, together with a couple of quite fashionable bracelets. Sometimes when she's angry she pulls up one of the rails from the well and beats her old man about the head with it. When something really sets her off, she grabs a stone awl and raps the servants' legs. This one was not born to handle a needle and thread: she has turned staff and spear play into woman's work.
Lungs went right in, saluted Auntie Gu and said: "Is this the Sun's?"
Auntie Gu replied cheerfully: "It certainly is. Do you want to drink wine or buy some meat? If you want to gamble, it's in the back."
"I am the younger brother of Colonel Sun's wife. Yue Ho is my name."
Auntie Gu looked pleased. "So it's cousin Yue Ho! I should have known. You're just like sister-in-law. Do please come in and have some tea."
Lungs followed her into the inn and took the guest's seat. Auntie Gu started the conversation: "I've heard that you have a job in the capital. I'm afraid we're worked off our feet here and never have any free time, or we would have tried to see you. What wind blows you here today?"
"I wouldn't have disturbed you either, if I didn't have some important business. We have just received two criminals who happen to have been sentenced by the court. I didn't know them before, but I have heard a lot about them. One is Xie Zhen, the Two-headed Snake, the other is Xie Bao, the Two-tailed Scorpion."
"They are my relatives," Aunie Gu said. "Whatever have they done to be sent to prison?"
"They shot a tiger and a rich man, Squire Mao, stole it. He turned the truth upside down, making them out to be thieves who had broken into his house, and handed them over to the court. He gave bribes to all and sundry and intends sooner or later to have prison Chief Warder Bao do them in and that'll be that. I saw at once it's a serious business and quite beyond my powers to help them by myself. But for the sake of family ties and even more importantly for the sake of justice, I had to let them know how things stood. They said you were the only one who can save them. But unless you act quickly and decisively, it's going to be impossible to get them out of it."
Auntie Gu responded by expressing her shock, but at the same time she sent some of her people to tell her husband to return home urgently to discuss things. They soon found him and brought him back to meet Lungs.
A poem describes Sun Xin's qualities:

Of fighters the finest,
With bearing most martial,

Penglai now his home,
And Hainan his birthplace.
Endowed with high spirit
And an amazon for mate,
The strength of two dragons,
The Still but a young man,
They call him Blackface.

This Sun Xin, or Blackface to give him his popular name, was born in Hainan, to a well-known military family. The father being posted to Dengzhou, the sons grew up there. Blackface was tall and strong. He had learnt all his elder brother's skills, and like him was pretty useful with the spear and whip, which is why people compared him to the black-faced warrior, whose image guards the doors of courtrooms. Auntie Gu related what she had heard to Blackface.

Blackface said to Lungs: "In that case you'd better go back there at once. Whilst they're in the prison we need you to keep an eye on things. My wife and I will try to work out a long-term solution. We'll come and find you afterwards."

Lungs said: "If I can be of use in any way, I promise to do my utmost."

Auntie Gu brought wine for them and then took out a quantity of small change which she gave to Lungs, saying: "Please would you take this and share it among the people at the gaol so that they will treat my cousins well."

Lungs took the money and thanked her and then went back to the gaol to distribute it. Of this no more.

As for Auntie Gu and Blackface, here is how their discussion went.

"What's your plan to save my cousins?" Auntie Gu asked.

"That Squire Mao has money and influence," said Blackface. "If he's had your cousins thrown into prison it won't end there. He'll definitely want to destroy them; they're certain to die under his orders. It's going to be difficult to save them, unless we can get them out of the prison."

"Let's go then, right away," said Auntie Gu.

"My goodness, you are impetuous! We've got to plan ahead. Once we get them out of gaol, there's got to be some route for them to take. Unless my elder brother helps us, and a couple of others, the thing's not going to work."

"Who are these others?" Auntie Gu asked.

"They're an uncle and nephew, a pair of fanatical gamblers called Zou Yuan and Zou Run. I have just seen them in Dengyun Mountain valley, where they've collected together a band of robbers. They're good friends of mine, and with their help I think we can manage it."

"That's not far," said Auntie Gu. "You'd better go tonight and ask them to come here and discuss it."

"I'll go right away," said Blackface. "You can prepare some food and drink while I go and invite them here."

Auntie Gu told her people to kill a pig, prepare some plates of dried fruit to accompany the wine, and set the tables. Blackface returned at dusk with a pair of stalwarts in tow. The senior was called Zou Yuan and he was from Laizhou. From his youth he had loved gambling and had grown up somewhat idle, but he was loyal and generous and he had, what is more, notable martial skills and a proud spirit: he wouldn't give way to anyone. Among the rivers and lakes he was known as the Forester. The second, who was his nephew, was called Zou Run. He was about the same age as his uncle, and both men were about equal in a fight. He was tall and well built. He had a strange birthmark: a prominent lump on the top of his head. Due to this people called him Rhinoceros. He was very much inclined to pick a fight with people. When angry he would butt people with his head. Once he actually butted a pine tree standing beside a mountain stream and knocked it down, to the amazement of the onlookers.

Auntie Gu asked them to come inside and sit down. She told them what had happened, and they discussed plans for breaking into the gaol.

The Forester said: "Although I've got around ninety men, there are only about twenty I have confidence in. If we do this, it won't be safe to stay around here afterwards. I've got somewhere to go to — I've been intending to go for quite a while. Would you two be prepared to go with me?"

Auntie Gu said: "I'll go anywhere with you, so long as we can rescue my cousins."

"They're doing extremely well at the moment in the Marshes of Mount Liang," the Forester said. "Song Jiang welcomes good people into the company. I know three people there under his command: one is Panther Yang Lin, another is Deng Fei or Redeye and the third is Shi Yong, the Guv. They've all been members for some time. How d'you say if after rescuing your cousins we all go and join the company on Mount Liang?"

"That's fine," said Auntie Gu. "If there's anyone who doesn't want to, I'll take my spear and stick it through him myself."

"There's just one thing," said the Forester. "If we get them out, there are government troops in Dengzhou and I'm afraid they're going to come after us. What are we going to do about that?"

"My brother is commander of the troops in Dengzhou," said Blackface. "He's the only one in the city that really counts for anything right now. Every time bandits have approached, he's always been the one that routed them. He's made a name for himself. Tomorrow I'll go and ask him to join us. If he agrees there'll be no problem."

The Forester said: "But he might object to becoming an outlaw."

"I know how to persuade him," said Blackface.

They went on drinking half the night and slept till it was daylight. Then, having persuaded the two outlaws to stay, Blackface told a servant to get a couple of others and a cart and go to the barracks in town and ask for his brother, Colonel Sun, and his sister-in-law, Mrs. Yue. They were to give them this message: "Our mistress is gravely ill, please come back to see her."

"Say only that I'm gravely ill and have something important to tell them," Auntie Gu admonished them. "Say they must come because it may be their last chance to hear what I have to say."

The servants went off, pushing the cart. Blackface placed himself in front of the door, to await his brother. At supper time the cart was seen approaching, bearing Mrs. Yue. Behind came Colonel Sun on horseback and a dozen or so soldiers, all heading for the third milestone. Blackface went inside to tell Auntie Gu. "My brother and sister-in-law are coming," he said.

"Do exactly as I said," said Auntie Gu.

Blackface went out to receive the visitors. He invited his sister-in-law to leave the cart and step inside to see his sick wife.

Colonel Sun dismounted and strode through the gate. He made an impressive figure: pale yellowish complexion, cheeks adorned with a luxuriant growth of whiskers, immense stature. His true name was Sun Li, but he was also nicknamed the Bilious Marshal, on account of his colour. He was a fine shot with the bow and a masterful horseman; his weapons were the long spear and a long steel whip, which now hung from his wrist, supple as a jointed bamboo and deadly as the gleam in a tiger's eye. Barbarians on distant shores surrendered the moment they saw him.

"What exactly is the matter with my sister-in-law?" he asked as he entered.

"Her illness is very strange, please come inside and talk," Blackface replied. He told some of his people to take the soldiers to the back and give them something to eat and drink, and to look after the Colonel's horse. Then he ushered his brother and sister-in-law into an inner room and asked them to be seated. After a little while he said: "Brother and sister-in-law, please come to see my wife."

They followed him into the sickroom, but there they found no patient. "But where is she?" Colonel Sun asked. As he spoke Auntie Gu entered the room, with the Forester and Rhinoceros at her heels. Colonel Sun asked: "Goodness me, is there really something the matter with you, sister-in-law?"

"Greetings, brother-in-law," she said. "I am infected with a need to rescue my cousins."

"How extraordinary!" said Colonel Sun. "To rescue what cousins?"

"It's no good pretending to be deaf and dumb," she said. "You're there in the city, you don't mean to say you don't know those two are my cousins, and therefore relatives of yours too?"

"I really don't understand," said Colonel Sun. "What two are you talking about?"

"With all due respect," she said, "I have to speak bluntly because it's so urgent. Those two, Xie Zhen and Xie Bao, Snake and Scorpion, have fallen into a trap set by Squire Mao of Dengyun Mountain and the clerk of the court, Wang, who are plotting against their lives. I have just made a plan with these two gentlemen, to go to town and break into the gaol to rescue them. After that we'll all go to Mount Liang and join the outlaws. I'm afraid there's going to be a big to-do, and you may well be implicated. That's why I pretended to be ill, so I could get you here and tell you the whole story. If you don't want to go with us we shall go to Mount Liang on our own. But the way things are nowadays at court, those who clear off escape without consequences, whereas those who remain pay the penalty. As the proverb says: 'Who's closest to the fire is the first to get burnt.' If you get sentenced and sent to prison because of us, there won't be anyone to take you food or look after you. So what do you propose to do?"

Colonel Sun said: "But I am an officer of the Dengzhou army, how can I do something like that!"

"If you won't, then it's got to be either you or me," she said, producing two swords that were by her side. At the same time the Forester and Rhinoceros drew their short swords.

"Wait, sister-in-law!" Colonel Sun cried. "Don't be so hasty. Wait till I've had a chance to consider all the consequences. I must think it over." Mrs. Yue, frightened out of her wits, went on screaming for a long time.

Auntie Gu said: "If you refuse to come with us, send sister-in-law away first, then we can get down to it."

Colonel Sun said: "If that's what we're going to do, let me go home first and pack some things and check up on what you told me, before we set out."

"Brother-in-law, it was one of your Yue relations who told us all this. Whilst we go and break into the gaol, you can go and do your packing, but make it quick."

Colonel Sun took a deep breath and said: "If this is what you've all decided, I don't see how I can refuse. I don't see why I should have to pay the penalty afterwards instead ofyou. Okay, okay, okay, let's just make our plans and then go."

The Forester was first told to go back to the camp on Dengyun Mountain to collect his valuables and horses, and bring the twenty or so men who were trustworthy to join them at the inn. When he had left, Blackface was sent into town to ask Lungs for the latest news. He would agree a time with Lungs for the raid, and ask him to secretly inform Snake and Scorpion.

Next day when the Forester had collected some money from his camp he returned with his men to lend a hand. There were also seven or eight trusted servants at Blackface's, so that together with the twenty soldiers Colonel Sun had brought they now had a force of more than forty. Blackface slaughtered two pigs and a sheep and everyone feasted. Auntie Gu, having concealed a sharp knife on her person and dressed herself up as a serving woman, left first. Blackface with Colonel Sun and the Forester with his nephew Rhinoceros made up two parties, each accompanied by the men they had brought. Then it was:

Hunting a tiger becomes tiger-hunting;
Wicked officials had better watch their step.
Hard iron cuts through the effects of bribery
An attack on the gaol takes the lid off the pot.

Back in Dengzhou gaol, Chief Warder Bao, bribed with Squire Mao's gifts, was continuing to do all he could to bring about the death of the two brothers. Lungs, meanwhile, was standing staff of office in hand beside the stone lion at the prison gate, when someone rang the bell. "Who is it?" he asked.

"The woman with the food," Auntie Gu replied.

After taking a look, Lungs opened the gate to let Auntie Gu in. He closed it behind her and led her down the corridor. Chief Warder Bao, who was sitting in the central pavilion, saw them and shouted: "Who is that woman? Who told her she could bring food in here? Nothing is supposed to get in here, not even the wind."

"It's a relative of Snake's and Scorpion's. She's bringing food for them."

"Don't let her into the cell," Chief Warder Bao bellowed. "You people take the stuff in yourselves."

Lungs took the food from her. He opened the cell door and gave it to the brothers. "That business you told us about yesterday," they asked, "how did it go?"

"Your cousin has come," he said. "You'll see her soon." He unlocked their fetters for them. At this moment another underling ran in and reported: "Colonel Sun is at the gate, he wants to come in."

"He's the garrison commander," Bao said. "What the devil is he doing in my prison? Don't open."

Auntie Gu now wandered into the central pavilion. Outside someone was shouting: "Colonel Sun is getting impatient. He keeps banging on the door."

Chief Warder Bao angrily started to go out. Shouting "Where are my brothers?" Auntie Gu drew out two gleaming knives. Bao realized trouble was coming and started to run for it. The brothers had lifted off their cangues and slipped out of their cell. They ran straight into the Chief Warder. Bao had no time to react. With one blow of the cangue, Scorpion smashed in his skull. Meanwhile Auntie Gu had got to work and had stuck four or five gaolers through. All shouting together they fought their way out of the gaol. Outside Colonel Sun and Blackface had stopped two of the guards escaping, but four others emerged and went racing off towards the government offices. But the Forester and Rhinoceros were just emerging from the government offices holding up the head of Wang, the clerk of the court. People fled screaming from the streets, as Colonel Sun rode out, grasping his bow with an arrow fitted and ready. The householders had all bolted their doors and didn't dare venture out. None of the policemen, when they saw it was Colonel Sun, had a mind to interfere. The Colonel, with his men around him, charged out of the city gates and headed for the third milestone. Mrs. Yue was helped into a cart, Auntie Gu mounted a horse, and they were ready to start. But Snake and Scorpion said: "How can we let that villain Squire Mao get away with such an injustice and not pay him back?"

"You're right," said Colonel Sun. He told his brother, Blackface, and Lungs to go on ahead, escorting the cart and said the rest of them would catch them up later. Blackface and Lungs accordingly set off, escorting the cart.

Led by Colonel Sun, Snake and Scorpion, together with the Forester and Rhinoceros and half the troops, rode towards Squire Mao's. It so happened that Mao Zhongyi and his father were having a drink in celebration of the latter's birthday, so they were totally unprepared. With ferocious yells the party charged inside and killed everyone, Squire Mao, his son, and all the household, young and old. Not a soul was left living. In a bedroom they discovered a dozen bags of gold and silver and valuables, and from the stables they took seven or eight good horses, and four pack horses. Snake and Scorpion picked out some good clothes for themselves, and then they set fire to the manor and burnt it down. Then they mounted again. Within ten miles they had caught up with the cart and its escort, and they all rode on together. From landowners along the way they took four or five more horses. They continued on towards Mount Liang by night.

There are some lines which say:

On the one hand loyalty, virtue and independence of spirit; on the other hand debauchery, venality and unpatriotic behaviour. Evil natures, vile fortune and abuse of office heap sorrows upon good men. A shameful plot to steal a tiger gives rise to a scheme to break open the gaol. In a trice the city's bitterness turns to a sea of corpses.

In a few days they reached the Guv's inn. When the Forester saw the Guv he asked about Panther and Redeye. The Guv informed him how Song Jiang had gone to attack Zhu Castle and they had both gone with him. Two attempts to take the castle had failed, and it had been reported that Panther and Redeye had both been taken captive there, but it was not known what had become of them. He also told how the three Brothers Zhu were said to be assisted by an instructor known as Ironstaff, which was why the second attempt had failed. Colonel Sun grinned broadly when he heard this. "We have all come here because we want to join the company, but since we have done nothing to win acceptance, I'd like to offer you a plan for taking Zhu Castle. Do you think this could be our joining present?"

The Guv was delighted. "I can't wait to hear this plan," he said.

"That Ironstaff," Colonel Sun began, "had the same arms instructor as I did. All that I learnt about spearsmanship he knows too; all that he learnt about martial arts, I know through and through. Now, suppose we say we are a company that has been posted from Dengzhou to the garrison at Yunzhou and that I wanted to see him as we pass through. He is bound to come out and receive me. When we get inside I'll get him to collaborate and that will settle the whole thing. How about that?"

Colonel Sun had hardly finished explaining his plan to the Guv when a guard appeared and reported: "The Professor is coming down the mountain on his way to Zhu Castle to reinforce our troops."

As soon as he heard this the Guv told the man to go back quickly and ask the Professor to come and see them. Before he'd even finished speaking, a body of troops halted in front of the inn: they were led by the Halberdier, the Little Duke and the three Ruan brothers. Immediately behind them was the Professor, with five hundred troops, cavalry and foot. The Guv took them into the inn and introduced everyone, explaining that they wanted to join the company and were presenting a plan.

The Professor was delighted. "Since you are all prepared to join us in the mountain stronghold, I suggest that instead of going up the mountain right now, you be so good as to come with us to Zhu Castle so we may bring this meritorious business to a successful conclusion. What do you say?"

Colonel Sun and the rest of his party were happy to agree to this.

The Professor said: "I shall start at once. Let this be our plan: my troops will go first and you will all follow on behind as quickly as possible."

Accordingly the Professor reached Song Jiang's camp first. He found Song Jiang's plunged in gloom, his expression morose. The Professor produced some wine to lighten his comrade's mood and then told him what the Guv, Panther and Redeye all knew, that Colonel Sun, commander of the Dengzhou garrison and the Zhu Castle arms instructor, Ironstaff, both had the same master; and that the eight leaders who would be arriving shortly wanted to join the company of Mount Liang, and were offering to set up this scheme as their joining present. It had been decided to launch a conspiracy within the castle and after the business had been settled this way they would come to meet Song Jiang. When he had heard all this through, Song Jiang's joy knew no bounds, his gloom evaporated. He immediately ordered wine to be prepared to welcome the newcomers.

Colonel Sun ordered his company, with the cart, the troops and the horses, to halt somewhere and wait while he himself took Snake, Scorpion, the Forester, Rhinoceros, Blackface, Auntie Gu and Lungs, a party of eight, to see Song Jiang. After the greeting ceremonies, Song Jiang offered them all wine and a banquet. Of this no more.

The Professor gave everyone secret orders: what to do on the third day, what to do on the fifth day and so on. When they all had their orders, Colonel Sun and the others left as had been agreed, with the cart, troops and horses in a long line, heading for Zhu Castle to set the plan in motion. Meanwhile the Professor said, "I want the Magic Messenger to go to the mountain stronghold and fetch four of the leaders for me. I've some urgent business for them." If he had not sent the Magic Messenger post haste to the mountain to fetch these 4, things would have been very different:

In the Marshes, they'd have had to grow new wings;
Many a post would have fallen vacant on the Mountain.

"THE favorable opportunity lies in this," said Wu Yong, "that our Shi Yong has introduced to our band a man who is a personal friend of Luan Tingyu of the Zhu Family Village. This new recruit knows that you did not succeed in attacking this village, and has suggested a plan of attack. He is now on his way here and in five days his plan will be carried out. What do you think of that?"

Song Jiang was much pleased upon hearing this.

Now at Dengzhou in Shandong there were two hunters Xie Zhen and Xie Bao who were very skillful in the use of the trident. Of all the hunters in that district they were the best. Xie Zhen was known as "Double Headed Snake," while Xie Bao had a nickname "Double Tailed Scorpion." Both of them had neither father, mother, or wife. They were both over seven feet in height, had broad shoulders, small ordinary waists, and brown complexions. Xie Bao had a rough temper, and at times would "shake heaven and earth."
The officials had issued a proclamation that the hunters would be held responsible for killing the tigers in Dengzhou, and if they did not kill the tigers in due time they would be punished. These two hunters had received the order and had prepared poisoned arrows, and then proceeding to the mountains where the tigers were known to be they hid themselves in a tree to wait for the tiger. After waiting there a whole day they returned home without having seen or even heard the tiger. They did this again the following day with the same result. At about 3 A.M. on the third day they again waited in a tree and were so tired that they leaned against each other and fell asleep. They had not yet closed their eyes when they were awakened by a sound of their trap, and springing up they looked around, and saw a big tiger writhing on the ground with the poisoned arrow sticking in its body. Seizing their tridents they ran forward, but the tiger seeing the hunters ran off carrying the poisoned arrow in its body. They followed it. The poison however was taking effect, and very soon the tiger roared loudly and sinking to the ground rolled down the hillside.
Xie Bao recognized the place down below as the garden of an Old Mao. They went down the hillside, and knocked at the door of the farmstead. It was now daylight and upon being admitted they explained to Old Mao that they had come to take the tiger in his garden they had shot that morning. Old Mao agreed to this, but as he was afraid they were hungry after their nights work he invited them to take food and wine with him, and then go and look for the wounded tiger. They agreed to this and after the meal Old Mao took two of his men, and went with the hunters into the garden, but although they looked everywhere they found no tiger. Old Mao suggested that the hunters had made a mistake as there was no tiger. Xie Bao, however, pointed to a spot where the grass had all been leveled, and there were marks of blood of the tiger on the ground. "It looks as though someone had moved away the tiger," he said.
"Do not make such statements," said Old Mao. "My farm servants did not know anything about a tiger being here, so how could they have had anything to do in the matter? You noticed that when we entered the garden the lock on the gate was rusty and we had to break open the gate. I also came with you to look for the tiger."
"Sir, you must hand the tiger over to us so that we can take it to the yamen and get the reward."
"What you say is quite unreasonable," said Old Mao. "Your statements are not correct in suggesting that I have taken the tiger away."
"Why should we make false charges?" asked Xie Bao. "Evidently you have taken the tiger, and sent it to the yamen so as to get the reward yourself. We shall be beaten by the magistrate."
"That is not my business," said Old Mao.
"Well, will you let us search your buildings?"
"I cannot agree to that. You, a couple of beggars, now have no decency," said Old Mao.
The brothers became angry, and began to damage his things by force.
Old Mao called out: "The Xies are plundering in broad daylight!" Seeing that an ambush was lying in the farmstead, the brothers left the yard saying that they would bring a charge against him in the yamen. They had not gone far when they saw the son of Old Mao on horseback with a group of men, and upon their explaining what had happened he said that some mistake had been made, and asked them to go back to the farmstead with him. They agreed to do this, but upon getting inside the gate of the farmyard the brothers were seized by the farm laborers by order of the son.
The son then said that the previous day they had shot a tiger themselves. He would hand the hunters over to the yamen for making false claims and trying to make trouble.
Old Mao had the brothers bound with ropes, and sent them to the yamen for trial. At the yamen the case was dealt with by a recorder named Wang Zheng who was a son-in-law of Old Mao, and he reported the case to the Prefect who ordered the two brothers to be beaten for making false claims. In order to avoid the punishment the brothers made a forced confession. They were then put under heavy cangues and sent to prison. Old Mao and his son talked matters over, and agreed that they could not feel safe until the hunters died in prison so they went to see Wang Zheng, and said they wished the case dealt with more thoroughly, and were willing to bribe the Prefect themselves.
The jailer Bao Ji was also bribed with the request to kill the two prisoners. But the under-jailer was a cousin by marriage to the Xies and disclosed the plot against the brothers, although they had never met before. The name of the jailer was Yue He, and his nickname was "Iron Flute." He was well skilled in all military drill, and also in the use of the spear. He knew that the prisoners were good men suffering from gross injustice, so he decided to assist them in escaping. He told them that the head jailer had received a bribe to put them to death. Xie Zhen then asked the under-jailer to take a letter to his aunt's daughter, married to Sun Xin, who was called Sister-in-law Gu Dasao, and who kept an inn outside the East Gate. She was very kind to both the prisoners, and upon the matter being explained to her she would make arrangements to rescue them.
Yue He agreed to do this and asking another under-jailer to take his duty he slipped out of the prison, and duly told Gu Dasao, the "Tigress," the story, and asked her to rescue the two prisoners.
She considered the situation bad, and sent a servant for her husband Sun Xin whose nickname was "Young General." This was a powerful man, very skillful with the iron bludgeon and the spear. He soon arrived, and upon being informed of the trouble he asked Yue He to return to the jail, and they would think of some plan of helping the prisoners to escape. He gave Yue He some money to distribute among the other jailers, and the latter then went back to the jail.
Sun Xin said that to rescue the prisoners he must go to bring two of his friends. He went straight away, and that evening returned with them. One was Zou Yuan, noted for his honesty and generosity. Because of his fearless disposition he was called the "Forest Dragon." The other one was Zou Run, the "Horned Dragon," and he got this nickname through once having knocked down a fir tree with his head. Zou Run upon hearing the details said he had only twenty loyal followers and after attacking the jail and releasing the two prisoners, the district would not be safe for them to stay in and they must all of them make straight for the refuge at Liangshan Marsh. He said he knew the leaders at that place.
Gu Dasao thought it an excellent plan, and said she would kill any man who would not go with them.
"But there is still one doubtful point," said Zou Run. "If we are pursued by cavalry what shall we do?"
Sun Xin said he had a plan and the next day he went to see his elder brother Major Sun Li who had charge of the cavalry in the town, and by threatening to use force Gu Dasao, the "Tigress," made him agree to join with them in their plots, and afterwards go with them to Liangshan Marsh.
The following day Yue He was near the entrance to the jail when he heard the doorbell ringing. He asked who was there, and Gu Dasao gave her name, and said she had brought some food for a prisoner. He knew her object, and admitted her. The jailer Bao Ji had been liberally bribed by Old Mao, and when he was told by Yue He that the woman was a relative of Xie Zhen and Xie Bao, and had brought food for them, he said the food must be left at the gate to be sent in to the prisoners. So Yue He took the food into the inner prison, and handed it to the two prisoners. He told them who had brought it, and said they would soon meet her. He then unlocked the bolt which fastened them to their beds. Just then he heard at the gate an attendant jailer report that Major Sun was at the gate waiting to enter. The jailer Bao Ji replied, "He is in command of troops. What does he want in my prison? Don't open the door."
Now Madame Sun had got near Bao Ji. Again a voice outside the room called out, "Major Sun is outside, and insists upon being admitted."
Jailer Bao Ji was very annoyed at this, and came out of the room. Gu Dasao asked him in a loud voice, "Where are my brothers?" She took two swords out of her belt, and threatened jailer Bao Ji. He understood the situation, and walked away. He had not gone far before he met the two prisoners Xie Zhen and Xie Bao who had both got rid of their cangues. Jailer Bao Ji was unarmed, and picking up a piece of cangue Xie Bao hit him on the head, and brained him. Gu Dasao had already killed about three jailers and now joined the two prisoners and Yue He. Going to the prison gate they opened it, and they all set off. The people closed their doors, and those policemen or soldiers who were about, seeing Major Sun in charge of the party, did not dare even ask a question. The party duly left the town, and reached Major Sun's home.
There Major Sun's wife got in a cart, and Gu Dasao mounted a horse. Sun Xin and Yue He went with the women as guard while Major Sun, Xie Zhen, Xie Bao, Zou Yuan, Zou Run, and the men went off in another direction to have revenge on Old Mao who was the cause of all this trouble. Upon reaching the farm they killed him and his son, and then took all the valuables available. They found eight horses in the stables, and loaded four of them with the valuables, and saddled the others for riding. They then set fire to the farm buildings.
They soon caught up to the cart, and all proceeded on their way to Liangshan Marsh.
Upon reaching the inn kept by Shi Yong they were told of the defeat at the Zhu Family Village and that the enemy had three great warriors on their side.
When Major Sun heard this he laughed, and said, "We are going to join these heroes, but we have not done any meritorious service yet. But if we now go and help in the attack on that village we shall be in a much better position to be admitted to Liangshan Marsh. Now I know all the same military drill as Luan Tingyu, as he and I were taught by the same teacher in those matters. I will go and say that I was just passing his village on official business, and he will admit me. While inside we can easily act in concert with the heroes outside." He had hardly finished saying this when a man reported that Wu Yong was leaving Liangshan Marsh to go to join Song Jiang. Shi Yong at once told the man to ask Wu Yong to come immediately to that inn as there was a very important matter for discussion. This was done, and very soon Wu Yong arrived with about five hundred men.
After the strangers had been introduced by Shi Yong and their object explained, Wu Yong was pleased, and urged that they should at once join with them in an attack on the Zhu Family Village. As they agreed to this he said that he would ride in advance, and announce the arrangement to Song Jiang and the other leaders. Upon arriving at the camp he found Song Jiang with a melancholy expression. He told him of the new recruits, and mentioned that one of them Major Sun was taught by the same teacher as Luan Tingyu of the opponent village, and that he was prepared to enter that village as a friend, but would act in concert with the attackers outside.
Song Jiang was much pleased to hear of this, and ordered a feast for the new recruits.
Wu Yong arranged the plans, and explained them to the leaders under strict secrecy. Having received the instructions, Major Sun departed with the new recruits for the Zhu Family Village while Dai Zong was instructed to go to Liangshan Marsh to bring four other leaders.

The eagle old on Liangshan Marsh
Receives new wings to help its flight;
At the mountain stronghold
A renovation will be in sight.

148
The Professor Wu Yong Uses & carries out a Double Linked Plan; Song Jiang's 3rd Attack on the Zhu Family Manor/Castle & Village

"I want Ironclad Virtue Pei Xuan, the Master Hand Xiao Rang, Hou Jian the Long-Armed Ape and the Jade-Armed Craftsman Jin Dajian," said Wu Yong. "Tell them to bring their tools and come down the mountain tonight. I need them."
Dai Zong departed.
A soldier posted outside the camp entered and reported: "Hu Cheng, from the Hu Family Manor in the west, is here with gifts of cattle and wine. He asks to see you."
Song Jiang said to invite him in. Hu Cheng approached the tent in the center of camp, kowtowed, and offered a sincere plea.
"My sister is young and untutored. In a moment of rudeness she offended you and your generals captured her. I'm here to beg forgiveness. It is because she has been pledged to a son of the Zhu Family that she displayed a misplaced valor and landed in captivity. If you will release her, whatever you require you have only to command and I will deliver."
"Please be seated," said Song Jiang. "That Zhu Family are boors. They're always picking on the people of our mountain stronghold. For that reason we've come with armed forces to avenge ourselves. We have nothing against the Hu Family. Your sister and her men seized our Stumpy Tiger Wang. And so we returned the compliment and captured her. Give Wang back to us and you can have your sister."
"Though we didn't expect it, the Zhu Family have already taken him."
"Where is he now?" Wu Yong asked.
"Locked up in their manor. I don't dare ask for him."
"If you don't return the Stumpy Tiger, how can we release your sister?" Song Jiang said.
"Don't talk like that, brother," Wu Yong urged. "Let me say a few words. Sooner or later the Zhu Family is going to have an alarm. Don't send people from your manor to help them. If any of them try to take refuge with you, tie them up and bring them here. When you do that, we'll return your sister. She's not in this camp. We sent her to our mountain fortress the other day and entrusted her to the care of Squire Song. You needn't worry. We have a plan."
"I wouldn't dare go to the aid of the Zhu Family. Should any of their people seek refuge with me, I'll bind them and bring them here to you."
"If you do that," said Song Jiang, "it will be worth more to us than any gold or brocade."
Hu Cheng thanked them and left.
We'll tell now of Sun Li who changed his banner to read: Sun Li Major of the Dengzhou Garrison. He arrived at the rear gate of the Zhu Family Manor with his company of men and horses. The soldiers on the walls, seeing the banner, reported to their leaders.
"He's like a brother to me. Since childhood we learned to play with weapons from the same teacher," Luan Tingyu said to the three sons of the Zhu Family. "I wonder what he's doing here."
Luan opened the manor gate, lowered the drawbridge, and rode out with twenty men to welcome him. Sun Li and his company dismounted. They exchanged greetings.
"I thought you're with the Dengzhou garrison," said Luan. "What are you doing in these parts?"
"The high command has transferred me here to Yunzhou Prefecture to defend the cities and town against the bandits of Liangshan Marsh. We were passing by and I knew that you were with the Zhu Family Manor, so I came to see how you are. We intended to approach your front gate, but the village entry was full of troops and cavalry. I didn't want to disturb them. I came along the paths through the hamlets to the rear gate to pay my respects."
"We've had one clash after another with those bandits the last few days. We've already caught several of their leaders. When we get Song Jiang, their chief, we'll turn them all over to the authorities. How fortunate we are that you've come to protect us! You'll be like 'flowery stitches on brocade,' like 'rain to parched sprouts.' "
Sun Li smiled. "I have no talent. But I can assist you to nab those rogues, so that your worthy goal will be achieved."
Luan was delighted. He led them into the manor, pulled up the drawbridge and bolted the gate. Sun Li and his party changed into fresh clothes and were presented in the main hall to Lord Zhu and his three sons. After courtesies were exchanged, Luan addressed Zhu: "My brother Sun Li is known as the Sickly General. He was major of the Dengzhou garrison, but the high command has just transferred him here to protect Yunzhou."
"I too shall be under your supervision," said Lord Zhu.
"Scarcely that, with my lowly rank. I shall be looking forward to constant enlightenment by you, and your instructions."
The three sons invited the guests to be seated.
"You must be weary, after several days of fighting," Sun Li said to them.
"There's been no decisive battle as yet," said the Dragon. "But you brothers must be tired from your long journey in the saddle."
Sun Li instructed his wife and Gu Dasao to go to the rear chambers and pay their respects to the female members of the household. Then he summoned Sun Xin, Xie Zhen and Xie Bao, and presented them.
"These three are my brothers," he said. He pointed at Yue Ho. "This is the officer sent from Yunzhou to fetch me." Indicating Zou Yuan and Zou Run, he said: "These two are army officers from Dengzhou."
Zhu and his three sons were clever. But Sun Li had come with women and children, luggage and carts. What's more, he was an old friend of Luan Tingyu. Why should they suspect him? They ordered that cows and horses be slaughtered and a feast be laid, after which the guests were wined and dined.
A day or two later a soldier of the manor reported: "Song Jiang is sending another force against us."
"I'll go and take that robber personally," said Tiger Cub. He left the manor, lowered the drawbridge and led forth a hundred mounted men.
Ahead were five hundred fighters, on horse and on foot. The chieftain in their lead was equipped with a bow and arrows. Twirling his lance, he urged his beast forward. It was Hua Rong.
When Tiger Cub saw him he spurred his mount, levelled his lance and charged. Hua Rong galloped towards Tiger Cub. Before Lone Dragon Cliff they fought a dozen rounds, with neither vanquishing the other. Hua Rong executed a feint, turned and moved off. Tiger Cub was about to give chase when one of his cohorts recognized his opponent.
"Don't pursue him, general. He might strike you a sneak blow," the man called. "He's a crack archer."
Tiger Cub reined his animal to a halt, then led his party back into the manor and raised the drawbridge. Hua Rong and his contingent were last seen riding away. Tiger Cub dismounted in front of the main hall and went to the rear chambers for food and drink.
"Did you catch any robbers today, young general?" Sun Li asked.
"Among those louts was some Hua Rong or other, a first-rate man with the lance. We fought fifty rounds, then he withdrew. I wanted to go after him, but my soldiers said he's fantastic with the bow and arrow. So I brought my company back."
"Though I'm not very capable, in a day or so I'll nab him and few of his gang."
At the feast that day Sun Li had Yue Ho sing a few ballads, to the pleasure of the assembled diners. In the evening the gathering broke up, and all retired for the night.
A manor soldier suddenly reported, around noon of the fourth day: "Song Jiang's forces are coming at us again."
The three sons of the Zhu Family donned their armor and went outside the manor gate. They could hear the crash of gongs and the thunder of drums in the distance. The shouting foe, banners waving, had spread out in battle formation. Lord Zhu took his seat in the tower atop the gate. To his left was Luan Tingyu, to his right was Major Sun Li. The three sons and the men Sun Li had brought were arrayed before the gate.
From the enemy position Panther Head Lin Chong shouted imprecations. Stung, the Dragon yelled for the drawbridge to be lowered. He took his lance, mounted, and rode forth with two hundred foot soldiers and cavalry. They galloped, shouting, towards Lin Chong. In the gatehouse the big drums pounded, and the two sides winged arrows against each other.
Lin Chong raised his long, serpent lance and engaged the Dragon in combat. Thirty rounds they fought, with neither being the victor. On each side gongs crashed, and both contestants withdrew.
The Tiger was enraged. Sabre in hand, he climbed into the saddle and raced upon the field, shouting his challenge: "Song Jiang, fight to a finish!"
Before the sound of his voice had died away, a rider emerged from the opposite ranks. Mu Hong the Unrestrained had come to do battle. The two fought for thirty rounds, again with no result. Tiger Cub was furious. Seizing his lance he flew onto his horse, and galloped forth with two hundred cavalrymen.
Yang Xiong the Pallid, astride his steed, lance in hand, charged from the Song Jiang position to meet him. Now the two sides were locked in slashing combat and Sun Li could restrain himself no longer.
"Get my ridged rod," he called to his brother Sun Xin. "And my armor, helmet and robe."

He put on his equipment and let out his own horse, known as the Piebald Steed. Heaving the saddle on its back, he tightened the three girths, hung the tiger-eyed, ridged steel rod from his wrist, grasped his lance, and mounted. To the accompaniment of crashing gongs from the Zhu Family Manor, Sun Li rode onto the field.
Lined up opposite on the other side, their animals reined in motionless, were Lin Chong, Mu Hong and Yang Xiong. "I'll take those rogues," Sun Li exclaimed as he cantered forward. Pulling his beast to a halt, he shouted: "If there's a good fighter among you thieving scoundrels, let him come forward and battle with me to the death!"
A rider galloped out, bridle bells tinkling. Everyone stared. It was Shi Xiu the Rash. The gap between the horses narrowed, and the two lances met. Fifty rounds the contestants fought. Sun Li feinted, letting Shi Xiu close in and thrust. Agilely, he dodged, yanked Shi Xiu from the saddle, carried him under one arm to the front of the manor, and dumped him on the ground.
"Tie him up," he shouted.
Meanwhile, the three sons had thrown Song Jiang's forces into disarray, scattering and driving them off.
The three sons gathered their men and returned to the foot of the gate tower. They clasped their hands together and bowed to Sun Li respectfully.
"How many robbers have been captured so far?" Sun Li asked.
"The first one we caught was Shi Qian," Lord Zhu volunteered. "Then we took the spy Yang Lin. Later we captured Huang Xin. Ten Feet of Steel of the Hu Family Manor caught Stumpy Tiger Wang. Two more were taken on the battlefield—Qin Ming and Deng Fei. Today, you, sir, captured Shi Xiu. The lout burned down my inn. That makes a total of seven."
"Don't hurt any of them. Build seven cage carts, quickly. But give them food and wine, keep them in good health. It would look bad if we starved them. Later, when we've taken Song Jiang, we'll deliver them all to the Eastern Capital. Everyone will know your fame, and will sing the praises of the three sons of the Zhu Family."
Lord Zhu thanked him. "We are fortunate to have your help, Major. The Liangshan Marsh gang is doomed."
He invited Sun Li to a feast in the rear hall. Shi Xiu was locked in a cage cart.
Hear me, gentle reader: Shi Xiu's skill with weapons was in no way inferior to Sun Li's. But to fool the Zhu Family he let himself be taken. This caused the manor people to trust the major completely. Sun Li secretly instructed Zou Yuan, Zou Run and Yue Ho to check the number of doors in the rear building. At the sight of them, Yang Lin and Deng Fei were pleased. Seeing that no one was around, Yue Ho softly told the prisoners of the latest developments. Gu Dasao and Madame Yue, in the compound's interior, looked over the entrances and exits of the living quarters.
On the fifth day, Sun Li and the others strolled around the manor. Shortly after breakfast a soldier reported: "Song Jiang has divided his forces into four columns and is advancing to attack."
"Even if he had ten columns, what would it matter?" said Sun Li to the Zhu Family. "Tell your underlings not to be alarmed, but just get ready. First, conceal a party with hooks and snares. We want live prisoners. Dead ones are no use."
The men of the manor donned their armor, and Lord Zhu went with a group to watch from the gate tower. To the east they could see a body of men and horses approaching, led by Panther Head Lin Chong. Behind him were Li Jun and Ruan the Second, and five hundred fighters on horse and on foot. From the west another five hundred were coming, with Hua Rong in the lead, followed by Zhang Heng and Zhang Shun. Due south were five hundred more, commanded by Mu Hong the Unrestrained, Yang Xiong the Pallid, and Black Whirlwind Li Kui. In every direction infantry and cavalry were advancing, battle drums pounding in unison, shouts rising to the skies.
"Those villains are coming at us in force today," said Luan Tingyu. "We mustn't underestimate them. I shall take a company through the rear gate and deal with the foe to the northwest."
"I shall go through the front gate and fight the eastern foe," said the Dragon.
"I'll also go through the rear gate and take on the enemy attacking from the southwest," said the Tiger.
"I'm going via the front gate to grab Song Jiang," said the Tiger Cub. "He's the chief robber."
Pleased, Lord Zhu rewarded them with cups of wine. All mounted and sallied forth with troops of three hundred cavalry each. Those remaining to guard the manor stood in front of the gate towers and cheered. Zou Yuan and Zou Run had already hidden big axes and were standing near the door of the building which held the prisoners. The Xie brothers, also with concealed weapons, stayed close to the rear gate. Sun Xin and Yue Ho were in position on either side of the front gate. Gu Dasao, after having assigned soldiers to protect Madame Yue, paced with a pair of daggers before the hall, ready to strike at the signal.
Three volleys thundered on the manor drums, a cannon boomed, the front and rear gates swung open, the drawbridges were lowered, and the army surged forth. Four Zhu Family contingents marched to engage the foe.
Sun Li and a dozen men promptly occupied the front bridge. On the gate tower, Sun Li unfurled the original banner. Yue Ho, lance in hand, entered, singing. At the sound of his voice, Zou Yuan and Zou Run whistled several times, shrilly. Swinging their axes, they cut down the few dozen soldiers guarding the temporary prison and broke open the cage carts. The seven released captives seized lances from the weapons racks. When she heard their shouts, Gu Dasao charged into the inner chambers and slaughtered all the women with her daggers. Lord Zhu recognized his danger and ran to jump into a well, but Shi Xiu hacked him down with one blow of his sabre and cut off his head.
The ten or more bold fellows separated to kill the manor soldiers. Near the rear gate the Xie brothers set fire to the haystacks. Black smoke tunneled into the sky. When the attackers saw this, they redoubled their forward drive.
Tiger, seeing the manor ablaze, hastened back. "Where do you think you're going?" shouted Sun Li, and blocked his passage over the bridge. Tiger understood. He turned his steed and galloped toward Song Jiang's position. But Lu Fang and Guo Sheng, waiting with barbed lances, tumbled horse and rider. Brigand fighters swarmed all over him and chopped him to mincemeat. The soldiers in front of the manor scattered, and Sun Li and Sun Xin escorted Song Jiang in.
To the east, the Dragon found he was no match for Lin Chong. He raced his horse to the rear of the manor. But when he reached the back drawbridge he saw the Xie brothers, inside the gate, throwing the bodies of slain vassals into the flames. He pulled his mount hastily around and sped north. Suddenly, he was confronted by Li Kui. Black Whirlwind bounded towards him, whirling his axes and cutting the animal's legs from under it. The Dragon fell helplessly to the ground. With one swing Li Kui split his skull open.
When these happenings were reported to Tiger Cub, he didn't dare return. He hurried to the Hu Family Manor. On the orders of Hu Cheng, vassals seized and bound him. As they were taking him to deliver him to Song Jiang, they met Li Kui, who cut off Tiger Cub's head with a single sweep of his ax. The vassals fled and Li Kui charged towards Hu Cheng. Obviously, it was a bad situation. Hu Cheng raced his steed into the wilderness. Abandoning his home, he rode for his life. He finally took refuge in the prefecture of Yanan. In later years, when order was restored, he became a general.
Black Whirlwind went on killing smoothly. He charged into the Hu Family Manor and slaughtered the old squire and the whole family, young and old. He instructed his men to load the squire's horses with the forty or fifty bundles of loot he collected, then put the manor to the torch and started back with his prizes.
Song Jiang was by then seated in the hall of the Zhu Family Manor, listening to the reports of his chieftains' achievements. They had captured nearly five hundred men and an equal number of good horses, in addition to innumerable cattle and sheep.
Song Jiang was very pleased, although when he thought of Luan Tingyu he sighed regretfully. "What a pity that gallant fellow was killed."
A brigand entered and announced: "Black Whirlwind has burned down the Hu Family Manor and cut off their heads. He's returned to present his booty."
"But Hu Cheng had already surrendered. Who told him to kill those people? Why has he burned their manor?"
Stained with blood, his two axes stuck in his sash, Li Kui entered and hailed Song Jiang respectfully. "I've killed the Dragon and cut down the Tiger Cub," he said. "That lout Hu Cheng got away, but I made a clean sweep of Squire Hu and the entire family. I've come to be commended."
"People saw you kill the Dragon, but why did you kill the others?" demanded Song Jiang.
"I got into the swing of it. I was heading for the Hu Family Manor when I ran into Tiger Cub. I finished him off with one chop. Too bad that oaf Hu Cheng got away, but I killed every single person in his manor."
"You rogue! Who told you to go there? You knew that Hu Cheng came with gifts of cattle and wine the other day and surrendered. Why didn't you listen to me? Why did you take it on yourself to kill his whole family in deliberate violation of my order?"
"Maybe you've forgotten, but I haven't. He also sent his friggin woman to kill you the other day, yet now you're all sympathetic! You're not engaged to his sister. Why should you care about her brother and father?"
"Iron Ox, you're raving! What would I want with her? I have something else in mind. How many live ones have you taken, you swarthy devil?"
"Who's got the patience? Any live one I met, I cut down."
"You've disobeyed my orders. That's a beheading offence! It wipes out the credit you deserve for killing the Dragon and the Tiger Cub. The next time you violate an order I won't forgive you!"
Black Whirlwind grinned. "So I don't get any credit. But all that killing was a real pleasure."
Military Advisor Wu Yong was seen approaching with a company of mounted men. On reaching the manor they drank to Song Jiang and congratulated him. Song Jiang conferred with Wu Yong. He wanted to annihilate the village attached to the manor, but Shi Xiu reminded him of the old man who had been of such help in telling the secret of the paths. "There are many good people like him in the village. They shouldn't be harmed."
Song Jiang instructed Shi Xiu to fetch the old man. Not long after, Shi Xiu brought him to the manor. The oldster kowtowed to Song and Wu Yong. Song Jiang rewarded him with silks and a bag of gold and told him he could remain in the village permanently.
"If it weren't for your kindness we would have obliterated your village," Song Jiang said, "and every family in it. But now, thanks to your meritorious conduct, they all shall be spared."
The old man could only kowtow again.
"I've been worried about you ordinary folk for several days," Song Jiang continued. "Today, we've taken the Zhu Family Manor and rid you of an oppressor. Each family shall receive a load of rice, as a sign of our concern."
He put the old man in charge of distribution. At the same time, he had the manor's surplus grain loaded onto carts. Gold and silver and other valuables he gave as rewards to the leaders and men of his forces. All cattle, sheep, donkeys, horses, and the like were driven off for use in the mountain fortress.
As a result of the capture of the Zhu Family Manor, the brigands obtained five hundred thousand loads of grain. Song Jiang was very pleased.
The chieftains big and small assembled their fighters. Several new leaders were added: Sun Li, Sun Xin, Xie Zhen, Xie Bao, Zou Yuan, Zou Run, Yue Ho and Gu Dasao. Seven gallant men had been rescued.
Sun Li, with his own horses and the valuables he had brought from home, took his wife and followed the main force up the mountain. Local villagers, supporting the old and carrying small children, burned incense and lit festive lanterns, kowtowed and gave thanks, as they saw them off.
Song Jiang and the leaders mounted. The army, divided into three contingents, marched through the night on the return trip to the mountain stronghold.

We'll speak now of Li Ying the Heaven Soaring Eagle who had been resting and recovering from his arrow wound. He kept the gates of the manor closed and did not go out, but he frequently sent men in secret to get news of the Zhu Family Manor. He was both startled and glad to learn that Song Jiang had conquered it.
A vassal entered and reported: "The prefect has come with forty or fifty men to inquire about the Zhu Family Manor."
Li Ying hurriedly ordered Du Xing to open the gate, lower the drawbridge and escort them in. He bound his injured arm in white silk and went out to welcome his callers and invite them into the main hall. The prefect dismounted, entered the hall, and seated himself in the center. His clerk sat by his side. Next were two sheriffs and several captains. At the foot of the platform were many bailiffs and prison guards. Li Ying kowtowed to the prefect and stood before him.
"The slaughter of the Zhu Family, how did that come about?" the prefect demanded.
"Their son the Dragon wounded me in the left arm with an arrow. I've kept my gates closed and have not ventured out. I have no knowledge of the affair."
"Lies! A complain accuses you of complicity with the Liangshan Marsh bandits. You lured out the Zhu forces so that the bandits could break into the manor. The other day you received from them saddle horses, sheep, wine, silks, gold and silver. How can you deny it?"
"I'm a law-abiding man. I'd never accept their gifts."
"I can't believe that. I'm taking you to the prefecture. There, you can confront your accuser and have this out."
At a word from the prefect, the guards seized Li Ying, and the sheriffs and captains tied his arms. The entourage swarmed around the prefect as he mounted his horse.
"Who is the steward Du Xing?" asked the prefect.
"I am that humble person," said Du.
"Your name is also in the complaint. Take him along."
Du was promptly fettered. The party left the manor. With Li Ying and Du Xing under restraint, they marched without halt along the road.
Before they had gone thirty /; Song Jiang, Lin Chong, Hua Rong, Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu suddenly emerged from the edge of the forest and blocked their way. "The gallants of Liangshan Marsh are here together," shouted Lin Chong.
The prefect and his party didn't dare put up a fight. Abandoning Li Ying and Du Xing, they fled. "After them," yelled Song Jiang. Brigands pursued them for a while, then returned.
"We'd have killed that friggin prefect if we'd caught up with him," they reported, "but he got away."
They untied the ropes and opened the fetters on Li Ying and Du Xing, and led forward two horses for them to ride.
"Won't you come and take refuge in our Liangshan Marsh for a time, sir?" said Song Jiang.
"I can't do that," said Li Ying. "You're the ones who tried to kill the prefect. It has nothing to do with me."
Song Jiang smiled. "Do you think the authorities would accept such an argument? Even if we went off without you, you'd still be implicated. You're not willing to become an outlaw, but at least stay in our mountain fortress a few days. As soon as we hear you're in no danger, you can come down again."
Li Ying and Du Xing had no choice, surrounded as they were by a whole army. Divided into three contingents, the force wound its way to Mount Liangshan.
Chao Gai and the others, beating drums and blowing flutes, came down the mountain to welcome them with wine. All repaired to Fraternity Hall and seated themselves fanwise.
Li Ying was introduced to the leaders. After courtesies had been exchanged, he said to Song Jiang: "Du Xing and I have seen you back to your stronghold, General, and have met the leaders. I don't mind staying here for a time, but I'm concerned about my family. I'd like to go down and see."
Wu Yong laughed. "No need, sir. Your family is already here. And your manor has been burned to the ground. What would you go back for?"
Li Ying looked sceptical, until he saw carts and people advancing up the path. They were vassals from his manor and members of his family. He hastened to them.
His wife said: "After you were taken by the prefect, two sheriffs came with four constables and a patrol of three hundred soldiers. They wrapped our belongings into bundles and made us get into carts. They took along all our hampers and livestock, and put the manor to the torch."
Li Ying uttered a cry of lamentation. Chao Gai and Song Jiang apologized. "The truth is that we have long heard of your excellence," they said, "and so we evolved this scheme. We beg your forgiveness."
Since they put it that way, Li Ying had no choice but to comply.
"Please ask your family to rest in a wing of the rear hall," said Song Jiang.
Li Ying observed that many of the chieftains had their wives and children with them. He told his spouse: "We can only obey him."
Song Jiang then invited Li to the front part of the hall for a chat. Everyone was pleased. In a jocular tone, Song said to Li Ying: "I'd like you to meet the two patrol sheriffs and the prefect."
Out stepped Xiao Rang, disguised as the prefect, and Dai Zong and Yang Lin, who had assumed the roles of the sheriffs. Pei Xuan had been the clerk, Jin Dajian and Hou Jian had been the captains. Song Jiang also summoned the four constables. They were Li Jun, Zhang Shun, Ma Lin, and Bai Sheng.
Li Ying gaped at them, speechless.
Song Jiang instructed the lesser chieftains to slaughter cows and horses quickly for a feast both of apology to Li Ying and of celebration over the addition of twelve new leaders: Li Ying, Sun Li, Sun Xin, Xie Zhen, Xie Bao, Zou Yuan, Zou Run, Du Xing, Yue Ho, Shi Qian, Ten Feet of Steel and Gu Dasao. The women leaders had a table of their own in the rear hall with Madame Yue and the female members of Li Ying's family.
All brigands, large and small, were rewarded, and merry pipes and drums sounded in the hall. The bold fellows drank and dined until late. When the festivities ended, the new leaders retired to the quarters assigned to them.
The chieftains were invited to another feast the following day to seek their aid in another matter. Song Jiang called forth Stumpy Tiger Wang and said: "When we were on Clear Winds Mountain I promised you a wife. I haven't forgotten, but I haven't yet fulfilled my pledge. Today, my father has a daughter he'll give to you in marriage."
Song Jiang requested Squire Song to bring the Hu Family girl to the feast.
"My brother Wang Ying is a good fighter. Of course, his skill can't be compared with yours," Song said to her apologetically. "But I've promised him a bride, and I still haven't produced one. You, sister, are now my father's ward. I'd like all these leaders to serve as match-makers and give you in marriage to Wang Ying. Today is an auspicious day."
Ten Feet of Steel saw how deeply Song Jiang felt his chivalrous obligations. She was unable to refuse. The bride and groom kowtowed their thanks. Chao Gai and the other leaders were pleased. They all praised Song Jiang for his virtue and loyalty. Everyone feasted the entire day, and many toasts were drunk in congratulations.
In the midst of the merrymaking, a messenger came up the mountain and reported: "There is a man from Yuncheng Town in Zhu Gui's inn. He requests to see you leaders."
Chao Gai and Song Jiang were delighted when they learned who it was. "If we can persuade our benefactor to join our band, we'll have achieved the wish of a lifetime," they said. Truly, he who cannot distinguish between gratitude and hatred is no real hero. He who cannot tell black from white is no genuine stalwart.

Now the request the Professor made to the Magic Messenger was this: "Dear friend, go back to the mountain and get these four: Sterling, the Hand, the Ape and the Craftsman. Tell them to bring the tools of their trade and to make haste. I have a job for them to do."
The Magic Messenger departed.
At this moment a sentry came to report that young Hu, Steelbright's brother from the Hu manor to the west had arrived, bringing oxen and wine, and was requesting an interview. Song Jiang ordered him to be brought in.
Young Hu marched right into the tent, bowed and declared: "My sister in a moment of madness, due undoubtedly to her youth and ignorance of the ways of the world, foolishly attacked you and has been taken prisoner. I beg you to be merciful. This rash action which brought about her captivity is owing to the fact that she had been promised to the Zhu family. If you will release her, we shall be happy to supply you with anything you may need."
"Please be seated and let us talk," Song Jiang replied. "That unmannerly crowd in Zhu Castle have insulted us without provocation, which is why we have come here to seek redress. We have no quarrel with the Hu family. But your sister led a force to capture one of our leaders, which is why we returned the compliment by taking your sister prisoner. If you will return our leader to us, I will release your sister to you."

"Unfortunately," young Hu replied, "the people from Zhu Castle have already taken him away."
"Then where exactly is he?" the Professor interposed.
"He's locked up in Zhu Castle. It's quite impossible for me to get him."
"If you won't go and get him for us, how can we return your sister?" said Song Jiang.
"Wait a moment, brother," said the Professor. "Let me say something first. Mr. Hu, some time hereafter you're going to hear noises from Zhu Castle. Your people, I trust, will not send reinforcements to help them out. If people from Zhu try to take refuge with you, you had better tie them up. When you have taken some captives your sister will be returned to you. The fact is that at present she is not here in the camp. She has already been sent back to the mountain stronghold and handed over to Squire Song for safekeeping. But you can rest easy. We know what we're doing."
"We will certainly not give them aid now. If anyone from the castle seeks refuge with us we will take them prisoner and hand them over to you," said Hu Cheng.
"If you do that it will be better than a gift of gold and silk to us."
Hu Cheng prostrated himself and left.
Meanwhile, Colonel Sun had changed the emblem on his banner to "Colonel Sun, commander of Dengzhou troops" and was leading his company towards the rear entrance of Zhu Castle. Those watching from the walls saw the Dengzhou banner and went to report. When Ironstaff heard that it was Colonel Sun, he came out to see for himself. He said to the Brothers Zhu: "Colonel Sun is my friend. When we were young we studied martial arts under the same master. I wonder why he's coming here?"
Taking some twenty or more troops, he had the gates opened and the drawbridge lowered and rode out to meet the visitor. Colonel Sun and his men dismounted and after the exchange of courtesies Ironstaff asked: "If you belong to the Dengzhou garrison, brother, what are you doing here?"
Colonel Sun replied: "An order has come from the regional commander-in-chief transferring me to the garrison at Yunzhou, to strengthen their defences against the bandits of the Marshes of Mount Liang. Along the way I heard that you were here at Zhu Castle, so I came to see you. We approached by the front gate first, but I found the castle was invested by a hostile force encamped outside the village. I thought it unwise to risk an engagement, so I made inquiries in the village and found a way round to the back gate. So here I am, come to greet you."
Ironstaff said: "We've been fighting with the Mount Liang bandits recently. We've got several of their leaders here as prisoners. We now want to capture the leader, Song Jiang, and hand him over to the authorities. Heaven must have sent you at this moment to lend a hand. It's gilt on the gingerbread for us, it's like fresh rain on parched earth."
Colonel Sun laughed. "Don't expect too much of me, but I'll see what I can do to help catch those slaves and complete your good work."
Ironstaff was delighted, and took them all into the castle right away. The drawbridge was raised again and the gates closed. Colonel Sun and all his company were settled in, with their carts, weapons, men and horses. After changing their clothes they all went to the main hall to meet. Courtesies were exchanged and Ironstaff said to Baron Zhu, "This dear friend of mine, Colonel Sun, sometimes called the Bilious Marshal, is a commander of Dengzhou garrison. Now the high command is sending him to reinforce the defences of Yunzhou."
The Baron said: "I too shall place myself under your command."
Colonel Sun replied: "You do me too much honour. I trust you will favour me with your advice and instructions."
The Brothers Zhu now asked everyone to be seated. Colonel Sun began the conversation with: "You have fought many days, you must be weary of battle."
Dragon Zhu said: "But we still haven't won. My brothers and] I are indeed weary from long days in the saddle."
Colonel Sun now told Auntie Gu and Mrs. Yue, the two sisters-in-law to go to the back room and pay their respects to the family, and asked Blackface, Snake and Scorpion to come in and be introduced. "These three are my friends," he said. He pointed out Lungs and said: "This is the official who was sent from Yunzhou to fetch me." Pointing to the Forester and Rhinoceros he said: "These two are army officers from Dengzhou."
Now although Baron Zhu and his sons were not stupid, they could see that Colonel Sun had his family and luggage with him as well as the cart, weapons, men and horses, and in addition he was a friend of Ironstaff's, so they suspected nothing. They simply went about killing oxen and horses to welcome the visitors. There was great feasting.
A couple of days later, on the third day, a castle sentry came to report: "Song Jiang has moved his men into position to attack the castle."
Wildcat Zhu said: "I shall ride out and get the villain myself!"
The drawbridge was lowered and he charged out at the head of more than a hundred cavalry. They soon came upon a body of men, around five hundred in all, surrounding a leader, fully equipped with bow and arrows. This leader, who slapped his horse and dashed forward, was Colonel Hua, the Archer.
When he saw him, Wildcat Zhu kicked his horse, levelled his lance and charged. Colonel Hua likewise urged his horse on to the encounter. There at Lone Dragon Heights the two fought a dozen or so bouts and neither had the advantage. Then Colonel Hua gave his adversary the slip, turned his horse and cantered off, tempting his adversary to follow. Wildcat Zhu was just about to give chase when a friend behind him spoke out: "Commander, don't follow him. I'm sure it's a trick. He's an expert archer."
Wildcat Zhu listened to the advice. Reining in his horse, he abandoned the chase and led his men back to the castle. The drawbridge was raised again and they watched Colonel Hua withdrawing also with his troops. Wildcat Zhu dismounted right in front of the main hall and went to an inner room to drink wine. Colonel Sun inquired: "How many brigands did you capture today, Commander?"
"The villains have got a certain Colonel Hua in their ranks. He's pretty handy with a spear. I fought more than fifty bouts with him, but then he ran away. I was going to chase him, but my men told me he's a good archer. So we broke off the engagement and came back."
"I've no skill to boast of," said Colonel Sun. "But another day I'll have a go and see if I can take some of them."
At the banquet that evening Lungs was asked to sing. Everyone enjoyed the performance. After the banquet they all rested. At midday on the fourth day, one of the castle guards reported: "Song Jiang's troops are advancing again!"
The Brothers Zhu armed themselves and hurried to the front gate. Gongs and drums could be heard in the distance, amid shouts and waving banners. Before long the enemy were facing them in battle order. By now Baron Zhu was sitting above the gate. On his left was Ironstaff, on his right Colonel Sun and the three Brothers Zhu. Some of the troops that Colonel Sun had brought were also lined up on either side.
Now from Song Jiang's ranks Leopard's Head emerged and began hurling insults. Dragon Zhu in a frenzy shouted for the drawbridge to be lowered. He grasped his spear and mounted. Followed by several hundred troops he hurled himself with a great shout on Leopard's Head's force. From the castle gate a drum began to beat and from both sides every bow and crossbow opened fire at the opposing lines. Leopard's Head levelled his snake head lance and joined combat with Dragon Zhu. They fought more than thirty bouts, but neither prevailed. Gongs rang out on either side and both men turned their horses. Tiger Zhu was furious. He grasped his sword, mounted and galloped to the front. In ringing tones he challenged Song Jiang to single combat. He had hardly finished when Song Jiang's ranks parted and out rode a horseman: it was Mu Hong the Unstoppable, answering Tiger Zhu's challenge. They fought more than thirty bouts but again neither had the advantage. This enraged Wildcat Zhu. He grasped his spear, leapt onto his horse and with two hundred cavalry launched himself against the front rank. From Song Jiang's ranks Morbid rode forward with his spear and rushed against Wildcat Zhu.
When Colonel Sun saw the two sides engaged in such furious combat, he could wait no longer. Calling to his brother Blackface to bring his spear, armour, helmet and robe, he accoutred himself and went to get his horse, which was a piebald. He fitted the saddle, securing it with three girths, hung the jointed whip from his wrist, grasped his spear and mounted. As a gong sounded in Zhu Castle, Colonel Sun took to the field. On Song Jiang's side, Leopard's Head, Mu Hong, and Morbid all reined in their horses and rejoined the main force. As he galloped forth, Colonel Sun said: "Let's see now if we can capture the bastards." Causing his horse to rear up, he shouted: "You there, you scum, if there is anyone among you who thinks he's good, let him answer me in single combat!"
With a flurry of bridle bells from among Song Jiang's ranks a rider galloped forth. All eyes turned towards him. It was Madcap, taking up Colonel Sun's challenge. The two horses closed, two spears were brandished. They fought fifty bouts before Colonel Sun feinted and allowed Madcap to lunge with his spear, dodging as he did so and lightly lifting the other from his horse and dragging him to the castle gates where he threw him down and shouted: "Come and tie him up!"
After harrying Song Jiang's troops a while, the Brothers Zhu scattered and brought their troops back to the gate tower. There they found Colonel Sun, reclining with a cup of wine among an admiring crowd.
"How many of the bastards have you got?" the Colonel inquired.
Baron Zhu said: "First we got one called Shi Qian, the Flea. Then we got Panther and one they call the Tamer. Steelbright, from Hu manor, took a certain Short-Arse Wang, and our troops took Thunderclap and Redeye. And now you yourself have captured this Madcap, he's the one that burnt my inn down. So we've got seven."
"Don't let any harm come to them," said Colonel Sun. "Have seven prison carts made to put them in, and give them food, to keep them strong and healthy, don't let them wither away, it doesn't look good. Later when we get Song Jiang we'll send the whole lot up to the Eastern Capital and get the Emperor to proclaim it, and make the Brothers Zhu famous."
Baron Zhu said: "We're so lucky to have your help, Colonel. This will be the end of the brigands of Mount Liang, I'd say."
Colonel Sun was invited to a banquet in an inner room, while Madcap was placed in the prison cart.
Now, you must understand, friends, that Madcap's skill in fighting was no less than Colonel Sun's. But they wanted to deceive the people in Zhu Castle. He purposely allowed himself to be taken to make people trust Colonel Sun.
Colonel Sun now secretly sent the Forester and Rhinoceros, uncle and nephew, with Lungs to the back of the castle to examine the gates and see how many ways in and out there were. When Panther and Redeye saw the Forester and Rhinoceros they were very excited. Lungs checked that there was no one around and told them all the news. Meanwhile Auntie Gu and Mrs. Yue were counting all the entrances and exits to the inner rooms.
Until the fifth day Colonel Sun and the others amused themselves strolling in the castle grounds. At dawn on the fifth day, after breakfast, one of the castle guards reported: "Song Jiang is coming to attack the castle and he has divided his forces into four columns."
"Why should he divide them into four columns?" said Colonel Sun. "There's nothing for your troops to worry about. All we need to do is to be prepared. First organize some hooks and ropes. We want to take them alive, dead ones are no use."
Everyone in the castle armed. The Baron himself took a company of men to a vantage point on the gate tower. They saw a body of troops approaching from the east, with a leader at its head. This was Leopard's Head Lin Chong, and behind him came the White-Water Dragon and Ruan the Second, with about five hundred troops. Another five hundred or so were approaching from the west, led by Colonel Hua the Archer with the Pilot and White Eel. And five hundred troops were coming straight towards the observers in the tower over the south gate. These were led by Mu Hong the Unstoppable, Morbid and Iron Ox. There were enemy troops on all sides. Drums and gongs were sounding. The noise was deafening.
Ironstaff said: "It's not going to be an easy fight today. I will go to the back gate and deal with those who are coming from the northwest."
Dragon Zhu said: "I shall go to the front gate and deal with the ones who are coming up from the east."
Tiger Zhu said: "I will go to the back gate too, and deal with the ones from the southwest."
Wildcat Zhu said: "I shall ride out of the front gate and capture Song Jiang. He's the important one."
Baron Zhu was well pleased and offered them all wine. Everyone mounted and with three hundred cavalry they burst out of the castle gates. The remainder guarded the castle precincts and lined up cheering on the battlements. By this time the Forester and Rhinoceros had hidden big axes on the left hand side of the prison door. Snake and Scorpion had concealed weapons somewhere near the back gate. Blackface and Lungs were keeping guard on the left and right of the front gate. Auntie Gu left one of the soldiers to look after Mrs. Yue and with her two swords took up a position next to the hall, listening to the talk, and ready to spring into action.
Now three drums began to beat in the castle, a gun was fired and the gates opened, front and back, the drawbridge was raised, and on four sides the parties went separately into battle. Soon after, Colonel Sun took a dozen troops and stationed them on the drawbridge. Now Blackface by the gate raised the signal flags they had brought with them on the gate tower and Lungs, brandishing his spear, began to sing. When they heard the singing, the Forester and Rhinoceros gave several loud whistles and whirling the big axes cut down the dozen or so prison guards in no time at all and broke open the prison carts. This released seven raging heroes, who each found himself a weapon and began to yell blue murder. Auntie Gu with her two swords charged into the inner chambers and systematically killed every one of the women in the hall. The Baron, seeing the situation had turned so ugly, was on the point of throwing himself down the well, but was stabbed by Madcap first and had his head cut off. A dozen or so heroes went on killing the castle's defenders independently. Snake and Scorpion at the back gate set fire to the piles of hay for the horses and a fiery column of black smoke began to mount to the heavens.
The four columns of troops, seeing the castle on fire, made desperate efforts to push forward. When Tiger Zhu saw the fire he first tried to return. But Colonel Sun guarding the draw-bridge, bellowed "Where the hell do you think you're going?" and blocked the way. Tiger Zhu in consternation turned his horse's head and charged Song Jiang's lines again. This time the Halberdier and the Little Duke raised their halberds and brought down both man and horse. The troops then fell on him and turned him into mincemeat. The foremost ranks fled in all directions. Colonel Sun and his brother welcomed Song Jiang into the castle. Meanwhile Dragon Zhu's eastern column had found Leopard's Head too much for them and were streaming back towards the castle. When they reached the drawbridge they saw Snake and Scorpion by the back gate pitching the defenders' bodies one by one into the flames. Dragon Zhu desperately wrenched his horse's head round and fled northwards. Suddenly he ran into Iron Ox, leaping towards him and whirling his two axes. In a trice the horse's legs were cut from under him and before Dragon Zhu could lift a finger he was thrown headlong. One blow from Iron Ox's axe and his head was rolling on the ground.
When troops from the castle reported the situation to Wildcat Zhu, he dared not return so he went straight to Hu manor to seek refuge. There Hu Cheng ordered his people to arrest him and tie him up. Hu Cheng was on his way to hand Wildcat Zhu over to Song Jiang when they had the bad luck to run into Iron Ox who with one blow of the axe cut off Wildcat Zhu's head. The retainers fled in all directions, while Iron Ox, still whirling his axes, turned on Hu Cheng. Things did not look at all good to Hu Cheng, so he galloped off into the wilderness, forsaking all family ties for the sake of preserving his life. He settled in Yan'an district, and later he made good, becoming a famous military commander.
Iron Ox, meanwhile, went on killing as he pleased. He charged into Hu manor and killed Squire Hu and his entire household, every one of them — not a soul was left. He told his men to get all the horses and collect up all the valuables and cash in the manor, which were loaded onto the forty or fifty packhorses they found. The place was then set alight and Iron Ox returned to hand over his contribution.
Song Jiang was now seated in the main hall of Zhu Castle and the leaders were coming to claim their honours. They had taken four or five hundred prisoners, more than five hundred horses and innumerable livestock. Song Jiang was delighted with the result. "The only pity is that Ironstaff was killed. He was a good man." As he was expressing this regret, someone announced: "Iron Ox has set fire to the Hu manor and is coming to present the heads he has cut off."
"Hu Cheng came and surrendered to us the other day," said Song Jiang. "Who gave Iron Ox permission to kill him? How dare he burn their house down!"
At this moment Iron Ox walked in, covered in blood from head to foot, the two axes swinging at his waist. He went straight up to Song Jiang, saluted and said: "I killed Dragon Zhu and I killed Wildcat Zhu too, cut off their heads. Hu Cheng got away, blast him, but I killed Squire Hu and all his family beautifully. I've come to claim my reward."
Song Jiang roared at him: "We saw you kill Dragon Zhu, but who says it was you that killed the others?"
"I killed whoever I came across, and then when I was pursing them to Hu manor I met Steelbright's brother coming out with Wildcat Zhu so I cut off his head with my axe but unfortunately the other bugger got away. The rest of the family I killed, there's absolutely no one left."
Song Jiang shouted: "You stupid bastard! Who told you to go there? Didn't you know Hu Cheng came the other day to surrender, bringing us gifts of oxen and wine? Why did you contravene my orders and go there to kill them all on your own initiative?"
"You may have forgotten, but I haven't," said Iron Ox. "The other day the bastard told that bloody woman to catch you and kill you. But now you want to be all merciful. You haven't even married his sister yet, but you want to behave like a brother-in-law."
Song Jiang shouted: "You moron, stop talking such bollocks. What do I want with the woman? I've got other things in mind. All right, you black bastard, how many did you take alive?"
Iron Ox replied: "Who the fuck would bother with that? If I saw any alive I cut their heads off."
Song Jiang shouted: "For deliberately flouting a military order, you wretch, you should be executed. But as your reward for killing Dragon Zhu and Wildcat Zhu I will commute the sentence. Next time you disobey orders you will not be pardoned."
Iron Ox merely grinned: "Even if I don't get a reward, I had a great time with all that killing!"
At this point the commander-in-chief, Professor Wu Yong was seen with his troops arriving at the castle to celebrate with Song Jiang. After a discussion, Song Jiang and the Professor decided that Zhu Castle and its environs should be obliterated. But Madcap made a request: "There's an old man here, Zhongli by name, who is truly charitable. He told me the way and I owe my life to him. When there's someone as kind-hearted and good as that around, we surely oughtn't to destroy the place."
When he heard this, Song Jiang told Madcap to go and find the old man. In a little while Madcap returned to the castle with him and brought him in to pay his respects to Song Jiang and the Professor. Song Jiang presented the old man with a bundle of silver and silk, praising him as an example to the people: "But for your kind-heartedness, we would have swept this whole village away. Not one family would have been spared. But because you showed such goodness, we will pardon everyone in the village."
The old man prostrated himself and Song Jiang said: "For many days we have been here turning your lives upside down. But today we have destroyed Zhu Castle and rid you all of a great scourge. Now every household shall receive a hundred catties of rice as a gesture of humanity."
The old man was given the responsibility of distributing the gift, while the bulk of the grain remaining in the castle was loaded onto carts. The valuables and cash were distributed among the men of the three companies as bounty. The oxen, sheep, mules, horses and other animals were sent to the mountain to be disposed of there. The overthrow of Zhu Castle produced five hundred thousand catties of provisions. Song Jiang was delighted.
All the leaders, men and horses now prepared for departure, including all the new arrivals — Colonel Sun, his brother Blackface, Snake and Scorpion, the Forester and Rhinoceros, uncle and nephew, Lungs and Auntie Gu — and the seven who had been freed. Colonel Sun and his party, with horses, possessions and family, including Mrs. Yue and followers headed for the mountain in a big troop. All the villagers, young and old, turned out to see them off, burning incense and lighting lamps to honour them and thank them. As soon as the others had all mounted, Song Jiang divided the troops into three columns. They set off, the leaders knocking their whips on the stirrups, the rearguard all singing a victory song.
Now our story divides in two.
First let us deal with Skyhawk Li Ying, who, now fortunately recovered from his arrow wound, had shut himself up in his manor and would not come out. Secretly however he regularly sent out scouts to gather news of events at Zhu Castle. When he learnt that Song Jiang had destroyed it, his shock and his pleasure were about equal. But then his scouts reported that the provincial governor had arrived with a force of around fifty men to investigate the Zhu Castle affair. Skyhawk hurriedly instructed Uglymug to open the manor gates, lower the drawbridge and let them in. Wrapping a strip of gauze round his injured arm, Skyhawk came out to greet the visitors and invited them into the main hall. The governor dismounted and entered. He took the place of honour, his secretary sat down beside him, after them a police sergeant and several court officers, and below the steps a number of prison guards and attendants.
Skyhawk prostrated himself before the governor and then stood and waited. The governor asked: "What's all this about fighting at Zhu Castle?"
"I had been shot with an arrow by Wildcat Zhu and wounded in the left shoulder. I know nothing about Zhu Castle because I kept my doors closed and didn't go out."
"Rubbish!" said the governor. "Someone in Zhu Castle accused you of being in league with the bandits of Mount Liang and so you invited them down to destroy the castle. The other day you accepted saddles, horses, sheep, wine and patterned silk from those bandits. How can you lie about it?"
"I respect the law," said Skyhawk. "I would never receive anything from them."
The governor said: "Who's going to believe that? You'd better come back to the government offices with me. Confronting you with our witness should settle it." He ordered the bailiffs to arrest Skyhawk and take him to the government offices to find out which of the two was lying — he or the Zhu witness. The two court officers tied Skyhawk up. When the governor, surrounded by his men, had mounted, he asked: "Is that Mr. Du, the manor steward?"
"Yes, sir," said Uglymug.
"Your name is also mentioned in the accusation. We'd better take you along too and lock you up with him."

The party rode out of the manor gates. So Skyhawk and Uglymug both left the manor under arrest and were carried off without delay. But they had barely gone ten miles when from the edge of a wood out rushed Song Jiang, Leopard's Head, Colonel Hua the Archer, Morbid and Madcap, together with a small body of troops, and barred the way. Leopard's Head gave a ringing cry: "The company of the Marshes of Mount Liang are here!"
The governor and his suite dared not put up any resistance. They abandoned Skyhawk and Uglymug and ran for their lives. Song Jiang gave orders for them to be caught. Some of the others went after them, and in a little while returned and said: "We caught some of them and killed that sodding governor, but we don't know where the others went to."
Skyhawk and Uglymug were released from their bonds and let out of the cages. Two horses were brought for them to ride. Then Song Jiang said: "Mr. Li, sir, I would like you to come with us to hide on Mount Liang for a while. What do you say?"
Skyhawk said: "That's quite impossible. Your killing the governor has got nothing to do with me."
Song Jiang smiled and said: "How can you expect the authorities to make that distinction? If we leave you, they will certainly consider you to be implicated. If you don't want to become an outlaw, sir, at least come and rest in the mountain stronghold for a few days. When we hear that it has all blown over, it will be time enough for you to go back."
So, however unwillingly, Skyhawk and Uglymug were obliged to go too, riding with the outlaws. For how could they go back?
They all rode on till they reached Mount Liang. When they got to the camp, the leader Chao Gai came down the mountain with drums and fifes to greet them. Some wine was drunk to welcome them and then they all went up to the Assembly Hall in the main camp, where they sat round in a circle and Skyhawk was invited to meet the other leaders.
After the introductions, Skyhawk had something to ask Song Jiang: "You have brought us here to the camp and introduced us to all the leaders, it wouldn't be difficult to accept your way of life, but what would become of my family? Please let me go back now."
"You are mistaken, sir," said the Professor with a smile. "Your family are all on their way to the camp and your manor is burnt to the ground. What would you go back to?"
Skyhawk couldn't believe his ears, until a moment later he saw carts, arms, men and horses filing up the mountain and recognized the people from his manor, with all his family and household. To his anxious questioning, his wife replied: "After the governor had taken you away, two inspectors and four sergeants came round with three hundred men and registered all our things. They asked us very politely to get in the carts and then fetched everything out of the house, boxes, trunks, cattle and sheep, horses, mules, donkeys and so on. Then they set fire to it and it burnt down."
Skyhawk cursed his fate when he heard this. Chao Gai and Song Jiang got up and came to apologize: "You see, we had heard so much good of you. That's why we thought up this scheme, we do ask you to forgive us."
They spoke so politely Skyhawk felt he had to go along with it.
Song Jiang said: "We would like you and your family to reside in the building at the side of the main hall."
Skyhawk saw that all the members of his own family were now among the leaders in the hall, at the front or at the back, and he said to his wife: "We must do as they say, then."
At the behest of Song Jiang and the others, the time was now devoted to conversation and rejoicing, and Song Jiang now spoke with a big smile on his face. "Sir, I'd like you to meet those two inspectors and the governor." The "governor" was in fact the Hand and the two "inspectors" were the Magic Messenger and Panther. The governor's secretary was Sterling, the court officers were the Craftsman and the Ape. He also introduced the four sergeants, who were the White-Water Dragon, White Eel, the Flautist and the Daytime Rat. Skyhawk looked on open-mouthed and speechless.
Song Jiang quickly called for oxen and horses to be killed and Skyhawk was invited to join them in celebrating the arrival of twelve new leaders, to wit Skyhawk himself, Colonel Sun and his brother Blackface, Snake and Scorpion, the Forester and Rhinoceros (uncle and nephew), Uglymug, Lungs, the Flea, the woman warrior Steelbright and Auntie Gu and also Mrs. Yue. A separate banquet was held for Skyhawk's family in the hall at the back. All the troops who had fought also had their reward. Amid much tootling of flutes and tapping of drums the company of heroes feasted in the main hall and did not break up till the early hours, when the new leaders retired to their allotted accommodation.
Next day another feast was held because there was a matter to be settled by all the leaders. Song Jiang called out Short-Arse and said to him: "Since the early days on Windy Mountain I promised you a wedding. It has been much on my mind that I have not yet fulfilled that promise. But now my father has a daughter whom he will offer you as wife."
Song Jiang asked Squire Song to bring forward Steelbright. He himself proposed to her on behalf of Short-Arse, saying: "This brother of mine, Wang Ying, whose martial skill is great, though not equal to yours, was originally promised a wife by me, but this business has long remained unfinished. Now, dear sister, you are my father's adopted daughter, all the rest of us here are the witnesses, this is a most auspicious day, so then, dear sister, will you accept to become the wife of Wang Ying?"
Seeing that Song Jiang was so honourable and serious, Steelbright could hardly refuse. In reply she kowtowed twice and thanked him. Chao Gai and the others were well pleased. They praised Song Jiang saying he was a true gentleman. The rest of the day was to be entirely devoted to feasting and celebration. During the banquet however a guard came up the mountain to report: "There is someone from Yuncheng district at the Crocodile's inn wanting to speak with you."
When they heard who it was, Chao Gai and Song Jiang were very excited. "If that honourable man is coming to join us, it will satisfy a long-felt wish." It was truly a case of:

No hero the man who mixes gratitude and revenge;
He who knows black from white is truly a man.

WU YONG sent Dai Zong to Liangshan Marsh to bring four other leaders to the camp.
That day Hu Cheng, brother of the girl Hu San Niang, the "Ten Feet of Green," arrived in the camp, and addressed Song Jiang, "My sister was very stupid in provoking your anger, and she deserved to be captured by you. I hope, however, that you will forgive her for her youthful rashness."
Song Jiang asked him to be seated, and then said, "The people of the Zhu Family Village have no sense of decency, and have repeatedly tried to deceive us. Therefore we have had to fight them yet we are on good terms with your village. Your sister had one of our leaders arrested so we had to treat her in the same way. We might exchange the prisoners, and so settle accounts."
"But our prisoner has already been taken away to the Zhu Family Village," said Hu Cheng. "I have no means of getting them to hand over the prisoner to you."
"In that case," said Song Jiang, "how can we release your sister?"
"There is another way," said Wu Yong, addressing Hu Cheng. "Your village must decline further assistance to the Zhu Family Village, and when they send a messenger to call for help you can arrest that man. If you do this then you can exchange that prisoner with us for your sister. You can now return and need not worry about her."
"We will never help them again," said Hu Cheng. He then departed.
Major Sun displayed a flag bearing his late official position, and duly arrived at the gate of the Zhu Family Village with his retinue. His arrival was duly reported, and Luan Tingyu at once recognized his old schoolmate. He went to the gate, had it opened, and welcomed Major Sun. They all entered the village.
Luan Tingyu asked how Major Sun came there at such a time, and the latter explained, "I have just been appointed to take command of the troops at Yunzhou, and guard the district against the brigands at Liangshan Marsh. As I was passing quite close to your village I thought that I would call and visit you."
Luan Tingyu then explained that the brigands had been attacking his village for several days, and that he was trying to capture the leader Song Jiang. The arrival of Major Sun was very opportune, like rain for dry grass.
Major Sun laughed, and said that he had no special ability, but he would help them in capturing the brigands. He made arrangements for quarters for his men and the horses and carts, and then changed his dress, and went to see old Zhu.
After the introduction and the usual salutations Major Sun said that as the village was in his district he would specially look to the advice and assistance of Old Zhu. He then inquired how their fighting against the brigands had resulted.
"We have not been very successful," said Dragon Zhu.
Major Sun then arranged for the ladies Gu Dasao and Yue to be introduced to the women's apartments. He then introduced Sun Xin, Xie Zhen, and Xie Bao as his younger brothers who were traveling with him. He introduced Yue He as a clerk of his yamen, and Zou Yuan and Zou Run as minor army officers.
Upon the third day after this an outpost reported that Song Jiang's troops were moving for another attack upon the village.
"Tiger's Cub" Zhu said he would go, and arrest the brigand's chief. He took about a hundred mounted men, and lowering the drawbridge left the village. He soon met a body of about five hundred brigands. He halted his men, and went forward alone. Hua Rong also advanced by himself to engage in combat. They met, but after about fifty bouts neither had any advantage. Hua Rong tried a ruse, and retired as though defeated. "Tiger's Cub" turned to pursue him when one of his men called out, "Do not pursue him as he may have some secret trap for you. Your opponent is a skilled bowman." "Tiger's Cub" listened to this advice, and stopped to pursue, but instead ordered a retreat into the village. Hua Rong also withdrew his men.
Upon reaching headquarters, "Tiger's Cub" told Major Sun about the fight, and how both had retired. They then all feasted together until well into the night.
The next day about noon Song Jiang's men were again advancing for an attack, and the three brothers Zhu all went with their men to repel the attack. There was a great noise of gongs and drums and a big display of flags. Zhu Chaofeng, the village chief, went on the gate tower, and sat down there with Luan Tingyu and Major Sun. Very soon they saw Lin Chong ride out from the brigands, and coming near the village gate he cursed loudly.
"Dragon" Zhu was annoyed at this, and mounted his horse. The drawbridge being lowered, he went across supported by a loud crashing of gongs and drums. He engaged in combat with Lin Chong, but after about thirty bouts neither had any advantage, and they both retired.
"Tiger" Zhu now mounted and dashed over the drawbridge. He was met by Mu Hong, and they had about thirty bouts without any definite result.
"Tiger's Cub" Zhu now took to the saddle, and was met by Yang Xiong, but again there was a draw.
Major Sun now called for his spear, and armor, and mounted his horse. He rode out to the bandits troop, and challenged the best man to come out and fight against him. Very soon Shi Xiu came out on horseback, and they had about fifty bouts. Then Major Sun by a trick let Shi Xiu thrust in with his spear, and by evading it, Major Sun suddenly seized hold of his opponent, dragged him off his horse, and carried him to the village gate. He was greeted by all the men as a great conqueror. Major Sun asked how many men had been captured so far, and was informed that this made the seventh. He said they must treat the prisoners well, because when they got Song Jiang they would send the whole lot in carts to the district city.
Major Sun sent Zou Yuan and Zou Run to visit the prisoners, and secretly told them of the plans for the coming struggle.
On the fifth day Song Jiang again had his men advancing for an attack. Major Sun now suggested that the defenders be not excited but be prepared to take prisoners instead of trying to kill the enemy. This was agreed to and arranged. Zhu Chaofeng again took his seat at the observation post on the tower above the gate. He saw large bodies of men on all sides, and it looked as though this was to be the final mass attack. The three brothers and also Luan Tingyu were ready to take their men out of the four gates to meet the bandits.
The war drums were beaten, and a rocket fired in the village, the four gates were opened, the drawbridge lowered, and the armed men rushed out of the gates. Major Sun had charge of his own men, and took up his position on the bridge in front of the main gate. His brother Sun Xin took the official flag, and stuck it on the tower over the gate. Upon a signal from Yue He the other leaders of the bandits inside the village blew whistles and attacked the villagers who were guarding the prison van. They soon broke open the van, released the seven brigands, and armed them. Gu Dasao seized two swords, and went into the rooms of Old Zhu, killing any woman she met. Zhu Chaofeng saw all this on the tower over the gate, but before he could raise an alarm he was killed by Shi Xiu. The brigands under Major Sun now attacked the villagers at the gate. Xie Zhen and Xie Bao went to the stables, and set fire to the fodder storage. The brigands under Song Jiang seeing the great fire pressed onward their attack.
"Tiger" Zhu seeing the fire, galloped back towards the village, but was stopped at the gate by Major Sun. He realized the treachery, and beat a hasty retreat. But he was confronted by Lu Fang and Guo Sheng who soon overcame him and killed him. The villagers, seeing their leaders killed, scattered in all directions. The bandits under Song Jiang now had a clear road, and advancing on the main entrance were admitted by Major Sun and his men.
At the other gate, "Dragon" Zhu had also failed to defeat Lin Chong in personal combat, and seeing the fire at the rear gate had also galloped back to the village. At the gate he saw Xie Zhen and Xie Bao throwing the dead bodies of villagers from the wall, and he retreated. He then met Li Kui with his two axes, and in a short encounter was soon overcome, and killed.
"Tiger's Cub" Zhu got reports of the treachery in his rear, and realizing that it was useless to retreat he led his men in the direction of the Hu Family Village. Upon arriving there he was arrested by Hu Cheng who intended to send him bound as a prisoner to Song Jiang. Shortly afterwards, however, Li Kui appeared and he at once took the "Tiger's Cub" and killed him on the spot. The villagers seeing this all scattered. Li Kui now advanced to attack Hu Cheng who mounted his horse, and galloped off. Li Kui continued his way through the Hu Family Village killing the whole family of Old Hu. Li Kui and his men looted the farmstead, and then set fire to it.
The leaders of the bandits assembled in the main hall. Song Jiang was highly elated at the victory, but expressed his regret at the death of Luan Tingyu. When he heard that the Hu Family Village had been looted and burnt, he asked why that had been done seeing that the chief Hu Cheng had been friendly towards them only a few days ago. Li Kui stepped forward. He was covered with blood, and had his two axes stuck in his belt. He said, "I killed the 'Dragon,' and 'Tiger's Cub,' but Hu Cheng got away on horseback. I made a clean sweep of the whole family of Old Hu. I now report my meritorious conduct."
"It has been reported already that you have killed 'Dragon' Zhu, but nobody has confirmed your other statements," said Song Jiang.
Li Kui then gave details of what he had done.
"But why did you do such a thing in defiance of my order that Hu Cheng and his village should be spared."
"You forget, but I remember," said Li Kui. "The 'Ten Feet of Green,' Hu San Niang was sister of Hu Cheng, and she wanted to goddamn kill you a few days ago. You must not expect to make her your wife."
"'Iron Ox,' you should not talk such nonsense," said Song Jiang. "Why should I want her as a wife when I have other plans for her? How many prisoners did you take alive?"
"None. If I saw one alive I killed him at once."
"You do not observe my orders. I ought to have you executed for that, but this time I will excuse you because you killed 'Dragon' Zhu, and 'Tiger's Cub' Zhu, and many others. In future, however, if you do not carry out my orders I shall certainly have you executed."
Li Kui laughed and said, "I may have no merit, but I certainly have had the pleasure of killing people."
Song Jiang then discussed with Wu Yong as to whether they should kill everybody in the village, and make a clean sweep of their enemies. But Shi Xiu pointed out that there were some good and innocent people in the village, and mentioned, as an instance, Old Zhongli who had shown him the roads in the village. Song Jiang asked Shi Xiu to go, and find the man, and bring him there. In a short time Shi Xiu returned with Old Zhongli who saluted Song Jiang and Wu Yong. Song Jiang presented him with some silver and said, "Because of your benevolent assistance to one of our leaders I show mercy to all the people in this village. We have thought of exterminating everybody, but on account of your great virtue we will spare their lives. We have been victorious, and have killed all those who were really opposed to us. We will even give each family in this village a picul of rice, in order to show our good intentions. We will entrust the distribution of the rice to you, as you are a good upright man."
All the valuables in the village and also the cows, sheep, and horses were sent to Liangshan Marsh. After the rice had been distributed as promised there was still about 50,000 piculs left which were also sent to Liangshan Marsh. The new recruits with Major Sun were duly admitted to the band, and all then went to Liangshan Marsh.
Now Li Ying had been wounded by an arrow, and he did not take part in all this. He remained in his village, and had messengers who reported to him all that had taken place in the Zhu Family Village. When the bandits had all gone a messenger reported to him one day that the Prefect had arrived in the village, and was making an investigation. Li Ying dressed up in his best silks, and went to meet the Prefect. The Prefect was seated in the main hall of his farmstead. With him were a recorder, a clerk, several servants, and many jailers. Li Ying saluted, and stood to attention. The Prefect asked him what he knew of the attack on the village.
"I was wounded by an arrow shot at me by 'Tiger's Cub' Zhu. I was confined indoors, and did not know the fighting."
"Nonsense!" remarked the Prefect. "I received a petition from the Zhu Family Village stating that you had brought the brigands from Liangshan Marsh to attack that village. They looted the village and you received their presents, but how is it that you did not go back with them?"
"I know the law in such matters," said Li Ying, "how dare I receive bribery from the bandits?"
"It is hard to believe what you say," said the Prefect. "I must arrest you, send you to the court where you can answer the charges made against you by the villagers." Li Ying was arrested, and bound, Du Xing was also arrested, and then they all mounted their horses, and set off.
They had gone only about ten li when they were stopped in a forest by Song Jiang and four other leaders. With the brigands was Lin Chong who shouted out, "We are from Liangshan Marsh," and the Prefect and his escort upon hearing this galloped away leaving the prisoners behind. Song Jiang ordered a party to pursue the men, who soon returned and reported that they had all escaped. The two prisoners were released, and given horses to ride on.
Song Jiang suggested to Li Ying and Du Xing, the prisoners, that it would be better if they both took refuge at Liangshan Marsh.
"That will not do," said Li Ying, "because you tried to kill the Prefect, and I had nothing to do with it."
Song Jiang laughed, "The court will not discriminate as to who among us killed the Prefect. If we go and leave you the officials will arrest you as being implicated. If you do not care to join our band, then you can leave us after staying at Liangshan Marsh until things settle down."
The two men saw no means of declining this offer as they were completely in the hands of the bandits so they fell in with the proposal, and accompanied them to the mountain. Upon arriving there they were duly introduced to all the leaders. Li Ying then asked that a man be sent to the village to find out how his people were faring as he was rather anxious about them.
Wu Yong laughed at this and said, "All your people are already here, and as the whole village has been burnt down what is the use for you to go back?"
Li Ying did not believe this until he saw many of his villagers about. Among the prisoners he even saw his wife who told him, "When you had left with the Prefect and inspectors about three hundred soldiers came to the village, and arrested us. They took all the cattle, and set fire to the houses and buildings." Li Ying was very much upset. Chao Gai and Song Jiang however bowed to Li Ying, and said, "We brought you all here because we heard that you're a good man. We hope that you'll excuse us for taking such liberties." Li Ying agreed to let matters remain as they were. Song Jiang then explained that the Prefect, inspectors, and soldiers who had taken him and Du Xing as prisoners, and had taken all the villagers to mount Liang Marsh were his own followers who had acted the part of officials. When the men were pointed out to Li Ying he recognized them, and was astounded at the way in which he and his people had been duped. Song Jiang spoke to the "Ten Feet of Green," Hu San Niang, and suggested that she should marry Wang Ying. She agreed to this, and the marriage took place soon afterwards. A few days afterwards, a messenger arrived from Zhu Gui, and said that there was a guest staying at the inn who wished to meet Song Jiang. Song Jiang was pleased to hear this and willing to receive the man.

Black and white all people know,
Bandits know their enemies.

149

The aroused Sergeant Winged Tiger Lei Hits & Kills singer Bai Xiuying with his Cangue; the Handsome Whiskers Loses & Misses the Official Prefect's innocent Little Son

"A band of travellers were passing the forest along the highway when our men stopped them," said the messenger. "One is Constable Lei Heng from Yuncheng Town. Chieftain Zhu Gui has invited him to the inn, where he is now being wined and dined. I was sent to report."
Chao Gai and Song Jiang were overjoyed. Together with Wu Yong, they went down the mountain. Zhu Gui had already ferried their guest to the Shore of Golden Sands. Song Jiang hastily kowtowed.

"It's been a long time since we parted," he said. "I've thought of you often. What brings you to our humble abode?"
Lei Heng returned the courtesy. "I was sent on official business by my local county to the prefecture of Dongchang. On the way back, I was stopped at the crossroads by bandits who demanded passage money. When I mentioned my name, brother Zhu Gui insisted that I stay with him for a while."
"A Heaven-sent good fortune!"
Song Jiang invited Lei Heng to the fortress, introduced him to the leaders, and feted him with wine. For five days, they met and chatted every day. Chao Gai inquired after Zhu Tong.
"He's now the warden of our county jail," said Lei Heng. "The new magistrate is very fond of him."
Song Jiang brought the conversation around to Lei Heng joining the band. But the constable said: "My mother is very old. I can't abandon her. I'll join you after she's lived out her final years."
He kowtowed and bid them farewell. Try as he might, Song Jiang could not persuade him to remain. The other leaders presented him with precious gifts, as did, of course, Song Jiang and Chao Gai.
Lei Heng went down the mountain with a large bundle of gold and silver. The leaders saw him off to the foot of the road. There he was ferried across to the highway and returned to Yuncheng. Of that no more need be said.
As to Chao Gai and Song Jiang, on coming back to Fraternity Hall they requested Wu Yong, military advisor of the stronghold, to determine the assignments of the various leaders. Wu Yong consulted with Song Jiang and, the following day, all were summoned to hear the dispositions. The first were those in the inns on the outer perimeter.
"Sun Xin and Gu Dasao were tavern-keepers originally," said Song Jiang. "We're instructing them to replace Tong Wei and Tong Meng, for whom we have another use. Shi Qian shall help Shi Yong, Yue Ho shall help Zhu Gui, Zheng Tianshou shall help LiLi. Thus, we will have taverns to the north, east, south and west, each selling wine and meat, and each with two chieftains, to receive bold fellows from all over. Ten Feet of Steel and Stumpy Tiger Wang shall hold the lower part of the rear mountain and look after the horses. The small fort at the Shore of Golden Sands shall be commanded by the brothers Tong Wei and Tong Meng. The small fort at Duck's Bill Shore shall be held by uncle and nephew Zou Yuan and Zou Run. The road in front of the mountain shall be guarded by a troop of cavalry under Huang Xin and Yan Shun. Xie Zhen and Xie Bao shall hold the first pass in the front of the mountain, Du Qian and Song Wan the second, Liu Tang and Mu Hong the third. The three Ruan brothers shall guard the water fortifications on the south side. Meng Kang shall continue to be in charge of boat building. Li Ying, Du Xing and Jiang Jing shall supervise all money, grain, and gold. Tao Zongwang and Xue Yong shall control building and repair of rampart walls and terraces. Hou Jian shall govern the making of clothes, armor, banners and military garments. Zhu Fu and Song Qing shall arrange the feasts. Mu Chun and Li Yun shall build the housing and the palisades. Xiao Rang and Jin Dajian shall deal with all correspondence and documents regarding guests. Pei Xuan shall head the legal department, and dispense rewards and punishments. Lu Fang, Guo Sheng, Sun Li, Ou Peng, Ma Lin, Deng Fei, Yang Lin and Bai Sheng shall control the stronghold's various hostels. Chao Gai, Song Jiang and Wu Yong will live on the summit in the center, Hua Rong and Qin Ming will live to the left, Lin Chong and Dai Zong will live to the right—all within the fortress. Li Jun and Li Kui will live on the front of the mountain, Zhang Heng and Zhang Shun on the rear. Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu will protect both sides of Fraternity Hall."
The assignments having been made, one chieftain was feasted each successive day. The organization of the mountain fortress was now tight and efficient.

*

After leaving Liangshan Marsh, Lei Heng, shouldering his pack and carrying his halberd, made tracks for Yuncheng. At home he saw his mother and changed his clothes. Taking the official reply, he called on the magistrate in the county office, reported verbally, and handed over the various documents and endorsements. Then he returned home to rest.
As usual he signed in and checked out at the county office every day, while awaiting a new assignment. He was walking down a street one day when a voice hailed him from behind.
"When did you get back, Constable?"
Lei Heng turned around. It was an idler known as Li the Second.
"Only a couple of days ago."
"You were gone for quite a while. Maybe you haven't heard. A travelling singer has come from the Eastern Capital. She's beautiful and talented. Her name is Bai Xiuying. The wench called to see you but you were out on a mission. She's performing at the theater now. She sings all kinds of ditties. They put on a variety show every day there—dancing, music, and singing. The place is jammed. Why don't you go and have a look? She's a delicious little actress."
Lei Heng, having nothing better to do, went to the theater with Li the Second.
Placards in letters of gold had been put up all around the entrance, and from a flagpole a vertical banner hung down almost to the ground. They went in and took the first seats on the left. A preliminary-act comedian was performing on stage. Li left Lei Heng in the crowd and slipped out for a drink.
After the comedian finished an old man came out. He wore a bandanna covering his forehead, a tea-colored silk gown bound by a black waist sash, and carried a fan.
"Bai Yuqiao from the Eastern Capital, that's me. I rely in my old age on my daughter Xiuying, who sings and dances and plays musical instruments. We travel all over and entertain."
A gong crashed and the girl came on stage. She bowed in each direction. She plied her stick against the gong with such rapidity that it sounded like scattering peas. Then she cut it short with one sharp blow and recited:

Twittering fledglings soar as old birds return,
Gaunt grow the old sheep while lambkins wax fat,
Men struggle a lifetime for clothing and food,
But lovebirds fly freely to where pleasure is at.

Lei Heng shouted his applause.
"Next on my program," said the girl, "is a romantic story called 'A Love Pursues in Yuzhang City.' " She spoke a few words and began to sing, alternately talking and singing while the audience in the mat-awning-covered courtyard roared approvingly.
Just as Xiuying reached the climax of the tale, the old man interrupted.
" 'Though not such a skill as earns horses and gold, it moves men of intelligence,' " he averred. "You gentlemen have applauded. Now, daughter, come down. The next act is rattling the drum with money ..."
The girl took up a platter, pointed at it, and chanted: "I'll go to the rich, halt where there's gain, pass when I'm lucky, and head for prosperity. When I place this before you, don't let it go away empty."
"Walk among them, daughter. Which one of you gentlemen will start us off?"
Holding the platter, the girl approached Lei Heng. The constable groped in his purse. He hadn't a penny.
"I forgot my money today. I'll bring you some tomorrow."
Xiuying laughed. " 'If the first brew of vinegar isn't strong, the second is sure to be even flatter.' Sitting in a front seat, you ought to set a good example."
Lei Heng reddened. "I didn't bring any money. It's not that I'm unwilling."
"You remembered to come to hear me sing, sir. Why didn't you remember your money?"
"I could give you four or five ounces of silver. It means nothing to me. Unfortunately I forgot to bring any."
"You haven't a penny in your pocket, and you talk grandly of four or five pieces of silver! Do you expect me to 'Slake my thirst looking at a sour plum' or 'Assuage my hunger with a drawing of a muffin'?"
"Have you no eyes, daughter?" Bai Yuqiao called. "Can't you tell the difference between a city man and a rube? Don't waste your time on him. Ask some kind gentlemen who has a little sense to start us off."
"Are you saying I haven't any sense?" Lei Heng demanded.
"If you know how a polished scholar should act, a dog's head can sprout horns!" the old man retorted.
A noisy stir ran through the audience. Lei Heng grew angry.
"You cheap lackey! How dare you insult me!"
"Does it matter what I say to a cowherd like you?"
Someone in the audience recognized Lei Heng, and he cried: "Stop talking like that. He's our county's Constable Lei."
"Did you say 'constable' or 'constipated'?" Yuqiao sneered.
Lei Heng couldn't contain himself. He leaped from his chair onto the stage and seized the old man. With one punch and one kick he puffed up his lips and knocked out a couple of teeth. The attack was fierce, and others rushed to separate them. Lei Heng was persuaded to go home, and the audience hastily departed.
Now it happened that the singer had been intimate with the new magistrate when he was still in the Eastern Capital, and this was one of the reasons she had brought her show to Yuncheng. After Lei Heng gave here father such a drubbing, she called a sedan-chair and went directly to the magistrate.
"Lei Heng beat up my father and drove out my audience. He's deliberately abusing me."
"Draw up a complaint, immediately," the magistrate heatedly exclaimed, in a clear demonstration of the influence of "pillow power." He also examined the old man's injuries and had these noted as evidence.
Lei Heng had friends in the county office, and they tried to intercede for him. But they couldn't prevail against the girl. She refused to leave, and pouted and flounced until the magistrate had to give in. Lei Heng was arrested, brought before the court, beaten till he confessed, collared with a cangue, and an order issued that he be paraded in the streets. At the girl's insistence, the magistrate instructed that Lei Heng be put on display at the theater door.
The next day, when Xiuying went to perform, Lei Heng stood by the entrance way. The guards were public servants like Lei Heng himself, and they were reluctant to strip him, as this type of punishment required. The girl thought: "I've already come out against him openly. Why fear to infuriate him further?"
She went to a nearby tea-house, sat down, and called the guards over. "You're all closely connected, so you go easy on him," she said. "The magistrate ordered you to display Lei Heng, bound and stripped, but you're too full of sympathy. Just wait till I tell the magistrate! We'll see whether I can cope with you or not!"
"Don't lost your temper, madam. If we have to, we'll strip him."
"In that case, I'll reward you."
The guards had no choice but to remove Lei Heng's clothes there on the street. "We can't help ourselves, brother," they said apologetically.
During this turmoil, Lei Heng's mother arrived, bringing him food. She saw him standing there, naked, and she started to cry.
"You work in the magistrate's office, just like my son," she berated the guards. "Is it worth the money she gave you to act like this? You might get into trouble yourself, some day."
"Listen, old mother, we wanted to do the right thing. But the complainant came to see the 'bound and stripped' sentence enforced, and we couldn't refuse. She threatened to make things hot for us with the magistrate. So we couldn't save face for Lei Heng."
"Who ever heard of a complainant seeing to it in person that a sentence is carried out?"
A guard lowered his voice. "She's very close to the magistrate, old mother. One word from her and we're sent up. That's why we're in such a fix."
The old woman began opening Lei Heng's bonds. "That slut knows how to use her connections. I'm going to untie this rope. Let's see what she can do about it."
Xiuying, in the tea-house, heard all this. She walked over. "What did you just say, old baggage?"
Lei Heng's mother pointed at her angrily. "You've been mounted and pressed by thousands, you screw for any man who comes along, you bitch! What right have you to swear at me?"
Xiuying's willow tendril eyebrows contracted, her starry eyes glared. "Old bawd," she screamed. "Beggar woman! How dare a low person like you curse me?"
"What are you going to do about it? You're not the magistrate of Yuncheng!"
The actress rushed up and with one push sent the old woman staggering. Before she could steady herself, Xiuying closed in and slapped her left and right.
Lei Heng, a filial son, was enraged. He raised his cangue and brought it down on Xiuying's head. A corner of it struck her squarely and split open her skull. She collapsed to the ground, her brain matter flowing, her eyes bulging, absolutely motionless. Plainly, she was dead.
The others at once brought Lei Heng to the magistrate and reported. The magistrate directed that Lei Heng be taken to the scene under guard, together with county officials, the district chief and witnesses, and that an examination of the body be conducted. This done, all returned to the court, where Lei Heng freely confessed. His mother, under surety to appear, was ordered to return home and await further instructions. Lei Heng, a cangue around his neck, was committed to prison.
The warden of the prison was Zhu Tong the Beautiful Beard. When Lei Heng was delivered, he couldn't do much for him. But he treated him to wine and food, and instructed a guard to sweep out and prepare a clean cell. Not long after, Lei Heng's mother also brought food.
Weeping, she said to Zhu Tong: "I'm over sixty, and this child is everything to me. You two have been such friends. Have pity and look after him."
"Don't worry, old mother. You needn't bring him food any more. I'll take care of everything. If I can find the chance, I'll save him."
"Do that and you'll be like my parents reborn! If anything should happen to him, it would be the end of me!"
"I'll remember. You can rest assured."
The old woman thanked him and left.
Zhu Tong tried to think of a way to rescue Lei Heng, but in vain. He asked someone to intercede with the magistrate, and spread bribes among high and low. The magistrate was very fond of Zhu Tong, but he hated Lei Heng for having killed his paramour, and was deaf to all pleas. What's more, the old scoundrel Bai Yuqiao flooded the magistracy with petitions that Lei Heng pay for his daughter's life with his own. And so, after sixty days of detention, Lei Heng was ordered committed to the prison in Jizhou Prefecture. The record scribe was sent on ahead with the relevant documents, and Zhu Tong was directed to deliver the prisoner there under armed escort.
Zhu Tong selected a dozen guards and left Yuncheng with Lei Heng. After marching ten li they came to a tavern.
"Let's have a few bowls of wine," Zhu Tong suggested.
Everyone went into the tavern and drank. Zhu Tong took Lei Heng out in the back, as if they were going to relieve themselves. In a secluded spot, he opened the cangue and freed him.
"Go home, brother, quickly, and get your mother. Travel all night, find refuge. I'll take the consequences."
"I don't mind fleeing, but you'll be implicated."
"Brother, you don't know. The magistrate is furious that you've killed his doxy. You're under sentence of death. If you went to the prefecture, they'd surely execute you. Letting you go isn't a capital offense. I have no parents to worry about. It doesn't matter if all my property is confiscated in recompense. Go as far as you can, and quickly."
Lei Heng kowtowed his thanks. He hurried home along a path from the rear door. He gathered his valuables and departed with his mother. They travelled through the night to Liangshan Marsh, where he joined the band. Of that no more need be said.

*

Zhu Tong buried the cangue in the deep grass. He emerged and shouted: "Lei Heng has escaped. This is terrible!"
"We'll chase him to his home and bring him back," exclaimed the guards.
Zhu Tong delayed them to give Lei Heng time to go a long distance, then returned to the county office.
"I was careless," he confessed. "The prisoner got away on the road. We searched without success. I'm willing to accept any punishment."
The magistrate liked Zhu Tong very much. He would have preferred to let him off. But Bai Yuqiao threatened to go to a higher court and accuse Zhu Tong of deliberately letting Lei Heng escape. The magistrate had no choice but to report the matter to the prefecture of Jizhou. Zhu Tong's family immediately sent someone there who spread bribes around liberally. When the constable was remanded to Jizhou the prefect knew all about it. He imposed a sentence of twenty blows, and ordered that Zhu Tong be committed to the prison in the prefecture of Cangzhou.
Zhu Tong, a cangue for travelling around his neck, set out with two guards carrying the relevant documents. Members of his family gave him clothing and money, after tipping the guards. On leaving Yuncheng, the party followed a winding road to Henghai County in Cangzhou Prefecture. The trip was uneventful.
The prefect was holding court when the guards delivered the documents and their prisoner. He could see that Zhu Tong, with his ruddy face and handsome beard extending down past his middle, was no ordinary person. Favorably impressed, the prefect said: "Don't take this man to prison. I want him here in the prefecture as my attendant."
The cangue was removed, a reply was written, and the two guards took their leave and returned to Yuncheng.
From then on Zhu Tong served in the prefectural office. He dispensed a certain amount of largesse among the sheriffs, captains, keepers of the gates, messengers, jailors and guards. Since he had an amiable disposition as well, he was liked by all.
One day the prefect was sitting in his court. Zhu Tong stood below in attendance. Summoning him forward, the prefect asked: "Why did you let Lei Heng go and end up here?"
"I would never have dared to do that. It's just that I was careless, and he escaped."
"Did you really deserve such a severe punishment?"
"The complainant in the original case insisted that I confess to having released him. So the sentence had to be severe."
"Why did Lei Heng kill that singer?"
Zhu Tong explained the circumstances in detail.
"Then you considered him filial and thought letting him go was the only chivalrous thing to do?"

"Would I have had the temerity to deceive the authorities?"
Just then, from behind a screen, the prefect's little son came out. Only four years old, he was a pretty child, and the prefect loved him better than gold or jade. The boy went directly to Zhu Tong and asked to be picked up. Zhu Tong held him in his arms, and the child grabbed his long beard.
"I want this bearded fellow to carry me. No one else," piped the little boy.
"Let go of him," said the prefect. "Behave yourself."
"I want him to carry me. I want him to take me out to play."
"I'll take him outside for a stroll," Zhu Tong suggested. "We'll be back soon."
"All right," said the prefect. "Since that's what he wants."
Zhu Tong carried the child to the street and bought him some good sweets. After a short while, he brought him back.
"Where did you go?" the prefect asked the little boy.
"This bearded fellow took me on the street to play. And he bought me sweets and fruit."
"You shouldn't have spent your own money," the prefect said to Zhu Tong politely.
"Only a small token of my esteem," said Zhu Tong. "It's not worth mentioning."
The prefect ordered wine for the constable. A serving girl brought a silver pitcher and platter and poured Zhu Tong three large beakers of wine in succession.
"Any time the child wants you to take him to play, you can carry him out for a walk."
"Your wish is my command, Excellency."
Thereafter, Zhu Tong took the little boy for a stroll every day. He had money in his purse and he wanted the prefect to be pleased, so he spent it on the child freely.
Half a month went by, and it was the fifteenth day of the seventh month—the Driving Out of Devils Festival. Glowing lanterns were set afloat upon the river, and people prayed and did good deeds. That evening, the nursemaid spoke to Zhu Tong.
"The child wants to see the river lanterns, Constable. Madam, his mother, says you can take him."
Zhu Tong promised he would. The little boy was dressed in a green silk robe, and short strings of beads were tied to the two tufts of hair sticking up like horns on the top of his head. Zhu Tong carried him on his shoulder as they left the gate of the prefectural compound and walked towards the temple. Lighted lanterns were sailing upon the water.
It was early evening. Zhu Tong strolled around the temple grounds with the little boy. People were earning blessings by setting live fish free in a special pool. The child climbed on a railing overlooking the river and watched happily as the lanterns floated by. A man behind Zhu Tong tugged him by the sleeve.
"Brother, would you come away a moment so we can talk?"
Zhu Tong looked around. To his surprise, there was Lei Heng.
"Get off that railing and sit here," Zhu Tong said to the child. "I'm going to buy you some candy. Don't leave this spot."
"Come back quickly. I want to watch the river lanterns from the bridge."
"I'll only be a minute." He turned and went off with Lei Heng.
"What are you doing here?" Zhu Tong asked.
Lei Heng pulled him into a secluded corner and said: "After you saved me, I had no other place to go with my old mother, so I joined Song Jiang's band in Liangshan Marsh. I told them of your benevolence, and Song recalled your kindness to him in previous days. Chao Gai and the other leaders were extremely moved. They sent me and Military Advisor Wu Yong to see you."
"Where is Teacher Wu?"
A man stepped out from behind him. "Wu Yong is here." He kowtowed.
Zhu Tong hastily returned the courtesy. "It's been a long time, Teacher," he said. "I trust all has been well with you?"
"Our stronghold leaders send their respects. They've deputed Constable Lei Heng and me to invite you up our mountain to join our righteous assembly. Though many days have passed, we haven't dared to approach you. Tonight, we meet at last. Please come with us to our fortress and satisfy the wish of our highest chieftains, Chao Gai and Song Jiang."
For some time Zhu Tong was unable to answer. Finally, he said: "Teacher, you're making a mistake. You mustn't ask me that. Suppose we were overheard? Brother Lei Heng committed a death-penalty crime. Out of chivalry I allowed him to escape. He could no longer let himself be seen, so he went up the mountain and joined your band. Because of him, I've been exiled here. But if Heaven is merciful, in another year or so I'll be able to go home and become a respectable citizen again. Why should I do the sort of thing you propose? Please go back, both of you. Staying here, you may cause misunderstanding."
"But, brother, you're only an attendant, here," Lei Heng argued. "That's no job for a real man. It's not only me who wants you to join us. Our highest chieftains have both been hoping to see you for a long time. What will they think if you delay?"
"Brother, what are you saying? You haven't thought. I let you escape because your mother was old and your family poor. Now you suggest I'm lacking in chivalry."
Wu Yong interceded. "Since the constable doesn't want to go, we shall bid farewell and leave."
"Please give my humble regards to the chieftains," said Zhu Tong. They walked together towards the bridge.
There was no sign of the little boy. Zhu Tong groaned. He searched high and low. Lei Heng grasped his arm. "Don't bother looking, brother. Probably the two men who came with us, when they heard you say you wouldn't go, took the child away. We'll go find them, together."
"This is no time for jokes. That little boy is the prefect's very life. I'm responsible for him."
"Brother, just come with me."
Zhu Tong, Lei Heng and Wu Yong left the temple and went outside the city. Zhu Tong was quite upset.
"Where have they gone with the child?" he demanded.
"We'll go to my place, brother," said Lei Heng. "I'll return him to you."
"The prefect will be angry if I get back late."
"Those two who came with us are ignorant fellows," said Wu Yong. "They must have taken him to where we're living."
"What's their names?" asked Zhu Tong.
"I don't know them," said Lei Heng. "I heard one of them being called Black Whirlwind."
Zhu Tong was shocked. "Not the fellow who killed those people in Jiangzhou?"
"That's the man," said Wu Yong.
Zhu Tong stamped his feet in anguish and groaned, then hurried on. When they were about twenty //from the city, they saw Li Kui the Black Whirlwind ahead.
"Here I am," called the big fellow.
Zhu Tong hastened up to him. "Where is the prefect's son?"
Li Kui hailed him respectfully. "Greetings, brother Warden. The child is here."
"Bring him out, then, and give him to me."
Li Kui pointed to his own hair. "I'm wearing his bead decorations."
Zhu Tong looked, and demanded in alarm: "Where is he now?"
"I put a drug in his mouth and carried him from the city. He's sleeping in that grove. Please see for yourself."
It was a bright moonlit night, and Zhu Tong plunged in among the trees. He saw the little boy lying dead on the ground.
Zhu Tong rushed out the grove, enraged. The three men were gone. He peered in every direction. Then he saw Black Whirlwind standing in the distance. The big man smote his battle-axes. "Come on. Come on!" he cried.
Wild with fury, Zhu Tong hitched up his robe and tore after him. Li Kui continued retreating, with Zhu Tong in pursuit. But what chance had he to catch up with the experienced mountain traveller? Soon he was gasping for breath.
Ahead of him, Li Kui called again: "Come on. Come on."
The seething Zhu Tong wanted to swallow him down in one gulp. But he couldn't get near him. The chase dragged on through the night. Gradually, the sky brightened. Li Kui moved faster when Zhu Tong speeded up, slower when he lagged, and not at all when he halted. Zhu Tong saw him enter a large manor.
"The rogue has gone to ground at last," thought the constable. "Now I can have it out with him."
He hurried into the courtyard and halted in front of a large hall. In racks on either side were many weapons. "This must be some big official's residence," he thought. He called: "Is anyone at home?"
A man emerged from behind a screen. And who was it? None other than Chai Jin the Small Whirlwind.
"Who are you?" Chai Jin enquired.
When Zhu Tong saw this handsome and graceful lord, he bowed and replied: "My name is Zhu Tong. I was warden of the Yucheng prison. But I committed a crime and was exiled here. Last night I took the little son of the prefect to watch the lantern floating on the river, and Black Whirlwind killed him. He's here now in your manor. May I trouble you to help me seize him and turn him over to the authorities?"
"Since you are Beautiful Beard, please be seated."
"May I beg to ask your name, my lord?"
"I'm Chai Jin, and am called the Small Whirlwind."
"I've long known of your great name." Zhu Tong kowtowed. "I didn't expect to have the honor of meeting you today."
"Your name has also been long known to me, sir. Please come into the rear hall where we can talk."
As he followed Lord Chai inside Zhu Tong asked: "How does that scoundrel Black Whirlwind dare to hide in your manor?"
"That's easy. I have always welcomed bold men of the gallant fraternity. An ancestor of mine gave up the throne, and because of that the first Song emperor bestowed on my ancestors the Wrought Iron Pledge. When a wrongdoer takes refuge with us, no searchers dare enter. A dear friend of mine knows you well. He's one of the leaders in Liangshan Marsh—Song Jiang, called the Timely Rain. He wrote a secret letter instructing Wu Yong, Lei Heng and Black Whirlwind to stay here at my place and invite you to go with them up the mountain and join the band. Since you couldn't be persuaded, Song ordered Li Kui to kill the prefect's son, to cut off any chance of you returning to the city, and thus compelling you to go to the stronghold and assume a chair of leadership. Teacher Wu, brother Lei, aren't you coming out to apologize?"
The two men emerged from an anteroom and kowtowed before Zhu Tong. "Forgive us, brother," they said. "We were acting on brother Song Jiang's orders. If you go with us to the fortress, you'll understand."
"I know you brothers meant well, but your methods were too cruel!"
Chai Jin murmured soothing words. "I'll go if I have to, but I want to see Black Whirlwind first!"
"Brother Li," the lord called. "Come out and apologize."
Li Kui walked from a side room and voiced loudly a respectful greeting. The sight of him sent flames spurting 30000 feet high in Zhu Tong's heart. He couldn't control his rage. He rushed towards Li Kui murderously. It took the combined efforts of Chai Jin, Lei Heng and Wu Yong to restrain him. "I'll go up the mountain," said Zhu Tong. "But first you've to promise me one thing."
"Not one but scores if you so desire," said Wu Yong. "What's it you wish?" And because of Zhu Tong's request, there was turmoil in Gaotang Prefecture and strife in the mount Liang Marsh stronghold. A noble patron of learning fell into the clutches of the law; a hospitable relative of the emperor was cast into a dungeon.

Now on the day that Song Jiang arranged the marriage of Steelbright and Short-Arse and everyone praised him for his humanity and a feast was held to celebrate the event, a messenger came up from the Crocodile's inn to report: "Our men have stopped a group of travellers who were passing near the wood on the highway, and apparently one of them is Sergeant Lei from Yuncheng. The Crocodile has invited him to stay. He is being well looked after with wine and food at the inn. They sent me to tell you."
Chao Gai and Song Jiang were very excited by this news, and with the Professor and all the other leaders they went down the mountain to welcome the newcomer, whom the Crocodile had already sent across in the boat to Golden Sands Landing.
Song Jiang hurriedly prostrated himself and said: "It's a long time since I saw you, but you have always been in my thoughts. What brings you here to our place?"
Sergeant Lei immediately returned the courtesy and said: "I was sent by my office on official business to Dongchang district. I was just on my way back when I was stopped at the crossroads by a group of men who demanded I pay a toll. When I happened to mention my name, Mr. Zhu began insisting that I should stay."
"Heaven be thanked for this!" Song Jiang exclaimed. He ushered Sergeant Lei into the main hall and all the leaders were invited to meet him. Wine was served. Sergeant Lei stayed five days and each day conversed with Song Jiang. It occurred to Chao Gai to ask Sergeant Lei for news of his colleague, Sergeant Zhu, and he answered: "Sergeant Zhu is now working in the prison service of our district, the new governor is very pleased with him." Song Jiang brought the conversation round to the subject of Sergeant Lei's joining the company on Mount Liang. He refused, pleading an aged mother as his excuse. He would join them, he said, when she passed away.
Eventually Sergeant Lei prostrated himself and announced his intention of departing. Although Song Jiang and the others repeatedly urged him to stay he would not. All the leaders gave him presents of money and silk; Song Jiang and Chao Gai were no exception of course. With a big bag to carry this booty, Sergeant Lei set off down the mountain, the leaders seeing him off as far as the road. After crossing on the ferry he took the road to Yuncheng. Of this no more.
When Chao Gai and Song Jiang returned to the Assembly Hall in the main camp, they asked the Professor to assign the various duties. The Professor did so, after discussing it with Song Jiang, and all the leaders were invited to assemble to hear the roster read.
"Blackface and Auntie Gu," Song Jiang began, "are innkeepers by trade, so I want them to replace the two Tong brothers, who will be employed elsewhere." He went on to assign the Flea to assist the Guv at his inn, Lungs to assist the Crocodile and Whitey to assist the Executioner, Li Li, so that each of the four inns north, south, east and west, was now provided with two leaders, selling wine and food and recruiting good men from all over the place. "Steelbright and Short-Arse can go to the other side of the mountain and look after the horses. Let the two Tong brothers guard Golden Sands Landing. Let the Forester and Rhinoceros guard Duck's-Bill Landing. The Tamer and the Dandy are to go down to guard the highway on this side of the mountain with their cavalry. Snake and Scorpion must guard the first gate on this side of the mountain. Door-God and Skyscraper will guard the second gate at the Place of Many Meanderings. The Red-Haired Devil, and Mu Hong the Unstoppable will guard the third gate, the entrance to the main camp itself. The Ruan brothers will guard the waterside camp on the south of the mountain. As before, Flagpole shall supervise the boats. Skyhawk Li Ying, Uglymug and the Calculator will look after the finances and provisioning and treasury in the main camp. The Nine-Tailed Turtle and the Pill Monger can supervise the building of a lookout for the main fortress. The Ape can go back to supervising the manufacture of clothing, armour, banners and war robes. Smiler and my brother Iron Fan will be in charge of banquets. Mu Chun the Irrepressible and Green-Eyes will deal with housing and fences. Hand and the Craftsman will set up an office for correspondence with guests and visitors. Sterling as before will be responsible for military regulations and penalties. The remainder, the Halberdier, the Little Duke, Colonel Sun, Golden Wings, the Flautist, Redeye, Panther, and the Daytime Rat, will each take one of the eight sides of the stronghold to keep watch. Chao Gai, the Professor, and I will reside in the headquarters at the top of the mountain. Colonel Hua and Thunderclap will reside in the camp on the left. Leopard's Head and the Magic Messenger will reside in the camp on the right. The White-Water Dragon and Iron Ox will be based in front of the mountain in the mountain stronghold. The Pilot and White Eel will be based at the back of the mountain. Morbid and Madcap will guard the Assembly Hall, on either side." Once all the leaders had been allotted their duties, they took it in turn each day to give a celebratory banquet. The protocol of the camp was now clearly established. As it says in the poem:

At that camp on its lofty mountain crest,
Establishing order is what they do best,
They've all but the trappings of life at the court,
And such fame in the marshes as cannot be bought.

Now when Sergeant Lei left Mount Liang, shouldering his pack and gripping his halberd, he set off for Yuncheng. Arriving there, he first went home to see his mother. Then he changed his clothes and went to the government offices to report to the district magistrate and deliver the reply from his mission. After delivering his verbal report and returning his official warrant to the office, he went home to rest. After that his life continued as before, going in to the office every day, making himself available for the next official mission he might be sent on.
One day as he was waiting outside the office he heard someone calling behind him: "When did you get back, sergeant?"
Turning to look, he saw it was one second brother Li, a well-known local idler.
"Just a few days ago," he replied.
"You've been away, so you probably don't know there's a new singer from the Eastern Capital in town. She's absolutely phenomenal, in every department. Fleur, they call her. The girl called on you but you were away on official business. She's performing at the theatre now, she does all the well-known songs. They put on some kind of variety show every day, with dancing, or music or singing and it draws a huge audience. Why don't you come and take a look? That girl's really something."

Since he had nothing better to do, Sergeant Lei agreed to go with this Li to the playhouse. There were signs written in gold characters over the door and from the flag-pole hung banners as tall as a man. They went in and found seats right in the front row on the left. On stage a comic curtain-raiser was being performed. Li left Sergeant Lei there in the crowd while he went out to get some wine. After the curtain-raiser, an old man came on, with a turban wound about his head and a tea-coloured silk shirt, trailing a long black cloth and carrying a fan. He opened his mouth and declaimed: "I am from the Eastern Capital, Bai Yuqiao's my name. I am old now, but my daughter Fleur supports me with her singing and dancing and her music. She's always at your service, to entertain you."

Next, to the clamour of gongs Fleur Bai stepped out onto the stage and curtsyed in all directions. Taking up the gong stick she beat out a rapid rhythm like the sound of scattering beans, ending with a quick crack of the clappers, and then recited a short poem. After this she said: "My next number is a truly beautiful tale. It's a romantic and refined piece, entitled 'A Yuzhang love story'." She launched into the piece, singing and speaking in turns, to repeated applause from all present. From his position in the front row Sergeant Lei had a good view of her, and indeed she was as accomplished as she was beautiful:

Floating gauzes like the drifting snow, lustrous tresses like massed clouds, a pair of cherry lips, a complexion of peaches and apricots, a willow waist, a seductive manner and a sweet nature. The singing tones soft as the fluting of birds in the branches, the movements in the dance proud as a phoenix stalking through flowers. The melody is classical, nothing forced or unnatural. Between high notes and low, from quick to slow, the voice moves, all in accordance with the rules of harmony; and the variations of emphasis and mood are ruled by superlative taste. The bamboo flute produces ravishing trills; the clappers impart an elegant emphasis to each word.

When the story reached its climax, Fleur's father cried: "Well, we don't grow rich by horse-trading or gambling, but we do provide something to satisfy the thoughtful and discerning. We've had the applause, friends. Now my daughter will take a turn among you for a little number known as drumming up support."

Fleur took up the plate and struck a pose, saying: "At a rich door I begin, on a wealthy spot I stay my steps, I travel to a lucky place, I journey by a happy way, the hand you see before your face, empty send it not away."

Her father said: "Off you go now, girl, our public are eager to show their appreciation."

Holding out her plate Fleur stopped first before Sergeant Lei. But when the latter felt about him for money, he found he hadn't got a cent.

"I'm afraid I haven't got anything on me," he said. "Tomorrow I'll reward you."

Smiling ironically she said: "'If the vinegar on top's got no bite, the rest is going to be too weak.' Really now, sir, you've got a seat in the front row, you ought to give a lead."

Blushing scarlet, Sergeant Lei said: "I really didn't bring anything, it's not that I would withhold it."

"Are you telling me you come to the playhouse and don't think to bring any money?" she asked.

"I'll give you four or five taels of silver, it's no problem," he said. "Only today I really did forget to bring it."

"You haven't a cent, but you talk about four or five taels of silver, that's like telling me to quench my thirst by looking at plums, or fill my stomach with a painted cake!"

Her father said: "Where's your eyes, child? Can't you see this is just a small town person, a bumpkin, why do you go on asking him? You should look for some man of real understanding and culture, and get him to start the ball rolling."

"Are you suggesting I'm uncultured?" Sergeant Lei protested.

"As you don't know what every mother's son ought to know about how to behave, there's as much hope of any culture from you as for a dog to grow horns."

At this point everyone rose to their feet.

Lei Heng gave a roar: "How dare you insult me, you cheeky bugger!"

The old man replied: "And if I say you're a cowherd from the sticks, so what?"

Someone who knew Sergeant Lei shouted out: "That's not right! It's Sergeant Lei, an officer of our district."

"Seems more like an arsehole to me," said the performer.

This was beyond Sergeant Lei's enduring. He leapt up onto the stage and made for the artiste. With one blow of his fist and one kick he split his lip and knocked his teeth out.

When the bystanders saw the man was badly hurt, they intervened to break up the fight, advising Sergeant Lei to leave. The audience dispersed too, amid scenes of pandemonium.

Now Fleur had previously been a close friend of the new magistrate when he resided in the Eastern Capital, which is indeed why she had now chosen to ply her trade in Yuncheng. When Sergeant Lei hit her father and she saw he was seriously hurt, she called a sedan chair and went straight to the magistrate's office to make a complaint against Sergeant Lei for beating her father, breaking up a performance and trying to swindle her. The magistrate was outraged. "Make a written accusation at once," he said. It was a real case of 'pillow power.' The father was invited to write down the accusation, show his wounds and name witnesses.

Now there were plenty of people in the district who knew Sergeant Lei well and they went to the government office to lay out bribes on his behalf. But the girl was already inside the magistrate's, throwing a tantrum, and the magistrate had no alternative but to take action. He gave orders forthwith for Sergeant Lei to be arrested and brought to the magistracy, where he was beaten and forced to confess, placed in irons and paraded through the streets to be publicly shamed. The girl also wanted to show off her power and asked the magistrate to have him exposed at the door of the theatre. So next day, just before the performance, the magistrate ordered Lei Heng to be taken to the theatre door.

Now all the guards were colleagues of Sergeant Lei's. How could they be expected to tie him up? The girl gave it some thought. The news had already got around that she was picking on him and people were going to blame her anyway. So she left the theatre and went to sit in a teashop, where she summoned the guards to her. "I know you're all hand in glove with him," she said. "You don't want to touch him. His Honour told you to tie him up, but you want to be lenient. But when I go to His Honour and tell him, do you really imagine he's not going to take it out on you?"

"Don't be angry, miss," the guards said. "We'll go and tie him up, don't worry."

"If you do I shall reward you financially," she said.

So the guards had to go to Sergeant Lei and say: "We're not trying to pick on you, brother, but we're going to have to sort of tie you up." And then they showed him off in public with his hands and feet bound.

This caused quite a commotion, in the middle of which Sergeant Lei's mother arrived bringing him food. When she saw they had him tied up, she began to weep noisily. "You're all colleagues of my son's," she scolded, "working just like him in the same department. Just look what money can do! Who can ever hope to keep out of trouble?"

"Listen, old lady," they answered. "We'd much rather have let him off. But since the plaintiff has demanded that he be bound we've no excuse for not doing it. If we didn't they'd go and complain to the magistrate and we'd be for it! That's why we've got to do it, see."

The old lady said: "Since when has it been permitted for the plaintiff to set the penalty for the accused?"

"Listen here," the guards whispered. "She's a very particular friend of the magistrate's. One word from her and we'd be done for. So it's as hard on us as it is for you."

The old lady started to undo the bonds, scolding all the while. "That dirty bastard, how he abuses his position! Well I'm going to undo these bonds, and let's see what he says to that!"

When the news reached the teahouse where Fleur was sitting, she came rushing round at once and shouted: "You there, what are you playing at?"

The old lady was in no mood for pleasantries. She pointed a finger and cursed her roundly: "How dare you raise your voice to me, you whore! Thousands have humped you, millions have, you bitch! You're common property!"

When Fleur heard this her willow brows became perpendicular, her starry eyes nearly popped out of her head: "You poisonous insect, you vermin, who gave you the right to shout at me?"

"Why shouldn't I shout at you? You've got no authority here, you're not the governor of this town!"

Enraged, Fleur dashed at the old lady and gave her a slap which made her stagger. When the old lady tried to retaliate, Fleur came in again and started boxing her ears. She showed no sign of stopping.

Now Sergeant Lei was a very filial son, and when he saw his mother being beaten up, anger exploded in his heart. He tore off the cangue and brought it down with a crash on Fleur's head. He hit her with great violence, using the end of the cangue; the blow cracked open her skull and she crashed to the ground. The brains spilled out, the eyeballs burst and she lay without movement. She was obviously dead.

The bystanders who had witnessed the killing of Fleur Bai seized the murderer and went straight away to the magistracy to denounce him and render a detailed account of the events. The magistrate sent men to bring Sergeant Lei to him under arrest. All those involved were collected; the local headman, neighbours, friends and such were all summoned to appear, and when the body had been examined, they were escorted to the magistracy. Sergeant Lei confessed everything, quite openly. His mother was released on her own security to wait at home. Sergeant Lei was fitted with a cangue and committed to the cells.

Now the gaoler there happened to be Whiskers Zhu Tong. When Sergeant Lei was brought he did not ill-treat him in any way, rather he laid on wine and food for him, and told the gaolers to sweep and prepare a clean cell to make him comfortable. In a little while Sergeant Lei's mother arrived at the gaol with food. Sobbing she complained to Whiskers: "Here I am, over sixty years old, and this son of mine is my whole life. I beg you sir to be kind to him and take good care of him."

"I assure you, ma'am," said Whiskers, "that you are leaving him in good hands. You don't need to bring him food any more. I shall look after him. If there's the least chance of it I will get him off."

"If you can save my son, I shall worship you like my own parents," she said. "If anything happens to him, I'd sooner die."

Whiskers said: "I shan't forget it. There's nothing for you to worry about."

When the old lady had prostrated herself in thanks and left, Whiskers turned it over in his mind for a whole day, but could think of no means to rescue his friend. He employed people himself to go to the magistracy and buy support and persuade everyone to show leniency. But although the magistrate liked Whiskers, he had it in for Sergeant Lei for killing his mistress and said he could not pardon him. Besides he had the girl's father nagging at him; he was having charges drawn up and urged the magistrate to sentence the culprit and make him pay with the life that he owed.

When Sergeant Lei had been in the gaol sixty days and the interval before sentencing had been completed, it was decided to send him to the provincial capital. The clerk in charge of the case left first, armed with a complete dossier. Whiskers was appointed to escort Sergeant Lei.

Whiskers set off from Yuncheng, with a dozen prison guards and Sergeant Lei in custody. They had barely gone four miles when they saw an inn. "We'll all go in here and have a cup or two of wine," Whiskers announced.

While the others were drinking, Whiskers took Sergeant Lei off to a quiet corner and removed the cangue. Having released Sergeant Lei, he said to him: "Leave now old chap. Go straight home, get your mother, and go as fast as you can to seek refuge somewhere else. I'll take the blame for this."

"I've no problem with going away," said Sergeant Lei, "but how can I leave you to get into trouble?"

"Don't you see?" said Whiskers. "The magistrate blames you for killing his mistress. He has judged it to be a capital offence. He must be sending you to the capital to be executed. I won't get the death penalty for releasing you. Besides, I haven't any parents to worry about, all I'm likely to lose is my possessions. You've simply got to put as much distance as you can between yourself and this place."

Sergeant Lei prostrated himself in thanks, set off by a small back road and raced home. He made all his valuables into a bundle, and with his mother travelled night and day to Mount Liang, to join the outlaws. Of this no more.

Whiskers threw the empty cangue into the undergrowth and then went to tell the guards: "Sergeant Lei has got away, what can we do?"

"We'd better go quickly to his house and pick him up," they said.

Whiskers purposely delayed for as long as possible, which allowed Sergeant Lei to get a good long way away. Then he went back to the office with the guards to own up.

"I'm afraid I've been careless," he said. "I let Sergeant Lei escape while he was in my custody. He fled and we couldn't catch him. I have no excuse and I am ready to pay the penalty."

The magistrate liked Whiskers, and would have liked to let him off, but the girl's father wanted to complain to a higher authority that Whiskers had deliberately let Sergeant Lei escape, so the magistrate was obliged to report Whiskers' crime to the provincial capital. Some of Whiskers' relatives went to the capital to hand out bribes, so when he was sent there and the case was investigated by the court and the facts established, he was only sentenced to twenty strokes and banishment to Cangzhou prison camp. He was fitted with a cangue for travelling and two court officers were appointed to escort him on the road, bearing the dossier of the case. His relatives supplied him with clothes and money for his expenses and gave presents to the two guards. Then they left Yuncheng for the place of banishment. Of the journey we need say nothing.

On arrival they entered the town and went straight to the government office. The Governor had just gone into session, so the two guards took Whiskers to the court and handed over the documents. The Governor read them. He saw that Whiskers was something out of the ordinary, with his ruddy complexion and a fine long beard reaching below the waist. He liked what he saw so much that he ordered the new convict not to be placed in the cells but retained in the government office for special duties. The travelling cangue was removed and the guards were given a receipt with which they returned whence they had come.

Every day then Whiskers waited for orders in front of the courtroom in the government office. All the constables, court officers, door-keepers, messengers, gaolers, prison guards and so on received gifts from him. Seeing that he was so friendly and polite, everyone liked him. Then one day, when the court was in session and Whiskers in attendance, the Governor called him up and said: "Why did you let Sergeant Lei go and allow yourself to be sent here as a convict?"

Whiskers respectfully replied: "I had no intention of letting him go. It's just that I was careless and he escaped."

"Then why did you get such a heavy punishment?" the Governor asked.

"The plaintiff was determined to make me confess I did it on purpose, so my interrogation was severe," said Whiskers.

"How did Sergeant Lei come to kill that singer?"

Whiskers recounted Sergeant Lei's story in detail.

"So you saw what a filial son he was and you let him go out of respect for his virtue?" the Governor suggested.

"How would I have dared to cheat the government and deceive my superiors?" Whiskers protested.

At this juncture a young boy burst out from behind the screen. This was the Governor's own son, a fine looking lad about four years old, the apple of his father's eye. When the child saw Whiskers he went straight up to him and wanted to be picked up. Whiskers had to take him in his arms and give him a hug. The boy grabbed Whiskers' beard in both hands and said: "I want to hug this beard."

"Let go of him, child," the Governor said. "Don't pester him."

The boy said: "I want this beard. I want him to come and play with me."

Whiskers said: "Shall I take him to the area in front of the court and play with him for a while? I'll come straight back."

"Since the child wants you to hold him, you'd better go and play with him for a bit and come back afterwards."

So Whiskers carried the child off to the front of the courtroom and bought some sweets and dried fruit to eat with him. He took him for a little walk and then returned to the courtroom.

"Where have you been?" the Governor asked his son.

"Mr. Whiskers played with me in the street and he gave me some sweets and some fruit and he let me eat them."

"Why did you spend your money to buy things for the child?" the Governor asked.

"It was just some trifles to please the little chap," said Whiskers. "Nothing to make a fuss about."

The Governor ordered wine to be brought for Whiskers. Slave girls appeared with a silver jug and some fruit and nuts. They poured out wine and Whiskers was made to drink three bumpers.

"Any time my son wants to play with you," said the Governor, "just take him out, will you?"

"Your wish is my command," said Whiskers.

From that day on he took the child out for a walk every day. He carried a wallet and in order to please the Governor he would pay out little sums when the child was with him.

A fortnight later it was the fifteenth of July, the festival of Hungry Ghosts, when according to tradition lights are floated on the river and altars are set up everywhere for prayers and offerings. That evening a nursemaid from the residence called out to Whiskers: "Sergeant Zhu, the young master wants to go and see the lights tonight. The mistress says you can take him."

"I'll take him, then," Whiskers replied.

The child came out, dressed in a green silk shirt, with his hair arranged on top of his head in two little horns braided with pearls. Whiskers hoisted him onto his shoulders and carried him out into the town. They went to watch the lights being floated in the river at the Temple of the Redeeming Buddha. At that time it happened to be the first watch of the evening and they saw something like this:

Bells are ringing, clouds of incense rising, pennants fluttering everywhere. Sticks of choicest incense smoulder in the pots, dishes are piled high with every kind of vegetarian fare. Wielding gold pestles, priests intone sacred texts to improve the lot of the dead; people dressed in mourning clothes pile up silver to ease the way to heaven of impeded souls. People gather at the Hall of Benevolence, to view representations of the officials of Hell, the eight obstacles and the three types of torment. Around the temple walls the four ways of birth and the six incarnations are impressively depicted. The branches of the willows are sprinkled with pure water; flaring lanterns float among the water lilies in the pond.

As Whiskers carried the Governor's son round the temple to see the sights, they came to the pond for releasing fish beside the Water and Land pavilion where people were floating their lights. The child climbed onto the balustrade and laughed gleefully. At that moment someone tugged Whiskers' sleeve from behind and said: "Please give me a moment of your time."

Whiskers got quite a shock when he turned round and saw that it was Sergeant Lei. "Come down from there," he said to the child. "And sit down here while I go and get you some sweets. Whatever you do, don't go away."

"Don't be long," said the child. "I want to go and look at the lights from the bridge."

"I'll be back immediately," said Whiskers, as he turned and went with Sergeant Lei to talk. "Why have you come here?" he asked.

Sergeant Lei led him to a quiet place and prostrated himself. "When you saved my life," he said, "I had nowhere else to go with my old mother, so I had to go to the Marshes of Mount Liang to join Song Jiang's band. When I told them about your generosity, Song Jiang also remembered how you helped him to get away that other time, and Chao Gai and the others were deeply moved. They asked the Professor and myself therefore to pay you a visit."

"Where is the Professor, then?" Whiskers asked.

"The Professor is here," said a voice behind him. The Professor came forward and prostrated himself.

Whiskers hurriedly returned the courtesy, saying: "It's a long time since we met. I trust all is well with you?"

"Many, many leaders in the mountain stronghold send you their regards," said the Professor. "They have commanded me to come here, with our brother Sergeant Lei, to request you to join our loyal band on the mountain. We've been here several days, but we couldn't find a way to speak to you. Today we waited here and managed to catch you. So please agree to come with us to the mountain stronghold and fulfil the wishes of our two leaders."

Whiskers thought about this for a long time before he could find an answer. Eventually he said: "I'm afraid you've misjudged me, sir. Please don't say any more about this. I'm afraid if someone should overhear, it could have serious consequences. My friend Sergeant Lei committed a capital offence. I let him escape for the sake of friendship and loyalty. He can't show his face now, so he went to join the outlaws on the mountain. I got sent here on account of him, but heaven may relent. In a year and a half I may manage to return home, and become a respectable citizen again. How can you imagine I would join you? Please go back now, and don't come here stirring up trouble."
Sergeant Lei said: "My dear friend, you're really nothing better than a servant here. Serving others is in no kind of work for a real man. It's just not manly. It's not only my idea that you should join us on the mountain, our two leaders have long wanted you to come. It's really not very good of you to keep them waiting!"
Whiskers said: "What are you talking about, brother? Have you forgotten that I let you escape because of your old mother and your difficult family circumstances? And now you come here and accuse me of disloyalty!"
The Professor said: "If you don't want to come with us, Sergeant, we had better say goodbye and leave you in peace."
"Please give my humble respects to the leaders," said Whiskers. Together they went to the bridge.
When Whiskers got back, there was no sign of the Governor's son. Cursing his fate, he searched absolutely everywhere, until Sergeant Lei put a hand on his arm and said: "Don't go on looking. I bet it's the two chaps we brought with us. They probably heard you didn't want to come with us and carried the boy off. We'll go with you to find them."
Whiskers said: "It's no joke. His Excellency dotes on that child and he entrusted him to me."
"You'd better come with us then," said Sergeant Lei.
The three of them, Whiskers assisted by the Professor and Sergeant Lei, left the Temple of the Redeeming Buddha and headed out of town. Whiskers was extremely worried. "Wherever have these mates of yours taken the child?" he said.
"Just keep going. When we get to the place where we're staying we'll give you back the child," said Sergeant Lei.
"Time's getting short," said Whiskers. "I'm afraid the Governor will think something's wrong."
The Professor said: "Those two we brought with us aren't very bright, I'm sure they'll have taken the child back to where we're staying."
"These friends of yours, who are they exactly?" Whiskers asked.
"I don't really know," said Sergeant Lei. "But I think I heard the name Li Kui, the Black Whirlwind."
"Not the murderer who killed someone in Jiangzhou?" cried the horrified Whiskers.
"That's the one," said the Professor.
Whiskers staggered a little and then with many a groan hurried on. They were five or six miles from the city when they saw Iron Ox Li Kui up ahead. "I'm here," he called to them. Whiskers raced towards him. "What have you done with the child?" he asked.
Iron Ox saluted and said: "My respects, sergeant. The child is here."
"Then hand him over to me, very, very carefully."
Iron Ox pointed to his own head and said: "This is what he tied his hair with."
Whiskers looked, and again asked where the child was. Iron Ox said: "I had a drug with me and I administered it to him before I carried him off. He's sleeping in that wood now. Go and see for yourself."
The bright moonlight aided Whiskers as he plunged into the wood to look for the child. He found him lying on the ground. But when he put out his hand to touch him, he saw that the head was split in two. The child was dead.
A great rage filled Whiskers' heart. He stumbled out of the wood. The other three had disappeared. He looked in all directions. Then he saw Iron Ox a long way off waving his two axes and shouting: "Come on, come on, I'm going to have a few bouts with you!"
Seething with rage, careless of life and limb, Whiskers hoisted up his robe and bounded in pursuit. Iron Ox turned and ran, with Whiskers hot on his heels. But Iron Ox was a hardened mountaineer and there was no way Whiskers could catch him. Soon he had to stop for breath. "Come on, come on," Iron Ox shouted back at him. "We're going to fight. It'll be you or me."
Whiskers couldn't wait. He would have eaten him alive, only he couldn't get his hands on him. The chase went on and on, till gradually day began to dawn. If Whiskers ran faster, Iron Ox also speeded up; if he went slower, Iron Ox slowed down. But Whiskers could never catch him. Eventually he saw Iron Ox disappear into a large compound. "So the villain's got a bolt-hole, has he? But I won't let him get away with it." he said to himself.
Whiskers went right to the main hall of the house. Here he found stacks of weapons on both sides of the building, and he said to himself: "This must be the house of some official."
He halted and shouted out: "Is there anyone in?"
A man emerged from behind the screen at the back. And do you know who it was?
One of ancient and illustrious lineage, noble scion of a royal line, his portals defended by vermilion inscription and cast-iron guarantee, host to good men from far and wide, provider of faultless hospitality to every guest, dispenser of largesse with a smiling face, skilled exponent of brush and sword, gentleman of Mengchang dubbed Little Whirlwind, the world famous Chai Jin.
He who came out was indeed Chai Jin, the Little Whirlwind. He said: "And who might you be?"
At the sight of such an imposing figure of a man, of such liberal endowments, Whiskers hurriedly bowed and said: "I am Zhu Tong, warden of Yuncheng prison. I was banished here on account of an offence I committed. Last night I took the Governor's little son out to see the lights and he was killed by Iron Ox Li Kui. I saw this Iron Ox enter your compound this morning. I beg you to do all you can to help apprehend him and send him to justice."
Chai Jin said: "You are Whiskers, aren't you? Please sit down."
"Might I ask your name?" Whiskers said.
"My name is Chai Jin and they call me the Little Whirlwind."
"Of course I have heard much about you," said Whiskers, hurriedly prostrating himself. "I never expected to have the chance of meeting you like this."
"I have heard a lot about you too, Whiskers," said Chai Jin. "Please come inside so we can talk."
Whiskers followed Chai Jin inside. Then he said: "How is it that villain Iron Ox dares to enter your house?"
"I had better explain," said Chai Jin. "I have always enjoyed knowing the brethren of the rivers and lakes. Because of the acts of my ancestor and his meritorious abdication, my family enjoy the privilege of a cast-iron guarantee. If anyone guilty of wrongdoing hides in my house no one can come here searching for him. Recently a dear friend of mine, with whom you too have had a connection, and who is now one of the leaders on Mount Liang, namely Song Jiang, the Opportune Rain, wrote to ask me if I would allow Professor Wu Yong, Sergeant Lei and Iron Ox to stay in my place whilst they tried to persuade you to go up the mountain and join the loyal band. He knew that you might refuse to go so he instructed Iron Ox to kill the child, in order to cut off your return route, and leave you no alternative but to take your place among the leaders on the mountain. Professor, Sergeant! Why don't you come out and join our discussion?"
Thereupon Professor Wu and Sergeant Lei emerged from a room at the side. They went straight to Whiskers and prostrated themselves. "Dear brother, please forgive us," they said. "It was on Song Jiang's orders, he told us to do it. If you will come to the mountain stronghold, all will be explained."
"I accept that you had good intentions," said Whiskers. "But that was really too cruel!"
After Chai Jin had done his utmost to calm him, Whiskers said: "I suppose I can go with you, but just let me have a sight of that Black Whirlwind!"
"Mr. Li!" Chai Jin called out. "Come and join our discussion!
Iron Ox also issued forth from the room at the side and saluted. When Whiskers saw him his heart was filled with an indescribable fury, vast and ungovernable. He leapt to his feet and rushed at Iron Ox, ready for a fight to the death. Chai Jin, Sergeant Lei and the Professor struggled hard to restrain him. Finally he said: "If you want me to join you on the mountain you'll have to promise me one thing, or I won't go."
"Not one but a dozen," said the Professor. "Please tell us what it's." And if Whiskers had not made this condition, things would have been different.

A tumult in Gaotang district, repercussions on Mount Liang,
Cause a royal friend of the righteous to clash with the law,
Lead to a hospitable royal relative languishing in gaol.

THE messenger stated that a few days ago they had stopped some travelers near a forest, and among them was Inspector Lei Heng of Yuncheng County, who was recognized by Zhu Gui, and the latter had got the former to stay at the inn. Song Jiang and Chao Gai were much pleased to hear this, and they went with Wu Yong to receive Inspector Lei Heng, and bring him to the headquarters.
Upon meeting, Song Jiang said, "I have been thinking of you very often, and it is with great pleasure that I now meet you here. But what has brought you this way?"
Lei Heng after a deep bow said, "I was deputed by our magistrate to go to Dongchang Prefecture, and I am now on my way back. I was however recognized by Zhu Gui when our party was held up by your people."
"Heaven fortunately arranged that," said Song Jiang. He then took Lei Heng to headquarters where he was entertained for about five days. Chao Gai happened to ask for news about Inspector Zhu Tong, and was informed that he was a head jailer of the prison at Yuncheng County. He was held in high esteem by the newly appointed magistrate.
Song Jiang gradually brought the conversation round, and suggested that Inspector Lei Heng join them, but the inspector rejected the idea. His mother was very old, and could not stay alone, but when she died he could join them. When at last he left the mountain they gave him many presents. Upon reaching Yuncheng County Inspector Lei Heng duly delivered the dispatches he was carrying, and reported to the magistrate the results of his journey. One day as he was on his way to the yamen he heard someone behind call out, "Inspector, when did you get back?" Upon turning round he recognized an idler named Li the Second, and replied, "I came back some days ago."
"Then you cannot have seen that beautiful girl Bai Xiuying who had just arrived here from the Eastern Capital. She was inquiring for you, but you were away at the time. She sings splendidly, acts well, plays the lute feelingly, and is very popular with all the men. Would you care to see her? She is one of the best singsong girls."
Inspector Lei Heng was off duty at the time so he agreed to go with Li the Second. At the door he noticed many announcements in golden characters. He entered, and took the first seat. There was an actress performing on the small stage. Li the Second, disappeared as soon as Lei Heng was seated. When girl's song finished an old man came on the stage holding a fan in his hand and he spoke, "I am Bai Yuqiao and I come from the Eastern Capital. I am getting very old, and have to depend upon my daughter Bai Xiuying for a living." A gong was then sounded, and his daughter came on the stage, and bowed to the audience. She went through a few tricks with a small gong, and then sang the following song:

The young birds chirp; the old ones come;
Old goats lean, but kids are fat;
In life how hard to get a crumb,
Let alone a little clothing;
In love our men are frolicsome,
So diff'rent to the mandarin duck.

Lei Heng applauded. The girl spoke, "Today you will have noticed a bill at the door announcing that I would sing the gay and amorous song, 'At Yuzhang City, Su Qing was twice expelled.'" Her song was received with general applause. She sang some more verses of the above song, and then her father spoke, "Our repertoire is very select, but particularly suited for an intelligent audience like this. Now that the applause is over I will ask my daughter to go round, and collect your donations." The girl took up a tray, and said, "I begin with the wealthy, and stop with the profitable pass the lucky spots, and go to the prosperous places. I hope you will all give something."
"They will all contribute," said her father.
She first came to Lei Heng when he felt in all his belts and pockets, but could not find a single cash. He said, "I have forgotten to bring my purse, but I will come again tomorrow and reward you."
"If you don't contribute the others will follow your example," said the girl. "You are sitting in the best seat."
Lei Heng blushed, and said, "When I left home I had no idea of coming here so I did not carry a purse."
The girl laughed, "You came here, and listened to my singing so why did you not bring some money?"
"Never mind! I will give you three taels of silver tomorrow. Just now I have not a single cash."
"As you have no cash today you need not talk about giving silver tomorrow," said Bai Xiuying. "It seems as though you were showing me a plum to quench my thirst and a painted cake to satisfy my hunger."
Her father also added, "My daughter! Have you no eyes? You ask people without looking whether they are likely to have money. You had better pass him by and ask more generous people for money."
"Do you wish her to infer that I am ungenerous?" asked Inspector Lei Heng.
"It would be easier for a dog to grow horns than for you to be generous," said the father, Bai Yuqiao.
The audience all laughed at this joke. Inspector Lei Heng was angry, and said, "You foolish slave! How dare you insult me?"
"To insult a village cowboy is a small matter," replied Bai Yuqiao.
A bystander interposed, "Don't talk like that. This is Inspector Lei Heng."
"This is a donkey dick," replied Bai Yuqiao.
Lei Heng could stand no more of this. He jumped on to the stage, and gave Bai Yuqiao a blow on the jaw which knocked some teeth out. Many bystanders intervened, and prevented further blows, and induced Lei Heng to leave.
Now the girl had been on intimate terms with the county magistrate when he was previously in the Eastern Capital. When the daughter saw how badly her father had been mauled she took a sedan chair at once, and went to call on the magistrate. She told him how her father had been treated in the tea-house. The magistrate was angry, and asked her to write out an accusation at once. This was done. The girl was so determined that she would not leave the magistrate's yamen, but stayed there crying. This prevented Lei Heng's many friends from seeing the magistrate and settling the matter in favor of Lei Heng. Lei Heng was arrested, and upon being brought into court was beaten with a bamboo. The magistrate also ordered that he wear a cangue, and be paraded on the street with it.
The girl wished to further display her influence with the magistrate so she again spoke to him, and asked him to order that Inspector Lei Heng be paraded in front of the tea-house. The magistrate gave this order.
The men in the yamen were all friendly to Lei Heng, and would not do him any harm. The girl knew this so she went into a tea shop just near, and called out to his attendant to come inside. She said to him, "The magistrate wants to punish Lei Heng, but I know that you are the prisoner's friend and treat him well. I will go to tell the magistrate, and see what he will do."
"Please do not get angry," said the attendant; "I will punish him."
"In that case I will reward you for your service," replied the girl.
The attendant went to Lei Heng, and told him what the girl had said. Then he began to execute the punishment. There was a big crowd all round looking on, and soon Lei Heng's mother arrived with some food for him. When she saw her son was being abused she cursed the attendant: "You are a friend of my son like all the others in the yamen, but how much money did you get for doing this dirty work? Who will stand for you when it is your turn to be charged?"
"Madam, please listen to me," replied the attendant. "The plaintiff insisted upon your son being sent to be bound up here as the orders issued. So what else can I do? If we disobey orders, the plaintiff would complain to the magistrate, and we would be punished. I have no means of saving his 'face.'"
"What right has the plaintiff," said Lei Heng's mother, "to ask for details of the punishment to be executed in this way?"
The attendant whispered to Madame Lei, "The plaintiff is very friendly with the magistrate, and a word from her goes a long way."
Madame Lei went up to her son, and began to untie the fastenings while she was cursing. "That girl must be a real slut to use her influence in this way. I will untie these ropes myself, and then see what she will do."
The girl Bai Xiuying in the tea shop had heard all this, and she now came out on the street, and spoke to Madame Lei, "What did the old woman say just now?"
Madame Lei was annoyed at this, and pointing at the girl she replied, "You've been mounted and squeezed by thousands, you'd screw any man, you bitch! How dare you abuse me?"
The girl raising her eyebrows, and staring replied, "You old pimp! Beggar-woman! How dare you insult me!"
"I have insulted you! Well, what then? You are not the magistrate of this district!"
The girl, Bai Xiuying, rushed forward, and slapped Madame Lei's face. She followed this up with a vigorous assault of slaps and blows. Lei Heng saw all this, and could not stand it. He was boiling with rage, and seizing the cangue, he broke it in two pieces, then seizing it he hit the girl's head with it, and broke her skull. She fell down dead, with her brains leaking out and her eyes bulging.
The bystanders seized Lei Heng, took him to the yamen, and made a full statement to the magistrate. The magistrate ordered the coroner and the neihbourhood chief to take Lei Heng to the spot, inspect the corpse, and make their report. Lei Heng confessed fully, and was sent to prison. His mother was released on bail.
The jailer was Zhu Tong, the "Beautiful Whiskers." He gave his friend Lei Heng a good room, and supplied food and drink.
Zhu Tong thought of finding a means of allowing Lei Heng to escape, but for a day he could not find a plan. He however arranged for a friend to interview the magistrate, and explain the case. The magistrate had some esteem for Zhu Tong, but would not listen to any proposal made as he was still angry that his sweetheart had been killed. The girl's father was pressing the magistrate for prompt action, and wanted Lei Heng executed at once. After sixty days of detention in the prison Lei Heng was sent to the Prefect at Jizhou for trial. Zhu Tong was placed in charge of the escort. When they had gone about four //from Yuncheng

County, Zhu Tong ordered a halt at an inn by the roadside. While the escort was drinking wine Zhu Tong took Lei Heng to a quiet spot at the back of the inn. He took off the prisoner's cangue, and said, "Younger brother, you are free. Go at once, and get your mother and then both of you can escape. I will face the case at the yamen."
Lei Heng replied, "I do not object to escape but it would only get you into trouble."
"Younger brother, you do not understand. The magistrate was angry because you killed his sweetheart, and has worded the report so that you will be executed upon your arrival at Jizhou. If I allow you to escape I shall not be executed for that crime. I have no parents now or even relatives, and can use whatever money I have for my own case. Go at once, and be more careful in the future."
Lei Heng argued no more, but escaped. He took his mother, and went to Liangshan Marsh.
Zhu Tong came inside the inn again and said, "Lei Heng has escaped. What can we do?"
"Let us go at once to his home, and arrest him, as he is sure to go there," replied the escort.
Zhu Tong, however, remained undecided for a long time, and then took the escort back to the yamen.
He reported to the magistrate that owing to his own carelessness Lei Heng had escaped, and he held himself responsible for the misfortune.
The magistrate was inclined to save Zhu Tong, but Bai Yuqiao would not let the matter drop. So he sent Zhu Tong to Jizhou Prefecture, for trial. Zhu Tong sent a man in advance with plenty of money to arrange matters with the officials. After his trial he received twenty blows with the bamboo, and was then sent to the prison at Cangzhou, Zhili province. He was put under the escort of two men. Upon arrival at Cangzhou the escort was dismissed, and sent back. The Prefect liked the appearance of Zhu Tong, and instead of sending him to prison gave him a post as a menial official in his yamen.
The minor officials treated Zhu Tong with respect, as they soon saw that he had a very good easy disposition. One day while the Prefect was sitting in court listening to a case he summoned Zhu Tong, and asked him, "For what reason did you assist Lei Heng in escaping?"
"I had no intention of allowing him to escape," said Zhu Tong, "and he only got away owing to my carelessness."
"Then your fault was not very serious," said the Prefect.
"But the plaintiff claimed that I had done it purposely, and demanded severe punishment."
"Why did Lei Heng kill the singsong girl?"
Zhu Tong then explained all the details of the murder.
The Prefect considered that under the circumstances as Lei Heng had acted from strong sense of filial piety, Zhu Tong had done the right thing in allowing the prisoner to escape.
Zhu Tong told the Prefect that he would not dare to deceive him so as to gain such a good reputation. Just then a son of the Prefect about four years of age entered the court. The Prefect regarded his child as a jewel of the greatest value. The boy approached Zhu Tong, and wanted to be lifted up. Zhu Tong took him in his arms. The child stroked Zhu Tong's beard and said, "I like men with beards."
The Prefect told his son not to annoy Zhu Tong by pulling his beard.
"I want him to come and play with me," replied the child.
"I will just go, and play with him outside, but will soon come back," said Zhu Tong.
The Prefect agreed to this, and the pair left the court. Zhu bought some sugared fruit in the street for the child, and then returned to the court with the boy still in his arms.
"Where did you go, my son?" asked the Prefect.
"This old beard took me to the street, and bought for me some sugared fruit which I ate," replied the little boy.
"Where did you get the money from to buy such sweets?" asked the Prefect to Zhu Tong.
"Do not mention it," replied Zhu Tong. "It is merely to express my reverence to you."
The Prefect ordered a servant to bring some wine for Zhu Tong. A woman servant soon brought it in, and offered Zhu Tong three large bowls of wine. The Prefect asked Zhu Tong to look after the boy and play with him in future.
"Your orders shall be closely observed," said Zhu Tong. After this Zhu Tong was always with the child, playing with him, and always spent sums of money to buy things for him.
In another fortnight was the Festival of Departed Spirits (15th of the 7th month), and many lamps were floated on the rivers for the spirits. A woman servant came to Zhu Tong, and told him that the boy wanted to go in the evening, and see the lamps floating on the river. The Prefect's wife had agreed to let him go with Zhu Tong. The boy was dressed in green silk, and wore a cap with imitation beards on each side. Zhu Tong carried him on his shoulder through the yamen gate to the Dizang Temple where they could get a good view of the river. It was about 9 P.M., and Zhu Tong carried the little boy round the temple to the Releasing Life Pool.[77] The boy leaned on the rail, and enjoyed watching the lamps floating on the water.
While there a man pulled at Zhu Tong's sleeve and said, "Elder brother, please come here as I have something to say." Turning, Zhu Tong was surprised to see Lei Heng. He told the boy to sit down at that spot while he went to buy some sugared fruit for him. He must not go away.
"Please come back quickly," replied the boy, "because I want to go to the bridge and see the floating lamps there."
Zhu Tong agreed, and then went off to Lei Heng. He asked why Lei Heng had come there.
Lei Heng drew Zhu Tong to one side where there was no one about. Then Lei Heng explained that he had taken his mother to Liangshan Marsh and joined the bandits. But Chao Gai and also Song Jiang were so much indebted to the splendid assistance of Zhu Tong that they had specially instructed Wu Yong to come with Lei Heng, and convey their deep gratitude to him.
"Where is Wu Yong now?" asked Zhu Tong.
A voice behind him said, "Here I am!" and turning he saw Wu Yong.
After the usual exchange of salutations Wu Yong invited Zhu Tong to accompany them to Liangshan Marsh. He urged him to go with them that night.
For some time Zhu Tong could think of nothing to say, but at last he replied, "You are wrong. I am afraid that somebody will hear what you say. Lei Heng has committed a murder. I let him escape, and am now an exile here for his sake. After about half a year more I can return home, and see my people again. I cannot join your band. You had better return at once, and not get into trouble by staying about here."
"You have a job here," said Lei Heng, "but it is hardly suitable for a hero like you. It is not my idea to take you away, but I come because both Song Jiang and Chao Gai would like very much to see you, and thank you personally for what you have done."
"I do not understand you," replied Zhu Tong. "I helped you to escape, and also to take your old mother away. But why do you come today, and endeavor to involve me in some trouble?"
"As you do not care to come with us," said Wu Yong, "we shall of course have to return without troubling you any further."
"Then please convey to our friends at Liangshan Marsh my kind regards," said Zhu Tong.
Upon returning to the spot where he had left the small boy, Zhu Tong could not find him anywhere, and became alarmed. Lei Heng seeing the position said that his companion had taken the boy, and that Zhu Tong should not worry so much.
"But this is a very serious matter for me," replied Zhu Tong. "If the boy has any misfortune the life of the Prefect will be in danger."
Lei Heng and Wu Yong got Zhu Tong to go with them outside the town.
"Where are your companions who have taken the child away?" asked Zhu Tong.
"Just come to our rooms and there we will give you the small boy," replied Lei Heng.
"Time is passing quickly," said Zhu Tong, "and I am afraid that the Prefect will blame me."
"Our companions are rather stupid, and will probably have taken the child to our rooms," said Wu Yong.
"What is the name of your companion?" asked Zhu Tong, and was informed that he was Li Kui. At this Zhu Tong was very much upset, and hurried forward. They had gone about a li when they met Li Kui and Zhu Tong asked him where the boy was.
After saluting Li Kui replied that the boy was there, and Zhu Tong wanted to see him at once. Li Kui said the boy was sleeping in the wood. Zhu Tong went to the place indicated, and there saw the boy lying on the ground. Upon going to pick the boy up Zhu Tong saw that he was dead—his skull having been cleft in two. At this Zhu Tong was boiling with rage, and he rushed out of the wood. The three men had disappeared, but looking round Zhu Tong saw Li Kui some distance away, and ran after him. On the way he stripped his clothing ready for a fight. Li Kui was a fast runner, and Zhu Tong could not overtake him, and was soon out of breath. It was now dark except for the moonlight, and Li Kui had no difficulty in keeping well in front. Soon they came to a farmhouse, and Li Kui went inside. "Now," thought Zhu Tong, "I will capture him, and kill him." Upon entering the farmyard Zhu Tong noticed many military weapons arranged in front of the main building. He thought this place must belong to some official so he shouted out, "Is there anybody inside?" In response, a man came out and asked, "Who are you?"
"I am Zhu Tong, jailer from the prison, at Yuncheng County, and I am in pursuit of a criminal who entered this farmyard. He is named Li Kui and he has murdered the son of the Prefect of Jizhou. Please help me to capture him."
The man asked him to wait a little, but Zhu Tong would not do so, and asked for his name.
"I am Chai Jin, 'Small Whirlwind,'" replied the man. Zhu Tong had heard of his reputation, and after salutations Squire Chai Jin asked him to go into the house, and talk matters over. They entered and Zhu Tong then asked how such a man as Li Kui could use that farm as a hiding place.
"I welcome all kinds of wanderers here," replied Squire Chai Jin. "As I have a special iron tablet bestowed by the Emperor to my ancestor as a distinction for great merit, no criminal may be arrested at my house. I received a special note from Song Jiang, a friend of ours, asking me to allow Lei Heng, Wu Yong, and Li Kui to stay at my house for a few days. They were on their way to request you to join them at Liangshan Marsh. As you refused to join them, Li Kui kidnaped the boy, and killed him, so that you could not return to the yamen and face his father."
Just then Lei Heng and Wu Yong entered the room, and after saluting Zhu Tong they said, "Please forgive us for the crime committed. We did it only by order of our chief, Song Jiang. If you come with us to Liangshan Marsh all will be explained to you."
"Your asking me to go to Liangshan Marsh was all right," replied Zhu Tong, "but your method of inducing me to go was exceedingly cruel. I will go with you now, but I must first see Li Kui."
Squire Chai Jin agreed to this, and called in Li Kui to make a full apology to Zhu Tong. When Li Kui entered he gave Zhu Tong a kotow. Zhu Tong was enraged at seeing the man, and rushing forward seized him to kill him on the spot. The other three men however intervened and held Zhu Tong.
"Before I go with you," said Zhu Tong, "I've something to say."

Battleaxes break the law,
Offspring of the Emperor dies.

150
Iron Ox Li Kui Beats Chancellor Yin Tianxi to Death; Mr. Chai Jin Jin Is Trapped, Captured, & becomes a prisoner in Gaotang Prefecture

"If you want me to go up the mountain," said Zhu Tong, "you must kill Black Whirlwind to appease my rage! Then I'll go."
"You can eat my prick," roared Li Kui. "I was carrying out the orders of brothers Chao and Song! It hadn't a tooting fart to do with me!"
Zhu Tong moved to throw himself on Li Kui. The other three restrained him. "If Black Whirlwind is there, I'll never go up that mountain," Zhou Tong vowed.
"That's easy," said Chai Jin. "I'll keep him here with me. You three go on to the stronghold and satisfy the wishes of Chao and Song."
"The prefect is sure to send a warrant for my arrest to Yuncheng County. They'll take my wife and children. How can we deal with that?"
"Don't worry," said Wu Yong. "Song Jiang has probably brought your family into the fortress by now."
Only then did Zhu Tong relax. Chai Jin treated his guests to wine, and the same day saw them off. They left towards evening. Lord Chai provided them with three riding horses and an escort of vassals. He accompanied them to the outside of the pass.
At the final parting, Wu Yong gave Li Kui some words of advice. "Behave with care. Stay a while in the lord's manor. Don't stir up any trouble and get him involved. In a few months or half a year, after Zhu Tong has cooled down, we'll bring you back to the fortress. We'll probably invite Lord Chai to join us, too."
The three mounted and departed. Chai Jin and Li Kui returned to the manor. Zhu Tong went with Wu Yong and Lei Heng to become a member of the band in Liangshan Marsh. When they came to the end of Cangzhou Prefecture, the vassals rode the horses back, and the three continued on foot.
The journey was uneventful, and they soon reached the tavern ran by Zhu Gui. He sent word to the stronghold of their arrival. Chao Gai and Song Jiang, accompanied by greater and lesser chieftains, were waiting to greet them on the Shore of Golden Sands, to the beat of drums and the shrilling of flutes. All got on their horses and climbed to the fortress, where they dismounted and went to Fraternity Hall. They talked for a while of old times together. Then Zhu Tong voiced his apprehension.
"You've called me to the mountain, but the prefect of Cangzhou is certain to notify Yuncheng County to seize my wife and children. What can I do?"
Song Jiang laughed. "Set your mind at ease, brother. We sent men to fetch them several days ago."
"Where are they now?"
"They're resting at the place of my father the squire. Why not go and see for yourself?"
Zhu Tong was delighted. Song Jiang led him to his father's villa. Zhu Tong was reunited with his family. He observed that they had brought all their valuables.
"A man came with a letter the other day saying you had already joined the mountain band," his wife related. "So we packed our belongings and travelled through the night to get here."
Zhu Tong kowtowed and thanked the brigand leaders. Song Jiang asked both him and Lei Heng to make their homes on the mountain summit. For successive days he gave feasts in their honor, as new chieftains. Of that no more need be said.

*

The prefect of Cangzhou, when it began getting late and Zhu Tong didn't return with his son, sent people out to look for them. They searched half the night. The next day, someone found the body in the grove, and notified the prefectural office. Shocked, the prefect went to the grove. He wept as though his heart would break. He had the body encoffined, and cremated it.
Summoning court the following morning, he issued notices for the arrest of Zhu Tong to all the surrounding areas. Yuncheng County reported that Zhu Tong's wife and family had fled to places unknown. Rewards for Zhu Tong's apprehension were offered in the various prefectures and counties. Of that, we'll say no more.

*

When Li Kui had been with Lord Chai for over a month, a messenger delivered an urgent letter to the manor. Chai Jin accepted and read it. He was astonished.
"In that case I'll have to go," he exclaimed.
"What's the trouble, Excellency?" asked Li Kui.
"I have an uncle, Chai Huangcheng, who lives in Gaotang Prefecture. That rogue Yin Tianxi, brother-in-law of the prefect, Gao Lian, has taken over his garden. My uncle is so infuriated that he's fallen ill, and he may not live. He must have some dying words he wants to impart. My uncle has no children. I'll have to hurry to his side."
"Would you like me to keep you company?"
"I'd be glad if you're willing to go."
Chai Jin packed some luggage, selected a dozen good horses, and told a number of vassals to get ready. The next day at dawn Lord Chai, Li Kui and their company climbed into their saddles, left the manor and headed for Gaotang.
They arrived in less than a day and dismounted in front of the residence of Chai Huangcheng. Chai Jin left Li Kui and the others in the outer hall and went to his uncle's bedroom. Seated beside Huangcheng's bed, he wept. The lady his uncle had married after the death of his first wife came in.
"You've had a tiring ride," she said. "You mustn't upset yourself."
Chai Jin greeted her courteously and asked what had happened.
"The new prefect, Gao Lian, is also the military commander here," she said. "Because Marshal Gao in the Eastern Capital is his cousin, he feels he can do anything he pleases. He brought with him his brother-in-law Yin Tianxi. Everybody calls him Counsellor Yin. Although quite young, Yin knows he has the prefect's backing, and he hurts people with his outrageous behavior. One of his toadies told him that we have a pretty rear garden with a pavilion overlooking a pool. He broke in with twenty or thirty scamps one day, examined the garden, and wanted to drive us out of our home and move in himself.
"Your uncle Huangcheng said to him: 'Our family is of noble origin. An earlier emperor bestowed a Wrought Iron Pledge on our family that no one may oppress us. How dare you seize my home? Where is my wife and family supposed to go?'
"The knave wouldn't listen. He insisted that we leave. Your uncle tried to push him away, and was beaten for his pains. He's been in bed ever since. He can't get up and he can't eat. Medicine doesn't seem to do any good. Heaven may be far but the grave for him is near, I'd say. Fortunately, you've come to take charge. So even if the worst should happen, we won't have to worry."
"Don't despair, aunt. We'll get a good doctor to treat him. If there's any dispute about this, I'll send a man back to Cangzhou to get the Wrought Iron Pledge, and show that to Yin. If we have to go before the authorities, or even the emperor himself, we have nothing to fear."
"Huangcheng failed in all his efforts," said his wife. "But I'm sure, in your hands, we'll get results."
Chai Jin stayed a while with his uncle, then came out and told Li Kui and the others about the dispute. Li Kui jumped to his feet.
"That unreasonable varlet! I'll give him a couple of licks with my axes first, then we can start discussions."
"Calm yourself, brother Li. You can't get rough with him without any provocation. Besides, although he may have powerful backing, our family is protected by the Pledge. If he won't listen to reason here, in the capital there are persons just as influential as he, and the law is clear. We'll fight him in court."
"The law, the law! If everyone obeyed the law, everything would be serene! I'm in favor of hitting him first and talking afterwards. If he complains to the court, I'll hack him and the friggin judge together!"

Chai Jin laughed. "No wonder Zhu Tong wanted to fight you. You're both such hotheads. This is an imperial city, not your mountain stronghold where you can act as you like."
"So what? Jiangzhou and Wuweijun are also imperial cities. Didn't I kill men there too?"
"Wait till I've seen how the land lies. When the need arises, I'll ask your help, brother. Until that happens, please remain here quietly."
At that moment a servant hurried out to request Lord Chai to go to his uncle. Chai Jin went quickly to the bedside. His uncle spoke to him with tears in his eyes.
"You're a man of high principle, nephew, a credit to our ancestors. I die today because of the humiliation imposed on me by Yin Tianxi. You owe it to me as one of the same flesh and blood to write a complaint to the emperor and obtain redress. From beneath the Nine Springs of the Nether World I will thank you. Take care of yourself. I have no other bequests."
Having spoken, Huangcheng died. Chai Jin wept bitterly. His aunt feared he would faint. "Restrain your grief," she urged. "We must talk about the funeral arrangements."
"The Wrought Iron Pledge is in my home. I haven't brought it. But I'll send a man for it immediately. If necessary, I'll file a complaint in the Eastern Capital. But uncle has passed away. First we must proceed with the encoffining and dress in mourning. We'll confer about other things later."
Chai Jin ordered that inner and outer coffins be prepared in the official manner, and that a memorial tablet be set up in keeping with the rites. The whole family dressed in deep mourning, and young and old lamented. Li Kui, outside, heard their weeping. Angrily, he ground a fist into the palm of his hand. But when he asked the servants what was going on, no one would tell him. Monks were invited to conduct the prayers.
Two days went by. Riding a spirited horse, Yin Tianxi and twenty or thirty cronies had been carousing outside the city, amusing themselves with slingshots, crossbows, blowpipes, inflated balls, stick branches for catching birds, and musical instruments. Now, pretending to be drunker than they actually were, they staggered up to the residence of Chai Huangcheng. Yin reined in his horse and shouted a demand to see the person in charge.
Chai Jin, wearing mourning, hastily emerged. Yin addressed him from his saddle.
"What part of the family are you?"
"I'm Chai Jin, the nephew."
"I gave orders the other day that they were to move out. Why haven't I been obeyed?"
"Uncle was sick in bed. We couldn't disturb him. He died in the night. We'll move when the forty-nine day mourning period is over."
"Farts! I give you three days more. If you're not out by then, I'll put a cangue around your neck and let you taste a hundred blows of my staff!"
"You mustn't persecute us like this, Counsellor. We're descendants of a royal family, and protected by an old imperial Wrought Iron Pledge. It must be respected."
"Take it out and let me see it," Yin shouted.
"It's in my home in Cangzhou. I've already sent for it."
"The rascal's lying," Yin said angrily. "Even if there is such an edict, it doesn't scare me. Men, give this fellow a drubbing!"
The gang started toward Chai Jin. Li Kui, the Black Whirlwind, had been watching and listening through a crack in the door of the house. Now he pushed it open, dashed up to Yin with a roar, dragged him from his horse, and with one punch knocked him sprawling. The thirty ruffians rushed to Yin's aid. Li Kui promptly flattened half a dozen. Yelling, they all turned and fled.
Li Kui picked Yin up and pummelled him with fist and foot. Chai Jin couldn't restrain him. It wasn't long before Yin was lying dead on the ground.
Chai Jin groaned. He led Li Kui to the rear hall and said: "They'll be sending men here very soon! You can't stay! I'll deal with the prosecution. You've got to go back to Liangshan Marsh, quickly."
"I can go, but you'll be implicated."
"The imperial Pledge will protect me. You must go at once. There's no time to lose."
Li Kui gathered his battle-axes, took some travel money, left through the rear gate, and set out for the mountain fortress.
Not long after, more than two hundred men, armed with swords, spears and staves, surrounded the residence. Chai Jin came out and said: "I'll go with you to the authorities and explain."
They bound his arms and went in to look for the culprit, a big swarthy fellow. He was gone. They took Chai Jin to the prefecture court, where he knelt in the center of the hall. Gao Lian, the prefect, had ground his teeth in venomous rage when he heard that his brother-in-law had been beaten to death, and had been waiting for the assailant to be brought in. Now, Chai Jin was flung down at the foot of the prefect's dais.
"How dare you kill my Yin Tianxi?" Gao shouted.
"I am a direct descendant of Emperor Shi Zong. My family has a Wrought Iron Pledge of imperial protection from Tai Zu, the first emperor of Song. It's in my home in Cangzhou," Chai Jin replied. "I called to visit my uncle Chai Huangcheng, who was gravely ill. Unfortunately, he died, and we are now in mourning at his residence. Counsellor Yin came with thirty men and wanted to drive us out. He wouldn't listen to my explanations and ordered his men to beat me. One of my vassals, Big Li, while defending me, killed him in the heat of battle."
"Where is Big Li?"
"He panicked and ran away."
"He's your vassal. Would he have dared kill a man without orders from you? You deliberately let him escape, and now you try to delude this court. Rascals like you never confess unless they are beaten. Take him, guards, and give it to him hard!"
"To save his master my vassal Big Li accidentally killed a man. It's not my fault. We have Emperor Tai Zu's Pledge. Am I to be beaten like a common criminal?"
"Where is the Pledge?"
"In Cangzhou. I've already sent for it."
"The scoundrel is opposing this court," Gao Lian raged. "Beat him, guards, with all your strength!"
They pounded Chai Jin till his flesh was a pulp and his blood streamed in rivulets. He was forced to confess: "I ordered my vassal Big Li to kill Yin Tianxi." A twenty-five-catty cangue for the condemned was placed around his neck, and he was cast into prison. Yin's body, after inspection by the medical examiner, was put into a coffin and buried. Of that no more need be said.
Yin's sister wanted vengeance. She had her prefect husband confiscate the property of Chai Huangcheng, arrest the members of his family, and take over for themselves the house and gardens of the residence. Chai Jin languished in jail.

Li Kui travelled through the night to get back to Liangshan Marsh. On arriving at the fortress he reported to the leaders. Zhu Tong was filled with rage the moment he saw him. He rushed at Li Kui with his halberd. Black Whirlwind, brandishing his axes, clashed with him in combat. Chao Gai, Song Jiang and the others exhorted them to stop. Song apologized to Zhu Tong.
"Killing the prefect's little boy wasn't Li Kui's idea. Military Advisor Wu Yong thought of this device when you wouldn't agree to joining us. Now that you are here, forget it. Let's all strive together in harmony and loyalty. We don't want outsiders to laugh at us."
Song Jiang turned to Li Kui. "Tell sir Beautiful Beard you're sorry."
Li Kui glared. "A fine business. I've done plenty for this stronghold. He hasn't done a thing. Why should I tell him I'm sorry?"
"Although it was the Military Advisor's order, you did kill the prefect's son. From the point of view of age, Zhu Tong is your older brother. Kowtow to him, for my sake. Then I'll kowtow to you, and that'll be the end of it."
Li Kui couldn't very well refuse. To Zhu Tong he said: "I'm not afraid of you, but brother Song Jiang insists. I can't help myself. I apologize." He threw his axes aside and kowtowed, twice.
Only then was Zhu Tong appeased. Chao Gai ordered that a feast be laid to cement the reconciliation.
"Lord Chai went to Gaotang because his uncle, Chai Huangcheng, was ill. The prefect's brother-in-law, Yin Tianxi, wanted to take over the house and gardens, and cursed Chai Jin. I knocked the lout around and killed him," said Li Kui.
"You escaped, but they're sure to prosecute Lord Chai," Song Jiang cried in alarm.
"Calm yourself, brother," said Wu Yong. "We'll know more about it when Dai Zong returns."
"Where has brother Dai Zong gone?" asked Li Kui.
"I thought you'd only stir up trouble, hanging around Lord Chai's manor," said Wu Yong, "and I sent Dai Zong to bring you back. If he found you were gone, he'd surely follow you to Gaotang."
Before the words were out of his mouth, a scout entered and announced: "Superintendent Dai has returned."
Song Jiang went forward to welcome him. After Dai came into the hall and was seated, he was asked for news of Lord Chai.
"I went to his manor and learned that he and Li Kui had left for Gaotang. I hurried after them. In Gaotang, the whole city was agog. Everyone said: 'Yin Tianxi tried to seize the residence of Chai Huangcheng, and a big dark fellow beat him to death. Lord Chai was implicated, and tied up and cast into prison. All the property of Chai Huangcheng's family has been confiscated. There's no guarantee that Lord Chai's life will be preserved.' "
"That swarthy rogue has done it again," said Chao Gai. "Wherever he goes, there's turmoil."
"Chai Huangcheng was beaten by Yin, and he died of rage. Then Yin came to take over his residence and ordered his men to beat Lord Chai. Even if he were a living Buddha, I wouldn't let him get away with it!" Li Kui retorted.
"Lord Chai has always been benevolent to our fortress," said Chao Gai. "Today, he's in danger. We must rescue him. I'll go personally."
"You're the highest leader here, brother, you shouldn't make a move lightly," said Song Jiang. "I've long been indebted to Lord Chai. Let me go on your behalf."
"Although Gaotang is a small city, it's densely populated, has a large military force, and plenty of grain. We mustn't underestimate it," said Wu Yong. "I propose that we ask twelve chieftains to lead a vanguard of five thousand men, with a supporting force of three thousand under ten chieftains."
The twenty-two chieftains bid farewell to Chao Gai and the others and left the mountain stronghold for Gaotang.
By the time the vanguard force reached the edge of the prefecture, Gao Lian had already been informed by his scouts. "I'd been intending to clean out that lair of shabby bandits in Liangshan Marsh," he sneered, "and now they present themselves to be tied. A Heaven-blessed chance." He directed his aides: "Transmit my order immediately to muster our army, go forth from the city, and engage the enemy. Let the citizenry man the walls."
On horseback Gao was military commandant, afoot he was the prefect. As soon as his order was issued, all his officers, from generals to sergeants, assembled their units and inspected them on the drill fields, then marched out of the city against the foe. Gao Lian had a personal contingent of three hundred crack troops known as the "Flying Miracles," who came from Shandong, Hebei, Jiangxi, Hunan, north and south of the Huai, and east and west of the Zhejiang River. Shouting, banners waving, drums pounding, gongs crashing, they waited only their adversaries' approach.
With the arrival of the five thousand men under Lin Chong, Hua Rong and Qin Ming, the two hosts confronted each other, drams and banners plainly visible, each temporarily halted by powerful flights of arrows. Trumpets blared, and the big battle drums throbbed.
Hua Rong, Qin Ming and the ten other chieftains reined in their horses at the most advanced position. Lin Chong, his serpent lance at the ready, spurred his mount forward. "Gao the thief," he yelled. "Come out, quickly!"
Gao Lian gave his animal its head. With thirty officers he rode to the arch of pennants. There, they halted. Gao pointed at Lin Chong. "Death-deserving rebel brigands! Dare you disturb our city?"
"People-harming crook," shouted Lin Chong. "One of these days I'm going to the Eastern Capital and pulverize your scoundrelly relative Gao Qiu, that thievish minister who deceives the emperor! I won't rest until I do!"
Gao Lian turned fuming to his cohorts. "Who will ride out and seize this robber?"
From among the officers emerged a captain named Yu Zhi. He clapped his steed and advanced brandishing his sabre. Lin Chong galloped towards him. They had fought less than five rounds when Lin Chong ran his serpent lance through the man's chest and brought him tumbling to the ground.
Gao was startled. "Who will get our revenge?"
Another captain, Wen Wenbao, holding a long lance, astride a sleek brown horse with equipage of tinkling bells and clinking jade, was already racing towards Lin Chong, his animal's hoofs churning a cloud of dust.
"Rest a while, brother," cried Qin Ming. "Watch me cut this varlet down."
Lin Chong reined his mount, retracted his steel lance, and allowed Qin Ming to go ahead. The two battled more than ten rounds. Qin Ming deliberately left himself open. As Wen lunged and missed, Qin swung his mace and stove in the captain's skull. Wen collapsed at his horse's hoofs, and the frightened animal scampered back to the defenders' position. From both sides rose a mighty roar.
Gao Lian, having lost two of his officers, drew from its sheath upon his back his precious Dragon Sword. He muttered an incantation, then shouted: "Speed." And from the midst of his army a black mist rolled. Soon it covered half the sky. Sand flew, stones rolled, the earth quaked, the heavens shook. A weird gale swept across the field against the brigands. Lin Chong, Qin Ming, Hua Rong and the others couldn't see. Terrified horses whinnied and bolted. The fighters turned and fled.
Gao Lian waved his sword. His three hundred Miracle soldiers charged, followed by his entire army. Lin Chong's forces scattered in disorder, exclaiming piteously. Of the five thousand, more than a thousand were destroyed. For fifty //they retreated, and finally made camp. The rout complete, Gao Lian returned with his army to the city.
When Song Jiang's contingent reached the camp, Lin Chong and the others told them what had happened. Song Jiang and Wu Yong were shocked.
"What magic can it be," they wondered, "that is so potent?"
"Probably some evil spell," Wu Yong averred. "If we knew how to turn back the wind and fire, we could defeat them."
Song Jiang opened his Heavenly Books. In the third volume he found the necessary formula. Delighted, he memorized the words of the incantation. Then he reorganized his ranks. At the fifth watch they breakfasted. Banners flying, drums pounding, they marched rapidly towards the city.
This was reported to Gao Lian, who again mustered his victorious troops and his three hundred Miracle soldiers. He opened the gates, let down the drawbridge and deployed his men in battle positions.
Song Jiang, sword in hand, rode to the front. He could see a bevy of black pennants in the midst of Gao Lian's army.
"Those soldiers are his so-called 'Spellbinders,' " said Wu Yong. "He's probably going to work some magic again. How are you going to cope with him?"
"Don't worry. I have an antidote. Let none of you have any fear or doubt. Just concentrate on plunging into the fray."
Gao Lian, to his officers, said: "Avoid clashes and combat. But when I bang on my shield, rush together in strength and grab Song Jiang. I will reward you well, personally."
He hung on his saddle a bronze shield emblazoned with heraldic emblems of dragon and phoenix. Shouts rose from the opposing armies, as he rode forward, holding his sword. Song Jiang pointed his finger at him.
"I couldn't get here last night and my brothers carelessly took some casualties. Today I'm going to wipe all of you out, completely!"
"Dismount, you rebellious brigands, and let yourselves be bound," Gao shouted back. "I don't want to have to soil my hands with your blood!"
He waved his sword, whispered a few word under his breath, then yelled: "Speed!"
A dark miasma appeared, and was driven by a strange wind towards Song Jiang and his forces. Before it could reach them, Song muttered an incantation and twisted the fingers of his left hand into a cabalistic sign. With his right hand he pointed his sword. "Speed!" he shouted.
The wind reversed itself and blew back towards Gao's position. Song Jiang was about to order his men to charge. Gao quickly raised his bronze shield and beat on it with his sword. His Miracle soldiers were at once concealed in a swirling cloud of yellow sand. From his army hordes of monstrous animals and poisonous serpents poured forth.
Song Jiang and his men were scared stiff. Throwing away his sword, Song pulled his horse around and fled. His officers crowded together and ran for their lives. His troops rushed away, every man for himself.
Again Gao Lian brandished his sword. With his Miracle soldiers in the lead, and followed by the rest of his forces, his entire army launched a murderous assault. Song Jiang's men were severely defeated. Gao Lian chased them for more than twenty //: Then gongs were beaten as a signal for his soldiers to re-assemble, and they returned to the city.
At a hillock Song Jiang reined in his horse and pitched camp. Although his men had suffered heavy losses, fortunately all of his chieftains survived. When his forces were settled he conferred with Military Advisor Wu Yong.
"We've been vanquished twice in our attack on Gaotang. We can't seem to break his Miracle soldiers. What are we going to do?"
"Since the rogue can work spells, he's sure to raid our camp tonight," said Wu Yong. "We must plan our defense. We'll leave a small contingent here, and the rest of us will go back to our original encampment."
Song Jiang ordered that only Yang Lin and Bai Sheng and certain men remain. The others returned to the old camp and rested.
Yang and Bai led their fighters half a //behind the hillock and hid themselves in the deep grass. At the first watch a gale rose and thunder crashed. From their place of concealment Yang and Bai and their three hundred men saw Gao Lian advancing on foot, followed by his three hundred Miracle soldiers. Howling and whistling, they rushed savagely into the camp. They found it was empty, and started to leave.
Yang and Bai let out a yell. Gao and his Miracle soldiers, fearing a trap, scattered and ran. The brigands winged random volleys after them with their bows. An arrow struck Gao Lian in the left shoulder. The fighters spread out and pursued, killing as they raced through a pouring rain.
By then Gao Lian and his Miracle soldiers were far away. Yang and Bai had only a limited contingent. They dared not go any deeper into enemy territory. Abruptly, the rain stopped, the clouds vanished and the stars came out. In the light of the moon, the brigands collected twenty enemy wounded, who had been felled before the hillock by blade and arrow, and led them to Song Jiang's camp. They told of the strange thunderstorm.
Song Jiang and Wu Yong listened in consternation. "That was only five //away, but we didn't have any wind or rain here," they said.
Everyone discussed it. "Truly magic," they agreed. "It rained only in the place, and from a height of just three or four hundred feet. The clouds must have picked up water from nearby ponds."
"Gao Lian charged into our camp carrying a sword and with hair unbound," Yang Lin related. "I hit him with an arrow, and he returned to the city. I didn't go after him because we hadn't enough men."
Song Jiang rewarded Yang Lin and Bai Sheng. He had the wounded prisoners executed. He set up seven or eight small strong points around the main camp and assigned a chieftain to each, as a precaution against an enemy raid. He also sent a messenger back to the mountain fortress for reinforcements.

Gao Lian, in the city, nursed his wound. “Defend the city,” he instructed his army. “Be constantly on the alert. But don’t get involved in any battles. When I’ve recovered there will be time enough to capture Song Jiang.”
After the defeat inflicted upon him, Song Jiang brooded. He said to Wu Yong: “We can’t seem to lick Gao Lian. Suppose he gets more troops from somewhere and they attack in force. How will we be able to withstand them?”
“There’s only one way to counter his magic,” said Wu Yong. He spoke softly in Song’s ear. “If we don’t get that person to help, we may be unable to save Lord Chai and we’ll never take the city.” Truly, to dispel the magic clouds and mists a person had to be found who understood the secrets of Heaven and Earth.

Now what Whiskers said to them was: “You want me to go to the mountain with you — well, I’ll do it, but only if you can purge this anger of mine by executing Black Whirlwind.”
This infuriated Iron Ox. “Well, fuck me! It was the two leaders who ordered it, what’s it got to do with me, you arsehole?”
The outraged Whiskers would have thrown himself on Iron Ox, but the other three restrained him. “If he’s going to be there,” said Whiskers, “you can kill me before you’ll get me to the mountain.”
“There’s no problem, I’ve got a solution,” said Mr. Chai. “Iron Ox can stay here with me. Then you three can go to the mountain, as the leaders have requested.”
“But after what’s happened,” said Whiskers, “the Governor is bound to have made out a warrant, and they’ll go straight over to Yuncheng and arrest all my family, what am I to do about that?”
“Don’t worry,” said the Professor. “By now I imagine Song Jiang has already taken your family to the mountain.”
Whiskers felt a bit better after this. Mr. Chai poured wine for them and gave a farewell feast. That very evening they bade him goodbye and prepared to set off. Mr. Chai had his people saddle three horses to carry them to the bounds of his territory. Before they parted, the Professor said to Iron Ox: “You be careful. You’re to stay with His Excellency for a while, but don’t play the fool and stir things up, or get him into any trouble. In a few months’ time, when Whiskers has settled down a bit, we will come to fetch you, and most likely we shall invite Mr. Chai to join our company too.” The three men then mounted and left.
We shall not follow Mr. Chai and Iron Ox back to the manor, but tell how Whiskers Zhu, accompanying the Professor and Sergeant Lei, came to the Marshes of Mount Liang and entered the company. When they had travelled one stage and reached the limits of Cangzhou, Mr. Chai’s retainers returned home with the horses.
The three men headed for Mount Liang, and nothing worthy of note happened on the way. They soon reached the inn of the Crocodile, who sent men up the mountain to report their arrival. Chao Gai and Song Jiang, with all the other leaders, greater and lesser, came down to the accompaniment of drums and fifes and met them at Golden Sands Landing. Everyone was introduced and then they rode up to the main camp where they dismounted and went to the great Assembly Hall, where the events that we already know of were recounted.
Whiskers said: “Now that I have been called here to the mountain, the Governor of Cangzhou is sure to have sent a warrant for the arrest of all my relatives. What can I do about it?”
Song Jiang smiled and said: “My advice is not to worry. Your wife and son were all brought here days ago.”
“Where are they then?” Whiskers asked.
“They are resting in my father’s house, go and see for yourself.” Song Jiang told Whiskers, to the latter’s immense relief.
Song Jiang had people take Whiskers to Squire Song’s residence, where he found all his family and also all of his valuable possessions. His wife said: “A little while ago someone brought a letter which said you had joined the company on the mountain, so we packed and came here at once.”
Whiskers went back and thanked everyone. Song Jiang then invited Whiskers and Sergeant Lei to the lower camp on the mountain where a feast was laid on, and the arrival of these new leaders was celebrated over several days. Of this no more.
Back in Cangzhou the Governor, when it got really late and Whiskers had still not brought his son back, sent people off to search in every direction. They spent most of the night searching. Next day someone found the dead body in the wood, and told the Governor. This gentleman was desolated. He went to the wood to see for himself. His grief was limitless. He had a coffin made and burnt paper offerings. A day later he went into session and ordered notices to be posted everywhere, demanding the apprehension and arrest of the said Sergeant Zhu. The authorities in the Sergeant’s home district had already reported that Whiskers’ wife and children had fled from their home and their whereabouts was unknown. A reward for the capture was announced in every district and town. Of this no more.
Meanwhile Iron Ox had been living at Mr. Chai’s for several months when suddenly one day a man bearing a letter burst through the manor gates. Chai Jin greeted him politely, took the letter and read it. “Then I must go at once,” he said in some consternation.
“Is it something serious?” Iron Ox asked.
“I have this uncle called Chai Huangcheng,” Mr. Chai began. “He lives in Gaotang. A certain rogue called Yin Tianxi, who is the brother-in-law of the governor there, Gao Lian, has been demanding he give up a garden that he owns. He’s had an apoplexy and is lying ill in bed. They think he’s close to death and apparently he has some last wishes he wants to make known, so they’ve come to fetch me. He has no children, so it’s essential that I go.”
“If you’ve got to go why don’t I go with you?” said Iron Ox.
“Yes, if you like, let us go together,” said Chai Jin.
Mr. Chai did his packing and picked a dozen good horses and some retainers to accompany them. At dawn next day Mr. Chai, Iron Ox and their retinue mounted and rode out of the gates, heading for Gaotang.
In less than a day they arrived. They entered the town and dismounted in front of the uncle’s residence. Leaving Iron Ox and the rest of the party outside the main hall, Mr. Chai entered the sick room to see his uncle:
This face is like gold leaf, the body a withered branch; the spirit is slow and sad, the breath but a tenuous thread. The teeth are tightly clamped together, neither food nor drink has passed these lips for days. The innards are so swollen no pill can get down. Grievers and mourners are already at hand, the doctors have given up hope.
Chai Jin sat down beside the bed and wept unreservedly. His uncle’s second wife came out and tried to comfort him. “You rode here in such haste,” she said. “You must try not to upset yourself too much.”
When greetings had been completed, Chai Jin asked for a full account. The second wife said: “The new governor, Gao Lian, who is also commander-in-chief of the armed forces, is a cousin of Marshal Gao in the capital. He relies on this connection to do just as he likes here. He brought a brother-in-law of his along with him, Yin Tianxi, whom people call Chancellor Yin. Actually he’s only a young man, but he uses his brother-in-law’s position to ride roughshod over everyone. A bunch of toadies he goes around with told him that behind our house we have a very attractive garden with a water pavilion. The swine came round here with twenty or thirty scheming rogues and marched straight through to the back to look at it. Now he wants to chase us out and come to live here himself. Huangcheng said to him: ‘Our family is of royal descent; we have a charter and a cast-iron guarantee from a previous emperor, which says no one is allowed to annoy us. How dare you try to take our house! Where are my family going to go?’
“The blighter just wouldn’t listen. He’s determined to throw us out. When Huangcheng tried to stop him, he got beaten up. That’s what brought on this seizure. He took to his bed and hasn’t moved since. He won’t eat or drink, no medicine does any good, it’s obvious he’s not long for this world. But now with you here to look after things, whatever troubles lie ahead it’s not going to get worse.”
Chai Jin said: “My dear, don’t worry. We’ll get a good doctor to treat him. If there’s any more trouble, I shall send someone home to get our imperial certificate to convince them. Even if the case goes before the Emperor himself there’s nothing to fear!”
“Huangcheng is so hopeless at practical matters. He’s not a patch on you, Your Excellency,” she said gratefully.
After seeing his uncle, Mr. Chai went out and explained everything to Iron Ox and the rest of his people.
When he heard it, Iron Ox leapt up and said: “What a bloody nerve! I’ve got my axes here. I’ll go and give the bastard a few chops first, and then we can discuss things.”
“Calm yourself, Mr. Li,” said Mr. Chai. “What’s the point in arguing with boors like that? Although he thinks he’s powerful enough to bully people, I’ve got a certificate at home to protect me. It’s no good disputing with him here, but in the capital there are people bigger than him, we must prepare our case carefully and appeal to the law.”
“The law my arse! If the law means anything, how come the world is in such a mess? Me, I’d strike first and talk later. Then if the bugger still wants to complain, I’d go and cut off the heads of all those fucking officials.”
“No wonder Whiskers has got it in for you and you two have got to be kept apart,” said Mr. Chai with a laugh. “This is an imperial city. You can’t employ your savage methods here.”
“So what if it is an imperial city?” said Iron Ox. “Didn’t I kill men in Jiangzhou and Wuweijun too?”
“Let me look into the affair first,” said Mr. Chai. “If I need your services, I’ll let you know. In the meantime there’s nothing you need do except sit down in this room and wait.”
At this point a maid came out and begged Mr. Chai to go in and see his uncle immediately.
Chai Jin entered the room and approached the bed. Huangcheng’s eyes were filled with tears. “My dear and respected nephew,” he said to Chai Jin, “I know you will not let our ancestor be shamed. That so-called ‘Chancellor’ has destroyed my life. On behalf of your own flesh and blood please take this letter to the capital to denounce him and obtain redress. Your kindness will bring relief to me in the underworld. Take care! This is my last and only wish!”
So saying, he gave up the ghost. Chai Jin wept bitterly for a time. Fearing that he was going to faint, the second wife did her best to enliven him. “You’ve been worried all the day. But now it’s time to consider what to do next.”
“I have the documents at home,” Chai Jin said. “I’ve sent for them but they haven’t come yet. But I’ll send someone as fast as possible with all that is needed, to lodge an accusation in the capital. Now we must honour my uncle; we must organize the coffin and the funeral service. When we’ve completed all the ceremonies we will discuss things again.”
Mr. Chai ordered everything to be done properly: the two coffins, inner and outer, obtained, a suitable memorial tablet set up, mourning clothes provided for the whole household. Everyone went into mourning.
Iron Ox had been outside and heard all the weeping in the inner appartments. He rubbed his hands together in eager anti~cipation of a fight. But when he questioned the servants no one would tell him anything. Meanwhile monks were invited to the house to organize prayers and offerings.
On the third day, the Chancellor turned up in front of the house. He was riding a prancing steed, and had with him a score of hangers-on, with bows and crossbows, some blowing on flutes, or fooling around with balls, staves or musical instruments. They were on an excursion and were all somewhat drunk and pretending to be more drunk than they really were. The Chancellor reined in his horse and shouted that he wanted to speak to whoever was in charge inside.
Mr. Chai responded by hurrying out to receive him, dressed completely in mourning.
“What’s your position here?” the Chancellor inquired arrogantly.
“I am a nephew of Chai Huangcheng’s. My name is Chai Jin.”
“The other day I told them to move out of here. Why have my orders not been obeyed?”
“My uncle was sick and we couldn’t move him. He died the other day and we can’t move till the seven days period is complete.”
“Bugger the seven days period. I’ll give you three days to move. If you’re not out in three days, I shall order you a cangue and let you have a hundred blows of my staff!”
“You had better not threaten us like this, your Honour! Our family has an imperial lineage, and we have a cast-iron guarantee. That’s something you can’t ignore!”
“Let me see it then!” said the Chancellor.
“It’s at home, but I’ve sent someone to fetch it.”
“This bugger’s talking nonsense!” the Chancellor said to his followers in a great rage. “Even if he’s got it, this cast-iron guarantee does not impress me. Take him away and beat him for me.”
Before his attendants could move, Iron Ox, who had been watching the proceedings from a gap in the door, flung the door open and with a huge bellow threw himself at the Chancellor’s horse, dragged him off it and felled him with a single blow of the fist. When Yin’s companions rushed to the rescue, five or six of them fell to Iron Ox’s fists and the rest fled in confusion. Iron Ox picked the Chancellor up and began to hammer him with fists and feet. There was nothing Mr. Chai could do to stop him. The Chancellor was now indeed in a sorry state, lying sprawled on the ground like a sacrificial victim:
The bully has such a false view of his worth,
He heeds not the justice of heaven and earth.
But Iron Ox is here, so he won’t get away.
Till the King of Hell greets him and asks him to pay.
Now that the Chancellor lay there dead by Iron Ox’s hand, Mr. Chai could only curse his luck. He ordered Iron Ox into the back room to discuss what to do. “Obviously they’ll come here to get you,” he said to Iron Ox. “So you’re not safe here. Leave me to take care of the authorities. You must go at once to Mount Liang.”
“But if I go,” said Iron Ox, “you’ll get the blame.
“I’ve got the cast-iron guarantee to protect me,” said Mr. Chai. “So you have to go, and without delay.”
So Iron Ox picked up his axes, took some money for travel expenses and departed, taking the road to Mount Liang.
It wasn’t long before several hundred well-armed men appeared and surrounded the house. Knowing they had come to arrest the culprit, Mr. Chai went out and spoke to them: “I am going to go with you to the magistracy to make a statement.”
They tied his hands first and then went into the house to look for the murderer, the big black fellow. Not finding him, they took Mr. Chai still with his hands tied to the courtroom where he was told to kneel. When Governor Gao Lian had heard that his brother-in-law had been killed, he ground his teeth in fury and couldn’t wait to get hold of the criminal. Mr. Chai was flung down before the bench while the Governor shouted: “How dare you kill my brother-in-law!”
Mr. Chai declared: “I am of imperial lineage. Our family has a charter and a cast-iron guarantee. It’s at my house in Cangzhou. I came here to see my uncle because he was ill. Unfortunately he died. At present we are preparing the funeral. Mr. Yin brought a crowd of people to the house and wanted to drive the family out. He wouldn’t listen to what I had to say and ordered his people to beat me. One of my retainers, Big Li, came to rescue me and happened to kill Mr. Yin.”
“Where is this Big Li?” the Governor roared.
“He was frightened and he ran away,” said Mr. Chai.
“If he is a retainer, how could he kill someone unless you ordered him to? You let him go on purpose, because you want to pull the wool over my eyes! You’re a villain! You obviously won’t confess till we beat you. Guards! Take him and thrash him within an inch of his life!”
Mr. Chai protested: “Big Li was protecting his master. If he accidentally killed someone, it’s not my fault. Since I have the imperial guarantee it’s quite illegal to beat me.”
“Where is this imperial guarantee?” said the Governor.
“I’ve sent someone home to fetch it,” said Mr. Chai.
This incensed the Governor still further. “The villain is opposing the authorities! Thrash him!” he roared. “Give him all you’ve got!”
The guards set to work. They beat Mr. Chai till the skin was in shreds and the blood flowed, and got him to confess that he had ordered his retainer Big Li to kill the Chancellor, Yin Tianxi. Then a twenty-five catty cangue, appropriate for a condemned man was fitted and he was consigned to prison. The body of the Chancellor was prepared for burial and the coffin was interred. Of this no more.
The Governor’s wife was determined to avenge her brother. She urged her husband to confiscate Chai Huangcheng’s prop~erty, imprison all his people and seize the house and all the lands. This was a bitter time for Chai Jin, languishing in prison:
The words of a woman are like a snake’s poison,
The power of the charter an empty illusion.
Just to think that the ancestor gave up a throne,
While his grandson can’t even defend what’s his own!
Meanwhile Iron Ox had rushed straight back to Mount Liang. Arriving at the stronghold he went to see all the leaders. When Whiskers Zhu saw him, he exploded with anger and reaching for his halberd tried to hurl himself upon him. Iron Ox took out his two axes to retaliate. Chao Gai, Song Jiang and the rest rushed forward to separate them.
Song Jiang tried to placate Whiskers by saying: “The business of the little boy was not Iron Ox’s fault. It was a plan of the Professor’s, because he could not persuade you to join us on the mountain. Now you are here with us, forget the past and try to work with us in order to strengthen our reputation for loyalty, lest outsiders deride us.” He then called upon Iron Ox to apologize to Whiskers.
Scowling ferociously, Iron Ox exclaimed: “But he started it all! I’ve put in a lot of work for the mountain stronghold, he hasn’t deserved half as much as I have, and now I’m the one who’s asked to apologize!”
Song Jiang said: “But you’re the one who killed the child, even if it was on the Professor’s orders. And again, he is your senior. Please, for my sake give him a few courteous words and I’ll prostrate myself before you.”
Iron Ox had to give way before Song Jiang’s insistence. He said: “I’m not afraid of you, and this is only because the boss makes me do it and leaves me no alternative: I apologize to you.” And at Song Jiang’s insistence he also threw down his axes and bowed to Whiskers twice. Whiskers’ anger was at last appeased. Chao Gai ordered a feast in the camp to celebrate their reconciliation.
Iron Ox now explained how Mr. Chai had gone to Gaotang to visit his sick relative and how the Governor’s brother-in-law had wanted to seize the garden and threatened to beat Mr. Chai and been killed by himself. Song Jiang was greatly disturbed by this account. “So you ran off and left Mr. Chai to face the music,” he said.
“Let us keep calm, friends,” said the Professor, “and wait till the Magic Messenger gets back. Then we’ll hear what’s happened.”
“Where has the Magic Messenger gone?” Iron Ox asked.
“I was afraid you might make trouble when you were staying at Mr. Chai’s,” said the Professor. “So I sent him to call you back. When he got there and found you gone, he must have gone on to Gaotang to look for you.”
He had hardly finished speaking when one of the men came in to report that the Magic Messenger was back. Song Jiang went to receive him and then brought him into the hall. When he was seated they asked him about Mr. Chai.
“When I got to Mr. Chai’s manor,” he replied, “they told me he had gone with Iron Ox to Gaotang. So I went there straight away and made inquiries. I found everyone in the city was talking about how the Chancellor in a dispute over Chai Huangcheng’s estate had been killed by a big black fellow and how Mr. Chai was held responsible and had been bound and thrown into prison. All Chai Huangcheng’s property has been confiscated and Chai Jin’s life is under grave threat.”
Chao Gai said: “This big black idiot has done it again! Wherever he goes he stirs up something!”
Iron Ox said: “Chai Huangcheng was beaten up by that bastard and died of chagrin. He came to grab their house and threatened to beat Chai Jin. Not even a living Buddha could put up with all that!”
Chao Gai said: “Mr. Chai has always been a friend of the mountain stronghold. Now he’s in trouble. How can we not go to his assistance? I shall go myself.”
“You’re our commander-in-chief,” said Song Jiang. “You can’t act like that without a plan. I myself have long been a friend of Mr. Chai, please allow me to go down on your behalf.”

The Professor said: "Although Gaotang is only a small administration, it's densely populated and has a big defence force and ample supplies, we mustn't underestimate them. I propose an advance guard of twelve leaders, Leopard's Head, Colonel Hua, Thunderclap, the White-Water Dragon, the Little Duke, the Halberdier, Colonel Sun, Golden Wings, Panther, Redeye, the Flautist and the Daytime Rat, with five thousand cavalry and foot, and in support a force led by Song Jiang and myself, with Whiskers, Sergeant Lei, the Magic Messenger, Iron Ox, White Eel, Morbid and Madcap, ten leaders in all, with three thousand horse and foot."
After bidding farewell to Chao Gai and the rest, these twenty two leaders left the mountain and set out for Gaotang. Indeed, they marched out in perfect order:
A swirling of embroidered banners and signal flags, a medley of trumpets and gongs. Forks, three-pronged and five-pronged, glitter like autumn frost; spears with steel or wooden points slant thick as winter's snow. Fierce warriors fill the road, archers and crossbowmen in the lead; guns follow on carts, stout halberdiers and lancers pressing after. The commanders on horseback have the ferocity of the tiger of the Southern mountains, every one of them a stern, indomitable warrior. Their mounts are like the green dragon of the northern sea, battle-steeled and unscareable. Here are engines of war as powerful as a flood; here are the troops to sweep all before them like a tempest.
When the advance guard of the Mount Liang forces reached the border of Gaotang, some government soldiers reported it to the Governor. "Aha, you rebellious rabble hiding away in the Marshes of Mount Liang," said the latter, with a cold smile. "I was intending to come and get you anyway, but now you've come to me of your own accord! Heaven must want me to succeed." To his minions he shouted: "You there, quickly pass on the order for the army to advance and engage the enemy and for the people to man the ramparts." For this Governor had two hats: he commanded the army and he governed the people. The moment the order was received all the army officers and government officials of every rank took up their positions to receive the enemy.
Under Gao Lian's immediate command there were three hundred special troops known as the Celestial Guard. These were all picked troops from Shandong, Hebei, Jiangxi, Hunan, or from either bank of the Huai river, or the east and west parts of Zhejiang. These three hundred Celestial guards were indeed a sight to behold:
Wild and dishevelled is their hair, their heads framed in an aura of mist. They are dressed in gourd-shaped armour, and a thousand flames leap up behind them. Their foreheads are daubed yellow and painted with the eight diagrams. They are cloaked in protective leopard skins; they wear face masks of copper like burnished gold and carry hard steel scourges like brooms. Front and back they are protected by bright steel. Their banners dazzle the eye, as they spread out on either hand like countless black vapours. One could be witnessing the heavenly powers descending from the Dipper, or some comet falling from on high.
So the Governor led out his three hundred guards, fully armed and accoutred; he rode forth, with the rest of the army under his command drawn up around him in battle formation. The three hundred guards were in the centre. Waving their banners and cheering, with thundering drum and shrilling fifes, they awaited the enemy.
Leopard's Head, Colonel Hua, and Thunderclap now arrived on the scene with their five thousand troops. The two armies met, flags and drums facing each other, while bows and crossbows on either side set up a deadly fire at the front ranks. Bugles rang out and drums thundered in both armies. Colonel Hua and Thunderclap with ten other leaders galloped to the front and reined in their horses. Leader Leopard's Head slanting his eight-pronged lance galloped out in front and shouted out: "Let the commander of Gaotang show himself!" Giving his horse its head, Gao Lian with some thirty or so of his officers, galloped to the pennants gate, and reined in his horse. He pointed at Leopard's Head and bellowed: "You foolhardy gang of rebels, how dare you flout my authority?"
Leopard's Head shouted back: "You vicious tyrant and plunderer! One day I shall go to the capital and get that Gao the Ball, oppressor of the righteous and despoiler of the people. I shall cut him into ten thousand pieces! Then I'll be satisfied!"
Gao Lian was outraged. He turned and asked: "Who wants to be first to go and get the scoundrel?"
One of the group of officers, a commander named Yu Zhi, rode forward, slapping his horse and whirling his sword.
Leopard's Head charged him at once. Before they had fought five bouts Yu Zhi received a thrust in the chest and was knocked head over heels from his horse.
Greatly shocked by this, Gao Lian asked: "Who will go and avenge him?"
Another captain rode forward, named Wen Wenbao. He wielded a long lance and rode a handsome bay and his harness bells and the jade ornaments on his belt all jingled as he rode out in front. Four hooves hammered the ground as he charged Leopard's Head.
Thunderclap immediately gave a great shout. "Wait, brother! Just watch me cut his head off!"
Leopard's Head reined in his horse and rested his lance, allowing Thunderclap to fight Wen. After about ten bouts, Thunder-clap left an opening, allowing his opponent to lunge forward. Thunderclap raised his arm and struck down and sliced off half Wen's head. He died in the saddle. The horse galloped back to the enemy ranks. A great tumult arose in the opposing ranks.
When Gao Lian saw two of his commanders defeated he reached behind him and drew his magic sword. After muttering a spell, he gave a loud cry of "chrr!" Immediately a column of black smoke rose from his lines. As the black smoke filled the heavens, sand and stones began to blow about, heaven and earth shook and a strange wind blew, sweeping towards the opposing army. Leopard's Head, Thunderclap, Colonel Hua and the other commanders could not face it. The terrified pack horses whinnied and bolted. Everyone turned and ran.
With a wave of his sword. Gao Lian signalled the three hundred Celestial guards to charge, with the regular troops following in support. They routed Lin Chong's troops, who scattered like falling stars and driven clouds, in total panic. It was like some natural disaster when brother loses brother and children are separated from parents. Of the five thousand troops more than a thousand were annihilated. The remainder fled back more than fifteen miles before daring to stop and make camp. After observing the rout, Gao Lian recalled his own troops and retired to the city to rest.
When Song Jiang arrived with the support force, he was greeted by Leopard's Head and the others, who told him what had happened. Song Jiang and the Professor had a shock. "What kind of trick is that, to have such a terrible effect!" Song Jiang said.
"It's some kind of magic," said the Professor. "You'd need to be able to stop the wind and turn back fire to defeat such an enemy!"
Hearing this Song Jiang opened his mystic books, and in the third volume found a method for stopping the wind and turning back fire. Delighted with what he'd found, he diligently committed the spells and magic formulae to memory. Then he made dispositions for his forces. They breakfasted at dawn and with waving banners and beating drums marched on the city.
Their approach was reported in the city. Gao Lian called up his victorious army again, including the three hundred Celestial guards. The gates were opened, the drawbridge lowered, and they marched out of the city and deployed in battle formation.
Waving his sword Song Jiang galloped to the front. A cluster of black pennants could be seen in Gao Lian's lines. "Those black pennants among their forces indicate masters of wizardry," said the Professor. "I'm afraid with a weapon like that we won't be able to stand up to them."
"Fear not, Professor!" said Song Jiang. "I have my own secret mode of offence. Let every man go forward without fear or hesitation in his heart."
Gao Lian now ordered all his commanders not to try and challenge the enemy to single combat but to observe the signals and together use all their strength to seize Song Jiang. He himself offered a big reward.
Shouts arose now on both sides as Gao Lian rode out in front of his troops. He had hung on the pommel of his saddle the bronze shield which gave him the power to summon beasts, decorated with dragon and phoenix insignia, and he was brandishing his magic sword.
Song Jiang pointed a finger at Gao and upbraided him: "Yesterday before I arrived my commanders carelessly suffered some casualties. Today I shall most certainly punish you."
"You bunch of rebels!" Gao riposted. "Get down off your horses double-quick and let us tie you up, to save me the trouble of soiling my hands and muddying my feet!"
And with this he waved his sword, muttered a spell and cried: "Chrr!" Immediately the column of black smoke arose and the strange wind began to blow. Song Jiang did not wait till the wind reached him. He also uttered a spell, formed a secret sign with his left hand while raising the sword in his right, and also pro~nounced "Chrr!" Immediately the wind stopped blowing towards Song Jiang's forces and turned back against Gao's ranks.
Song Jiang was about to give the order to charge, but Gao had seen how the wind had changed. He hurriedly took his bronze shield, rapped it with his sword and then rolled a ball of sand towards the company of celestial guards. From among the troops a pack of fearsome beasts rushed forth:
There are wildcats with darting claws, lions with shuddering heads. Flashing chimeras reveal their savage ferocity, rearing monsters parade their awesome power. Wolves and jackals become rows of snarling teeth, vomiting fearsome warriors; tigers and leopards turn into bevies of gaping mouths, spitting out wild horses. Bristling wild boar burst through the ranks, curly-haired mastiffs savage the men. Python like dragons rear into the sky, vicious serpents that could swallow an elephant infest the earth.
When Gao's bronze shield rang out, this pack of weird beasts and venomous reptiles poured forth, while Song Jiang's troops gazed on in horror.
Song Jiang was the first to throw away his sword, clap heels to his horse and lead the retreat. The other leaders fled for their lives all in a bunch. The lesser commanders also took flight, so tightly packed together you could not tell one from the other. Gao was after them, waving his sword and urging on his troops, the celestial guard in the lead and the regulars behind them. Song Jiang's army suffered a huge reverse. Gao harried them for half a dozen miles before giving the signal for his men to regroup and return to the city.
Arriving at the foot of a hill, Song Jiang halted his troops and made camp. Although they had suffered losses among the troops, the leaders were fortunately all unscathed. Having settled his troops, Song Jiang held a discussion with the Professor. "This time in the attack on Gaotang we have lost a second battle. We've no means of overcoming the celestial guard, what shall we do?"
"If this blighter can employ wizardry," said the latter, "he will surely come tonight to raid our camp. We must have a plan to pre-empt him. Let's leave just a small force here, while the rest of us go back to the old camp."
Song Jiang gave the orders. Only Panther and the Daytime Rat were left in charge of the camp while the others went back to the old camp to rest.
Now Panther and the Daytime Rat disposed their troops in an ambush several hundred yards outside the camp. About the first watch this is what they saw:
In every quarter the murk deepens; from every side the mist spreads. A violent gale arises, shaking heaven and earth. Driving rain causes the seas to boil and the rivers to burst their banks. The Lord of Thunder rages, riding backwards on the Firebreather to vaunt his might; the Lightning Goddess spits, goading the Golden Snake into a venomous display. Great trees are torn up by the roots, deep waters emptied to the dregs.
During the big storm that night as Panther and the Daytime Rat with their three hundred men lay hidden in the undergrowth, they watched Gao stealthily approach with his three hundred Celestial guards. After certain secret signals, they charged into the camp. They found it empty and were turning round to leave when Panther and the Daytime Rat raised a great shout. Gao and his men suspected they were caught in a trap. They scattered and fled, each of the Celestial guards taking his own path to escape. Panther and the Daytime Rat began loosing crossbow bolts at random, firing for all they were worth, and one of the bolts struck Gao in the left shoulder. Braving the elements they spread out and attacked the fleeing enemy forces. But when Gao and his Celestial guards had put some distance between themselves and the camp Panther and the Daytime Rat, not having many troops at their disposal, dared not continue the pursuit.
A little later the rain had ceased and the sky cleared. The stars were visible again and in the moonlight they found that more than twenty of the Celestial guards had been shot or wounded at the foot of a grassy knoll. They took the wounded to Song Jiang's camp and also told him about the storm. Song Jiang and the Professor were alarmed by what they heard. "We are only a mile or two away, but we had no rain or wind!" they exclaimed.
"It must be the magic," everyone concluded. "It was only in that place and from a height of a few hundred metres. The moisture must have been drawn up from nearby ponds."
Panther said: "Gao Lian charged into our camp, with his hair flying and waving his sword. One of my crossbow bolts hit him and he retreated to the city. We didn't have enough men so I didn't dare pursue him further."
Song Jiang rewarded Panther and the Daytime Rat, the wounded Celestial guards were executed, and the rest of the leaders were ordered to set up seven or eight small camps around the main camp, to protect them from further attacks, while someone was sent to the mountain stronghold to fetch reinforcements.
Meanwhile the wounded Gao was convalescing in the city. He ordered the army to man the defences and to be on the alert night and day. He ruled out any further offensive until he was recovered from his wound, when he vowed he would capture Song Jiang.
When Song Jiang saw his troops defeated his heart was filled with gloom. He discussed matters with the Professor. "Once again we haven't managed to break the power of Gao Lian. Suppose they raise more troops and mount a stronger attack, what then?"
The Professor said: "We'll only break Gao Lian's magic if we do this and this. Unless I can get a certain person to come, it'll be difficult to save Chai Jin and we'll never take Gaotang." Indeed, in order to overcome the power to raise fog and clouds it was necessary to invite a master of the most transcendental and profound knowledge.

I will go with you to Liangshan Marsh on the condition that you kill Li Kui," said Zhu Tong. "Then my anger will be appeased."
Li Kui was angry at this, and swore, "You can kiss my ass! I was told by Chao Gai and Song Jiang to kill the boy. It doesn't have a stinking fart to do with me!"
Zhu Tong again tried to get at Li Kui, but was held back by the others. Squire Chai Jin intervened, "This matter can be easily arranged. You three may go to Liangshan Marsh according to Chao Gai's wish, and leave Li Kui behind here?"
"But the Prefect will order for the arrest of my family," said Zhu Tong. "What about that?"
"I think that Song Jiang has probably sent men to bring all your family to the mountain," said Wu Yong.
This appeased Zhu Tong, and at last he agreed to go. That evening the three men mounted horses given them by Squire Chai Jin, and left for Liangshan Marsh. They duly reached their destination, and were received by the leaders of the bandits. During the reception Zhu Tong asked if anything had been done about his family. At this Song Jiang laughed, and said, "You need not worry about them because they have been here for several days."
Zhu Tong was pleased at this, and was taken to see his wife. She told him that a letter had been brought to their home stating that he had joined the bandits, and that she was to join him there. After this Zhu Tong lived with his family at Liangshan Marsh.
At Cangzhou the Prefect became anxious at the nonreturn of his son and Zhu Tong, and sent men to look for them. They all returned by midnight without having found a trace of them. The next day the body of the boy was found in the wood. The Prefect was filled with anguish, and went at once to see the corpse. The next day he issued an order for the arrest of Zhu Tong. Inquiries made at Yuncheng County discovered that Zhu Tong's family had left there some days before.
Li Kui had stayed at Squire Chai Jin's for a month when one day he saw a messenger arrive with an urgent message. Squire Chai Jin read the letter and was startled. He said, "As things are like this, I must go and look into the matter myself."
"What is it about?" asked Li Kui.
"I have an uncle at Gaotang Prefecture, and he is very ill because a man is trying to deprive him of his garden. As he is about to die he asks me to go, and hear his will. As he has neither son nor daughter I must go at once to him."
"I should like to go with you," said Li Kui. "What do you say?"
"As you want to go I have no objection," said Squire Chai Jin. He then selected about ten of his best horses and men to go with them. They started the following morning at daybreak, and reached Gaotang Prefecture the same day. Upon reaching the house they dismounted, and Squire Chai Jin went inside to see his uncle, leaving the others with Li Kui in a guest room. Squire Chai Jin found his uncle on the bed in a very weak state. Hi aunt said, "You have ridden a good distance to pay us this visit, but I hope that our trouble will not upset you." After answering several questions she continued, "The new Prefect here, Gao Lian, is a cousin of Marshal Gao Qiu of the Imperial Guard. He does all kinds of bad things here, and relies upon his influence and position to hush any objection. He brought with him his brother-in-law, named Yin Tianxi, who has got the nickname Yin, the 'Prefect's Deputy'; and he also acts just as badly as his brother-in-law. One of his hangers-on informed him that we had a very nice flower garden with a fine arbor in a pond. One day he came here with about thirty dissolute fellows, and after looking round our garden he said we must remove as he had decided to come and live here himself. My husband told Yin Tianxi that our family was of very high standing, and that we held an iron tablet inscribed by the Emperor himself. Therefore we could not submit to such treatment. 'If you take our home, where can we go to?' But he would not listen to what my husband had said, and insisted upon our leaving at once. My husband got so excited that he tried to fight with Yin Tianxi, but the fellows around seized my husband and assaulted him. As a result of this he has been seriously ill ever since. Medicine has not improved his health, and he is expecting to die very soon. As you are his cousin you must devise some plan for this situation."
"Do not worry about it," replied Squire Chai Jin. "Let us send for the best doctors, and see whether they cannot cure my uncle. I will send a man to my home to bring the Imperial iron tablet here, and then I will discuss matters with the officials. We need not be afraid of these local mandarins when I have that tablet."
"Perhaps my husband has not managed the business properly," said his aunt, "and I hope that you will succeed."
After attending to his uncle's requirements Squire Chai Jin went to the guest room, and explained the position to Li Kui and the men.
Li Kui was very angry at this and said, "These fellows are unreasonable. But I will go and ask them to bite my axe, and after that we can discuss matters with them."
"Don't be so stupid," replied Squire Chai Jin. "This official has great influence, but when I show him my imperial tablet, if he will not listen to me, then I may go to the capital, and lay the case before the highest official."
"Laws! Laws!" said Li Kui. "At the present time laws are of no use in our country. Better fight and discuss afterwards. Then if these fellows appeal to the mandarins against us we shall chop off the heads of the mandarins themselves."
Squire Chai Jin laughed, "You should not forget that you cannot meet Zhu Tong because he wants to fight with you. But still you must remember in this city you cannot act as you wish as if you were on the mountain stronghold."
"What difference does this city make? When I was in Jiangzhou did I not kill many men there?"
"Wait until I have seen how the matter goes," said Squire Chai Jin, "if I see a chance of using you I will let you know."
Just then a maid servant entered, and asked Squire Chai Jin to go and see his uncle again. Upon entering the sick room Squire Chai Jin saw that his uncle had tears in his eyes, and the latter said, "You are very courageous, and did nothing to defend our family. As we are blood-relations I want you to take the imperial iron tablet to the capital, and there bring a charge against Yin Tianxi of being the cause of my death. Revenge me, and then in the grave I shall rest contented. Take due care of yourself, and I have nothing more to say." After saying this he expired.
Squire Chai Jin burst into tears, and his aunt begged him not to be so much upset. "The Imperial iron tablet has not yet arrived from my home," replied Squire Chai Jin, "but as soon as I can get it I will proceed at once to the capital. But we can talk matters over after the corpse has been dressed and placed in the coffin." He then made all the usual arrangements, and observed the rites.
Three days after this Yin Tianxi went to the country with his followers armed with bows and arrows and all kinds of musical instruments. They all got more or less drunk, and upon reaching Squire Chai Jin's house, they reined in their horses and called to speak to the master. Squire Chai Jin upon hearing the message went to the gate dressed in his mourning clothes.
Yin Tianxi seated on his horse asked, "Who are you?"
"I am the nephew of Chai Huangcheng," replied the Squire.
"A few days ago I told him to remove from this house," said Yin Tianxi. "How is it that he has not done so?"
"My uncle was very sick after your visit, and could not remove," replied Squire Chai Jin. "He died a few days ago, and after waiting the proper seven days we can remove the household goods."
"Absurd!" said Yin Tianxi, "I allow you only three more days. After that if you are still here I shall have you beaten one hundred times, and put a cangue on your neck."
"You must not insult me in that way," said Squire Chai Jin, "because our family comes from very honorable ancestry. I am the possessor of the Imperial iron tablet so who dare be disrespectful to me?"
"Well, let me look at your iron tablet," shouted Yin Tianxi.
"It is at my home at Cangzhou," replied Squire Chai Jin, "but I have already sent a messenger to bring it here."
"You are talking very foolishly," said Yin Tianxi with anger. "Even if you have such a tablet it will not make any difference. You men! Beat this fellow!"
Li Kui was standing inside looking through a crack in the door, and hearing all this. He now rushed out, and seizing Yin Tianxi pulled him off his horse. The followers of Yin Tianxi came to his assistance, but Li Kui used his fists right and left, and drove them off. They all decamped. Li Kui picked up Yin Tianxi, and gave him such a beating that the latter soon died.
Squire Chai Jin was annoyed at this as it would lead to trouble, and told Li Kui to go inside to discuss matters. There he spoke, "The officials will soon be here to investigate this case, and you must escape at once to Liangshan Marsh. I will deal with the officials."
"If I escape you will be involved," replied Li Kui.
"I have the Imperial iron tablet," said Squire Chai Jin, "and that will protect me. You must go at once."
Li Kui agreed, and taking his axes, he left by the back door.

It was not long before about a hundred armed men arrived, and Squire Chai Jin went out and spoke to them. "I will go with you to the yamen and give my evidence there." The men bound him with ropes, and then searched his house for Li Kui without finding the latter. They then took Chai Jin to the yamen as a prisoner, where he knelt down.
The Prefect was very angry that his brother-in-law was killed, and he shouted at Squire Chai Jin, "How dare you kill my brother-in-law, Yin Tianxi?"
"I am a descendant of Emperor Chai Shizong who received from the Emperor Taizu an iron tablet. I live at Cangzhou. My uncle was very sick so I came here to see him. Unfortunately he died, but has not yet been buried. Yin Tianxi came to the house with about thirty armed men, and told us to clear out of the house at once. As I objected to this he set his men to beat me. A villager named Li Da, came to my assistance, and during the fight he killed your brother-in-law."
"Where is this Li Da?" asked the Prefect.
"He was very much afraid of the consequences of this action, and ran away."
"He was a servant at the house, and must have done this with your approval. You purposely told him to escape, and now come here to try to deceive me. If I don't have you beaten now I suppose you will not speak the truth. Jailer, beat this prisoner very severely!"
"As it was Li Da who killed the man that is not my crime," said Squire Chai Jin. "I have an Imperial iron tablet protecting me from injustice so how dare you torture me?"
"Where is the tablet?"
"I have already sent a man to bring it here from Cangzhou."
The Prefect was angry and shouted, "This fellow is doing his best to thwart the law. Beat him!"
The attendants seized Squire Chai Jin, and beat him till the blood flowed. Then Squire Chai Jin falsely confessed that he had told Li Da to commit the foul deed. A heavy cangue was then fastened on his neck, and he was sent to prison.
The sister of Yin Tianxi was not satisfied with this, and got the Prefect to arrest also the whole family, and put them in prison. She also got the house sealed up.
Li Kui traveled day and night to get to Liangshan Marsh, but on arriving there he was seen by Zhu Tong who was angry at the sight of him. Zhu Tong seized a halberd, and Li Kui took his axes. Chao Gai and the other leaders interposed to stop the fighting.
Song Jiang spoke in an apologetic tone, "Li Kui killed the Prefect's son in accordance with Wu Yong's order, and the latter only thought of that because you would not join us. Do not think of that affair any more, but let us work together here, and not let outsiders laugh at us." He then turned to Li Kui and told him to apologize to Zhu Tong.
Li Kui stared at Song Jiang and said, "I have been here a long time, and have done many meritorious deeds. But Zhu Tong has only been here a few days, and has done nothing so far. Why should I apologize to him?"
"Although Wu Yong gave the order yet you actually did the deed," said Song Jiang. "But apart from that Zhu Tong is your elder brother, and if you will salute him now and become friends, I myself will give you a salutation, and so end this trouble satisfactorily for all."
Li Kui turned to Zhu Tong and said, "I am not afraid of you. But as my elder brother Song Jiang orders me to do it I will salute you as my friend, and here I apologize for what I did."
He gave Zhu Tong two salutations, and the latter was appeased. Li Kui then told the assembled leaders what had happened to Squire Chai Jin. When Song Jiang heard the news he was startled, and said, "You have escaped and let Squire Chai be involved."
"Do not get excited," interposed Wu Yong. "I was afraid that Li Kui would make some trouble at Squire Chai Jin's place so I sent Dai Zong there to investigate and report. If Li Kui was not there Dai Zong was to go on to Gaotang Prefecture and make inquiries there."
While he was speaking a scout entered, and reported that Dai Zong was just arriving.
Dai Zong soon entered the hall, and Song Jiang asked for news about Squire Chai Jin. He reported that not finding Li Kui at Chai Jin's home he had hurried on to Gaotang Prefecture. There he heard the news that a dark complexioned man had killed Yin Tianxi. That as Squire Chai Jin was implicated he had been arrested, and was put in prison. All the furniture and also the house had been confiscated. Squire Chai Jin was undoubtedly in danger of losing his life.
"That black fellow is always stirring up trouble," said Chao Gai. "Everywhere he goes there is some strife."
"Squire Chai Jin's uncle was killed by Yin Tianxi," said Li Kui. "Then he came, and wanted to take possession of the house, and I heard what was said. Even if I were a living Buddha I could not have remained passive with such injustice."
"Squire Chai Jin has always been on good terms with us here," said Chao Gai, "and now that he is in danger I will go myself to rescue him from the peril."
"How can you do that by yourself when you are our great chief?" said Song Jiang. "As I am indebted to Squire Chai Jin I will go in your place."
"Gaotang Prefecture is a small place, but the people and soldiers are many so that we must not consider this matter as only trifling," said Wu Yong. "We must send at least five thousand men under the command of Lin Chong, Hua Rong, and ten other leaders, as an advance guard. The main body consisting of three thousand men must be in charge of Song Jiang and nine other leaders."
They all left Liangshan Marsh that very day, and upon nearing Gaotang Prefecture the Prefect was informed by his own men of the advance of the brigands. Upon hearing this the Prefect Gao Lian, sneered and said, "These are bandits of Liangshan Marsh, I will now capture them as they come here. Let all preparations be made for an immediate march outside the town. The people left behind can guard the city." He mounted his horse and went to the parade ground where the troops assembled, and soon began to march out of the town gates. His own bodyguard consisted of three hundred men called the "Flying Spirits." He commanded these specially selected men himself. They had armor, a double-edged sword on their back, and were mounted on horses. They formed the center of the army with the other soldiers on both wings.
The two armies duly met, and faced each other standing in readiness. Both sides sounded their ram's horns and beat their drums. Lin Chong, armed with a big crooked spear, galloped forward, and coming near the opposing force shouted, "Gao, you thief! Come out!"
Gao Lian advanced with about thirty officers, and then halting shouted, "You, fellow, are not aware that you will soon die. How dare you come here!"
"You robber of the people!" replied Lin Chong. "Very soon I shall go to the capital to kill that rascal Marshal Gao Qiu. When I cut him up into small pieces I shall be contented!"
Gao Lian was angry, and turning round asked his attendants who would volunteer to kill this thief. General Yu Zhi came forward, and whipping his horse dashed towards Lin Chong. They fought, and after about five bouts, Lin Chong mortally wounded General Yu Zhi who fell dead off his horse.
Gao Lian was surprised, but called for another volunteer. General Wen Wenbao next came forward mounted on a cream-colored horse which had many bells tinkling, and he was armed with a long spear. He galloped, and met Lin Chong.
General Qin Ming seeing this called out to Lin Chong, "Let me meet this man while you take a rest." Lin Chong therefore retired, and left his opponent to General Qin Ming. They fought and after about ten bouts Qin Ming tried a trick, and hit his opponent on the head killing him on the spot.
Both sides raised loud shouts after this. Prefect Gao Lian, seeing that two of his champions had been killed, drew his precious sword from its sheath on his back, and holding it in front he muttered a charm, and immediately a large dark magical mist arose in his army. It rose upwards like a whirlwind throwing sand and stones in all directions, and moved towards the opposing brigands. The bandits could not see anything, and being thrown into confusion they began to retreat. Gao Lian waved his sword and ordered his special bodyguard to charge. The other troops on either wing also advanced to the attack. The brigands were now in hopeless confusion and in their retreat were cut down by the pursuing troops. During the general rout about a thousand bandits were killed. After pursuing about a //Prefect Gao Lian recalled his men, and they returned to the town.
Song Jiang at last got together Lin Chong and Wu Yong, and they were surprised at the fatal defeat. Song Jiang said, "What is this devilish charm that threw our men into confusion?"
"It was done by a magical spell," replied Wu Yong. "If we had had a trick of turning the wind we should have won."
Song Jiang now remembered the Heavenly Books he had, and upon looking through these he found in volume three the description of a method of turning winds or fire. He was now much pleased, and carefully memorized the magic spell as given. He mustered all his men, and after they had partaken of a meal he ordered a general advance towards the town.
Prefect Gao Lian was informed by a scout of the return of the bandits and immediately gave orders. The town gate was opened, and the troops again marched out. When the two armies were close they halted, and Song Jiang rode forward. He saw many black flags in Prefect Gao Lian's troops. Wu Yong said, "Those black flags must be part of the magic spell, and they will be used again. What are you going to do?"
"Do not be anxious!" replied Song Jiang. "I have a means of gaining a victory this time. You tell our men this, and order that they must advance without any fear."
Gao Lian addressed his troops, "This time we will have no single combats, but instead you will all advance on hearing my signal. You must capture Song Jiang this time, and I will reward you handsomely." His charmed breast plate was engraved with animals and seal characters. He carried his sword in his hand, and went in front of his bodyguard on horseback.
Song Jiang pointed to him and cursed him, "Yesterday I was not here, and therefore my men were defeated by you. Today I will see that you are killed."
Gao Lian replied in a loud voice, "Do not make me soil my hand, you rebellious thieves, but submit at once and become my prisoners." He then held his sword aloft and muttered a charm. Immediately a black mist arose, and began to whirl round.
Song Jiang also took his sword, and uttered his spell. The black whirlwind immediately turned, and went back towards Prefect Gao Lian's army.
Gao Lian seeing the black whirlwind returning took his charmed breastplate and rattled his sword on it. Immediately a cloud of sand arose, and from this mass emerged strange monstrosities, snake and insects.
Song Jiang was quite nonplused at this, turned his horse, and galloped off to escape these monstrosities, followed by the other leaders and all his men.
Gao Lian ordered a general advance, and his army pursued the fleeing bandits. They chased them for about five //; and then a gong was sounded to stop the attack, and the troops returned to the town.
The brigands reached their camping ground, and Song Jiang held a consultation with Wu Yong as they had been defeated twice at Gaotang Prefecture for the purpose of rescuing Squire Chai Jin.
Wu Yong said, "As this man uses such supernatural agencies he will probably attack us tonight, so we must prepare for same." Song Jiang then ordered Yang Lin and Bai Sheng to guard the camp with three hundred men while the other leaders retired to another place.
These two leaders posted their men at various points hidden in the grass. They waited until nearly 9 p.m. when a storm arose with wind and thunder. The two leaders then saw Gao Lian with his bodyguard, advancing upon their camp whistling. But finding nobody there Gao Lian and his troops returned. The two leaders hidden in the grass signaled to their men who immediately without showing themselves raised a loud shout. Gao Lian could not understand this, and fearing a trap in the dark ordered a retreat, and his troops scattered in all directions. The bandits now discharged arrows from their ambush and one of these hit Gao Lian in the shoulder. Many soldiers were killed. Gao Lian led some of his men back, and after pursuing them for some distance Yang Lin and Bai Sheng summoned their men to return. The rain had now stopped and it was a bright starlit night with a cloudless sky. They returned to the camp with about twenty prisoners, and reported the matter to Song Jiang. He was surprised to hear the details because at his camp there had been neither wind nor rain nor thunder. It was the general opinion that Gao Lian had used his supernatural powers again. Yang Lin was sure that he had wounded Gao Lian with an arrow, and said that Gao Lian had his hair unbound and flying loose. Being afraid of another attack from Gao Lian, Song Jiang ordered his men to take precautionary measures.
That night he sent to Liangshan Marsh for reinforcements.
Gao Lian upon returning to the town issued an order that the gates and moat should be carefully guarded both day and night, but that no further fighting would take place against Song Jiang until his wound was healed.
Song Jiang had a talk with Wu Yong. "Gao Lian has defeated us twice, and our losses have been great. What can we do if he gets reinforcements from other districts?"
"I know a man who can overcome these supernatural tricks of Gao Lian," said Wu Yong, "and if we don't get him to help us I don't see how we can attack the town or rescue Squire Chai Jin."

To raise mist and cloud,
A supernatural man was brought.

151

Magic Messenger Dai Zong Seeks & Fetches Gongsun Sheng a 2nd Time & wins the argument by using his wits; Iron Ox Li Kui Splits the Skull of Taoist Luo the Immortal Sage Open & believes he's chopped the Sage to bits

"If we are to break Gao Lian's spells," Wu Yong said to Song Jiang, "we must send a man immediately to fetch Gongsun Sheng."
"The last time Dai Zong went, he spent many days, but all his inquiries failed," said Song Jiang. "Where can he look for him now?"
"The prefecture of Jizhou has numerous counties, towns and villages under its jurisdiction. He'd never find him in such places. It seems to me that since Gongsun is a Taoist, he's more likely to live on some famous mountain where there are Taoist caves and retreats. We'll ask Dai Zong to search in the mountainous regions of Jizhou. He'll surely find him." Song Jiang summoned Dai Zong and explained what was wanted.
"I'll go," said Dai. "But it would be better if I had a companion."
"When you use your magic travel method, who can keep up with you?" said Wu Yong.
"I'll put some charms on his legs too, and he'll be able march swiftly."
"Let me be your companion," Li Kui requested.
"If you want to travel with me, you must eat only vegetarian dishes on the road and obey my commands."
"No problem. I'll do whatever you say."
"Behave yourself and don't cause any rows," Song and Wu cautioned him. "Return quickly, once you've found Gongsun."
"Because I killed Yin Tianxi, Lord Chai is being prosecuted. Don't I want to save him? I wouldn't stir up any trouble."
The two emissaries concealed weapons on their persons, tied their luggage, bid a respectful farewell to Song Jiang and the others, left Gaotang and set out for Jizhou. When they had walked about thirty //; Black Whirlwind halted.
"Let's have a bowl of wine before going on, brother."
"You can only have vegetables with your drink during the magic travel."
"What difference would a little meat make?" Li Kui said, laughing.
"There you go again. It's getting late. We'll find an inn for the night, and continue on in the morning."
They walked another thirty //; until it was dusk, and put up at an inn. They made a fire, cooked rice and bought some wine. Li Kui carried a bowl of vegetables and another bowl of vegetable soup into the room, where he joined Dai Zong.
"Why aren't you having any rice?" Dai asked.
"I don't feel like it."
Dai Zong thought: "That rogue must be fooling me and eating meat behind my back." He finished his own vegetable dish and went softly to the rear. There was Li Kui with two measures of wine, wolfing down a platter of beef. "I knew it," Dai said to himself. "I won't say anything, but tomorrow I'll have a little fun with him."
He went back to their room and slept.
Li Kui finished off the meat and wine. Afraid that Dai might question him, he returned quietly and went to bed.
At dawn Dai awakened and told Li to light a fire. They cooked a few vegetables for breakfast, then put their luggage on their backs, paid the bill and left the inn.
Before they had gone twenty //; Dai said: "We didn't use our magic method yesterday, but today we have to make time. Tie your bundles on tight. I'm going to work the magic on you. We'll be covering eight hundred //before we rest."
He attached four charms to Li Kui's legs and said: "Wait for me at the tavern up ahead." He muttered an incantation and blew on Li's legs. Black Whirlwind strode off. He flew as if he were riding a cloud. Dai Zong laughed. "I'll keep him hungry all day." He affixed charms to his own legs, and followed.
Li Kui didn't understand this magic, and he walked as usual with a free stride. At once the sound in his ears was like the rush of wind and rain, the houses and trees on either side seemed to fall backwards as he passed, his feet felt propelled by cloud and mist. He grew frightened and tried to stop several times. But his legs refused to halt. It was as if someone were pushing them. They moved without touching the ground. Taverns selling meat and wine continued to fly towards his rear. He couldn't buy anything.
"My old grandpa," he swore. "Let me stop a minute!"
Soon the red sun was level in the west. Li Kui was hungry and thirsty. But he still was unable to halt. Drenched in a foul sweat, he panted for breath. Dai Zong narrowed the gap between them.
"Brother Li," he called, "why don't you buy a snack to eat?"
"Save me, brother," Li Kui bawled. "I'm dying of hunger!"
Dai Zong pulled a few wheat cakes out of his tunic and commenced to munch.
"I can't stop. How can I buy anything?" Li Kui yelled. "Give me a couple of cakes to take the edge off my appetite."
"I will, if you'll only stand still."
Li Kui extended his hand back, but his reach was short by about ten feet. "Good brother," he cried. "Let's stop!"
"It's very peculiar today. I can't halt my legs either."
"Aiya. My friggin legs won't listen to me. They just keep running. If they get me mad I'll take my big ax and cut them off!"
"That's a good idea. Otherwise even by next New Year's day you'll still be running."
"Good brother, you're making fun of me. If I chop my legs off, how will I be able to get back?"
"You probably didn't obey me last night. Now even I can't halt. Well, you can just keep going."
"My lord and master, forgive me and let me stop!"
"With my magic you can't eat meat, especially beef. If you eat one slice of beef, you have to run until you die."
"That's terrible! I deceived you last night, brother. I secretly bought six or seven catties of beef and ate them all! What am I going to do?"
"No wonder even my legs can't be halted. You're going to be the death of me."

Li Kui bawled his laments to the heavens. Dai Zong laughed.
"Promise me one thing and I'll remove the spell."
"Ask me quickly, master, you'll see how I obey!"
"Will you deceive me and eat any more meat?"
"If I do, may a boil as big as a bowl grow on my tongue! I saw you sticking to vegetables, but I thought that would be too much of a nuisance, so I tried to fool you. I'll never do it again!"
"In that case, I'll forgive you."
Dai Zong caught up, and brushed Li Kui's legs with his sleeve. "Stand," he cried. Li Kui immediately halted. "I'm going on ahead," said Dai. "You can follow slowly."
But when Li Kui attempted to step out, he couldn't lift his feet. They felt like cast iron. "Another calamity," he yelled. "Save me again, brother!"
Dai Zong looked back and laughed. "Did you mean what you just vowed?"
"I respect you like my own father! Would I dare go against your commands?"
"You'll really obey me?" Dai encircled Li Kui's wrist with his hand. "Start," he ordered. The two easily walked on.
"Have mercy, brother," Li Kui begged. "Let's rest."
They found an inn, and entered. When they got to their room, Dai removed the charms and burned a few sheaves of sacrificial money.
"How are you now?" he asked.
Li Kui kneaded his limbs and sighed. "These legs feel like they belong to me again at last."
Dai told him to order wine and a vegetable meal, and set water on to boil for washing their feet. Afterwards, they retired and slept until dawn. They got up, performed their ablutions and had breakfast. They paid the bill and set forth. When they had gone about thirty li Dai produced the charms.
"I'm only giving you two, today," he said to Li Kui. "You won't go quite so fast."
"My honored father, I don't want them!"
"You promised to listen to me. We're on an important mission. I won't play any tricks. But if you don't obey me, I'll immobilize you like I did last night. You'll have to stand right here until I go into Jizhou, find Gongsun, and come back."
"Tie them on, tie them on," Li Kui said hastily.
Dai and Li attached to their legs only two charms each. Dai Zong then spoke the incantation. He held onto Li as they continued their journey. Using this magic, Dai could stop or go whenever he pleased. Li Kui dared not disobey. On the road they consumed nothing but wine and vegetable dishes, resuming their march immediately after.
But we mustn't be too wordy. Travelling by magic means, in less than ten days they were resting at an inn in the outskirts of Jizhou. The following day they entered the city, with Li Kui disguised as Dai Zong's servant. They inquired all day, but could find no one who knew Gongsun Sheng. They returned to the inn and retired.
The next day they explored the small streets and narrow lanes of the city, again without success. Li Kui fumed irritably.
"That beggarly Taoist! What friggin place is he hiding in? When I see him, I'll drag him off by the head to brother Song Jiang!"
Dai Zong frowned. "There you go again. Don't you remember what you suffered last time?"
Li Kui laughed apologetically. "I wouldn't, actually. I was only kidding."
Dai again berated him. Li dared not reply.
They spent another night at the inn. They rose early the next morning, and searched the villages and towns on the city's perimeter. Whenever they met an old man, Dai greeted him respectfully and asked the whereabouts of Taoist teacher Gongsun Sheng. But none of them knew him, though Dai made dozens of inquiries.
By noon both men were hungry. They went into a noodle shop by the side of the road to buy something to eat. The place was full and all the tables were occupied. The two stood waiting in the aisle.
"If you gentlemen would like some noodles," a waiter said, "you can sit with that old man."
Dai Zong saw an old fellow seated alone at a large table. He hailed him respectfully and bowed, then he and Li Kui sat down opposite, side by side. Dai told the waiter to bring four bowls of noodles.
"One for me and three for you," he said to Li Kui. "That should be enough."
"Hardly. I could do six without any trouble."
The waiter grinned. Time passed, and there was no sign of the noodles. Li Kui saw steaming bowls being carried into an inner room, and he began to lose patience. The waiter placed a bowl of hot noodles down before the old man, who tucked in without any ado, bending low over the table to sip.
"Waiter," the impetuous Li Kui cried angrily, "you're keeping me waiting." He slammed his fist on the table, bouncing hot soup out of the bowl into the old man's face and spilling the noodles.
Annoyed, the old man grabbed Li Kui. "What right have you to overturn my noodles?" he shouted.
Li Kui clenched his fists and was going to hit him. Dai Zong yelled at him to behave, and apologized on his behalf.
"Don't quarrel with this fellow, old gentleman. I'll buy you another bowl."
"You don't understand, sir. I've a long way to go. I wanted to have some noodles and get home early to hear a sermon. Delaying my breakfast delays my journey."
"Where are you from, and who are you going to hear?"
"I'm from Two Fairies Mountain in Jiugong County, which is part of Jizhou Prefecture. I came into town to buy some good incense. I'm on my way back to the mountain to hear Luo the Sage. He's lecturing on 'How to Live Forever.' "
Dai Zong thought: "Could Gongsun Sheng be there, too?" And he asked: "Old gentleman, do you have a Gongsun Sheng in your village?"
"If you asked someone else, sir, you probably wouldn't get any answer. Most people don't know him by that name. He's a neighbor of mine, and he lives alone with his old mother. For a time he was away from home on religious wanderings, and he was called Gongsun the Pure. Now, he's given up his family name altogether, and he's known simply as the Pure Taoist. No one calls him Gongsun Sheng. That was his secular name. They wouldn't know who you meant."
"This is really a case of 'Wearing out iron shoes seeking in vain, then finding a solution with the greatest of ease'! Old gentleman, how far is Two Fairies Mountain from here? Is the Pure Taoist at home?"
"It's only about forty-five li from this county. Pure Taoist is the leading disciple of Luo the Sage. His master would never let him leave."
Dai was delighted. He urged the waiter to hurry with the noodles, then he ate with the old man. Dai paid the bill, and they left the shop together.
After asking the old man for directions, Dai said: "You go on ahead, old gentleman. I'll join you later. I want to buy some incense and paper money first."
The old man bid him farewell and departed.
Dai Zong and Li Kui returned to their inn, collected their luggage and bundles, attached the charms, left the inn and set out for Two Fairies Mountain. Using the magic travel method, they covered the forty-five li in no time. They asked the way to the mountain on arrival at the county town of Jiugong.
"Go east from here," their informant said. "It's only five li."
The two followed directions and, sure enough, in less than five li they reached the foot of Two Fairies Mountain. There, they met a woodcutter. Dai bowed courteously.
"Could you tell us where the Pure Taoist lives?"
The woodcutter pointed. "Through that mountain pass. There's a little stone bridge right outside his gate."
The two traversed the pass and saw a dozen thatched buildings surrounded by a low wall. Outside there was a small stone bridge. As they approached it they met a peasant girl coming from the enclosure carrying a basket of fruit. Dai Zong bowed.
"I see you're from the Pure Taoist's home. Is he in, do you know?"
"He's in back, refining cinnabar pills."
Pleased, Dai softly instructed Li Kui: "Conceal yourself in that thicket. After I've seen him I'll call you."
Dai Zong went in and looked around. A reed curtain hung in front of the door of a three-room thatched cottage. Dai coughed, and a white-haired old woman emerged. He bowed politely.
"I would like to see the Pure Taoist, old mother."
"What is your name, sir?"
"Dai Zong, from Shandong Province."
"My son is away on a religious journey. He hasn't returned yet."
"We're old friends. I have something important to tell him. Please let me see him."
"He's not home. You can leave a message, if you wish. You can see him when he comes back."
"I'll drop in again."
Dai bid the old woman farewell and returned to Li Kui outside the gate.
"I'll have to use you today. His mother says he's not at home. Go in and ask to see him. If she tells you he's away, start smashing things but don't hurt her. I'll rush in and stop you."
Li Kui took his pair of axes from his bundle, tucked them in his waist sash, and entered the gate. "Send someone out," he shouted.
The old woman hastily emerged. "Who is it?" she called. She became frightened when she saw Li Kui glaring at her, and said: "What is it you want, young man?"
"I'm Black Whirlwind from Liangshan Marsh. I'm under orders to invite Gongsun Sheng. Tell him to come out, so we can meet face to face. If he refuses, I'll set this friggin place on fire and burn your home to the ground!" And he shouted: "I want him to come right out!"
"Don't be like that, bold fellow. This isn't Gongsun Sheng's house. My son is called the Pure Taoist."
"Just tell him to come out. I'll know when I see his friggin face."
"He's on a religious trip and hasn't returned."
Li Kui pulled out his big axes and knocked down a wall. The old woman moved forward to stop him.
"If you don't call your son, I'll kill you," cried Li Kui. He raised his axes.
The old woman collapsed to the ground in terror. Gongsun Sheng emerged from the house, running.
"Don't you dare," he yelled.
At the same time Dai Zong shouted: "Iron Ox, how can you frighten this old mother?" He helped her to her feet.
Li Kui tossed his axes aside and hailed Gongsun respectfully. "Brother, forgive me. This was the only way to get you out."
Gongsun first supported his mother into the house, then returned and invited his two visitors into a quiet room and asked them to be seated. "How fortunate you've tracked me down," he said.
"After you left the mountain, brother," said Dai Zong. "I sought you in Jizhou, but was unable to discover where you'd gone. So I gathered a band of brothers and went back to the stronghold. Brother Song Jiang recently tried to rescue Lord Chai in Gaotang, but was twice defeated because of magic used by the prefect Gao Lian. He can't cope with it, and has sent me and Li Kui to request your assistance. We searched all Jizhou for you without success. Fortunately, we ran into an old gentleman in a noodle shop who told us where to find you. A village girl said you were at home refining cinnabar, but your old mother insisted you were away. So I asked Li Kui to arouse you into coming out. It was a crude method, and I beg your pardon. But to brother Song Jiang at Gaotang, every day is like a year. We urge that you go with us and demonstrate your unflagging chivalry."
"I have drifted about since childhood, and have become acquainted with many gallant men. Though I left Liangshan Marsh and returned home, I haven't forgotten you. But my mother is old and has no one to look after her, and my teacher, Luo the Sage, wants me by his side. I was afraid the stronghold would send people looking for me. That's why I changed my name to the Pure Taoist and hid myself here."
"Song Jiang is in danger. Have mercy, brother. You must make this trip."
"My mother has no one to take care of her, and my teacher never would let me go. It's really out of the question."
Dai Zong kowtowed and pleaded. Gongsun raised him to his feet. "We can talk about this later," he said. He served his guests wine and vegetable dishes in the quiet room, and the three ate.
"If you refuse to go, brother," said Dai Zong, "Song Jiang will surely be captured by Gao Lian. The chivalry of our mountain fortress will be ended."
"Let me ask my teacher," said Gongsun. "If he agrees, I'll go with you."
"We'll go to him at once."
"Relax and spend the night here. We can start the first thing in the morning."
"For Song Jiang in his present position each day is like a year. Please, brother, let's go now."
Gongsun led Dai and Li along a road to the Two Fairies Mountain. It was the end of autumn and the beginning of winter. The days were short, the nights long, and it grew dark early. By the time they were halfway up the slope, the red sun was sinking in the west. They followed a path through the dimness of a pine grove to the temple presided over by Luo the Sage. On a vermilion plaque over the gate inscribed in letters of gold were the words: "Temple of the Purple Void."
The three straightened their clothes in the Garments Pavilion, then proceeded along a covered walk to the Hall of Pines and Cranes. Two boy novices informed the Sage of their arrival. He ordered that they be invited in. They entered. Luo had just finished his prayers and was seated on a cloud-decorated dais. Gongsun advanced and greeted him, then stood and waited, body bent respectfully. Dai Zong hastily kowtowed. Li Kui only stared.
"Who are these two gentlemen?" Luo asked.
"Brothers of former days I've told you about, Teacher, gallant friends from Shandong. Gao Lian, prefect of Gaotang, has been using magic. Brother Song Jiang has sent these two brothers to ask my help. I wouldn't venture to decide on my own. I've come to ask Teacher's permission."
"You've escaped the fiery pit of human frailty, you've learned to make longevity pills. Why go back to that life?"
Dai Zong again kowtowed, "Please allow Teacher Gongsun to go with us," he requested. "After he's broken Gao Lian's spell, we shall escort him back."
"You two gentlemen don't understand," said Luo the Sage. "This is not a matter of concern to religious persons. Leave here. Make other plans."
Gongsun could only lead them away. They left the Hall of Pines and Cranes and went down the mountain the same night.
"What did that old mystic teacher say?" asked Li Kui.
"Why didn't you listen?" said Dai Zong.
"I couldn't understand his gibberish."
"He said Gongsun couldn't go."
"We travel all this distance, I'm given a hard time, and we finally find him," shouted Li Kui, "and all we get is parts! That old thief had better not make me lose my temper or I'll crush his hat with one hand, grab him by the waist with the other, and fling him down the mountain!"
Dai Zong frowned. "Do you want to be rooted to the spot again?"
Li Kui smiled abashedly. "No, no. I was only joking."
When they reached Gongsun's home the Taoist prepared some food. He and Dai Zong ate, but Li Kui sat wrapped in thought and didn't touch a morsel.
"Rest here tonight," said Gongsun, "and tomorrow I'll plead with my teacher again. If he agrees, I'll go with you."
Dai Zong bid him good night, put his luggage in order, and retired to the quiet room with Li Kui. But Black Whirlwind couldn't sleep. He endured his wakefulness till around the fifth watch, then got up softly. He listened to his companion. Dai Zong was snoring peacefully.
"Are you a friggin craven?" Li Kui mentally addressed Gongsun. "That old man is full of crap! You used to be a member of our stronghold. Why do you need permission from that friggin teacher? Suppose he doesn't agree? Won't that harm brother Song Jiang? I won't stand for it! I'll kill the old rogue! Then Gongsun will have no one to ask, and he'll have to go with us!"

Li Kui groped for his two axes, quietly opened the house door and, step by step in the moonlight, made his way up the mountain. The double portals of the Temple of Purple Void were shut, but the fence around the compound was not high, and he cleared it in a leap. After opening the portals in readiness for a retreat, he crept into the grounds till he came to the Hall of Pines and Cranes. He heard someone within chanting scriptures. He crawled closer and poked a hole through the paper window. Luo the Sage was seated alone on his dais. Two smoking candles on a table before him shed a bright light. "That wretched Taoist," thought Li Kui. "He deserves to die."

Stealthily, he crept to the latticed door and, with one push, swung it creaking open. He charged in, raised his axes and brought them down on the Sage's forehead. Luo collapsed on his dais. His flowing blood was white. Li Kui laughed. "The varlet must have been a virgin. He's still got all his male essence. He hasn't used any of it! There's not a drop of red blood in him!"

Li Kui took a close look at his handiwork. His ax had cleaved the Sage's hat and split his head right down to his neck. "Today, I've removed a trouble-maker," Black Whirlwind observed with satisfaction. "We won't have to worry about Gongsun not going."

Turning, he left the Hall of Pines and Cranes and hurried along the corridor. A young black-clad novice blocked his way.

"You killed our teacher," the boy yelled. "Don't think you can escape!"

"Little knave," cried Li Kui. "Have a taste of my axes!"

He chopped, and the boy's head rolled to the foot of the terrace. Li Kui laughed. "I'd better get out of here."

He left the temple portals and flew down the mountain. At Gongsun's house he slipped in and closed the door behind him. Once more he listened in the quiet room. Dai Zong was still asleep. Softly, Li Kui returned to bed and slept.

Gongsun rose at daylight and laid out some breakfast. He and Dai Zong ate.

"Please take us up the mountain again so that we may plead with your teacher," said Dai.

Li Kui bit his lips to keep from laughing.

The three followed the same path and climbed the slope. At the Hall of Pines and Cranes inside the Temple of Purple Void they were met by two novices.

"Is the Sage within?" asked Gongsun.

"He's meditating on his cloud dais," the boys replied.

Li Kui was astonished. He stuck his tongue so far out in consternation, for a long time he couldn't pull it back. They pushed aside the door curtain and entered. Sure enough, there seated on the dais was Luo the Sage. "Could I have killed the wrong man last night?" Li Kui wondered.

"What brings you three here again?" Luo queried.

"We wish to beg your permission for Gongsun our teacher to rescue mercifully many people in distress," said Dai Zong.

"Who is that big swarthy fellow?"

"A brother in chivalry of mine, Li Kui."

The Sage laughed. "I was going to refuse Gongsun. But for that dark fellow's sake I'll let him take this one trip."

Dai Zong kowtowed, and relayed the information to Black Whirlwind.

Li Kui thought: "The rascal knows I wanted to kill him. Why does he make such friggin remarks?"

"I'll send you three immediately to Gaotang," said Luo. "How will that be?"

They thanked him, and Dai Zong said to himself: "This Sage has much stronger magic than my Miraculous Travel Method."

Luo directed his novices to bring three handkerchiefs.

Dai asked him: "How are you going to get us to Gaotang so quickly? Please explain."

The Sage stood up. "Come with me."

They left the hall and followed him to the top of a bluff. A red kerchief was spread upon the ground.

"Purity, stand on that."

Gongsun placed both feet on the kerchief. With an upward sweep of his wide sleeve, Luo cried: "Rise!"

The kerchief turned into a red cloud and carried Gongsun high into the air till it was two hundred feet above the mountain.

"Stop," shouted Luo the Sage, and the red cloud hung suspended.

Next, a blue handkerchief was spread, and Dai Zong was told to stand upon it. At the command, "Rise," it changed into a blue cloud and soared up till it was at a level with the red. Each the size of a large sleeping mat, the two clouds circled in the heavens. Li Kui stared, open-mouthed.

Luo then had a white kerchief spread upon the bluff top, and he instructed Li Kui to step on.

"This is no joke," the Black Whirlwind grinned. "If a man fell off he could raise quite a bump on the head!"

"You see those other two, don't you?" said Luo.

Li Kui stood on the kerchief and the Sage shouted: "Rise!" The kerchief changed into a white cloud and started upwards.

"Aiya," yelled Li Kui, "mine is unsteady! Let me down!"

Luo waved his right hand, and the red and blue clouds smoothly returned to earth. Dai kowtowed his thanks, and stood on Luo's right. Gongsun stood on his left. Above, Li Kui was shouting.

"I have to piss and shit like everyone else! If you don't bring me down, I'll pour it on your head from up here!"

"I'm one who has given up the material world. I've never harmed you. Why did you come over the wall at night and hack me with your axes?" Luo asked. "If I weren't possessed of virtue, you'd have killed me. And you murdered my novice."

"It wasn't me! You're mistaking me for somebody else!"

The Sage laughed. "Although all you did was chop off a couple of gourds, your intentions were bad. I'm going to make you suffer a bit for that." He waved his hand. "Go!"

An ugly wind blew Li Kui into the clouds. Two warriors, wearing head kerchiefs of imperial yellow, escorted him under guard. The wind and rain howled in Li Kui's ears. He looked down. Houses and trees seemed to be falling backwards as he passed. His feet felt as if they were being hastened by clouds and mists.

He had no idea how far he had gone. He was scared out of his wits, and was trembling all over. Suddenly, he heard a scraping sound, and found himself rolling down the roof of the main hall of the prefecture of Jizhou.

*

The magistrate, Ma Shihong, was holding court. Arrayed outside the building were many police and functionaries. When they saw a big swarthy fellow tumbling down from the sky they were very startled.

"Bring that rogue here," shouted Ma.

A dozen jailors and guards hustled Li Kui forward.

"Where are you from, rascally sorcerer?" demanded the magistrate. "Why have you dropped from the heavens?"

Li Kui, in his fall, had banged his head and split his brow. He was too stunned to speak.

"He must be a wizard," Ma affirmed. He directed that punishment implements be brought.

Guards and jailors tied Li Kui up and dragged him to the grassy sward before the hall. A captain poured dog's blood on his cranium. Another tipped a bucket of urine and turds and drenched him from head to toe. Li Kui's mouth and ears were full of the stuff.

"I'm not a wizard," he bawled. "I'm an attendant of Luo the Sage!"

Everyone in Jizhou knew that Luo the Sage was a living spirit on earth. They were reluctant to harm Li Kui any further. They pushed him before the magistrate.

"Luo the Sage is famed for having attained virtue and becoming a living god," said a functionary. "If this is one of his followers, we mustn't punish him."

The magistrate laughed. "I've read a thousand books and know ancient and modern history, but I've never heard of a living god who had a disciple like this! He's just an evil sorcerer. Guards, give him a good drubbing!"

They had no choice but to turn him over and beat him till he was more dead than alive.

"Admit you're a wizard, knave," shouted the magistrate, "and we'll stop."

Li Kui had no choice but to confess that he was "Wizard Li the Second." A big cangue was nailed around his neck and he was cast into prison. He was put into the section for the condemned.

"I am a spirit general and officer of the day," he asserted loudly. "How dare you place a cangue on me? I'm going to wipe every one of you out in Jizhou Town!"

The guards and warden all knew that the virtue of Luo the Sage was of the highest purity, and they admired him greatly.

"Who are you, really?" they asked Li Kui.

"Officer of the day, spirit general, and intimate of Luo the Sage! I made a mistake and annoyed him, so he flung me here that I might suffer a bit. But he'll be sending for me in two or three days. If you don't serve me meat and wine I'll slaughter you and your whole families!"

The guards and warden were frightened. They bought wine and meat and invited Li Kui to dine. Seeing this, he grew wilder in his speech, which scared his listeners still more. They brought hot water for him to bathe in, and clean clothing.

"If you stint on wine and meat, I'll fly away," he threatened. "I'll make you suffer!"

The guards and jailors apologized and entreated. Needless to say, he remained in the Jizhou prison.

*

All of this Luo the Sage related to Dai Zong, who pleaded that he spare Li Kui. Luo kept Dai as his guest in the hall and questioned him about activities in the mountain fortress. Dai said that Chao Gai and Song Jiang were chivalrous and charitable, doing only what was morally right, never harming faithful officers of the emperor, noble-hearted men, filial sons, righteous husbands or chaste wives. He told of their many virtues.

Luo was very pleased.

Dai stayed with him for five days, and each day he kowtowed and begged the Sage to save Li Kui.

"Men like that can only be driven away," said Luo. "Don't take him back with you."

"You don't understand," replied Dai. "Li Kui is stupid, he doesn't know the rites, but he has his good points. First of all he's absolutely straight. He'll rarely ask anyone for anything. Secondly, he doesn't flatter people, but when he's loyal it's to the death. Third, he's not lecherous, greedy or treacherous, but brave and bold. For these reasons, Song Jiang loves Li Kui. I wouldn't be able to face brother Song if I went back without him."

Luo laughed. "I've known for some time that he is one of the stars of Heavenly Spirits. Because many people on earth behave too wickedly, as a punishment to them and him he was sent down to kill them. Would I dare go against the will of Heaven and harm a man like that? I only want to rough him up a little, then you can have him back."

Dai thanked the Sage, and Luo called: "Are any warriors around?" A wind rose outside the Hall of Pines and Cranes, and when it passed a warrior in a turban of imperial yellow stepped forward and bowed. "What are your orders, Teacher?"

"Bring that man back you escorted to the Jizhou prison. He's paid for his crime. Go and return quickly."

The warrior respectfully assented. In about half a watch, he dropped Li Kui down from the air. Dai hastily helped him to his feet.

"Where have you been these last couple of days, brother?" he asked.

Li Kui saw Luo the Sage and fervently kowtowed. "My own father, I'll never dare to offend again!"

"You must curb your temper from now on," said Luo. "Concentrate on serving Song Jiang. Shun all wicked thoughts."

Li Kui again kowtowed. "You are like my own father! Would I dare disobey your commands?"

"Where did you go these last few days?" Dai pressed him.

"The wind that day blew me to the Jizhou magistrate's office and rolled me down the roof. They all grabbed me and that friggin magistrate said I was a wizard. He had me knocked down and tied up and told his prison guards to pour dog's blood and piss and shit all over me and beat me till my legs were jelly. Then they put a cangue on me and threw me into prison. Though I was beaten, I got some good food and wine out of it. Those rogues were afraid of the Sage, so they let me bathe and gave me a change of clothes.

"They were wining and dining me just now in a pavilion, when that yellow turbaned warrior jumped down from the sky. He opened my cangue and told me to close my eyes. It was like a dream, till I landed back here."

"The Teacher has over a thousand such warriors," said Gongsun. "They're all his personal attendants."

"Living Buddha," cried Li Kui. "Why didn't you tell me before and save me from making that stupid error?" Again he kowtowed to the Sage.

Dai Zong also kowtowed. "I've been here indeed a long time," he said. "The military situation at Gaotang is desperate. Please be merciful and let teacher Gongsun go with us and rescue brother Song Jiang. After we've smashed Gao Lian we'll escort him back."

"I was opposed to letting him go originally. But because of your lofty loyalty, I'll permit him to make the trip. I've something to impart first that you must remember." Gongsun came forward and knelt before the Sage to receive his instructions. Truly, he was filled with desire to save the world and bring tranquility to the land, a man destined for high rank and prestigious position.

Now what the Professor told Song Jiang was that they would never break the magic power unless they quickly sent someone to fetch Gongsun Sheng, the Taoist.

Song Jiang said: "But last time the Magic Messenger spent a long time looking for him and drew a complete blank. Where are we going to look now?"

The Professor said: "Just think how many towns, villages and hamlets there are under the jurisdiction of Jizhou. He can't have searched them all. The way I see it, Taoist Gongsun is a very spiritual person, he must be staying in some famous hermit's cave or some blissful abode beside a rushing stream. This time tell the Magic Messenger to go and have a good look outside the city, wherever there is a famous mountain or sacred spot. I am confident that he'll find him."

Accordingly Song Jiang summoned the Magic Messenger and said: "You are to go to Jizhou and fetch Taoist Gongsun."

The Magic Messenger said: "I will gladly go. But it would be good if I could have a travelling companion."

"But how can anyone keep up with you when you start your magic walking mode?" said the Professor.

"If I have a companion, I tie the magic amulets on his legs too," said the Magic Messenger. "That enables him to travel fast as well."

Iron Ox said: "I'd like to accompany Superintendent Dai."

"If you want to go with me, you'll have to eat vegetarian food for the whole journey and obey my orders," said the Magic Messenger.

"No problem," said Iron Ox. "I'll do whatever you say."

Song Jiang and the Professor said: "You'd better watch out on the journey. Don't stir up any trouble. If you find him come back as fast as possible."

Iron Ox said: "It was me who killed the Chancellor and got Mr. Chai into trouble, so naturally I want to save him. I'm certainly not going to cause any more trouble."

The two men concealed weapons on their persons, tied their bundles, bade farewell to Song Jiang and the others and left Gaotang by the Jizhou road.

When they had gone about six miles, Iron Ox stopped and said: "I'd travel more easily if we could stop and have a bowl of wine for the journey."

"If you want to do the magic walking with me you can only have a non-alcoholic drink," said the Magic Messenger. "And we must go straight on afterwards."

"We could eat a little bit of meat, what's wrong with that?" said Iron Ox.

"There you go again," said the Magic Messenger. "But anyway, it's late. Let's look for somewhere to stay. We'll have an early start tomorrow."

After another couple of miles, as dusk was falling, they found an inn where they stopped and lit the fire to cook their rice and procured some wine. Iron Ox brought in a bowl of vegetarian food and a bowl of vegetable broth and gave it to the Magic Messenger.

"Why aren't you eating?" the latter asked.

"I'm not hungry," Iron Ox replied.

The Magic Messenger thought to himself: "He's cheating me, the rogue. He must be eating meat behind my back."

The Magic Messenger finished his vegetarian meal and stole to the back to investigate. There was Iron Ox with two measures of wine and a plate of beef, eating away. "What did I say!" the Magic Messenger exclaimed to himself. "I won't expose him now. I'm going to have some fun with him tomorrow."

The Magic Messenger returned to the room and went to sleep. After eating for a while, Iron Ox began to worry about what the Magic Messenger had said, and crept back into the room and went to sleep.
The Magic Messenger woke at dawn and told Iron Ox to light the fire and cook some vegetarian food for breakfast. Then they shouldered their bags, paid their bill and left the inn. Before they had gone a mile, the Magic Messenger said: "We didn't do any magic walking yesterday. We need to get on a bit faster today. So make sure your pack is tied on securely, because I'm going to say the spell over you and then we'll do three hundred miles without stopping."
He took out four amulets and tied them on both of Iron Ox's legs. He said: "Wait for me when you get to the next inn." Then he pronounced the formula and blew on Iron Ox's legs.
Iron Ox shot off. It felt just as if he was riding on a cloud, he seemed to be flying.
The Magic Messenger laughed to himself: "He's about to suffer a day of hunger." He fastened on his own amulets and followed.
Iron Ox had no understanding of this mode of travel. He tried to walk just as usual. But the sound of wind and rain was in his ears, houses and woods appeared to fall away as if in long lines on either side, the clouds and mist beneath him seemed to speed his feet on their way. He started to feel afraid. He made several attempts to stop but his two legs would not respond. It was as if there was someone underneath pushing him, his feet simply would not touch the ground, they just kept on going. When he came to an inn and couldn't just pop in and buy something to eat, he cried out: "Please, old chap, let's take a break!"
When they had been travelling till the sun was going down red in the west, Iron Ox was hungry and thirsty. But still he couldn't control his legs. Fear brought him out in a stinking sweat, his breath came in short pants. The Magic Messenger drew closer and called out: "Iron Ox, my friend, why don't you go and buy some snacks to eat?"
"Brother, help me please," Iron Ox replied. "I'm starving!"
The Magic Messenger took some cakes out of his pocket and started eating them.
"I can't buy anything because I don't know how to stop," Iron Ox cried. "Give me a couple, please, to ease my hunger."
"Come a bit closer and I'll give you some," said the Magic Messenger.
Iron Ox stretched out his hand, but he couldn't get closer than three metres and he couldn't reach the cakes. "Please, please brother," he implored. "Wait for me a minute!"
"There's something funny about it today," said the Magic Messenger. "I can't stop either."
"Aiya!" Iron Ox moaned. "These fucking feet of mine won't obey me at all, they just keep going on their own like this, I'd like to get an axe and chop of my bottom half!"
The Magic Messenger said: "Perhaps that's the only solution. Otherwise we shall just keep on going till next New Year's Day and we still won't be able to stop!"
"Please, don't laugh at me!" said Iron Ox. "If I were to chop off my legs I know you'd laugh at me!"
"Maybe you didn't do everything I said yesterday?" said the Magic Messenger. "Today even I can't stop. You'll just have to keep on going!"
Iron Ox cried: "Please, old chap, please let me stop."
"When you're using this magic of mine you mustn't eat meat. Beef above all things is forbidden. If you eat a single piece of beef, you'll have to go ten thousand miles without stopping."
"Then it's a disaster! I deceived you last night, I was a fool. I did secretly buy a few little pieces of beef to eat. It was so good!"
"No wonder then that today even I can't stop going. We'll just have to go on till we reach the end of the sky, it'll take us about three or four years to get back!"
Iron Ox began to shout his complaints to heaven. The Magic Messenger was laughing his head off. "If from now on you'll do everything I say, I'll make the magic stop," he said.
"I will, old chap, I will!"
"Are you going to cheat again and eat meat?"
"If I eat meat again after today, may a boil the size of a rice bowl grow on my tongue! When I saw you were going to eat vegetarian food I simply couldn't stomach it, that's all. But I won't do it again!"
"All right then, I'll let you off!" He took a step back and flapping his sleeve against Iron Ox's legs cried "Halt!", just once. Iron Ox's legs stopped going immediately and remained as if nailed to the ground. They couldn't move.
"I'll go on ahead," said the Magic Messenger. "You follow on slowly."
Now when Iron Ox tried to move his feet, they wouldn't stir from the spot; he tugged at his legs but they wouldn't budge. It was as if they had been cast in iron.
"Oh no! Not again!" Iron Ox exclaimed. "How am I going to get anywhere now?" Then he yelled: "Brother! Help! Help!"
The Magic Messenger turned round, laughing. "Are you going to listen to me now?" he asked.
"I shall respect you like my father, I will never dare to disobey you in anything!"
"This time you'd really better do as I say!" said the Magic Messenger. Touching Iron Ox with his hand, he said "Go!" and they both began to walk easily on.
"Brother, please take pity on me and let's soon have a break!" Iron Ox said after a while. And before long they came to an inn where they stopped for the night. When they went to their room the Magic Messenger took off the amulets, burnt some paper money as an offering, and asked Iron Ox: "Well, how do you feel now?"
Iron Ox said: "These two legs belong to me again."
"Who told you to go and secretly buy wine and meat last night?"
"It's only because you wouldn't let me eat meat I ate some secretly, so now you've had a good laugh at my expense."
The Magic Messenger got Iron Ox to prepare some vegetarian food and non-alcoholic wine for their supper and warm the water to wash their feet. Then they lay down to rest. They slept till dawn. When they had completed their toilet, breakfasted and paid the bill they set off. Before they had gone a mile the Magic Messenger took out the amulets and said: "I'm only going to give you two today, so you'll go a bit slower."
"I'd rather not have any at all, old man," said Iron Ox.
"If you do as I say, we're going to achieve something very important, you and I. Why should I try to make fun of you? But if you don't do as I say, I shall nail you down again like I did yesterday, and you'll have to wait till I've been to Jizhou and found Taoist Gongsun before I can come back and release you."
Iron Ox hurriedly said: "I will, I will."
This time the Magic Messenger and Iron Ox both put on two amulets and when they started the magic walking the Magic Messenger held Iron Ox's elbow. This magic, you see, enabled him to move or stop just by willing it. Iron Ox from now on didn't dream of disobeying him. For the rest of the journey they just bought vegetarian fare, ate and then went on. To cut a long story short, by using the magic walking they were soon outside the walls of Jizhou, where they found an inn to stay.
Next day they went into the city, the Magic Messenger dressed as the master and Iron Ox got himself up as his servant. They searched all day, but no one had heard of Taoist Gongsun, so they retired to their inn to rest. They spent the whole of the next day searching all the little side-streets and alleys, but heard no news. Iron Ox was getting restive. "That bloody monk, where the fucking hell is he hiding?" he complained. "When I find him I'm going to take him by the scruff of the neck and drag him to our leader!"
"There you go again! If you don't listen to me, I'm going to make you regret it!"
"I was only joking," said Iron Ox with a sheepish grin.
But the Magic Messenger went on grumbling for a while and Iron Ox did not dare to answer back. They reached the inn and rested.
They were up early next morning and searched every neighbourhood outside the city walls. Every time he saw an older person, the Magic Messenger bowed and respectfully asked where Taoist Gongsun's house was, but not a single one knew him. He asked in a dozen different places. In the late afternoon when they were really hungry from so much walking they came upon a vegetarian restaurant beside the road and went in to have a snack. But all the tables were taken, not one was free, so they had to go out and stand in the road. The waiter said: "If you want some noodles, sirs, you'd better sit here with this old gentleman."
The Magic Messenger saw an old man all by himself occupying a big table, so he greeted him respectfully and they both sat down opposite. Iron Ox, who was sitting a little behind the Magic Messenger, told the waiter to bring them four bowls of noodles. The Magic Messenger said: "One bowl for me and three bowls for you, are you sure that will be enough?"
"No point in economizing," said Iron Ox. "Make that six, I'll take care of them."
This made the waiter laugh. But they waited hours, and still the noodles didn't come. Watching all the noodles being taken in for other people, Iron Ox became pretty impatient. Then the waiter brought a bowl of steaming noodles and placed it in front of the old man. Without a word of apology, the latter began to eat. Since the noodles were very hot, he lowered his head and leaned forward over the table. Iron Ox lost his temper. Because the noodles hadn't come, he gave a great shout of "Waiter! We've been waiting here half the day!" and banged the table, splashing hot soup all over the old man's face and spilling his noodles. Highly incensed, the old man got up and grabbed Iron Ox. "Where's your manners? Why did you spill my noodles?" he said indignantly.
Iron Ox clenched his fist and was about to strike the old man, but the Magic Messenger hurriedly intervened. He apologized to the old man. "Don't waste your time with him, sir. I will buy you another bowl," he said.
"That's not the point," said the old man. "I've got a long journey ahead of me, and I want to eat quickly so I can go back to hear the talk. If I take too long it will ruin my journey."
"Where are you from, sir?" the Magic Messenger asked. "Whose talk is it you want to hear, and what is he talking about?"
"I am from Nine Halls Village by the Two Immortals Peak in this province. I came here to get some good quality incense and I'm going to hear the Blessed Sage on the mountain speaking on 'The Secret of Longevity.'"
It occurred to the Magic Messenger that this might be where Taoist Gongsun was, so he asked: "Do you by any chance have a Taoist called Gongsun Sheng in your village?"
"Anyone else wouldn't be able to answer your question," said the old man. "Not many people know him. We are neighbours. He's got an old mother. He spends his time wandering about begging, this monk, and nowadays he's called Gongsun the Pure because recently he changed his name to Brother Purity and is no longer Gongsun Sheng. No one knows his old worldly name now."
"It's just like they say," said the Magic Messenger. "You can wear out a pair of iron shoes in the search and still not find what you're looking for; but then you get it without lifting a finger!" He respectfully asked the old man: "How far is this Two Immortals Peak from here?"
"It's just fifteen miles," the latter replied. "Brother Purity is the chief follower of the Blessed Sage. The master won't let him out of his sight."
The Magic Messenger was delighted. He got them to bring the noodles quickly and ate in the old man's company. When they'd paid the bill, they left together. After asking the way, he said to the old man: "You go on ahead, sir. We'll buy some incense and paper to burn and then follow you." The old man said goodbye and left.
The Magic Messenger and Iron Ox went back to the inn to collect their luggage. Then they tied on the amulets again and set off for Two Immortals Peak in Nine Halls Village. With the magic walking they did the fifteen miles in no time. When they asked in the village for Two Imortals Peak, a resident gave them directions: "Out of the village go east and in a mile and a half you're there."
They followed these directions, and just as they had been told, they were soon looking at that mountain, which was indeed outstandingly beautiful:
The mountain is green as if carved from jade; the emerald peaks are swathed in clouds. On opposing cliffs tigers crouch and dragons coil; on every side the howling of apes, the call of the crane. In the morning the summit is lost in cloud, at nightfall the sun hangs in the branches of the trees. Everywhere the tinkle of running water, as if each stream stirred a string of jade pendants. Waterfalls seem to hang in the air and in the mountain cave the zither softly sounds. Perhaps it's a Taoist busy with his rites, or maybe some saintly elder preparing potions.
When they reached the mountain, the Magic Messenger and Iron Ox met a woodcutter. The Magic Messenger greeted him politely and said: "Can I ask you where Brother Purity lives?"
The woodcutter replied: "Just past yon eastern spur of the mountain, 'tis the place with a little stone bridge in front of the gate."
Beyond the spur they found a collection of thatched huts surrounded by a low wall, outside which was a tiny stone bridge. As they reached it a peasant woman came out carrying a tray of fresh fruit.
The Magic Messenger said: "You've just come from the house of Brother Purity, is that right? Is he at home?"
"He's at the back, making up pills," she answered.
Inwardly rejoicing, he told Iron Ox: "Go and hide behind a tree while I go inside. If I find him, I'll come and fetch you."
He entered what was apparently a typical three-room house with a reed curtain hanging over the doorway. At his shout, a white-haired old lady emerged from the inner room. Here's what he saw:
A grey-haired old crone, but still with a rubicund complexion; eyes misty as the smoke of an Autumn Festival lantern, eyebrows white as sunlight glittering on frost. She wears a plain black skirt, like a female immortal in the heavens. Her outer robe is sackcloth, like the old Dame's on Mount Li. In her figure you seem to see a crane soaring among the clouds, in her face the look of a mountain pine proudly standing against the snow.
The Magic Messenger greeted her most respectfully and said: "My greetings, madam. I would like to request an interview with Brother Purity."
"What is your name, please?" the old lady asked.
"My name is Dai Zong, and I have come here from Shandong.
"My son has gone out begging. He isn't back yet."
"I am an old friend, and I want to speak to him about a most urgent matter. Please let me see him."
"He's not at home. If you've got something to say to him you can certainly wait here. When he gets back he'll come and see you."
"I'll come back."
He took leave of the old lady and went out to find Iron Ox. "Now I need to make use of you. Since his mother insists he's not home, you go in now and ask for him. If she says he's not in, threaten her, but remember she's his mother, don't hurt her. When I come in and tell you to stop, do so at once."
Iron Ox first took his two axes out of his pack and tucked them behind his back. Then he went into the house and shouted: "Come out!"
The old lady hurriedly received him and said: "Who is it?"
When she saw Iron Ox scowling at her she was very scared. "What do you want, sir?" she asked.
"I am the Black Whirlwind from the Marshes of Mount Liang," said Iron Ox. "Under orders from my leader I have come to ask for Taoist Gongsun Sheng. Ask him to come out and I'll behave nicely. If he doesn't, I shall start a fucking fire and burn your house to the ground. No arguing now. Just make it snappy!"
"Please be patient, sir," she said. "This is not Gongsun Sheng's house. It belongs to Brother Purity."
"Just ask him to come out, that's all," said Iron Ox. "I'll know him by his fucking face."
"He's gone out begging and he hasn't come back yet."
Iron Ox took out an axe and began to hack at a wall. When the old woman rushed forward to stop him, he said: "If you don't ask your son to come out, I'm going to kill you." He raised his axe as if to strike and the old lady collapsed in a heap. At this moment Taoist Gongsun rushed out, crying: "Stop this disgraceful behaviour!" As the poem says:

This mountain hideout's the perfect place
Pharmacy's secret arts to trace.
Only a rude and rough onslaught
Will persuade the Taoist to come out.

The Magic Messenger also rushed in shouting: "Iron Ox, why are you frightening the old lady?" He hurriedly helped her to her feet.
Iron Ox threw down his axe and respectfully saluted Taoist Gongsun. "Don't be angry with me," he said. "If I hadn't done it you weren't going to come out."
Taoist Gongsun first helped his mother into the inner room. Then he came back and greeted the other two and invited them into a clean room to sit. "What caused you to look for me here?" he asked.
The Magic Messenger said: "Since you left the mountain I have already been once to Jizhou in search of you and couldn't find any trace. I did however get together a band of brothers to join the company on the mountain. Now Song Jiang has gone to Gaotang to rescue Mr. Chai and he has lost several battles to the governor, who has been using magic. He doesn't know what else to try, so he sent me with Iron Ox to find you and ask you to come. We looked all over Jizhou but couldn't find you. We chanced upon an old man from this district in a vegetarian restaurant, and he led us here. We met a peasant woman who told us you were at home preparing pills and potions. But your mother kept denying it, so I got Iron Ox to provoke you into coming out. It was a bit of a nasty trick but please forgive us. For our leader in Gaotang every day that passes increases the danger. Please agree to come with us, for the sake of loyalty to our great enterprise."
Taoist Gongsun said: "It is true that in my youth I used to frequent the rivers and lakes and enjoy the companionship of brave men. But since the time I left Mount Liang and returned home I have had no taste for that life: in the first place I have an aged mother with no one else to look after her; secondly my present master, the Blessed Sage, wants me to stay. I was afraid someone might come looking for me, that is why I changed my name to Brother Purity and hid myself away here."
The Magic Messenger said: "But right now Song Jiang is in extreme peril. Please, out of compassion, Father, come with us, if only for a little while."
Taoist Gongsun said: "The problem is there will be no one to look after my mother. And I doubt if my master would allow it. No, really I can't."
The Magic Messenger threw himself down in supplication. Taoist Gongsun raised him up and said: "Let's think about it later." He left them sitting there in the room while he went to arrange some vegetarian food for them.
When the three had been eating for a while, the Magic Messenger said with many a sigh: "If you won't come with us, Song Jiang will be captured by Gao Lian and from now on the loyal company of the mountain stronghold is no more!"
Taoist Gongsun said: "Let me go and ask my master. If he gives his consent I will go with you."
"Then go and ask him right away."

"Just be patient for this one night. I will go first thing tomorrow morning."
"But for our leader every day that passes is like a year, please let's go now."
So Taoist Gongsun stood up and together with the other two set off on the path to Two Immortals Peak. It was that season when autumn is turning into winter, when the days are short and the nights long and it is easy for the traveller to be benighted. When they were halfway up the mountain a red sun was already sinking in the west. Through the shadow of the pine trees a little path led directly to the hermitage of the Blessed Sage. Before it was a red sign with three gold characters saying "Temple of the Purple Void." The scene that met their eyes when they arrived there was indeed impressive:
The dark green pines stand thickly, the paler green cypresses are luxuriant. A bunch of greybeards listen to the scriptures, while a group of black-robed priests mix medicines. The green wutong trees, the green bamboos, are like a jade screen at the mouth of the cave shutting out the cold; white snow and yellow shoots seem to seal in the heat of the furnace in the pill manufactory. Wild deer wander down the paths, trampling the flowers; mountain apes leap across the gorges picking fruit. The sound of Taoists reciting the scriptures is wafted to the ears, hermits can be seen discussing the law. From the altar to the Heavenly Void the sound of priests chanting the litanies carries on the breeze, from the phoenixes atop the Hall of the Dipper comes the tinkling of jade. Veritably one thinks oneself in heaven, for where else could one go to seek paradise?
In the vestibule the three of them arranged their dress and then entered from the corridor passing the main hall to the Pines and Cranes Pavilion at the back. Two acolytes, seeing that Taoist Gongsun was bringing two strangers, went and reported it to the master. They returned with an invitation to enter.
When the three men entered, the master had just been praying and was seated on the monk's throne. Taoist Gongsun stepped forward and greeted him reverently, then waited with bowed head. The holy man whom the Magic Messenger and Iron Ox now observed had a truly other-worldly air:
His monk's circlet is bedecked with jade leaves, his crane robe is embroidered with gold thread. He has long whiskers and broad cheekbones, and is a steadfast practitioner of the rule to suppress passion; he has green eyes with large pupils, and is replete with longevity pills. He is always nibbling Anqi dates or gobbling Fangshuo peaches. His solar plexus is filled with qi: he is brimming with health and vitality. His name is inscribed in the mystic register: he is a pure and unblemished immortal. This is indeed one who loves to stroll at night under the moon and harken to the distant cry of the peacock, or travel a thousand leagues soaring among the clouds on the crane's back.
The Magic Messenger hurriedly bowed, but Iron Ox simply stared. "Why are these two here?" the holy man asked Taoist Gongsun.
"They are the two young friends I told you about," said Taoist Gongsun. "They are loyal friends from Shandong. It's because the governor of Gaotang has been using magic powers that our friend Song Jiang has sent them here to summon me. Of course I wouldn't go without your permission, so I have come to ask you for it."
"My son, if you wish to escape the burning pit and prepare yourself for longevity, how can you have any desire to return to those realms?"
The Magic Messenger bowed again and said: "I beseech you to give Taoist Gongsun leave. As soon as Gaotang is defeated we will send him back."
"You know nothing about it," said the Blessed Sage. "It is not for the laity to involve themselves in our affairs. Go, take yourselves off."
Taoist Gongsun had no alternative but to take them away. They left the hermitage and went down the mountain that same night.
Iron Ox asked: "What did that old monk say?"
The Magic Messenger said: "Didn't you hear what he said?"
"I know, but I can never work that kind of crap out."
"Well, the upshot of what the master said was that he couldn't go."
Iron Ox began to rave. "The two of us have come all this way, and had a world of trouble finding him, and now he comes out with that shit? That really makes me sick! I'm going to get that bloody monk, I'll twist his crown off with one hand, grab him round the waist with the other and pitch him down the mountain!"
The Magic Messenger gave him a look and said: "You want to have your feet nailed down again?"
Iron Ox said hastily: "I don't mean it, I don't mean it. I was just joking!"
They went back to Taoist Gongsun's house, where a supper was prepared for them. Taoist Gongsun said: "Please stay here tonight, and tomorrow I'll go and plead with my master again. If he gives his permission I'll go with you."
So the Magic Messenger bade him goodnight and the two of them collected their things and went to the clean room. They both went to sleep, but around midnight Iron Ox stealthily got up. Judging by his companion's heavy breathing that he was soundly asleep, he said to himself: "Isn't it fucking stupid? You're a member of the company of Mount Liang, yet you have to come and ask permission from some fucking priest! If the bugger refuses again tomorrow morning, all our leader's great enterprise goes to pot. I can't stand for that. It's only a question of killing that bloody Taoist, and then he's got no one to ask and he'll have to come with us."
He groped around for his axes and then quietly opened the door and set off up the mountain, moving forward steadily by the light of stars and moon. When he reached the Temple of the Purple Void, the main gates were shut. But the fence was not particularly high. With a spring he was over it. He opened the main gate and entered stealthily. When he got to the Pines and Cranes Pavilion he heard someone behind the partition reciting the Jade Pivot sutra. He crept up close and made a hole in the paper window with a wettened finger: the Blessed Sage was there alone, seated on his throne. On a table before him burnt a little pot of choice incense, and two painted lamps were lit, throwing a bright light on the text.
"This bloody Taoist deserves to die!" Iron Ox said to himself. He crept up to the door and then gave a single push, so that both halves sprang open with a shuddering groan. He rushed inside, raised the head of his axe and brought it crashing down on the Sage's head. It cut right through into the chair. The blood that flowed out was white. Iron Ox chuckled at this. "The bloody Taoist's a virgin, obviously," he said. "He hoards all his spunk and won't let a drop of it go. There's not a trace of red blood."
Looking carefully, he saw that even the priest's crown had been cut in two and the skull was split down to the spinal column. "Well, that's the end of that problem," he said. "He won't be making any more fuss about Taoist Gongsun's going." He turned and ran from the Pines and Cranes Pavilion, leaving the temple by the main corridor. On the way he came upon a black-robed acolyte who barred the way and shouted: "You have killed our master, where do you think you are going?"
"You can have a taste of my axe too, you young bugger!" Iron Ox yelled. He raised his arm, the axe fell, and the head went bounding along the temple floor. That made two he had killed. "I'd best be off now!" he said with a laugh. He made his way to the main gate and positively flew down the mountain. Arriving at Taoist Gongsun's house he slipped inside and bolted the door. Back in the room he could hear that the Magic Messenger was still fast asleep. He went back to sleep again too.
In the morning Taoist Gongsun got up and prepared breakfast and told the others to eat.
"Please will you go with us again to the mountain and plead with the Sage," the Magic Messenger said to Taoist Gongsun. This caused Iron Ox to smile ironically to himself.
Taking the same road as before, they returned to the mountain. They went again to the Pines and Cranes Pavilion in the Temple of the Purple Void. Two acolytes met them. "Where is the Sage?" Taoist Gongsun asked.
"The Sage is on his throne nurturing his spirit," the acolytes replied.
Iron Ox had a huge shock. His mouth fell open and it was quite a while before he closed it. When they drew aside the curtain and entered they saw the Blessed Sage seated on his throne in the middle of the room. Iron Ox thought to himself: "Can I possibly have killed the wrong person last night?"
"Why have you three come again?" the Blessed Sage asked.
"I have come to implore my master's compassion," said the Magic Messenger, "to help rescue our company from their present straits."
"Who is this big dark fellow?" the Blessed Sage asked.
"He is my comrade, his name is Li Kui," said the Magic Messenger.
"I had not intended to allow Taoist Gongsun to go," said the Blessed Sage with a slight smile. "But for the sake of his honour I shall allow him to absent himself for a little while."
The Magic Messenger prostrated himself in gratitude. Iron Ox thought to himself: "The bastard knows I wanted to kill him, that's why he fucking says it."
At this point the Blessed Sage said: "Shall I have all three of you transported to Gaotang in an instant of time?" They thanked him and the Magic Messenger thought: "It seems as if this Blessed Sage knows some trick like my magic walking."
The Master told his acolytes to bring three handkerchiefs.
The Magic Messenger said: "May I ask, Master, how you propose to transport us to Gaotang?"
The Blessed Sage rose and said: "Come with me." They all followed him out to the cliff. First he took a red handkerchief. He spread it out on the rock and said: "Let my disciple climb onto it." Taoist Gongsun placed both feet on the handkerchief and with a flap of his sleeve the Blessed Sage shouted "Rise!" and the handkerchief turned into a red cloud and Taoist Gongsun went soaring into the sky till he was two hundred feet or more above the mountain. The Blessed Sage shouted "Stop!" and the red cloud became stationary. Then he spread out a blue handkerchief and made the Magic Messenger step onto it. He shouted "Rise!" and the handkerchief changed into a blue cloud and rose up into the sky with the Magic Messenger on it. The two clouds, red and blue, about the size of two rush mats, floated there in the sky above them, while Iron Ox watched open-mouthed. The Blessed Sage now spread a white handkerchief on the rock and bade Iron Ox step onto it. Iron Ox grinned nervously and said: "No tricks now. If I should fall off, I'd look a proper idiot."
"Don't you see the other two?" said the Blessed Sage.
Iron Ox stood on the handkerchief and the Blessed Sage pronounced "Rise" and the handkerchief changed into a white cloud and flew up into the sky. Iron Ox shouted: "Aiya, mine is unstable, bring me down again!"
The Blessed Sage motioned with his right hand and the red cloud and the blue one gradually sank back to earth. The Magic Messenger prostrated himself and stood with bowed head in front of the Sage, while Taoist Gongsun stood on his left. Above them Iron Ox was shouting down: "I've got to relieve myself, I'm going to pee and shit, if you don't bring me down I'm going to do it on your head!"
The Blessed Sage said: "I am a contemplative, I never did anything to upset you, why did you come by night and break in and try to chop me with an axe? If I had not been protected by my virtue, I would be dead. And you killed one of my acolytes too."
"Not me," said Iron Ox. "Perhaps it's a case of mistaken identity!"
The Blessed Sage laughed. "Although you actually only split two of my gourds, your intention was evil, and for that reason I am going to make you suffer for a time." And he signalled with his hand and shouted "Go!", and an ill wind arose and blew Iron Ox off into the midst of the clouds. At this point two yellow-turbanned strong men took charge of Iron Ox. With the sound of wind and rain roaring in his ears he was gradually swept into the territory of Jizhou. He was frightened out of his wits and his hands and feet trembled violently. Then there was a sudden swishing sound, and he fell slap bang into the middle of the Jizhou court of justice.
Governor Ma was actually sitting in his court, with quite a number of officials present in the courtroom, when suddenly, to everyone's utter amazement, this big swarthy character fell from the sky.
"Bring him here!" Governor Ma shouted. Immediately a dozen guards and gaolers dragged Iron Ox before the bench.
"Where the devil have you come from?" the Governor roared. "How do you manage to fall out of the sky like that?"
Iron Ox's pate was cracked and his forehead cut by the fall and at first he was simply unable to speak.
The Governor said: "He must be some kind of magician. This calls for the instruments of justice to be employed." The guards and gaolers tied Iron Ox up and dragged him to an open space in front of the court-house. One of the officers fetched a bowl of dog's blood and plunged his head into it, while another brought a bucket of shit and poured it over Iron Ox, drenching him from head to foot. Iron Ox's mouth and ears were filled with piss and shit.
"I'm not a magician," Iron Ox protested. "I'm a follower of the Blessed Sage."
Now of course everyone knew that the Blessed Sage was a living saint and for this reason they were reluctant to do him any injury. They dragged him before the bench again and one of the officials said: "This Blessed Sage of Jizhou is renowned throughout the world as a living saint. If this is one of his followers we cannot punish him."
Governor Ma merely laughed. "I have read thousands of books and have heard of many wonders ancient and modern, but I never heard of a holy man having a disciple like this one. He's a magician, I tell you. Give the bastard a good hiding!"
The guards were obliged to throw Iron Ox down and beat him to within an inch of his life.
"Confess you're a magician and the beating will stop!" the Governor shouted.
So Iron Ox had to confess that he was "Second Brother Li, the Magician." A heavy cangue was produced and fitted, and he was escorted to the main gaol. When he arrived at the cells for the condemned, he said: "I'm one of the top brass of the spirit world, how dare you put a cangue on me? You people of Jizhou are all going to come to a sticky end."
Now every officer in the gaol knew that the virtue of the Blessed Sage was immense, all held him in the greatest respect, so they said to Iron Ox: "Tell us honestly who you are."
"I am the Blessed Sage's favourite disciple and chief bodyguard. But I committed a small fault and the Sage was angry with me and has cast me in here, allowing me to suffer like this. In two or three days' time he will come to get me out. If you don't provide some food and wine for my comfort I shall see to it all of you and your families die."
This put the wind up all the officers of the gaol and they bought wine and meat which they pressed upon Iron Ox. Seeing how scared they were, Iron Ox invented even more stories. More and more frightened, they brought him hot water to wash in and clean clothes to put on.
"If you don't bring me enough wine and food," Iron Ox told them, "I shall fly off, and you will really be in trouble." The gaolers all had to plead with him. Iron Ox of course remained in the gaol. We shall say no more of this.
When the Blessed Sage told the Magic Messenger all the above, the latter was very upset and begged him to release Iron Ox. The Blessed Sage retained the Magic Messenger in his quarters for the night and asked him for information about the affairs of the mountain stronghold. The Magic Messenger told of the many good qualities of the two leaders, their loyalty and generosity, their obedience to heaven's will, their vow never to harm honest officials and upright citizens, filial sons and chaste women, and all their various virtues. The Blessed Sage was most impressed. The Magic Messenger stayed five days, daily kowtowing and pleading with the Blessed Sage for Iron Ox's release. The Blessed Sage said: "It's best to expel such people, don't take him back with you."
The Magic Messenger said: "But you see, although Iron Ox is a bit of a fool, and rather undisciplined, he has his good points. For one thing he's absolutely straight and would never pick on anyone. Also he's no toady, he'll stick to his guns even if he has to die for it. And thirdly, he's not a philanderer, nor is he greedy or treacherous, and he is always foremost in a fight. For all these reasons Song Jiang loves him. If I were to go back without him, it would be very difficult for me to face my leader."
The Blessed Sage said: "I know full well that this person is one of the baleful stars come down to earth. Because men have committed too many sins he has been sent as a scourge. How could I go against heaven's will and harm this person? I intend only for him to suffer a while, afterwards I shall return him to you."
The Magic Messenger prostrated himself in gratitude.
The Blessed Sage called out: "Where is my yellow-turbanned bodyguard?" and a sudden gust of wind swept through the Pines and Cranes Pavilion. When it had passed, a mighty yellow-turbanned bodyguard stood before them. Here is what they saw:
Face red as a beetroot and hair like black silk, he seems at least ten feet tall and built with strength enough to lift a ton. His yellow turban is tilted on one side and secured with a gold ring which throws back the sun's bright rays; over his embroidered robe the iron armour spreads a frosty shadow that would swallow the moon. He stands guard over the altar of the law and every evil spirit that draws near to earth is vanquished forthwith.
"What is your command, Master?" said the yellow-turbanned bodyguard.
"That criminal I sent you with to Jizhou has served his term," said the Blessed Sage. "I want you to go back to Jizhou and fetch him. Go quickly and return quickly."
The bodyguard saluted and left. About an hour later Iron Ox tumbled out of the heavenly void.
The Magic Messenger immediately helped him to his feet and asked: "Where have you been for the last two days, brother?"
But Iron Ox had seen the Blessed Sage and was busy kowtowing and saying: "Forgive me, Master!"
The Blessed Sage said: "From now on you had better control yourself. Do all you can to help Song Jiang and do not nurture evil tendencies."
Iron Ox prostrated himself again, saying: "I shall never dare to disregard the Master's words."
"But where exactly have you been all this time?" the Magic Messenger asked again.
"That gust of wind the other day blew me to Jizhou district court," Iron Ox replied. "I bounced off the roof of the courtroom and they seized me. Governor Ma said I was a magician so they tied me up and then the guards from the prison poured dog's blood and shit all over me and beat me till my legs were like pulp. They put a cangue on me and chucked me in the main gaol. When they asked me how I had managed to fall out of the sky, I told them I was the Blessed Sage's favourite disciple and chief bodyguard and that I was being punished like this because of a little fault I committed, and that in a few days time he would come and release me. Although I was beaten, I got quite a lot of wine and food out of them, because they're so scared of the Blessed Sage. They bathed me and gave me clean clothes. While I was in one of the inner rooms enjoying a bit of wine and meat, this yellow-turbanned fellow suddenly dived out of the sky, took off my cangue, told me to shut my eyes, and I was wafted here like in a dream."
Taoist Gongsun said: "The Master has more than a thousand of these yellow-turbanned bodyguards, all at his service."
"My God!" Iron Ox cried. "Why didn't you tell me that before? I would never have misbehaved!" He hurriedly prostrated himself again.
The Magic Messenger said: "We have been here many days now, and the troops in Gaotang are in a desperate situation. I humbly beg the Master to allow Taoist Gongsun to go with us to rescue Song Jiang and destroy Gaotang before returning to the mountain."
The Blessed Sage said: "Originally I didn't want to let him go but now on account of your great loyalty I'll permit him to absent himself for a while. But I've some words for him which I want him to remember." Taoist Gongsun stepped forward and knelt to hear the Blessed Sage's instructions. He was indeed filled with ambition to bring peace and salvation to the world and destined to ride the phoenix and tread the clouds.

Wu Yong said, "The only man who can overcome Gao Lian is Gongsun Sheng, and we must send for him at once."
"Previously Dai Zong went to Jizhou to find Gongsun Sheng without success," said Song Jiang, "so where can he go this time?"
"Jizhou is a very big district." said Wu Yong, "with many villages, county towns, and hamlets. I think he must be somewhere there. As he is a great Taoist he will probably be at some temple in some remote mountain, and we must tell Dai Zong this time to make inquiries at all the mountains in isolated spots."
Song Jiang sent for Dai Zong, and then told him about their plans for finding Gongsun Sheng.
"I will go," said Dai Zong, "but it would be better this time if somebody accompany me."
Li Kui was there, and volunteered to go. "In that case," said Dai Zong, "you will not eat meat while on the way with me, and also you must obey my orders implicitly."
"Where is the difficulty in that?" said Li Kui. "I will of course do what you say."

"On the way you must be careful," said Song Jiang to Li Kui, "as we do not want any trouble this time. When you find Gongsun Sheng you must return at once with him."
"There will be no row this time," said Li Kui.
The two men started off at once, and when they had got about ten li beyond Gaotang Prefecture, Li Kui suggested that they should stop at an inn for some wine. But Dai Zong reminded him that he had promised to abstain from meat. They went on until evening, when they stopped at an inn. Li Kui went and got the food, and soon brought in some vegetables for Dai Zong.
"Why don't you also dine with me?" asked Dai Zong.
"I do not feel hungry just now," said Li Kui; "I will dine by and by."
"This fellow probably tries to deceive me," thought Dai Zong, "and will get some meat behind my back." He however finished his meal, and then went stealthily to see what Li Kui was doing. In a room at the back he found Li Kui with a plate of beef and two horns of wine. He decided, however, not to disturb him at his meal, but would have a practical joke with him the following day. Dai Zong then went to bed. The next morning he was up by about 4 A.M., and awakening Li Kui they got their breakfast, and went on their way. They had only gone a short distance when Dai Zong said, "Yesterday we did not travel by supernatural power so we have to hurry up today. Now pack up your things firm, I will apply the charm to you and you can travel three hundred li where you can stop. You can go in front, but when you come to an inn you wait for me there." He then put the enchanted puttees on Li Kui, repeated the incantation, and blew at Li Kui who sailed off. He took very long strides, and in fact was like a cloud floating along with a strong wind behind.
When Li Kui had gone Dai Zong laughed, "He will be hungry before the day is done." Dai Zong then put on his enchanted puttees, and flew after Li Kui.
Li Kui did not suspect there was a joke being played on him. He felt the wind rushing past his ears, and saw the trees and houses whirl past him. The speed became so great that he became afraid, but when he tried to stop he found that he was quite helpless. He had the sensation of being swept along by some invisible force. When he saw an inn he was simply whirled past it although he would have liked to stop there and have a drink. He called out, "Sir, stop here! stop here!" His flight continued until the western sky began to redden for sunset, and he was now not only thirsty but very hungry as well. His body was covered with perspiration and he was panting for breath.
At last Dai Zong caught up to him, and asked, "Elder brother Li, why did you not stop at some inn for a meal as I asked you?"
"Elder brother!" replied Li Kui, "Save me! Save me, before I die from hunger!"
Dai Zong took some cakes out of his breast pocket, and began to eat them. Li Kui seeing this called out, "I cannot stop. Please give me a bite."
"Brother," said Dai Zong, "if you will only stop I can give you some."
Li Kui turned round, and reached out a hand, but found that Dai Zong was nearly a furlong away. He himself was now traveling along at the same rate, but without seeing where he was going. He called out, "Elder brother! Elder brother! Let us stop here."
"Things are very strange today, as I cannot control my legs, and they will not stop," said Dai Zong.
"Aiya! My legs are the same. I am quite helpless. They won't goddamn obey me at all today. The only escape would be for me to cut off my legs with my axe."
"That appears to be the only way, because if we go on like this we shall never stop until the first day of the New Year."
"Elder brother, please do not play practical jokes with me. If I cut off my legs how can I go back?"
"Last evening you must have disobeyed my order, and I think that is why we are like this today. You must go on."
"Elder brother, please forgive me."
"I cannot do anything because you must have broken the important rule about abstaining from meat. If you have committed that sin you will probably have to continue your flight for very many years."
"What a prospect! I deceived you yesterday, and ate some meat. But it was not very much—only about six jin. What can I do now?"
"No wonder that we cannot stop today. You have seriously injured me, and rendered me helpless."
Li Kui hearing this threw his hands up towards heaven, and wept.
Dai Zong could not help laughing, "If you would swear to always listen to what I say I might be able to find a way out."
"Sir, please say what you like in future, and I will obey every word."
"Well never dare again to deceive me about eating meat."
"If I do that again may my tongue be blistered. Yesterday I saw you eat the vegetables, but I did not like the taste, and so ate just a very little meat. I will never do that again."
"In that case I will forgive you just this time." So saying Dai Zong hastened his speed, caught up to Li Kui, and catching hold of his leg, pulled it hard, and shouted, "Stop!" They began to slow down, and soon stopped. Dai Zong said, "I will now go in front, and you can come slowly behind." But when Li Kui tried to go he found that he could not move. His feet were like cast iron, and he could not lift them. "Trouble again! I request you to assist me," he said.
Dai Zong turned his head, laughed, and said, "Will you take an oath that you have spoken the truth?"
"You are my elder brother, and I will strictly do what you ask me to do," replied Li Kui.
"Will you really do as I tell you this time?" asked Dai Zong. So saying he took hold of Li Kui, and saying, "Rise," and the latter began to walk.
"Please take pity on me as I am tired, and should like a rest," said Li Kui. Soon they came to an inn and stopped there.
Upon entering the inn they bought some sacrificial joss money, and burnt it to the gods.
"Well, what about today's journey?" asked Dai Zong. Li Kui rubbed his legs, and said, "These legs appear to be mine just now."
Dai Zong got some warm water, and they both bathed their feet. They then partook of a vegetarian repast, and went to bed.
The next morning they were up early, and after breakfast they started off again on the road. When they had gone about a li Dai Zong took the enchanted puttees, and said he would put only a pair of them on Li Kui's so that he could travel slower that day.
"I do not want them," said Li Kui.
"You must do as I tell you," said Dai Zong. "We are on important business, and I will not trifle with you. If you don't do as I wish I will leave you here rooted to the spot. I will then go to Jizhou. and after finding Gongsun Sheng I will return here and release you."
"Do it! Put them on!" replied Li Kui hurriedly.
They were put on, and that day the two men traveled together. Whatever Dai Zong proposed Li Kui agreed to at once.
They duly reached Jizhou, and stopped at an inn there. The day following their arrival Dai Zong dressed as a master with Li Kui as his servant. All that day they made inquiries in all parts of the town without finding any trace of Gongsun Sheng. The next day was the same although they tried all the small alleys. At the end of that day Li Kui lost his temper and said, "Where can this Taoist beggar have got to? When I goddamn find him I will take him by the hair and drag him off."
Dai Zong frowned at him, "You are at it again! Don't forget what trouble you got into once before." Li Kui laughed, and said, "I was only joking."
They returned to the inn that evening to rest, and the third day they spent all their time outside the town making inquiries in all the villages. But again nobody had ever heard of Gongsun Sheng. About noon as they were both hungry they entered an inn for a meal. The inn was very crowded, and they could not find a seat. The waiter however asked them to sit at a table where there was an old man. Dai Zong saluted the old man, and they sat down. They ordered four bowls of vermicelli and Dai Zong said to Li Kui, "If I eat one bowl to your three bowls will that do?"
"Not enough!" said Li Kui. "If they bring six bowls I could eat the whole lot."
The waiter laughed at this. After waiting a long time however no food was served. The other tables were however being served with vermicelli, and seeing this Li Kui became angry. The waiter now brought a bowl of hot vermicelli, and set it in front of the old man at their table. The old man without any ceremony began to eat. He had his head bowed down to the bowl eating when Li Kui called out, "Waiter, why have we to wait so long?" So saying he struck the table so hard that the bowl of hot vermicelli was upset. The old man was annoyed at this, and taking hold of Li Kui said, "Have you no reason? Why have you upset my bowl of vermicelli?"
Li Kui held up his fist to strike the old man, but Dai Zong interposed and told him not to do so. Dai Zong addressed the old man, "Take no notice of this man as he is very stupid. I will supply you with another bowl of vermicelli."
"You do not understand," replied the old man, "I come from a distant place, and must hurry back as quickly as possible according to the order I received."
"Where did you come from, and who gave you orders?" asked Dai Zong.
"I am from the Erxian Mountain in Jiuguan County in Jizhou," said the old man. "I came here to buy incense, and must get back quickly because True Man Luo the Immortal has promised to disclose to us the secrets of immortality."[78]
Dai Zong thought a bit, and then asked if he had heard of a man Gongsun Sheng.
"If you had asked anybody else they could not have answered you," said the old man. "He is a neighbor of mine, and lives with his mother. He is often away from home, and was once called Gongsun Yiqing, but now is known as the Taoist Qing. People have forgotten his original name."
Dai Zong repeated the old proverb, "You can wear out iron shoes in fruitless searching, and yet by a lucky chance you may find the lost thing without even looking for it." He asked the old man, "How far is this Erxian Mountain? Is the Taoist Qing at home just now?"
"It is about fifteen li from here. The Taoist Qing, is a pupil of the True Man Luo who would not dispense with him."
Dai Zong was much pleased and when they all had their food he paid the bill, and they left the inn. He then got full directions of the road and let the old man go in advance.
Dai Zong and Li Kui put on the enchanted puttees, and set off and soon reached the Erxian Mountain. There they met a woodcutter, and asked him where the Taoist Qing lived. The man told them to cross a pass on the hill, and they would come to a house with a stone bridge opposite the door. That was where the Taoist Qing lived. They followed these directions, and found the house. There they asked a woman carrying a basket of fruit whether the Taoist Qing was at home. The woman replied that he was in a room at the back preparing a magic drug. Dai Zong asked Li Kui to wait outside while he went in by himself. Dai Zong entered, and came to a room with a reed curtain in front of the door. Here he coughed, and a white-haired old woman came out. He saluted her, and said, "I come here to see the Taoist Qing."
"What is your name?" she asked.
"I am Dai Zong, and have come from Shandong."
"My son has not yet returned from his travel abroad."
"I am an old friend of his," said Dai Zong, "and have a message for him."
"He is not here, but you can tell me the message, and I will tell him when he returns."
"As he is not here I will call again to see him," said Dai Zong. He again saluted and went outside, and said to Li Kui, "An old woman says that he is not at home so now I want you to go inside and see what you can do. If she tells you the same story you must make a row, but avoid striking the old woman. When I hear the noise I will come in, and intervene between you two."
Li Kui put down his pack, and putting his two axes in his waist belt he entered the house and shouted, "Is anybody here?"
The old woman came, and asked, "Whom do you want?" When she saw Li Kui, however, she was afraid.
"I am the 'Black Whirlwind' from Liangshan Marsh, and have orders to come here for a man Gongsun Sheng. Tell him to come here at once. If he comes I will be respectful, but if there is any obstacle I will burn down this goddamn house."
"Sir, do not get excited, this is not the home of Gongsun Sheng, but of the Taoist Qing."
"Then tell him to come here. I know his damned face."
"He has gone abroad, and has not returned yet."
Li Kui took his axe and striking the wall made a big hole in it. He then said, "If you won't call your son I will kill you at once." He then advanced with his axe in a threatening attitude, and the woman fell down. A door opened, and Gongsun Sheng came out saying, "You have no decency." Dai Zong just then also entered, and said, "'Iron Ox,' why have you knocked this old lady down?" He went and lifted her up.
Li Kui threw his axe on the ground, and said, "Please excuse me. I did this only because you would not come out to see us."
Gongsun Sheng took his mother inside, and then came and saluted both Dai Zong and Li Kui. He then took them into a small room, and Dai Zong explained the position at Gaotang Prefecture, and asked Gongsun Sheng to help them against the troops who had defeated them. Gongsun Sheng was unwilling to go and leave his old mother alone, but Dai Zong pressed him, and said that if Gongsun Sheng did not help them they would be defeated again, and probably Song Jiang himself would be captured.
Gongsun Sheng at last agreed to go to consult his master True Man Luo the Immortal. He, with Dai Zong and Li Kui, then left the house, and went to Erxian Mountain. By the time they got there it was dusk. A small path through pine trees brought them to a small temple with three characters over the door, "Pole Star Temple." They entered an arbor in front of the door, and arranged and dusted their clothes. They then went inside. Two acolytes had seen them coming, and had announced their arrival to Luo the Immortal. He asked them to come into the Pine and Stork Room where he usually sat in silent meditation. Gongsun Sheng and Dai Zong kowtowed, and then stood in respectful attitude. But Li Kui instead of following their example was staring about the room.
Gongsun Sheng then explained the object of the visit, and asked Luo the Immortal, to advise him whether he should go to rescue Song Jiang.
"You sought refuge here from the wicked world," said Luo, "and wished to attain immortality. So why do you now think of returning?"
"We only want him to help us in defeating Prefect Gao Lian, and after that he can return here," said Dai Zong.
"That is hardly a matter for a priest to interfere in," replied Luo "You can decide that question yourself."
Gongsun Sheng and the other two then withdrew, and returned to Gongsun Sheng's house. Upon arriving there Li Kui asked what the priest had said. "Did you not listen?" asked Dai Zong.
"I listened but could not understand what he said," replied Li Kui.
"He said that Gongsun Sheng should not go," said Dai Zong.
Li Kui was angry at this. "We have come so far, and undergone many tribulations, and now we have at last found Gongsun Sheng but the priest tells him not to go. I feel like killing that priest."
Dai Zong frowned upon him, and said, "Must I again fasten your feet to the ground?"
"No! No! I was only joking," said Li Kui.
That evening they talked over a plan, and at last Gongsun Sheng agreed to go with them the next day, and get the priest to agree to their proposal. But Li Kui could not sleep as he was thinking the matter over. About 4 A.M. he got up, and heard that Dai Zong was snoring while fast asleep.
He thought, "We are heroes so why should we ask a priest for his opinion about our own affairs. If I kill the priest there will be no obstacle in our way." He took his axe, and quietly opening the door he went towards Luo's temple, easily finding his way in the bright moonlight. Upon reaching the temple he found that the gates were closed. The wall was not very high, and he soon leapt over it. Then opening the gates from the inside he went towards the temple. He soon found the room, and breaking a piece of the paper on a window he looked inside. Candles were burning on a table, and the Immortal Luo was slowly chanting the scriptures. Li Kui thought, "That fellow deserves death." He pushed the door open, and going straight to Luo the Immortal, he struck him on the head with his axe, and killed him on the spot. Li Kui saw that the blood was white, and laughed saying, "He evidently was a virgin, he's full of semen! There's not a drop of red blood in him! He cannot stop Gongsun Sheng from going now." He left the room, but was stopped by an acolyte who called out, "You have killed our master. Where are you going?" Li Kui without hesitation used his axe, and also killed the boy. He then quickly left the temple, and going down the hill soon came to Gongsun Sheng's house where he quietly opened the door and slipped into bed.
The next morning Gongsun Sheng was up early, and prepared the breakfast. While eating Dai Zong reminded Gongsun Sheng that he had to take them to the temple again. Upon hearing this Li Kui could hardly suppress a laugh. He said nothing, and accompanied the other two up the hill. Upon entering the temple they saw the two acolytes, and Dai Zong inquired if the True Man Luo the Immortal was in.
"He is sitting on the bed meditating," replied the acolyte.
Upon hearing this Li Kui was dumbfounded, and stood with his mouth wide open, and his tongue hanging out. The curtain was raised, and looking into the room they saw Luo the Immortal, sitting on the bed. Li Kui thought, "Last night I must have made a mistake."
"What do you three men want now?" asked Luo.
"We came to ask for your mercy," replied Dai Zong, "and beg you to save us from calamity."
"Who is that dark man?" asked Luo pointing to Li Kui.
"He came with me, and his name is Li Kui," replied Dai Zong.
Luo the Immortal, laughed, "I did intend to allow Gongsun Sheng to leave me, but I have changed my mind on account of that dark fellow." Dai Zong saluted the priest, and then turning to Li Kui told him what had been said. Li Kui knew then that the priest was aware that he had tried to kill him.
"How would you like if I dispatch you three men to Gaotang Prefecture in a few minutes?"
Dai Zong thought that a better way than using his enchanted puttees, and so they thanked Luo the Immortal. Luo then ordered the acolytes to bring three pieces of clothes, and asked the three men to follow him. He took them outside to a place and there spread a red cloth on a stone. He said, "Taoist Qing,you can stand on this." Gongsun Sheng did so, and the True Man Luo waved his sleeve, and said "Rise!" Immediately the cloth became a cloud which ascended carrying Gongsun Sheng upwards about fifty feet when Luo called out "Stop!" and there Qing remained stationary. He then spread a blue cloth on the stone, and invited Dai Zong to stand on it. He did so, and the same process was gone through. Li Kui was astonished, and gazed with open eyes at the two clouds in the sky on which stood his two companions.
Luo the Immortal now spread a white cloth on the stone, and asked Li Kui to stand on it. Li Kui laughed, "This is no joke! If I fall I shall have a big lump on my head."
"Do you see those two men?" asked Luo.

Li Kui took his position, and after the same process he rose up on a white cloud. "I do not feel safe," said Li Kui "Let me come down!"
Luo the Immortal, hearing this, waved his sleeve again, and the red and black clouds descended. Li Kui seeing this called out, "I also want to come down."
"I am a priest and have never offended you. Why did you attempt to kill me last night? If I had had no virtue you would have killed me. You also tried to kill my acolyte."
"It wasn't me! You must have made a mistake!" replied Li Kui from aloft.
Luo the Immortal, laughed, and said, "You certainly broke two of my gourds last night. You are a bad man! I am going to punish you for that." So saying he again waved his sleeve. "Go!" he said, and a strong wind arose, and carried the white cloud right up into the sky with Li Kui on it. On each side of the cloud were two men with yellow turbans, and looking downward Li Kui saw houses, forests, and mountains skimming past under his feet. He was exceedingly afraid, and trembled in every limb. All at once he heard a great noise and the next moment he fell on the roof of the yamen in Jizhou and rolled off into the courtyard. The Prefect was sitting on the bench with a full court, and they were all startled by this strange and sudden appearance of a big man rolling off the roof of the court.
"Seize that man," ordered the Prefect.
The attendants seized Li Kui, and brought him as a prisoner before the Prefect who asked, "What kind of magic is this? Where do you come from?"
Li Kui could not speak as in his fall his head had been injured. "He must be a wizard," continued the Prefect, "Use the means to exorcise evil spirits." The jailers took Li Kui outside, and there an attendant took a bowl of dog's blood, and threw it over his head. Another attendant poured a bucket of urine and nightsoil over him, and he was covered all over with the filth. His mouth and ears were full of blood, piss, and turds.
At last Li Kui spoke, "I am not a wizard. I am only a servant of True Man Luo the Immortal."
At that place they all knew the True Man Luo as a Living Immortal on earth, so they ceased their activities against Li Kui. They took Li Kui into the court, and there a secretary spoke to the Prefect, "If this man is a servant of Luo the Immortal, had we better not punish him?"
The Prefect laughed, and said, "I have read many thousand of books both ancient and modern, but have never read of a Living Immortal having this kind of servant. He must be a wizard. Jailers! Beat him!" The jailers forced Li Kui on the ground, and beat him with the bamboo until he was almost unconscious.
"Now you fellow speak the truth, and I will stop the punishment," said the Prefect.
"I will confess," said Li Kui, "I am a wizard, called Li Er." A cangue was put on him, and he was sent to prison. Upon reaching the cell Li Kui said, "I am a spirit general of the Living Immortal, so how dare you put this cangue on me? I will duly report this indignity, and everybody in this town will die."
The jailers all respected the Living Immortal as they knew his great power, so they asked Li Kui, "Now, who are you really?"
Li Kui replied, "Truly, I am a confidential general of Luo, the Living Immortal. But as I had made a mistake, Luo sent me here so that I would be punished by you. He will send to rescue me in two or three days. If you don't treat me well and give me some meat and wine, I shall tell him, and he will kill all you people."
The jailers were afraid of him, and gave him a good meal. Li Kui seeing their fear spoke wildly again, and the men being more afraid brought hot water for him to bathe, and also wash his clothes. He then swore that if they did not treat him well the next day he would fly away, and send trouble to them. They beseeched him to take pity on them, and promised to treat him well.
True Man Luo the Immortal, told Dai Zong how Li Kui had tried to kill him, and how he would punish him. Dai Zong expressed his great regret, and begged Luo to spare Li Kui. Luo asked Dai Zong to come into the temple where they discussed the affairs of Liangshan Marsh. Dai Zong explained that both Chao Gai and Song Jiang distributed wealth in good cause and were acting like agents sent from Heaven. They had sworn not to injure good officials or patriots who were willing to die for their country; filial sons or worthy grandsons; men of high principles or chaste wives; and they had done fine work.
Luo the Immortal, considered this, without expressing an opinion. Dai Zong stayed there for five days, and every day he kowtowed to Luo, and begged him to have mercy for Li Kui. The True Man however said that Li Kui was a bad man, who was not deserving to be saved from his distress.
"Master, you do not understand," replied Dai Zong. "He is a very simple fellow, but has good intentions. He is very straightforward, and the making of wealth has no attraction for him. Again he is not a flatterer and is loyal even in the face of death. Again he is not lustful and is very brave. Because of these qualities he is liked by Song Jiang and if he does not return to Liangshan Marsh I should not dare to face Song Jiang again."
True Man Luo laughed, "He was evidently born under a murderous star, and Heaven has sent him here to kill off those sinful people. I will not oppose the will of Heaven. I have punished him enough, and will now have him back to you."
Dai Zong kowtowed and expressed his gratitude. Luo the Immortal, then summoned his strong men who came, and stood awaiting orders. Luo said to them, "That man you took to Jizhou has now finished his period of punishment. You must go and release him from the jail and bring him back here." The men vanished, and in about an hour they reappeared throwing down Li Kui from aloft. Dai Zong went forward to lift Li Kui up, and said to him, "Younger brother, where have you been these last few days?"
Li Kui noticed Luo the Immortal and kowtowed to him before replying, "Sir! I dare not offend you again."
"After this you must abstain from taking life," said Luo the Immortal, "you must exert all your strength to assist Song Jiang, and must avoid bad thoughts."
Li Kui again kowtowed, "You are my newly adopted father, and I will certainly do as you say."
"But where have you been these last few days?" asked Dai Zong.
Li Kui then recited his experiences at the court and prison in Jizhou, and how he had been brought back. When he was told that Luo the Immortal, controlled about one thousand of such stout men as had taken him to Jizhou, Li Kui said, "If I had only known all about this I would never have even tried to attack the True Man Luo."
Dai Zong again pressed Luo to let Gongsun Sheng accompany them to Gaotang Prefecture. Luo said he would not place any obstacle in his way, though he did not like to let him go. He however had some advice to give him.

To help the age and guard the country,
Magic power must now be used.

152
The Taoist Dragon in the Clouds Gongsun Sheng Defeats Gao Lian by Magic Trick; the Black Whirlwind Iron Ox Descends into the Well to Rescues Chai Jin

"Younger brother," said Luo the Sage, "the magic you've learned is the same as Gao Lian's. But now I'm going to teach you the Divine Method for Summoning the Five Thunderbolts. With this you can save Song Jiang, defend the country, preserve peace for the people, and act righteously on Heaven's behalf. I will see to it that your old mother is looked after. You may rest assured. You are one of the stars of Heavenly Spirits. For that reason, I permit you to help Song Jiang. Retain the virtues you have learned. Let no mundane desires lead you astray, lest you be deflected from your important cause."
Gongsun Sheng knelt and received the Method. Then, with Dai Zong and Li Kui, he took leave of the Sage and his Taoist colleagues, went down the mountain and returned home. Collecting his twin swords, his iron helmet, and Taoist cloak, he bid farewell to his mother, and set forth along the road out of the mountains.
When they had travelled thirty or forty li Dai Zong said to Gongsun: "I'll go on ahead and report to Song Jiang. You and Li Kui follow the highway. I'll come back and pick you up."
"Good, you do that," said Gongsun. "We'll move as fast as possible."
"Take care of the Teacher," Dai admonished Li Kui. "If anything goes wrong, I'll make you suffer for it."
"He knows the same magic as Luo the Sage," Black Whirlwind replied. "I wouldn't dare neglect him!"
Dai Zong affixed his charms and, invoking his marvellous travel means, swiftly departed.
Leaving Two Fairies Mountain and Jiugong County behind them, Gongsun and Li Kui pushed on along the main road, resting in inns at nightfall. Black Whirlwind was afraid of Luo the Sage's magic. He treated Gongsun with the greatest solicitude and kept his impetuosity tightly in check.
On the third day of their journey, they came to a town called Wugang, a populous, busy place.
"These last couple of days have been tiring. Let's have some wine and noodles before going on," Gongsun suggested.
"Fine," said Li Kui.
They saw a small tavern beside the post road and went in. Gongsun sat down at the head of the table. Li Kui undid the pack around his waist and seated himself opposite. They ordered wine and vegetable tidbits.
"Have you any meatless pastries?" Gongsun asked the waiter.
"No, we've only meat and wine here," said the man. "But there's a shop at the town entrance that sells date cakes."
"I'll go and buy you some," Li Kui volunteered. He took copper coins from his purse, headed into town and bought the cakes. Starting back, he heard people in a crowd by the side of the road cry admiringly: "What strength!"
Li Kui looked. They were surrounding a big fellow, watching him manipulate a large ribbed iron mallet. He was tall, his face was pitted with smallpox scars, and there was a large groove in his nose. Li Kui estimated the mallet to weigh about thirty catties. The man swung it and smashed a paving block to bits with a single blow. The crowd cheered. This was more than Li Kui could bear. He shoved the packet of date cakes inside his tunic and reached for the big hammer.
"Who the hell are you, that you dare take my mallet," the man shouted.
"That's some friggin farce you put on, trying to win applause! It hurts my eyes," said Li Kui. "I'll show these people how it should be done!"
"Go on, take the hammer. But if you can't wield it, I'll punch your neck!"
Li Kui picked up the mallet and flipped it about as if it were a child's slingshot. He toyed with it for a few minutes, then set it down lightly. He was neither red in the face nor panting, and his heart did not beat fast.
The man dropped to his knees and kowtowed. "I would know your name, big brother."
"Do you live around here?"
"Just up ahead." The man led Li Kui to a house and unlocked the door. He invited Li Kui in and asked him to be seated.
Li Kui noted an anvil, hammers, a forge, pincers, awls and pokers. "Must be a blacksmith," he thought. "We need a man like this in the fortress. Why don't I ask him to join?"
"What's your name?" he queried.
"I'm called Tang Long. My father was a garrison officer in the prefecture of Yanan. Because he was a good ironsmith, he served directly under Old General Zhong. He died a few years ago. I'm mad about gambling, and I've knocked about a lot. I'm here as a blacksmith temporarily only to earn my keep. My real love is play with weapons. Since I'm marked all over with smallpox scars, people call me the Gold-Coin Spotted Leopard. May I ask, brother, what your name is?"
"Li Kui, Black Whirlwind of Liangshan Marsh."
Tang Long kowtowed twice. "I've heard so much about you. Who'd have thought we'd meet today!"
"You'll never prosper hanging around this place. Come with me to Liangshan and join us. We'll make you a chieftain."
"If you don't despise me and are willing to take me along, I'll gladly serve as your groom." He pledged himself to be Li Kui's younger brother, and Black Whirlwind accepted him.
"I have no family to entertain you here," said Tang Long, "but I can treat you to three cups of simple wine in town to mark our brotherhood. Rest here tonight, and we'll set out tomorrow."
"There's a teacher in the tavern ahead, waiting for some date cakes I've bought. We have to go as soon as he's eaten. We must leave immediately."
"What's the hurry?"
"Our brother Song Jiang is involved in a fierce battle on the edge of Gaotang Prefecture. Only this teacher can save him."
"Who is he?"
"Don't ask. Just get your things together and come."
Tang Long hastily packed a bag, took silver for travelling expenses, put on a broad-brimmed felt hat, hung a dagger at his waist, and grabbed a halberd. He left his dilapidated home and crude furnishings, and followed Li Kui to Gongsun Sheng in the tavern.
"Where have you been all this time?" the Taoist demanded reproachfully. "I'd have gone back if you kept me waiting much longer."
Li Kui was afraid to reply. Instead, he introduced Tang Long, and told of their pledge of brotherhood. Gongsun was pleased to learn that he was a blacksmith. Li Kui produced the date cakes and instructed the waiter have them heated. The three downed several cups of wine together, ate the cakes, and paid the bill.
Tang Long and Li Kui shouldered the packs. With Gongsun, they left the town and made their way along a winding road towards Gaotang.
By the time they had covered two thirds of their journey, Dai Zong returned to meet them. Gongsun was delighted.
"How's the battle going?" he asked.
"Gao Lian has recovered from his arrow wound. He marches out with soldiers and challenges us every day. But brother Song Jiang is afraid to engage them. He's waiting for you."
"It will be easy."
Li Kui introduced Tang Long to Dai Zong and related what had transpired. The four men hurried on to Gaotang. About five li from the brigands' camp they were met by Lu Fang and Guo Sheng leading a hundred cavalrymen. The four mounted and proceeded to the camp.
Song Jiang and Wu Yong were waiting to greet them. Obeisances were exchanged, the travellers were offered wine, politely questioned about their journey, and invited into the headquarters tent. All the chieftains came to congratulate them on bringing Gongsun, Li Kui introduced Tang Long. When the courtesies were completed, a celebration feast was laid.
The next day Song Jiang, Wu Yong and Gongsun conferred in the tent on how to smash Gao Lian. "Give the order to attack the city," Gongsun said to Song Jiang. "We'll see what the enemy reaction is. I have a plan."
Song Jiang transmitted the command to the leaders of each encampment. These led their men to the moat around Gaotang, where they again made camp. At dawn, everyone rose and had breakfast, and the warriors donned their armor. Song Jiang, Wu Yong and Gongsun rode to the fore.
Mid waving banners the men shouted, while the thunder of drums and the bray of gongs beat against the city walls.
During the night an officer had reported to Gao Lian, the prefect, now recovered from his arrow wound, that Song Jiang's forces had arrived. In the morning Gao put on his armor, opened the city gate, lowered the drawbridge, and rode forth with his three hundred Miracle soldiers, plus officers high and low.
When the two armies were in sight of each other's drums and pennants, they spread out in battle position. Intricately carved drums thundered. Beribboned, embroidered banners waved. From Song Jiang's position a V-formation of ten horsemen trotted up. The left wing consisted of Hua Rong, Qin Ming, Zhu Tong, Ou Peng and Lu Fang. In the right wing were Lin Chong, Sun Li, Deng Fei, Ma Lin and Guo Sheng. The three commanding generals rode between them.
On the opposite side, golden drums pounded, and a front row of banners parted to permit the forward passage of Gao Lian, prefect of Gaotang, surrounded by twenty or thirty of his officers. He halted before the banners and hurled imprecations.
"Swamp bandits! Since it's a fight you want, we'll fight you to the death! Whoever runs is no real man!"
"Who will ride forth for me and cut this scoundrel down?" Song Jiang demanded.
Hua Rong, lance raised, kicked his horse and cantered to the center of the clearing.
"Who will take this rogue for me?" Gao Lian called.
A captain named Xue Yuanhui, wielding a pair of sabres, galloped forward on a spirited mount. The two men battled several rounds. Hua Rong turned his steed and rode towards his original position. Brandishing his sabres, Xue raced in pursuit. Hua Rong slowed his horse slightly, fitted an arrow to his bow, twisted around suddenly in his saddle, and let fly. Xue tumbled head first to the ground. Both sides roared.
Angrily, Gao Lian clanged his sword three times on the animal-embossed bronze shield hanging from the pommel of his saddle. A yellow dust storm rose from the midst of the Miracle soldiers, dimming the sun and darkening the earth and sky. The men yelled, as from the yellow cloud there emerged savage beasts and weird serpents. Song Jiang's forces began retreating in alarm.
But then Gongsun pulled out an ancient sword with a pine tree pattern. He pointed it at the enemy, muttered an incantation, and shouted: "Speed!"
A golden ray shot into the yellow cloud and zapped every serpent and beast. As they fell they were seen to be only white paper cutouts, and the haze of yellow dust disintegrated.
Song Jiang pointed with his whip. All three contingents charged, mowing down men and horses of the foe. Their drums and banners were scattered in disarray. Gao Lian fled to the city with his Miracle soldiers. Song Jiang's forces chased them to the foot of the walls. But the drawbridge was hurriedly raised and the gates slammed shut. Logs and ballista stones rained down on the attackers.
At Song Jiang's command, gongs were beaten as a signal for his forces to make camp and be counted. They had won a stunning victory. Song Jiang summoned Gongsun to his tent and thanked him for his marvellous Taoist sorcery. Then he rewarded the army's three contingents. The next day they divided and assaulted the city vigorously from all sides. To Song Jiang and Wu Yong, Gongsun said: "Although we destroyed more than half the enemy effectives last night, the three hundred Miracle soldiers got safely into the city. We must pound them hard, for tonight that villain is sure to raid our camp. We'll pull out in the dark of night, first erecting false palisades, and lie in ambush all around. Tell our men when they hear the sound of thunder and see flames rising in the camp to rush in and attack."
Orders were so given. Early in the afternoon they withdrew from the city and returned to camp, where they drank and loudly made merry. When darkness fell, all quietly slipped away and took up ambush positions on the camp's perimeter.
Song Jiang, Wu Yong, Gongsun, Hua Rong, Qin Ming, Lu Fang and Guo Sheng waited on a rise. Sure enough, in the middle of the night Gao Lian mustered his three hundred Miracle soldiers. Each man carried on his back an iron gourd containing sulphur, nitrate, and other gunpowder material. Each held a hooked blade and an iron whisk, and bore in his mouth a reed whistle. Around the second watch the city gate was opened, and the drawbridge lowered, and they marched forth with Gao Lian at their head and followed by thirty cavalry.
As they neared the brigands' camp Gao Lian performed a secret spell. A black mist erupted heavenward. A wild wind howled, driving before it sand and stones, ripping up earth and soil. With their fire-making equipment, the three hundred Miracle soldiers ignited the contents of their gourds, and blew together on their whistles. In the inky darkness, the flames illuminated their bodies as they surged into the camp, brandishing sabres and axes.
On the bluff, Gongsun grasped his sword and murmured an incantation. A thunderbolt burst in the empty camp, setting it ablaze. The frightened Miracle soldiers tried to run, but they were engulfed by flames, which reddened earth and sky. There was nowhere they could flee.
The fighters lying in ambush now closed in on the palisades. They could see very clearly from the outer darkness. Not one of the three hundred Miracle soldiers was allowed to escape. All were slaughtered, to the last man.

Gao Lian hastened towards the city with his thirty remaining cavalry. A pursuing battle steed was rapidly closing the gap between them. Its rider was Panther Head Lin Chong. He had almost caught up when Gao Lian yelled for the drawbridge to be lowered, and clattered into the city with eight or nine of his escort. Lin Chong captured the rest.
Once inside, Gao Lian ordered the citizens to man the ramparts. Song Jiang and Lin Chong had annihilated virtually his entire army as well as all his Miracle soldiers.
The next day, Song Jiang's forces again surrounded the city. "Who'd have thought he'd foil the magic I studied for years," Gao Lian said to himself. "What can I do?" He would have to dispatch men to neighboring prefectures to plead for aid.
Hastily, he penned notes to Dongchang and Kouzhou. "They're not far," he thought, "and the prefects in both received their appointments through my cousin. I'll request them to send reinforcements immediately." He dispatched two senior staff officers with the missives, letting them out through the west gates. They travelled west along the road at top speed.
The brigand leaders wanted to pursue them, but Wu Yong said: "Let them go. We'll use their own plan against them."
"What do you mean?" Song Jiang queried.
"They're very weak in the city in both officers and men, and they're begging for aid. We can have two of our columns pretend to be reinforcements and stage a mock battle with us on the road. Gao Lian will surely open the gates and come out to help them. That will be our chance to take the city. Meanwhile, we'll lure Gao Lian off onto a small path, and there we'll capture him."
Very pleased, Song Jiang directed Dai Zong to return to Mount Liangshan and fetch two columns of men and horses and have them approach the city separately.
Every night Gao Lian burned huge fires in the center of the city as a beacon and watched eagerly from the ramparts for his reinforcements. After several days, defenders on the walls observed a turmoil among Song Jiang's troops, though they didn't seem to be attacking. When this was reported to Gao Lian he quickly donned his armor and mounted the ramparts. He saw two columns of men and horses, their dust obscuring the sun, their shouts shaking the heavens, advancing rapidly. The brigand forces surrounding the city scattered at their approach.
Convinced that rescuers had arrived, Gao Lian mustered his forces. He opened the gates, and all charged out, dividing to join the fray.
When Gao Lian reached Song Jiang's position he saw the brigand leader, together with Hua Rong and Qin Ming galloping off along a path. Gao Lian and his men chased after them hotly. Suddenly, he heard cannon fire on the other side of the hill, and he grew suspicious. He and his unit turned around and started back. Gongs crashed on both sides of the path, and down the right slope came Lu Fang, and down the left slope came Guo Sheng, each leading five hundred men.
Gao Lian fled hurriedly, most of his escort already wiped out. When he got to the outskirts of the city he saw the banners of the men of Liangshan flying from its walls. No reinforcements were visible anywhere. Gao Lian ran with his broken remnants towards the mountains.
Before they had gone ten /i; a body of men and horses surged out from around a bend, headed by Sun Li, and blocked their road. "I've been waiting for you," Sun shouted. "Dismount and be bound!"
Gao Lian turned to go back. But from behind another unit appeared, with Zhu Tong in the lead. Both sides began closing in. With all roads cut, Gao Lian could only abandon his horse and scramble into the mountains on foot. His soldiers ran with him.
Frantically, Gao Lian mumbled an incantation and shouted: "Rise!" On a black cloud he floated as high as the hilltops. Then Gongsun rounded the slope and saw this. From his horse, he gazed towards the sky and uttered a few phrases. "Speed!" he cried, pointing his sword upwards.
Gao Lian plummeted to earth from his cloud. Lei Heng sped forward from the side. With one sweep of his halberd, he cut him in two.
Lei Heng carried Gao Lian's head as all went down the mountain. A messenger was dispatched to report the news to Song Jiang swiftly. Song Jiang pulled back his outlying troops and entered Gaotang. He ordered that the citizenry were not to be harmed, and had proclamations posted assuring them that their lives and property were safe.
Next, he went to release Lord Chai from prison. The warden, jailors and guards had all left. Only the prisoners themselves, about fifty in number, remained. Their fetters were removed.
But Lord Chai was not among them. Song Jiang was worried and puzzled. In one of the buildings he found the family of Chai Jin's uncle, in another the family of Chai Jin himself. They had been arrested in Cangzhou and imprisoned here together. Because of the continuous fighting, they had not been questioned.
Only Lord Chai could not be found. Wu Yong directed that the jailors and guards be summoned. One of them said: "I am Lin Ren, the warden of this prison. Prefect Gao Lian instructed me to keep Lord Chai in a separate cell and make sure he didn't escape. 'If luck goes against us,' Gao Lian said, 'finish him off.' Three days ago he ordered me to take Lord Chai out and kill him. I could see that he was a good man. I didn't have the heart. So I stalled. 'He's very ill,' I said. 'He's eight tenths gone already. There's no need to do anything.' But then they really put the pressure on me, so I said: 'Chai Jin's dead.' The prefect was busy fighting every day, and he had no time. But I was afraid he'd send people to check up. If they found Chai Jin, I'd be in for it. So yesterday I took him to a dry well in the rear courtyard, removed his fetters, and pushed him in to hide there. I don't know whether he's alive or dead."
Song Jiang hastily had Lin Ren lead him to the well. He peered down into its black maw, unable to fathom its depth. He called, but no one answered. A rope was lowered. It extended about ninety feet before touching bottom.
"He doesn't seem to be there," said Song Jiang, and tears rolled from his eyes.
"Don't upset yourself, Commander-in-Chief," urged Wu Yong. "We won't know until we send someone down to see."
Before the words were out of his mouth, Li Kui the Black Whirlwind pressed forward and shouted: "Let me go."
"Good," said Song Jiang. "You're the one who put him in his predicament. It's only right that you should repay."
Li Kui laughed. "I'm not afraid to go down. Just don't cut the rope."
"Don't be funny," said Wu Yong.
A long rope was tied to a large basket, a frame placed over the well mouth, and the rope slung over the frame. Li Kui stripped to the buff, grasped his battle axes, and sat in the basket, which was lowered into the well. Two copper bells were affixed to the upper portion of the rope.
Gradually, the basket reached bottom. Li Kui crawled out and felt around. He touched a heap of bones. "Father and mother," he cried. "What friggin thing is this?"
He continued groping. The well bottom was damp. There wasn't a dry place to set foot. Li Kui put his axes in the basket and felt around with both hands. The area was quite wide. Finally he touched a man, crouched in a puddle.
"Lord Chai," he exclaimed.
But the man didn't move. Li Kui put a hand in front of the man's face. Only faint breath was coming from his mouth.
"Thank Heaven and Earth," Li Kui said. "He can still be saved!"
He climbed into the basket and shook the bells. The others hauled him up. He emerged alone and told what he had found.
"Go down again and put Lord Chai in the basket," directed Song Jiang. "After we've got him out, we'll send the basket down for you."
"I had two tricks played on me at Jizhou, brother. I don't want this to be a third."
Song Jiang laughed. "Would I fool you? Go down, quickly."
Once more Li Kui got into the basket and descended into the well. On reaching bottom, he crawled out, carried Lord Chai over, put him in the basket, and rang the bells. Those above began pulling immediately. When the basket reached the top, everyone was delighted to see Lord Chai.
Song Jiang examined him. He had a gash on his forehead, the flesh on both legs had been beaten to a pulp, and his eyes were half open and half closed. He was a sorry sight. A doctor was called to treat him.
Li Kui was bellowing at the bottom of the well. Song Jiang ordered that basket be lowered and that he be pulled up. Li Kui was very angry when he reached the surface.
"You're no good, any of you," he raged. "Why didn't you send the basket down for me?"
"We were so worried about Lord Chai, we forgot," Song Jiang explained. "Please forgive us."
He ordered a cart for Chai Jin to lie on, and more than twenty others for the lord's family and that of his uncle, together with their valuables. He instructed Li Kui and Lei Heng to escort them to the Liangshan stronghold. He also directed that Gao Lian's entire household of thirty or forty, good and bad alike, be executed in the marketplace. The warden Lin Ren was rewarded. As much as possible of the riches in the prefecture's treasury and the grain in its granary, as well as Gao Lian's private property, were packed and carried off to the mountain fortress.
The brigand officers, high and low, left Gaotang and returned to Liangshan Marsh, troubling none of the prefectures and counties they passed through on the way. After several days, they reached the stronghold. In spite of his illness, Chai Jin got up and thanked Chao Gai, Song Jiang and the other leaders. Chao Gai ordered that a house be built near Song Jiang's residence on the summit for Lord Chai and his family.
All of the leaders were very pleased, for they had acquired two more commanders—Chai Jin and Tang Long. They banqueted in celebration. Of that, we'll say no more.

*

By then Dongchang and Kouzhou had heard that Gao Lian, prefect of Gaotang had been killed and that the city had fallen. They immediately dispatched written reports to the emperor. Officials who had escaped from Gaotang also brought news of this to the capital. Marshal Gao Qiu thus learned that his cousin had been slain.
At the fifth watch the next day he went to the imperial antehall and waited for the morning bell. Hundreds of officials in ceremonial robes thronged the inner hall, waiting to attend the audience. At the third section of the fifth watch, the emperor entered the imperial chamber. Three times the ceremonial staff tapped, and civil and military officials formed in separate ranks as the emperor seated himself on the throne.
"Let those with business present their petitions," intoned the chief of ceremonies.
Marshal Gao stepped forward and spoke: "Of late Chao Gai and Song Jiang, leaders of the bandits in Liangshan Marsh in Jizhou Prefecture, have committed a series of terrible crimes, plundering cities and robbing government granaries. In savage hordes they slaughtered government troops in Jizhou and ran riot in Jiangzhou and Wuweijun. Most recently, they wiped out the entire city of Gaotang and walked off with everything in the granary and treasury. They are like a canker in our vitals. If we don't quell them quickly they will grow so strong that we shall be unable to control them. I beseech Your Majesty to act."
The emperor was shocked. He ordered Gao to assemble an army, arrest the culprits, thoroughly purge the Marsh, and kill all such persons.
"We don't need a large army to deal with those petty outlaws. If Your Majesty will grant me a certain man, he will take care of them," said Gao.
"If you consider him so useful, he must be good. Have him go at once. Let us hear news of victory soon and we shall raise him in rank and reward him well. He will be given a high and important post."
"He is the direct descendant of Huyan Zan, the general from Hedong who won fame at the start of the dynasty. His name is Huyan Zhuo. He wields two steel rods and is a man of peerless courage. At present he is garrison commander of Runing Shire, and has under him many crack soldiers and brave officers. With the services of this man we can restore order to Liangshan Marsh. If given good officers and skilled troops and placed at their head, he will swiftly clean out the lair and return victorious."
The emperor directed the Council of Military Affairs to send an emissary to Runing immediately to fetch Huyan Zhuo. When the imperial court was concluded, Gao personally selected an official from the Council to serve as the emissary. He was sent forth that same day, and a time limit set for his return.
Huyan was conducting business in his military headquarters in Runing when an officer at the city gate entered and announced: "An emissary has come with an imperial edict ordering you, General, to the capital for a special mission."
With several prefectural officials Huyan went to the gate and conducted the emissary to military headquarters. Huyan read the edict and had a feast laid for the emissary. Then he donned his helmet and armor, saddled his horse and gathered his weapons, and left Runing with an escort of thirty or forty. They travelled through the night and soon reached the capital after an uneventful journey. Huyan Zhuo dismounted before the Chancellery of Imperial Defense and went in to see Marshal Gao.
Gao Qiu was holding court. The gate-keeper announced: "Huyan Zhuo, summoned from Runing, is at the gate." Very pleased, Gao directed that he be brought in. After asking Huyan solicitously about himself, Gao rewarded him.
Early the next day, Gao presented Huyan to their sovereign. The emperor could see that he was no ordinary man, and the imperial countenance smiled. He presented Huyan with a fine horse known as the Ebony Steed Which Treads in Snow. Pitch black in color except for snowy white hoofs, it could cover a thousand //in a single day. This beast was given to Huyan as his mount.
After thanking the emperor, Huyan Zhuo returned with Gao Qiu to the chancellery, where they discussed how to take Liangshan Marsh.
"I've spied out that place, Your Excellency," said Huyan. "They've many officers and men, and they're well equipped with fine horses and weapons. An adversary not to be despised. But I have two men I can guarantee to lead my vanguard, while I follow with our main force. We definitely will win a great victory."
Gao was delighted. "Who're these men?" he asked. And because of the 2 Huyan guaranteed, the mountain citadel added fresh wings, and the fighters of mount Liang Marsh smashed the government hosts. Truly, though their names were never inscribed in the Imperial Commendation Records, they were registered in the rolls of Fraternity Hall.

Now here is what the Blessed Sage said to Taoist Gongsun: "My son, you have studied magic. You can match Gao Lian. I am going to reveal to you the orthodox technique of the Five Thunders. Following this method it is possible to rescue Song Jiang, protect the country and pacify the people, and perform heaven's will. Do not become entangled in human desires and neglect the great task, concentrate on following the essence of Taoist practice which you have learnt. As for your mother, I will send someone morning and evening to see that she is all right, so have no sad thoughts about her. I know that you are one of the stars from the upper regions of heaven, and that is why I give you leave to go and assist Song Jiang. I have this eight character verse which you must have in mind if you are to avoid future mistakes." Here is the verse the Sage pronounced:

On encountering darkness halt,
Reaching Kaifeng turn back.

When Taoist Gongsun had humbly received the secret doctrine, the three of them bade farewell to the Blessed Sage and the other Taoists and went down the mountain. When they reached Taoist Gongsun's home he got together his priest's cloak, his two swords, his iron circlet, jade sceptre and other religious objects and bade farewell to his mother and then off they went.
When they had gone some ten miles, the Magic Messenger said: "I shall go on ahead to let Song Jiang know, and you Father must continue along the road with Iron Ox. I'll return later to meet you."
"Right you are," said Taoist Gongsun. "We'll press on by ourselves."
"Mind you serve the father faithfully on the journey," the Magic Messenger commanded Iron Ox. "If there's any trouble I shall make sure that you regret it."
Iron Ox said: "He's got the same magic as the Blessed Sage. How could I dare not treat him with respect?"
The Magic Messenger tied on his amulets and raced on ahead, doing his magic walking.
As for Taoist Gongsun and Iron Ox, after leaving the Two Immortals Peak they took the main road and at evening sought accommodation for the night. Iron Ox, fearing Taoist Gongsun's magic, served him most attentively on the journey: he didn't dream of misbehaving! After travelling for three days they came to a place called Battle Knoll. Here they found a populous community and Taoist Gongsun said: "We've been travelling several days and we're tired. We'd better buy ourselves some non-alcoholic wine and some plain noodles before we go on."
"Hear hear," said Iron Ox.
They found a small inn beside the highway, so they went in and sat down. Taoist Gongsun took the place of honour, while Iron Ox removed his belt and sat down next to him. They called the waiter, to ask for wine and some vegetarian food.
"What kind of vegetarian snacks have you got?" Taoist Gongsun asked.
"We only sell wine and meat," the waiter said. "There isn't anything vegetarian. But they sell date cakes in the market."
"I'll go and buy some," Iron Ox said. He got some silver out of his pack and went off to the market, where he bought a bag of the date cakes. He was about to return when he heard the sound of applause somewhere off to one side, and cries of "What strength!" People were crowding round a big fellow who was putting on a performance with an iron hammer the size of a melon, to the admiration of the onlookers.
The man was very tall, with a pock-marked face and big scar on his nose. The hammer must have weighed something like thirty catties. The big fellow swung his hammer and "pow!" smashed it down into a paving stone, which was reduced to powder. The crowd applauded.
This was too much for Iron Ox. He tucked the date cakes inside his shirt and went to grab the hammer. "Who the fuck are you?" the big man shouted. "How dare you steal my hammer!"
"What's so fucking wonderful about what you're doing?" said Iron Ox. "What is there to get excited about? It offends my eyes! Let me show you how, just watch me for a bit!"
"I'll lend you the hammer," said the other. "But if you fail to lift it, I'll give you a good thrashing!"
Iron Ox took the hammer like someone picking up a marble. He swung it around for a bit and then gently put it down. He was not even flushed. His heartbeat was measured and his breathing unhurried. Seeing this, the other man threw himself down, and said: "Please tell me your name."
"Where do you live?" Iron Ox asked him.
"Just over there," the other answered. He led Iron Ox to a place with a locked door. He unlocked the door and invited Iron Ox in to sit down. The house was full of anvils and hammers, there was a furnace, forge, chisels and other tools of the trade. "This fellow must be a blacksmith," Iron Ox said to himself. "He'd be very useful to us in the stronghold. Why not persuade him to join?"
So Iron Ox said to the stranger: "Would you mind telling me your full name, sir?"
"My name is Tang Long. My father was an officer of the Yan'an garrison. Because he could work iron he happened to be of service to old Marshal Zhong and was employed on his staff. A little while back my father passed away up there and I became addicted to gambling and fell into the way of the rivers and lakes, which is why I come to be here and spend my time working as a smith. I am passionately fond of spear and staff play. Because I am covered in these pock marks people call me Spots. May I ask what your name is?"
"I am Li Kui, the Black Whirlwind, from the Marshes of Mount Liang," said Iron Ox.
Spots prostrated himself all over again, and said: "I have heard so much about you. I never expected to meet you here today!"
"How will you ever make a career for yourself here?" said Iron Ox. "Wouldn't it be better to go with me and join the band on Mount Liang? We'd make you one of the leaders."
Spots said: "If you're really willing to take me with you, I would do anything for you." So saying he prostrated himself to Iron Ox as to an elder brother, while the latter accepted him as younger brother.
"I have no family or other ties," Spots said. "Why don't we go into town and have a few cups of wine together, to celebrate our becoming brothers? We can rest tonight and start early tomorrow."
"I've got this priest at an inn up the road," said Iron Ox. "He's waiting for me to bring him some date cakes to eat before we go on. We can't waste any time. As soon as possible we must continue our journey."
"Why are you in such a hurry?" Spots asked.
"It's like this, our leader Song Jiang right now is attacking Gaotang and he is waiting for us to take this priest back to lend a hand."
"Who is he then, this priest?" Spots asked.

Iron Ox said: "Don't ask so many questions. Pack your bags quickly and let's go!"
Spots hurriedly tied his bundle, got some silver for travelling expenses, donned a hat, buckled on a sword, grabbed a halberd, abandoned his tumbledown old house with its rough furnishings and accompanied Iron Ox to the inn where Taoist Gongsun was waiting.
"Why have you been so long?" Taoist Gongsun grumbled. "If you're going to waste so much time, I shall go back home."
Iron Ox dared not answer back. He presented Spots and explained how they had become brothers. When he heard that Spots was a blacksmith, Taoist Gongsun was mollified. Iron Ox got out the date cakes and told the waiter to serve them. After drinking several cups and eating the date cakes, they called for the bill. Iron Ox and Spots shouldered their packs and with Taoist Gongsun left Battle Knoll and took the road for Gaotang. Early one morning, after three stops and two full days of travel, they saw the Magic Messenger coming to meet them. Taoist Gongsun was very pleased and quickly asked: "How has the battle been going?"
The Magic Messenger said: "That bastard Gao Lian has recovered from the arrow wound. Every day he marches out and issues a challenge. Song Jiang stands firm and doesn't venture forth."
"We shall be all right then," said Taoist Gongsun.
Iron Ox presented Spots to the Magic Messenger and explained all about him. The four then hurried on to Gaotang. When they were just over a mile from the camp, the Little Duke and the Halberdier came out to meet them with a hundred cavalry and some extra horses. The four mounted and rode into the camp where they found Song Jiang and the Professor awaiting them. After the greetings, a celebratory wine was served, questions were asked and answered, and then they were invited into the command tent where there was a banquet for all the leaders. Iron Ox presented Spots to Song Jiang, the Professor and all the rest. After courtesies had been exchanged the whole camp settled down to feasting.
Next day in the command tent Song Jiang, the Professor and Taoist Gongsun discussed how to defeat Gaotang. Taoist Gongsun said: "You must give the order to strike camp and advance. We'll see what the enemy does, but don't worry, I have a plan."
The same day Song Jiang spread word throughout the camp that everyone was to muster their troops and advance on Gaotang. They pitched camp again beneath the walls. After an early breakfast, they armed themselves. The three leaders rode out in front of the army, and with banners waving, drums beating, men cheering and gongs sounding, they bore down on the city.
Inside the city Governor Gao Lian had been recovering from his arrow wound. That night a soldier reported that Song Jiang's army was on the march. At dawn next day the Governor put on his armour, had the city gates opened and the drawbridge lowered, and marched out of the city to encounter the enemy, with his three hundred Celestial guards and all his officers. As the two armies drew close enough for the banners and drums of the other side to be clearly seen, the ranks deployed in battle formation. On either side special drums were beaten and many-coloured banners waved.
Ten riders now detached themselves from Song Jiang's ranks in a V formation. On his left wing were five leaders: Colonel Hua, Thunderclap, Whiskers, Golden Wings and the Little Duke, on the right another five, namely Leopard's Head, Colonel Sun, Redeye, the Flautist and the Halberdier. Three horsemen remained in the centre, the chief of them the commander-in-chief Song Jiang. He was dressed like this:
On his head a cloth of alizarin red, his waist girt with an outlandish belt with lion's head clasp. His brocade military robe has a big eagle on the back, his burnished helmet has a brilliant phoenix in flight on the brim. Green boots tread jewelled stirrups, gold armour shines like the rippling scales of a dragon. His gilt saddle flap consorts with the purple silk whip; the embroidered saddle cloth perfectly matches his horse, which is dappled like peach blossom.
The rider on Song Jiang's left was the chief military adviser of Mount Liang, Professor Wu Yong, and on his right was the deputy military adviser, Taoist Gongsun. Together the three commanders rode out in front of their troops.
On the other side Governor Gao Lian also rode out in front and in stentorian tones roared out: "Now listen here, you bunch of swamp-dwelling ruffians, since you've come here to seek us out, there's got to be victory and defeat, there's got to be a winner and a loser, the one who turns tail is no man!"
Song Jiang's response was to shout: "Who will take that bastard for me and cut his head off?"
Immediately the Archer, Colonel Hua, levelled his lance and urged his horse forward, charging into action. Gao Lian in turn shouted: "Who will capture that bandit for me?"
Someone rode out from a group of staff officers, waving a pair of sabres and mounted on a fiery horse. He charged into action to encounter Colonel Hua. There in front of the armies they fought several bouts, till Colonel Hua suddenly turned his horse and fled back towards his own side. His opponent did not realize it was a trick. Giving his horse its head and brandishing his sabres he galloped in pursuit. Colonel Hua deliberately reined in his horse, took his bow and arrows, and twisting in the saddle loosed a shaft which sent his pursuer tumbling head over heels from his horse. A cry arose from the watching armies on both sides.
Gao Lian was enraged. He hurriedly grasped the special brass shield for calling out wild beasts which hung from the pommel of his saddle, and took a firm grip of his sword. He knocked three times on the shield and from among the ranks of the Celestial guards a cloud of yellow sand arose engulfing everything so that the sky was veiled and the earth grew dark and the sun's brightness was extinguished. A great cry arose as this cloud of yellow sand spewed forth jackals, wolves, tigers, leopards, together with divers unknown beasts and poisonous reptiles. All the troops naturally fled.
Taoist Gongsun, however, grasping his famous sword, with its ancient pattern of pine trees, faced the enemy forces and pointed as he pronounced a muttered spell, climaxing in a shout of: "Chrrr!" Immediately a golden ray shot out and the whole pack of strange beasts and venomous reptiles fell back writhing and squirming into the cloud of yellow sand in front of the armies. The soldiers were now able to observe that they were all white paper cut-outs. The cloud of sand also subsided and vanished. Song Jiang now pointed with his whip stock and the three wings of his army charged forward together. Soldiers died and horses fell, the standards were scattered. Gao Lian hastily withdrew his Celestial guards into the city. Song Jiang's troops pursued them to the city walls, but the drawbridge was quickly drawn up and the gates closed, while blocks of wood and ballista missiles poured down on them like rain. On Song Jiang's orders, a gong sounded the order for his troops to return to camp. Numbers were counted and a great victory was celebrated. Back in the tents praise and thanks were given for the magic powers and virtue of Taoist Gongsun, and the army was rewarded.
Next day the army, in four divisions, mounted a furious attack on the town from every side. Taoist Gongsun said to the other two leaders: "Although we destroyed the greater part of their forces yesterday, the three hundred Celestial guards evidently managed to retreat into the town. If we press them hard today the buggers will undoubtedly try to steal into our camp by night. This evening we must take up a position somewhere. At night we'll pull out our forces after dark, and lay an ambush in four separate groups. We'll build false defences. All the commanders are to wait till they hear a loud report and see fires within the camp and then attack."
Orders were given accordingly. The attack was continued until midday, and then the troops on all four sides returned to camp, where there was music and feasting. As night began to fall, the leaders quietly led their separate forces away and set up the ambush all around.
Song Jiang, the Professor, Taoist Gongsun, Colonel Hua, Thunderclap, the Little Duke and the Halberdier waited on top of a small rise. At nightfall Gao Lian had, as expected, assembled his three hundred Celestial guards each carrying an iron gourd filled with sulphur and brimstone, gunpowder and explosive materials. Each man also carried a hook, an iron broom, and a reed whistle between his teeth. Some time before midnight the city gates were opened, the drawbridge lowered, and with Gao Lian leading them the Celestial guards, followed by another three hundred cavalry, went into action. When they were close to the camp, Gao Lian made a magic signal: a black cloud enveloped the sky and a violent wind arose, flinging sand and stones about and shaking the earth to its very foundations. The Celestial guards took out their tinder-boxes and lit the touch-papers at the mouth of the iron gourds, blew a blast on their whistles and amid the darkness, their bodies masked by the blaze, with swords and axes whirling, swept into the camp.
Taoist Gongsun on top of the hill made magic with his sword and a clap of thunder rang out across the whole flat area of the camp. The three hundred Celestial guards recoiled in dismay. The empty camp was now alive with flickering lights, casting a red glow everywhere. There was no way of escape. The troops lying in ambush on every side closed in. Surrounded as they were by the stockade and darkness, not one of the three hundred Celestial guards got away. All died there in the camp.
Gao Lian with some three hundred cavalry raced back to the city. Some troops were in close pursuit. This was Leopard's Head Lin Chong's force. Seeing the pursuers were so close behind, the drawbridge was raised in a hurry. Only eight or nine horsemen got back into the city with Gao Lian. The rest were taken alive by Leopard's Head and his men. Back in the city Gao Lian ordered the citizens onto the battlements to defend it. His army, including the Celestial guards, had been wiped out by Song Jiang and Leopard's Head.
Next day Song Jiang was quick to deploy his troops around the city again. Gao Lian said to himself: "All those years I spent studying magic, who'd have thought they could defeat me! What am I going to do now? My only hope is to send someone to request help from the neighbouring districts." He hastily composed two letters and sent them to two cities that were not far off, whose governors had both been preferred by his brother. He asked them to come by night with troops to reinforce him. Two aides-de-camp were entrusted with the letters, the west gate was opened and they galloped off on the road westwards.
When the commanders of the besieging force wanted to pursue them, the Professor said: "Let them go. We'll match their plan with one of our own."
"How do you propose to do that?" Song Jiang asked.
"The forces within the city are greatly reduced in numbers. That is why they are sending for help. We can use two detachments of our own troops to play the part of a relieving force, caught up in a fight with us on their way to the city. Gao Lian will naturally open the gates and come to their assistance. This will give us the opportunity to take the city and also to entice Gao Lian onto a narrow path where we can capture him."
This was all greatly to Song Jiang's liking. He told the Magic Messenger to return to Mount Liang and form two detachments of troops, with instructions to approach separately.
Now every day Gao Lian was having sticks piled up in an open space in the city and lit as a signal bonfire. In the city they were continually on the lookout for a relieving force. After a few days the sentries on the city walls saw confused fighting in Song Jiang's lines and immediately reported it. Gao Lian hurriedly armed himself and went up onto the battlements to look. He saw two columns of troops advancing, raising a cloud of dust that cloaked the sun and wildly cheering, whilst the besieging troops fled in all directions. Gao Lian decided it must be that two relief columns had arrived. He quickly ordered the gates to be opened and the defending troops sallied forth, dividing in pursuit of the enemy.
When Gao Lian ran into Song Jiang's army, he saw the latter with Colonel Hua and Thunderclap riding away down a small path. He immediately gave chase. But when he suddenly heard a string of explosions, he began to suspect something. He ordered his troops to turn back. Gongs began to sound on either side. On the left the Little Duke came down, on the right the Halberdier, each with five hundred troops. Gao Lian tried to flee but the greater part of his troops were destroyed.
When Gao Lian fled from the thick of the battle, it was only to find that the banners of Mount Liang were now flying over the city walls. Raising his eyes for a second look, he noted that there was no sign whatsoever of a relieving force. His only resort now was to lead the remnants of his army away into the mountains by a small lonely path. But had barely gone three miles when a troop of men and riders led by Colonel Sun appeared from behind the mountain and barred the way. "We've been waiting a long time for you!" Colonel Sun shouted. "Dismount and allow us to tie you up!"
Gao Lian tried to turn back, but there was another body of troops barring the way behind him. The leader of these was Whiskers. Trapped between these two forces, with every escape route blocked, Gao Lian could only abandon his horse and flee up the mountain. From all sides now his opponents pursued him over the mountainside. Gao Lian desperately gabbled a spell and shouted "Rise!" Immediately he began to ascend slowly into the sky on a black cloud, till he was level with the peak.
At this point Taoist Gongsun appeared on the side of the mountain. When he saw what was happening, he waved his sword towards the sky, muttered a spell and shouted: "Chrrr!" He pointed up with his sword and Gao Lian came crashing down out of his cloud. Immediately Sergeant Lei rushed over and cut him in two with one blow of the halberd.
Thus did this wretched governor learn the illusory nature of power, like the man who awoke from a dream of glory to find he had been lording it over an anthill:

Heaven's scrutiny can't be fooled.
By the powers of Earth be ruled.
The law should be observed:
The spirits must be served.
The cruel are cruelly rent,
The despot's power is spent.
Be on the look-out all your life,
For hardship, danger and strife.

Sergeant Lei picked up the head and they all trooped back down the mountain. First they sent an urgent message to the commander-in-chief. When Song Jiang heard that Gao Lian was dead he marshalled his forces and marched into Gaotang. Orders were first issued not to harm the people. Peace was declared, and a total amnesty. Then they went to the gaol to rescue Mr. Chai. The chief gaoler and all his staff had fled by this time and only some forty or fifty convicts remained. They all had their cangues removed and were set free. But there was no sign of Mr. Chai among them. Song Jiang was extremely anxious. Then in a detention room he came upon all the family of Mr. Chai's cousin, Chai Huangcheng. In another cell he found all the members of Mr. Chai's family who had been brought from his home province and locked up there. Because the fighting had been continuous for several days, they had not yet been questioned or dealt with. But he could find no trace of Mr. Chai.
The Professor had the Gaotang gaolers rounded up and questioned. Among them was one who said: "I am Lin Ren, a warder from the prison. The day before yesterday His Excellency Governor Gao Lian gave orders for Chai Jin to be locked up under tight security, lest he should escape. The order said: 'If anything goes wrong you must put him to death.' Three days ago the Governor wanted to take Chai Jin away for execution. I could see he was a good man and I did not want to do it. So I got out of it by saying: 'The man is seriously ill; the execution cannot be carried out.' Later when they put even more pressure on me, I reported that Chai Jin was dead. Because of the continual fighting the Governor had no time to check up, but I was afraid he would send someone to do so and my crime would be discovered, so yesterday I took Chai Jin to a dried-up well at the back of the prison. I removed his cangue and told him to hide in the well. I don't know whether he is still alive or not."
Song Jiang told this warder to take him there at once. They found the dry well behind the prison and looked down it. It was pitch black and it was impossible to say how deep it was. They shouted down, so anyone there should have heard. They lowered a rope to the bottom: it was over eighty feet deep. "Obviously Mr. Chai is long since dead," Song Jiang said. He shed tears.
"It's no use grieving, commander," said the Professor. "Who dares go down and investigate, to see if he's there or not?"
Before he'd even finished speaking, Iron Ox popped up and shouted: "Just let me go!"
"Good," said Song Jiang. "Since it was you who got him into trouble in the first place, it's fitting for you to make recompense."
Iron Ox merely laughed. "I'm not afraid of going down there," he said. "Only don't cut the rope!"
"What a joker you are," said the Professor.
They got a big bamboo basket and a thick rope, which was tied to a wooden frame, and then thrown into the well. Iron Ox stripped to the skin, took his two axes and sat in the basket while they lowered him. Two bells were attached to the rope.
Slowly Iron Ox descended to the bottom. He clambered out and started to feel about on the floor of the well. Presently he touched a pile of something. It was a skeleton. "Well, blow me!" he exclaimed. "What a fucking horrible place this is!"
As he went on feeling about, he found the bottom of the well to be soaking wet, with no firm ground to stand on. He threw his two axes into the basket and began to feel about with both hands. He stretched his arms out in all directions and eventually touched a human body huddled in a pool of water. "Mr. Chai!" Iron Ox shouted out. There was a slight movement. When he touched the body he seemed to hear a faint whisper. "Thank heavens, it seems as if it's still possible to save him!" he said. He climbed into the basket and shook the bell till they pulled him up.
When Iron Ox told them what he had found below, Song Jiang said: "You'll have to go down again and put Mr. Chai into the basket. We'll pull him up first and then lower the basket again for you."
"Listen," said Iron Ox. "I was made a fool of twice on the way to Jizhou. I hope this isn't going to be a third time someone plays a trick on me."
Song Jiang laughed. "Why should I play tricks on you? You get down there again, quickly." So Iron Ox had to get into the basket and go down the well again.
When he reached the bottom and clambered out, he lifted Mr. Chai bodily and put him in the basket. He gave a tug to the rope and those above hearing the bell began to haul on it. When the basket and its load reached the top, all were overjoyed. Chai Jin's head and face were swollen and cut and his legs coated in mud and he could not open his eyes. He was a sorry sight to behold, and Song Jiang implored the doctor to cure him.
Iron Ox, meanwhile, had been left bellowing at the bottom of the well. Song Jiang hurriedly ordered the basket to be lowered again to bring him up. When he rose to the surface Iron Ox indignantly exclaimed: "You're not very kind, all of you! You didn't want to send the basket down again for me!"
"We were too concerned about Mr. Chai," Song Jiang said. "That's why we forgot you. I'm sorry."
Song Jiang had them lay Mr. Chai in a cart. The two families went first, together with a lot of their possessions that had been recovered. Altogether there were more than twenty carts. He told Iron Ox and Sergeant Lei to guard and escort them to Mount Liang. Then he had Gao Lian's family, young and old, good and bad, thirty or forty people in all, executed in the market-place. The helpful warder Lin Ren was rewarded. The coffers and granaries of Gaotang, together with all stores of private wealth, were emptied and everything in them transported to the mountain. Then all the commanders left Gaotang and returned victorious to the Marshes of Mount Liang. They exacted no penalties whatsoever on the places they passed through. They travelled several days before reaching the stronghold.
Despite his weakness, Chai Jin got up to thank Chao Gai, Song Jiang and all the others. At Chao Gai's instance, another house was built on the summit, where Song Jiang had his residence, for Chai Jin and his family to live in. Everyone was pleased with this. Two new leaders, Chai Jin and Spots, had now been added to the company and a banquet was held to celebrate. Of this no more.
Meanwhile the news of Gao Lian's death and the fall of Gaotang to the rebels had reached the governors of the two neighbouring districts. They wrote to the Emperor. The fleeing Gaotang officials also arrived in the capital and recounted what had happened. Marshal Gao heard how his younger brother had been killed.
Next day before dawn Marshal Gao was up and awaiting the dawn bell in the court of the Waterclock. All the courtiers had assembled there in ceremonial dress to await the dawn audience. In the third drumbeat of the fifth watch the Emperor entered the hall. Three taps of the staff and the officials civil and military lined up in their ranks. When the Emperor was seated, the master of ceremonies called out: "If there are matters to report stand forth and declare them; if not, take leave and depart."
Accordingly, Marshal Gao came forward and said: "Recently in Jizhou the leaders of the Mount Liang bandits, Chao Gai and Song Jiang have been creating mayhem. They have plundered cities and robbed government stores. They have raised an army of ruffians who recently massacred the forces of Jizhou. They caused havoc in Jiangzhou and Wuweijun, and still more recently they wiped out Gaotang and made off with all the government stores. This activity poses a grave threat to internal security. If it is not dealt with soon, the rebel power will grow day by day, till it becomes difficult to control them. I beg Your Majesty to take action."
The Emperor was greatly perturbed by this report and handed down the following order: Marshal Gao was to pick commanders and deploy troops to eradicate the evil. The marshes were to be swept clean and total extermination effected.
Marshal Gao submitted: "To deal with a bunch of outlaws like these there is no need to raise a big army. I can do the job with just one man whom I shall recommend."
The Emperor said: "If it is someone appointed by you, I have no doubt that he will be excellent. Let him set off at once and return quickly with news of victory. He shall have promotion and an ample reward. He can expect to be given the highest responsibility."
Marshal Gao said: "The man I have in mind is from Hedong, and is a direct descendant of General Huyan Zan, who won fame at the founding of the dynasty. His name is Huyan Zhuo. He fights with two steel rods, and his valour is such that a thousand men cannot stand against him. He holds the position of military commander of Runing and has many brave soldiers and valiant officers under his command. This is the man I recommend for the pacification of Mount Liang. If he is given command of a force, with sufficient foot soldiers and cavalry and keen officers, he will in short order clean out that nest of bandits and return in triumph."
The Emperor graciously gave his consent and an imperial order was issued requiring the council to send a messenger immediately to summon Twin Rods, as he was popularly known. After the dawn audience Marshal Gao conferred with the council of ministers and appointed a military officer to bear the imperial order and deliver the summons. The man left the same day, bearing strict orders for Twin Rods to report to the capital without delay and receive his instructions.
Twin Rods was holding a meeting of his military council when the usher announced: "An imperial order is on its way, sir, requiring your presence in the capital to hear about an important assignment."
Twin Rods and his officers received the bearer of the imperial command at the city gate and invited him to the council chamber. When Twin Rods had read the edict he laid on a feast for the messenger. He hurriedly got together his helmet, armour, horse and weapons, and with a personal retinue of thirty or forty followers travelled non-stop to the capital.
Nothing of importance happened on the journey. Arriving in the capital he dismounted before the palace and sought out Marshal Gao. Gao the Ball was in session at the time. The usher called out: "Marshal Huyan Zhuo from Runing is here."
Marshal Gao was well pleased and called him in at once. This Twin Rods was a most striking figure:

Descendant of an official who helped found the dynasty, great great grandson of a famous general of the first emperor, he has inherited a truly miraculous technique with the rods; he is bold and experienced in battle. He would beard the tiger in its den with a bare sword, and flights of eagles are not beyond the reach of his arrows. This is the famous warrior who is nicknamed Twin Rods.

After the interview Marshal Gao rewarded him financially. Next morning at dawn he had an audience with the Emperor. The Emperor recognizing that this was someone quite out of the ordinary, looked upon him with a gracious smile and presented him with a "snowy-footed raven-hued steed," that is to say a horse black as an ink-stick, but with four white socks, as white as mourning sackcloth. That is why it is called a "snowy-footed raven-hued steed." It could do three hundred miles a day and was a personal gift of the Emperor's to Twin Rods.

Twin Rods expressed his thanks and then Marshal Gao took him back to the military council chamber to discuss matters relating to the raising of an army to annihilate Mount Liang.

Twin Rods said: "May I say something? According to my intelligence, the troops of Mount Liang are well led and have a high level of fighting skills. They should not be underestimated. I would like to recommend two officers to lead the attack. With their forces added to our own we can be certain of success."

Marshal Gao was glad to hear this. "Who is it you recommend then, to lead the attack?" he asked.

Now if Twin Rods had not recommended these two officers, things would have been different. As it was, important new leaders joined up in the Place of Many Meanderings, and in the Marshes of Mount Liang the government troops got a hiding. Although the two names may not appear on the imperial roll of honour, they are certainly good enough to grace the Assembly Hall of the Heroes.

"Disciple," said True Man Luo the Immortal, the spell you have learned is the same as Gao Lian, but I will now disclose to you the means of controlling thunder so that you can help Song Jiang to guard the country and pacify the people as an agent appointed by Heaven. You need not be anxious about your mother as I will see that she is well looked after. You are one of the stars of the constellation and therefore I let you go for some time. You must remember what I told you of the divine principles, and avoid being deceived by human desire, as this will upset your plans."

Gongsun Sheng kowtowed, and received the method for controlling thunder. He, Li Kui, and Dai Zong saluted Luo and the other priests there. They then went to Gongsun Sheng's home where he put on his traveling dress, took his double-edged sword, and after bidding adieu to his mother they all departed.

When they had walked about ten //Dai Zong said he would go in advance to Gaotang Prefecture, and announce their approach. Gongsun Sheng agreed to this, and promised that they would follow behind.

"On the road I want you to wait upon Gongsun Sheng," said Dai Zong to Li Kui. "You must also be careful to avoid all further trouble."

"He has the same magic power as Luo, so how dare I deceive him?" asked Li Kui.

Dai Zong then put on his enchanted puttees and vanished from sight.

Gongsun Sheng and Li Kui continued their way, and towards evening stopped at an inn. Li Kui had felt the great powers of Luo the Immortal and therefore he dared not display his temper, but waited upon Gongsun Sheng with every attention. On the third day they came to the town of Wugang where the streets were very crowded. As they were both tired Gongsun Sheng said they would get some vegetarian food at that market town. They entered a small inn at the side of the street, sat down, and ordered food from the waiter.

"What kind of vegetarian cakes have you?" asked Gongsun Sheng.

"We have only wine and meat," replied the waiter. "But at the entrance of the street you can get cakes made with dates."

"I will go and buy the cakes," said Li Kui. He went and after purchasing the food was on his way back to the inn when he heard the applause, "How strong!" Looking round Li Kui saw a big crowd round a very big man who was holding a heavy iron hammer with a head as big as a watermelon. His face was pock-marked. The hammer, Li Kui thought, must have weighed about thirty jin. The man swung it round, and brought it down on a stone in the street, and broke the latter into small bits. The crowd applauded this exhibition of strength, but Li Kui did not think it amounted to much. So putting the cakes in his breast he stepped forward, and took hold of the hammer.

"What are you doing? Who are you?" asked the owner.

"These people applaud you, but what for?" asked Li Kui. "It does not seem very wonderful. You just watch me do it."

"You may try," said the man, "but if you fail the penalty will be a blow from my fist."

Li Kui lifted the hammer, and after whirling it round his head brought it down on the ground lightly and with ease. His face was not red, his heart did not palpitate, and his breathing was regular. He looked quite cool and collected.

The tall man seeing this, saluted, and asked for his name.

"Where do you come from?" asked Li Kui.

"I live just opposite," replied the man. He then conducted Li Kui to his home, and upon reaching the house he unlocked the door, and asked Li Kui to be seated. Li Kui noticed that the room contained all kinds of implements of a blacksmith, a hammer, a stove, tongs, steel punches, and so on. He thought that the man must be a blacksmith, and as they had no such person at their stronghold it would be a good thing to invite this man to join them. He asked the man his name.

"I am Tang Long, and my father was a military official at Yanan Prefecture, Shaanxi province. This year my father died, and through gambling I have lost all the money. I work here as a blacksmith, and like to practice the use of lance and stick. Because of my pock-marked face the people call me the 'Cash Marked Leopard.' I beg to ask for your honorable name."

Li Kui told him, and also that he came from Liangshan Marsh. Upon hearing this the man saluted, and said he had heard of Li Kui's fame, and was very fortunate to meet such a hero. Then Li Kui suggested that he should go with him to Liangshan Marsh, and join the bandits there. The man agreed to this at once. Li Kui then asked him to go with him to the inn to be introduced to Gongsun Sheng. The man got a few things together, and left his house to follow Li Kui.

Upon reaching the inn Li Kui duly introduced the new partner, and explained fully how they had met. After a meal together they three all started on their journey. When near their destination they met Dai Zong, and Gongsun Sheng inquired whether there had been any more fighting.

"Gao Lian's wound is nearly healed now," replied Dai Zong, "and every day there is fighting. Song Jiang has been acting merely on the defensive awaiting your arrival."

The four men then went on their way to Gaotang Prefecture, and soon reached the bandits' camp. There Tang Long was introduced, and duly joined the brigands. They were all pleased to see Gongsun Sheng.

The next day there was a general council held of all the leaders to discuss their future plans. Gongsun Sheng said that orders could be issued for a general advance on Gaotang Prefecture. He would go and see what the opposing army was doing. The next day the bandits all moved forward fully equipped, with flying banners, rolling of drums, and clash of gongs. Song Jiang, Wu Yong, and Gongsun Sheng rode in the front.

Gao Lian had been informed of the approach of the bandits, ordered his army to leave the town. The two bodies of fighting men soon met, and stood in ranks. There was a great display of banners, and a great noise of drums and gongs. Song Jiang and the two leaders advanced. Gao Lian was seated on his horse surrounded by about thirty officers with a large flag. As Song Jiang approached Gao Lian shouted, "You thieves! As you come here to fight I hope you won't run away this time when you are defeated. Running away does not look nice."

Song Jiang turned, and asked who would volunteer for a single combat. Hua Rong immediately set spurs to his horse, and dashed forward without saying a word.

Gao Lian also asked for a champion to meet Hua Rong and Xue Yuanhui dashed forward.

These two fought for a long time, and then Hua Rong retired. Immediately Xue Yuanhui pursued him, flourishing his sword. Hua Rong, however, got his bow, and turning round in his saddle shot an arrow which wounded Xue who fell off his horse. The troops applauded.

Gao Lian was very angry at this, and taking his copper plate from his saddle he beat it with his sword. Immediately a yellow cloud of dust arose, and obliterating the sunlight made the field quite dark. Out of the cloud now emerged all kinds of strange animals, tigers, leopards, and insects. The troops shouted and moved forward. Gongsun Sheng however on his horse took his sword, and waving it towards the approaching troops called out, "Go!" A flash of light emerged from his sword, and meeting the weird animals they all fell down. The assembled troops now saw that these animals had only been made of paper as they were all consumed by the flame. The yellow cloud of dust also disappeared.

Song Jiang now ordered his men to charge, and they meeting the opposing troops entered into conflict. It was soon over and Gao Lian and his troops retreated into the town. When Song Jiang came up they found the bridge drawn up, and the town gate closed, and the troops on the wall shower stones and blocks of wood on them. Song Jiang then gave the signal for his men to withdraw, and slowly they returned to their camping ground. The men were rewarded for the victory and Gongsun Sheng was loudly praised.

The next day the bandits surrounded the town on all sides. Gongsun Sheng said to Song Jiang and Wu Yong, "Yesterday we defeated more than half of the opposing army, hut we did not touch the bodyguard of Gao Lian. Today we must attack with great force. Tonight they will probably attack our camp so we will leave the camp deserted, and station our troops at other points all round. We must instruct our men to remain quiet until they hear a clap of thunder and see a large flame in the camp when they must rush towards the camp."

Orders were given accordingly, and in the afternoon the brigands were withdrawn from the town, and were given a good feed in the camp. When it was dark the men were divided under their various leaders and all left the camp. Song Jiang, Gongsun Sheng, and several other leaders took up a position on a mound near the camp.

That night Gao Lian provided his bodyguard with iron gourds filled with saltpeter and gunpowder. Each man also had a hooked sickle, an iron broom, and a whistle. Near midnight the town gate was opened, and his men marched out. Gao Lian was on horseback, and used his magic spells. A strong wind sprung up which whirled stones and dust in all directions. The soldiers soon lit their gunpowder, blew their whistles, and advanced in the great confusion.

Gongsun Sheng now used his magic, and in the deserted camp there was a clap of thunder with many flashes of lightning. Gao Lian's troops saw that the camp was deserted, and being frightened by the spectacle they all tried to retreat. But they now found their way blocked by the bandits who attacked fiercely, and in the end not a single one of the three hundred troops was left alive. Gao Lian, however, had been able to get back to the town with about nine of his bodyguard of thirty men. Upon entering the gate he gave orders for the drawbridge to be raised and the gate closed. He then ordered all the people in the town to mount guard on the walls.

The next day Song Jiang surrounded the town with his bandits. Gao Lian considered that all his study of magic was of no avail as he had been thoroughly defeated. What could he do? He decided that the only thing left was to send to the surrounding districts, and ask for help. He wrote two letters accordingly and sent messengers with them. Both of the Prefects concerned had been appointed by his elder brother in the capital so he thought they could not refuse assistance.

Wu Yong saw the two messengers leave the town, but said, "We must not stop them, but let them go. We can make use of their plot to defeat them."

"What is your plan?" asked Song Jiang.

"Evidently there are very few soldiers in the town now," said Wu Yong, "and they are sending for reinforcements. We must get two squadrons of cavalry, and delude the people in the town that they are reinforcements for them. We must arrange for a sham battle, and let the supposed reinforcements win. Then Gao Lian will open the town gate and welcome them. When however he finds out his mistake he will probably try to leave the town by some means, and we must look out for him and capture him."

Song Jiang applauded this plot, and sent Dai Zong to Liangshan Marsh to bring two squadrons of cavalry.

Gao Lian had gathered a great deal of straw and grass to a vacant spot on the wall with the idea of burning this at night so as to guide the reenforcements should they arrive after dusk.

A few days afterwards the outposts reported to Gao Lian that the bandits were fighting against some troops. Gao Lian went to the observation post, and saw a large body of cavalry fighting against the brigands. Many bandits were on the grounds, and others were running away. Gao Lian considered that these were the reenforcements so he mustered his soldiers, had the city gates opened, and marched out his soldiers to attack the bandits. He saw Song Jiang, Hua Rong, and Qin Ming leaving the battlefield by a small side road. He advanced to pursue them but just then many gongs were sounded on a hill some distance away, and suspecting some trap he ordered a retreat. As he retreated he found that he was surrounded by brigands on his left and right who were closing in. He hastened his retreat, but about half of his men were cut off and taken prisoners. Looking towards the town he saw the brigands' flags flying there. He looked round for the supposed reinforcements, but could not see a single man. He, therefore, led his men towards a small hill to escape, but when near he saw a large body of brigands already there. He turned to try to find another way, but saw bandits on all sides. He dismounted his horse with the idea of going up the hillside on foot. He soon realized that he was being hemmed in again, and reciting a spell he caused a black cloud on which he mounted himself and ascended into the sky. Gongsun Sheng had however seen this, and uttering a spell he caused the cloud to descend bringing Gao Lian to the ground. There Gao Lian was attacked by Inspector Lei Heng who soon killed him. Upon receiving news of the death of Prefect Gao Lian, Song Jiang entered the town with his men, and issued an order that the people were not to be disturbed by his men nor anything looted. He then went to the city prison to release the prisoners, and found that all the jailers had left their posts and run away. He released about fifty prisoners without however finding any trace of Squire Chai Jin. In one cell, however, he found the family of Chai Jin's uncle, and then in another cell found all the family of Squire Chai Jin. As Gao Lian had very little spare time he had postponed cross-examining them until a later time. But Wu Yong had come across a turnkey in the prison who told him that some days ago before Prefect Gao Lian had given him the special duty of attending to the prisoner Squire Chai Jin, and had ordered him that in case of any disorder in the town he must kill Chai Jin at once. Three days before, Prefect Gao Lian had sent to the prison for Chai Jin to be executed. This turnkey thought Squire Chai Jin a fine type of man, and declined to carry out the order. But he sent a reply that Chai Jin had been killed. As he was afraid that further inquiry might be made he smuggled Squire Chai Jin out of the prison, and lowered him into a dry well. Upon hearing this Song Jiang went with the turnkey to the well. He looked down, but as it was quite dark he had no idea how deep it was. He called out, but got no reply. He then got a rope about 30 feet long and lowered it down the well. Again there was no result. Song Jiang considered that Squire Chai Jin was not there, and burst into tears. "Do not cry," said Wu Yong. "In order to make sure we must lower a man down the well."

Just then Li Kui came on the scene and offered to go down the well.

""As you have involved him in trouble," said Song Jiang, "you must make recompense for him."

"I will go down. I am not afraid," said Li Kui laughingly, "but don't cut the rope."

"That is a villainous thought," said Wu Yong. "Of course we shall not cut the rope."

A basket was obtained, and fastened to the end of the rope, a three-legged derrick was erected over the well with the rope running over the top. Li Kui got in the basket, and was slowly lowered down. Upon reaching the bottom Li Kui got out of the basket, and began to feel around in the dark. He felt some bones, and was rather upset by this. He however felt around, but found nothing. It was all mud and water. He again searched round and found a small hole in the side of the well, and there he felt a man. "Squire Chai Jin," he called out, but got no reply. He took hold of the man who was still breathing. "Thanks to Heaven and Earth, I have saved your life," said Li Kui. He took his seat in the basket; and rang a small bell that was fastened to the rope. The basket was pulled up, and upon reaching the top he explained that Squire Chai Jin had been found.

"Then you must go down again, and send Squire Chai Jin up first," said Song Jiang.

"When I went to Jizhou I was deceived twice, so that today I do not want to be fooled again," said Li Kui.

"We certainly will not fool you," said Song Jiang. "You quickly go down."

Li Kui went down again, placed Squire Chai Jin in the basket, and rang the bell on the rope. The basket was pulled up, and everybody was pleased to see Squire Chai Jin again. He was almost unconscious, had big wounds on his thigh and head. A doctor was sent for at once.

Li Kui thought they had forgotten him, and shouted loudly. Song Jiang hearing this, had the basket lowered and they soon brought Li Kui up in the basket. Upon getting to the top, Li Kui was angry. He said, "You people are bad! Why didn't you lower the basket for me at once?"

"We saw that Squire Chai Jin was very badly wounded, and for the moment forgot about you. Please excuse us," said Song Jiang.

A cart was obtained and Squire Chai Jin was laid down in it. Others were obtained for Chai Jin's relatives and altogether about twenty carts, set off for Liangshan Marsh. On the way the bandits did not trouble the people. Within a few days Squire Chai Jin recovered and was given quarters near Song Jiang's at Liangshan Marsh.

The victory of the bandits under Song Jiang was duly reported by the Prefects of Dongchang and Kouzhou to the minister at the Eastern Capital. Marshal Gao Qiu of the Imperial Guard learned that his cousin Prefect Gao Lian had been defeated and killed by the bandits. Early the next morning before dawn, he went to the palace to have an audience with the Emperor. There were many ministers and high officials also waiting for the audience. About half past 4 A.M. the Emperor appeared, and took his seat on the throne. An official called out, "Those who have business may now speak. If there is no business His Imperial Majesty will retire."

Gao Qiu stepped out of the ranks of the standing officials, and addressed the throne: "At Mount Liang Marsh in Jizhou, there's a strong company of bandits under Song Jiang and Chao Gai. They've ravaged the surrounding country, done great damage to the people, and their property. This is a vile state of affairs. If they aren't suppressed, I'm afraid the province will be in danger. I await Your Majesty's order." The Emperor was surprised at the news, and issued a decree that Gao Qiu use all the necessary military forces to suppress the bandits at once. Marshal Gao Qiu decided to send to Runing Prefecture in Henan province for a famous general named Huyan Zhuo to take charge of the expedition, and the Imperial edict was issued accordingly. Upon that man's arrival the Emperor presented him with a black horse. Gao Qiu and Huyan Zhuo then discussed details and the latter recommended 2 other generals to assist him.

Merit should be comprehended,
Virtue entered honors list.

153

Marshal Gao Raises a 3-Column Army Troop & finds himself 3 commanders; Twin Rods Huyan Zhuo Deploys his linked Armoured Cavalry

"I've in mind a district garrison commander in Chenzhou, a man named Han Tao," said Huyan. "Originally he's from the Eastern Capital. He's passed the Second Degree Military Examination and wields a datewood lance eighteen feet long. Everyone calls him the Ever-Victorious General. He can lead the vanguard. The other man I want is a district garrison commander in Yingzhou. His name is Peng Qi, and he also hails from the Eastern Capital. His family have been military people for generations. He uses a three-pointed two-edged lance. His skill with weapons is extraordinary, and he's known as the Eyes of Heaven General. This man can be second in command."

Marshal Gao was very pleased. "With Han and Peng in the van, we need have no fears about those impudent bandits," he exclaimed.

He wrote out two summonses and directed the Chancellery of Imperial Defense to dispatch messengers from the Council of Military Affairs with them immediately to Chenzhou and Yingzhou to fetch Han and Peng. In less than ten days the garrison commanders arrived in the capital. They went directly to the chancellery and presented themselves to Gao and Huyan.

The next day Gao and his entourage went to the training ground and watched imperial troops practicing and drilling. Then Gao returned to the Chancellery and conferred with the Council of Military Affairs on important matters of military strategy.

He asked Huyan and Han and Peng: "How many men have the three of you together?"

"About five thousand cavalry," said Huyan. "Ten thousand, if you include the infantry."

"Go back to your respective cities and pick three thousand of your best cavalry and five thousand foot soldiers. Assemble, set forth, and clean out Liangshan Marsh."

"Our cavalry and infantry are crack troops," said Huyan. "Both men and horses are in fine fettle. Your Excellency need have no worry about them. But we're short of clothing and armor. We don't want to cause delay and inconvenience, but we must request more time to prepare."

"If that's the case, go to the capital armory and pick out as much as you need in the way of clothing, armor, helmets and weapons. I'll issue the order now. We want your forces well equipped so that they can cope with the enemy. The day you're ready to march I'll send officials to check you over."

Huyan took the order and went with some of his people to the armory. There he selected three thousand sets of steel armor, five thousand sets of horsehide armor, three thousand bronze and iron helmets, two thousand pikes, one thousand swords, countless bows and arrows, and over five hundred cannon, and loaded them all onto carts. The day the three men were leaving the capital Gao issued them three thousand battle chargers and all the grain their forces would require, and gave them personal gifts of gold and silver, silks and satins.

Huyan, Han Tao and Peng Qi submitted written guarantees of victory, and took their leave of Marshal Gao and officials from the Council of Military Affairs.

They mounted their horses and rode back to Runing. The journey was uneventful. When they arrived, Huyan directed Han Tao and Peng Qi to return to their respective cities, raise their armies and bring them to Runing.

In less than half a month the three columns were complete. Huyan issued the equipment he had drawn from the imperial armory—clothing, armor, helmets, swords, pikes and saddles. He also had chainmail made, plus various other items of military ware, and distributed these as well among the three columns.
They were ready to go. Gao sent two officials from his chancellery to review them. The officials handsomely rewarded the three commanders, and Huyan marched forth with his three columns. Han Tao led the van, Huyan commanded the main force in the middle, Peng Qi and his men brought up the rear. The three columns of infantry and cavalry were a splendid sight as they hastened grimly towards Liangshan Marsh.

To the mountain stronghold came a far-posted scout with a report of the approaching troops. Chao Gai and Song Jiang, together with Military Advisor Wu Yong, magic expert Gongsun Sheng, and the various other chieftains had been feasting daily in celebration with Chai Jin. When they heard that Two Rods Huyan Zhuo of Runing was leading an army of infantry and cavalry to attack, they conferred on strategy.
"I've heard of him," said Wu Yong. "He's a direct descendant of Huyan Zan, the general from Hedong who helped establish the dynasty. His skill with weapons is superb. When he wields those two steel rods of his no one can come near him. We must use our most competent and courageous officers. To capture him we'll have to apply first force and second guile."
Before the words were out of his mouth, Black Whirlwind Li Kui spoke up. "I'll nab the wretch for you!"
"You'd never do it," said Song Jiang. "I have a plan of my own. We'll ask Qin Ming the Thunderbolt to fight the first bout, Panther Head Lin Chong the second, Hua Rong the third, Ten Feet of Steel the fourth, and Sickly General Sun Li the fifth. These bouts must come one right after the next, like the spokes of a spinning wheel. I myself will head ten brothers who will command our main divisions. On the left will be Zhu Tong, Lei Heng, Mu Hong, Huang Xin and Lu Fang. On the right will be Yang Xiong, Shi Xiu, Ou Peng, Ma Lin and Guo Sheng. Our water approaches will be defended by boats under the command of Li Jun, Zhang Heng, Zhang Shun and the three Ruan brothers. Li Kui and Yang Lin will lead two columns of infantry and lie in ambush as reinforcements."
Shortly thereafter, Qin Ming went down the mountain with a unit of men and horses. They set up a battle position on a broad plain.
Although it was already winter, the weather was pleasantly warm. The next day, they saw in the distance the approaching government troops. The van, led by Ever-Victorious General Han Tao, made camp and built surrounding palisades. There was no fighting that night.
The two armies faced each other at dawn the following day. Horns blared, and the thunder of drums shook the heavens. On Song Jiang's side Qin Ming the Thunderbolt rode forth from the arch of pennants, his wolf-toothed mace athwart his mount. On the opposite side at the arch of pennants appeared Han Tao, leader of the van. Holding his lance crosswise, he gave his horse rein and shouted at his foe.
"We heavenly hosts have arrived! But instead of surrendering, you dare to resist! You're asking to die! I'll fill in your Marsh and pulverise your Mount Liangshan! I'll capture you rebellious bandits, take you to the capital, and have you smashed to bits!"
Qin Ming was a hot tempered man. Without a word, he clapped his steed, and rode straight at Han Tao, flourishing his mace. Han Tao kicked up his horse, levelled his lance, and galloped to meet him. They fought over twenty rounds, and Han Tao began to weaken. He turned to go. From behind him came Huyan Zhuo, commander of the main contingent. He saw that Han Tao was being bested, and he charged forth on the snowy-hoofed black steed the emperor had given him, roaring and waving his steel rods.
Qin Ming recognized him, and prepared to do battle. But Lin Chong the Panther Head cantered up, calling: "Rest a while, commander. Let me go three hundred rounds with this fellow, then we'll see."
Lin Chong levelled his serpent-decorated lance and charged Huyan. Qin Ming wheeled his mount to the left and rode out of sight behind a bend. The new adversaries were evenly matched. The lance and rods interwove in flowery patterns for more than fifty rounds, but neither man could vanquish the other.
Hua Rong appeared for the third bout. At the entrance to the field of combat he called: "Rest a while, General Lin. Watch me capture the lout."
Panther Head turned his horse and departed. Huyan had seen enough of his high-powered use of weapons. He let him go and returned to his own position, while Lin Chong disappeared around a bend with his men. Huyan was already among his rear column when Hua Rong emerged with lance at the level. Peng Qi the Eyes of Heaven General, astride a glossy brown piebald that could run a thousand //in a day, rode towards Hua Rong. Holding crosswise his three-pointed, two edged, four-holed, eight-ringed weapon, Peng shouted: "Traitorous robber! You're devoid of all morality! Let's fight this one to a finish!"
Hua Rong was furious. Without a word, he clashed with Peng Qi.
More than twenty rounds they battled. Huyan could see that Peng was weakening. He gave his horse rein and engaged Hua Rong.
Before they had fought three rounds, the girl warrior Ten Feet of Steel rode out for the fourth round. "Rest a while, General Hua," she cried. "Watch me take this oaf!"
Hua Rong led his contingent off to the right and departed round a bend. Even before the battle between Peng Qi and Ten Feet of Steel approached a decisive stage, Sun Li the Sickly General, who would fight the fifth bout, had already arrived. He had reined his horse at the edge of the field of combat and was watching the two contestants.
They fought in a cloud of dust with murderous intensity, one with a long-handled sabre, the other with a pair of swords. For over twenty rounds they battled. Then the girl separated her blades and rode off. Peng Qi, eager for glory, gave chase. Ten Feet of Steel hung her swords on the pommel of her saddle. From inside her robe she pulled out a red lariat bearing twenty-four gold hooks. She let Peng Qi draw near, then suddenly twisted around and flung the rope. The noose landed squarely on him before he could ward it off, and he was dragged from his horse. Sun Li yelled a command, and his men rushed forward and grabbed the fallen rider.
Huyan, enraged, galloped to the rescue. Ten Feet of Steel clapped her steed and met him. The seething Huyan would have swallowed her down in one gulp, if he could. They battled more than ten rounds, Huyan increasingly frantic because he couldn't defeat the girl.
"What a spitfire," he fretted. "After all this fighting, she's still so tough!"
Impatiently, he feinted and let her close in, then raised his steel rods and started to bring them down. The swords were still in their resting place when the rod in Huyan's right hand was only a hair away from the girl's forehead. But Ten Feet of Steel was clear of eye and swift of hand. A sword sprang into her right fist, flew up and warded off the blow with a clang of metal and a shower of sparks.
The girl galloped back towards her own position. Huyan raced in pursuit. Sun Li promptly levelled his lance, intercepted Huyan and engaged him in fierce combat. Song Jiang moved up with his ten divisions and deployed them in battle formation. Ten Feet of Steel and her contingent, meanwhile, had ridden away down the slope.
Song Jiang was very pleased that Peng Qi the Eyes of Heaven General had been taken. He rode to the front to watch Sun Li and Huyan do battle. Sun Li sheathed his lance and went at Huyan with the steel rod ribbed like bamboo, which had been hanging from his wrist. Now, both were wielding rods of steel. Even their style of dress was similar. Sun Li wore a five cornered iron helmet bound in place by a red silk band around his forehead, a white-flowered black silk robe flecked with jade green, and darkly gleaming gold embossed armor. He rode a black stallion, and wielded a bamboo-shaped steel rod with dragon's eyes. Truly, a bolder picture than Yuchi Gong, that hero of old.
As to Huyan Zhuo, he wore a high pointed five-cornered helmet bound round the forehead by gold-flecked yellow silk, a black robe with sequins of seven stars, and darkly gleaming armor of over-lapping leaf. He rode the snowy-hoofed black stallion given him by the emperor, and wielded two octagonal steel rods polished bright as water. The one in his left hand weighed twelve catties, the one in his right thirteen. He indeed resembled his ancestor Huyan Zan.
Left and right over the field of combat they fought for more than thirty rounds, with neither man the victor.
When Han Tao saw Peng Qi captured, he quickly gathered the rear column and led them forward in a headlong rush. Song Jiang, afraid that they would break through, pointed his whip, and his ten commanders moved their divisions up to meet them, the last two spreading out in an enveloping pincers. Huyan hurriedly wheeled his columns around and each engaged their adversaries.
Why didn't the Liangshan warriors win total victory? Because of Huyan's "Armored Cavalry." Both horses and men wore chainmail. The battle steeds were draped to their hoofs, the soldiers protected to the eyes. Although Song Jiang's animals were equipped with some cover, this consisted mainly of red-tasseled net masks, copper bells, and plumes. The arrows sped by his archers were easily deflected by the chainmail. And all three thousand of Huyan's cavalry were armed with bows. They spewed flights of arrows which discouraged the men of Liangshan from coming any closer.
Song Jiang hastily had the horns sound the call to withdraw. Huyan also pulled his forces back twenty //i where they made camp.
The Song Jiang army encamped west of the mountain and settled their horses. At Song Jiang's command, his swordsmen hustled Peng Qi forward. Shouting for them to fall back, Song Jiang rose and untied his captive's bonds, then escorted him into the headquarters tent. He seated Peng Qi as a guest and kowtowed. Peng Qi at once returned the courtesy.
"I am your prisoner. By rights I should be killed. Why are you treating me with such courtesy, General?"
"Most of us are hunted men who have taken temporary shelter in the Marsh. The imperial court has sent you, General, here to arrest us. The proper thing for me would be to submit and be bound. But I fear for my life. And so I've criminally clashed with you. I beg your forgiveness for my presumptuousness."
"I have long known of your fraternal devotion and righteousness, of your aid to the endangered and your succor to the needy. But I never expected such chivalry! If you will spare my miserable life, I will serve you with every breath in my body!"
That day Song Jiang had the Eyes of Heaven General Peng Qi escorted to the mountain fortress to be introduced to Chao Gai and given refuge there. After rewarding his three armies, he conferred with his commanders on the military situation.

*

Meanwhile, Huyan Zhuo discussed with Han Tao how to vanquish Liangshan Marsh.
"Today, those louts moved forward in a quick covering action when they saw us coming at them," said Han Tao. "Tomorrow, we ought to hit them with our entire cavalry. That way, a big victory will be guaranteed."
"Exactly what I had in mind. I just wanted to make sure you agreed."
Huyan then ordered that all three thousand of the cavalry be stretched out in a single line, divided into troops of thirty, and that all the horses in each troop be connected together by chains. On nearing the foe, the men were to use arrows at a distance and their lances when they got close, and drive relentlessly ahead. The three thousand armored cavalry would become one hundred platoons, each locked in solid formation. Five thousand infantry would follow as support.
"Don't challenge them in person, tomorrow," Huyan admonished Han Tao. "You and I will stay behind with the reinforcements. When the fighting starts, we'll rush them from three sides."
It was decided they would go into action the next day at dawn. The following day Song Jiang set five troops of cavalry to the fore, backed by the ten divisions, with two contingents to left and right lying in ambush.
Qin Ming rode forth and challenged Huyan. But the imperial troops only shouted, and no one appeared. The five Liangshan cavalry units spread out in a line. Qin Ming was in the center, Lin Chong and Ten Feet of Steel were on the left, Hua Rong and Sun Li were on the right. The ten divisions under Song Jiang stood to the rear, a dense mass of men and horses. About a thousand imperial foot soldiers were arrayed opposite. Although they beat their drums and yelled, not a single man rode out to joust. Song Jiang grew suspicious. He quietly gave the order for his rear forces to withdraw, then rode up to Hua Rong's contingent to look.
Suddenly, a volley of cannon fire erupted from the opposite side. The thousand imperial foot soldiers separated into two sections and platoons of linked cavalry poured through in an enveloping three-sided phalanx. Arrows winged from both flanks. The middle bristled with long lances.
Startled, Song Jiang ordered his archers to reply. But how could they withstand this assault? Every animal in the thirty-horse platoons galloped together, unable to hold back even if it wanted to. From all over the hills and plains the linked cavalry charged.
Song Jiang's forward five cavalry units were thrown into a panic. They couldn't stem the tide. The rear divisions, also unable to make a stand, broke and ran. Song Jiang raced away on his horse, guarded by his ten commanders.
A platoon of imperial linked cavalry closed in after them. Li Kui, Yang Lin and their men rose out of their ambush in the reeds and drove them off. Song Jiang fled to the water's edge. Li Jun, Zhang Heng, Zhang Shun and the three Ruan brothers were waiting with war boats. Song Jiang hurriedly boarded one of craft and ordered them to rescue the chieftains and get them into the boats, quickly.
A platoon of linked cavalry rode right up to the river and showered the craft with arrows, but shields blocked the arrows and no one was hurt.
The boats were rowed hastily to Duck's Bill Shore, where everyone disembarked. In the fort there a count was made. They had lost more than half their effectives. Fortunately all of the chieftains had been saved, although several of their mounts had been killed.
Shortly thereafter, Shi Yong, Shi Qian, Sun Xin and Gu Dasao arrived. "The imperial infantry swarmed all over us," they reported. "They levelled our inns and houses. If our boats hadn't rescued us, we would have been captured."
Song Jiang consoled them and took stock of his commanders. Six had arrow wounds—Lin Chong, Lei Heng, Li Kui, Shi Xiu, Sun Xin and Huang Xin. Innumerable lesser chieftains had also been struck by arrows or otherwise wounded.
When Chao Gai learned of this, he came down the mountain with Wu Yong and Gongsun Sheng. They found Song Jiang frowning and depressed.
"Don't fret, brother," Wu Yong said soothingly. "Both victory and defeat are common fare for the soldier. Why worry? We'll work out a good plan to deal with that linked cavalry."
Chao Gai ordered the naval forces to strengthen the shore stockades, repair the boats, and guard the beaches day and night. He urged Song Jiang to return to the mountain stronghold and rest. But Song insisted on remaining at the fort on Duck's Bill Shore. He agreed only that the wounded commanders should go up and recuperate.

*

Huyan Zhuo went back to camp after his tremendous victory and had the linked horses unchained. Warriors came forward, one by one, to claim their commendations. They had slain countless numbers of the foe. More than five hundred prisoners had been taken, and over three hundred battle chargers. Huyan sent a messenger to the capital to report the glad tidings, and he richly rewarded his three columns.
Marshal Gao was holding court in his chancellery when word came from the gatehouse: "Huyan Zhuo has won a victory in his campaign against Liangshan Marsh. A messenger has brought the news."
The marshal was so delighted that he went to the imperial court early the next morning and, without waiting his turn, relayed the information. Extremely pleased, the emperor presented him with ten bottles of vintage wine bearing the imperial yellow seal, and a fine brocaded robe. He directed that an official deliver one hundred thousand strings of cash to Huyan's army. Bearing the imperial order, Gao returned to his chancellery and dispatched an official with the money.
On learning that an imperial emissary was coming, Huyan and Han Tao went twenty //to meet him. They brought him to the camp, accepted the emperor's reward with thanks, and served wine and entertained the emissary. He suggested that the rewards be distributed among the troops at once. He said he would wait until they had captured the brigand leaders, and then he would take them, in addition to the five hundred prisoners already rounded up, to the capital, where they would be paraded through the streets and punished.
"I don't see Peng Qi around," the emissary noted.
"In his eagerness to take Song Jiang, he plunged deep into enemy terrain and was captured," Huyan explained. "Those villains won't dare attack again, but we're going after them. We must eradicate their mountain fortress, sweep clean the marsh, capture the brigands and destroy their lair. Unfortunately, they're surrounded by water, and there are no roads leading in. We can see their forts in the distance, but the only way we can hit them is with long-range cannon. I have heard that in the Eastern Capital there's a cannon expert named Ling Zhen. He's known as Heaven-Shaking Thunder. He makes pieces with a range of fourteen to fifteen //i. When his stone cannon balls land, the earth and sky quake, mountains tumble and cliffs split asunder. If we can get him, we'll smash the bandits' lair. Ling Zhen is also very skilled with weapons. His archery and horsemanship are splendid. I wish you'd go back to the capital and speak to the marshal about this. Ask him to rush Ling Zhen out here, and we'll take the brigands' stronghold."
The emissary agreed, and set out the next day. Nothing happened on the road. On reaching the capital he went to see Gao and told him that Huyan requested cannoneer Ling Zhen so that he could perform a great deed. Gao issued a summons for Ling Zhen, who was assistant custodian of the imperial armory. Ling's ancestral home was in Yanling. In the Song Dynasty, he was the best cannoneer in the country, which was why he was known as Heaven-Shaking Thunder. Moreover, he was an excellent fighter with all kinds of weapons.
Ling Zhen reported to Marshal Gao, who commissioned him a commander of the army in the field and instructed him to ready his horse and arms and depart. Ling gathered the powder and explosives he needed, plus various types of cannon, stone balls and mountings, and loaded them on carts. Taking his armor, helmet, sabre and luggage, he left the Eastern Capital with thirty or forty soldiers and headed for Liangshan Marsh.
When he reached the camp he called first on Huyan, the commanding general, then on the leader of the van Han Tao. He inquired about the roads and paths distant and near the brigands' shore fort and the state of the cliffs guarding their mountain stronghold. Ling Zhen prepared three types of cannon—Fireball, Golden Wheel, and Mother and Sons. He had his soldiers assemble the mountings, brought his guns to the river bank, and primed them for action.
Song Jiang, in the Duck's Bill Shore fort, conferred with Wu Yong on how to achieve a break-through on the battlefield. But they could not think of anything.
A spy entered and reported: "The Eastern Capital has sent a cannoneer, Ling Zhen, Heaven-Shaking Thunder. He's set up guns near the river and he's getting ready to bombard our forts."
"It doesn't matter," said Wu Yong. "Our mountain stronghold is surrounded by a marsh which is full of creeks and ponds. It's a long way from the river. Even if he has guns that can reach the sky, he'll never hit it. We'll just abandon this fort on Duck's Bill Shore and let him shoot. Then we'll talk some more."
Song Jiang left the fort and returned to the mountain stronghold. Chao Gai and Gongsun Sheng escorted him to Fraternity Hall.
"How are we going to crack the enemy?" they asked.
Almost before the words were out of their mouths, they heard the boom of artillery at the foot of the mountain. Three cannon balls were fired. Two landed in the river. A third scored a direct hit on the Duck's Bill Shore fort.
Song Jiang watched glumly. The other leaders blanched.
"If Ling Zhen could be inveigled to the river we could nab him," said Wu Yong. "Then we could discuss what to do about the enemy."
"We'll send Li Jun, Zhang Heng, Zhang Shun and the three Ruan brothers in charge of six boats. Zhu Tong and Lei Heng will be on the opposite shore," said Chao Gai. And he told what each would do.
The six naval leaders received their orders and divided into two units. Li Jun and Zhang Heng took forty or fifty good swimmers in two fast craft and slipped across through the reeds. Backing them were Zhang Shun and the three Ruan brothers with another forty or so men in a fleet of small boats. On reaching the shore, Li Jun and Zhang Heng and their men, shouting and yelling, charged up to the cannon mountings and knocked them over.
Soldiers hurriedly reported this to Ling Zhen, who at once took two Fireball cannon and his lance, mounted his horse, and hastened to the scene with a thousand soldiers. Only then did Li Jun and Zhang Heng and their men leave. Ling Zhen chased them as far as the reedy shore, where a line of forty small craft, manned by a hundred or more sailors, were moored.
Li and Zhang went aboard, but didn't cast off. When Ling Zhen and his force came in sight, everyone on the boats shouted and jumped into the water.
Ling Zhen's men seized the boats. Zhu Tong and Lei Heng, on the opposite shore, began yelling and pounding drums. Ling Zhen ordered his soldiers to board the craft and go across and get them.
When the boats reached the middle of the river, Zhu Tong and Lei Heng struck a gong loudly. Forty or fifty swimmers rose from beneath the waves and pulled the plugs from sterns. Water flooded the craft. Strong hands capsized many of the boats, dumping the soldiers into the river.
Ling Zhen made haste to go back, but his craft's rudder had already been removed under water. Two of the chieftains clambered aboard. With one quick rock, they turned it bottom up. Ling Zhen landed in the water. He was grabbed by Ruan the Second from below and dragged ashore. There, other chieftains who were waiting had him bound and taken up the mountain.
Over two hundred soldiers were captured. More than half of the remainder had been drowned. The few who escaped with their lives reported to Huyan Zhuo. He hastily mustered his forces and galloped to the rescue. But the boats had already crossed to Duck's Bill Shore. It was too far for arrows. Besides, the raiders were gone.
All Huyan's fuming was to no avail. He could only return to his camp, seething with rage.

When word reached the stronghold that Heaven-Shaking Thunder Ling Zhen had been captured, Song Jiang and all the leaders went down to the second gate to meet him. Song Jiang personally untied his bonds.

"I told you to invite the commander courteously to call at our fortress," he said to his men reprovingly. "How could you behave so rudely?"
Ling Zhen kowtowed and thanked the leaders for not killing him. Song Jiang poured him a libation cup. Then, he took Ling Zhen by the hand and led him up to the fortress. Ling Zhen saw that Peng Qi had been made one of the chieftains. The cannoneer sealed his lips and said not a word. Peng Qi offered him some advice.
"Leaders Chao Gai and Song Jiang act righteously for Heaven, receiving bold fellows from all over. They are waiting only for an amnesty and acceptance into the emperor's forces so that they may serve the country. Since you and I are here, we should take their orders."
Song Jiang added a few courteous apologetic phrases.
"I can remain easily enough," said Ling Zhen. "My only concern is that my wife and mother are still in the Eastern Capital. When it's known about me, they're sure to be put to death. What can I do?"
"Rest easy in your mind," said Song Jiang. "In a few days we'll bring them here."
Ling Zhen thanked him. "You are too considerate. When I die I'll be able to close my eyes."
"Let a feast be laid in celebration," Chao Gai directed.
The next day there was a meeting of the leaders in Fraternity Hall. As they drank, Song Jiang discussed with them the problem of the linked cavalry. No one could think of how to cope with it. Finally, Gold-Coin Spotted Leopard Tang Long rose to his feet. "Though I have no talent, I'd like to suggest a plan," he said. "But we need a certain weapon and a cousin of mine."
"What kind of weapon and who's this cousin?" asked Wu Yong. Calmly, Tang Long clasped his hands together, stepped forward, and replied. And truly, from the capital of jade and gold, a man fabulous as a unicorn and bold as a lion was lured to captivity.

Now when Marshal Gao asked Twin Rods: "Who is it that you recommend for leading the attack?" the latter replied: "The man I refer to is district commander in Chenzhou. His name is Han Tao. He was originally from the Eastern Capital. He has passed the second grade military examinations. His weapon is a spear of jujube wood. They call him Victorious because he wins so often. He is just the man to lead the main attack. Another is the district commander of Yingzhou. He is called Peng Qi and hails from the Eastern Capital too. His family have been soldiers for generations. His weapon is a double-edged blade with three prongs. His martial skill is so outstanding they call him the Supremo. He can be second in the attack."
Marshal Gao was well satisfied with what he heard. "With these two leading the attack, we can forget about those brigands," he said. He immediately signed two orders prepared by the Chancellery and had the Council send messengers to ride post-haste to Victorious and the Supremo and order them to report with all speed to the capital. Within a short space of time the two commanders had arrived. They went straight to the Chancellery where they met Marshal Gao and Twin Rods. Next day Marshal Gao took them all to the imperial parade ground where they practised manoeuvres. After reviewing the troops, they returned to the Chancellery and met with members of the Council to discuss important military matters.
Marshal Gao asked: "How many troops do you have altogether, in your three armies?"
Twin Rods replied: "About five thousand cavalry, and if you include the foot soldiers perhaps as many as ten thousand."
Marshal Gao said: "I want all three of you to go back to your districts and choose another three thousand spirited cavalry and five thousand foot soldiers. Then you can start on your mission to destroy the bandits of the Marshes of Mount Liang."
Twin Rods said: "Our three armies of cavalry and foot are all hardened troops, tough soldiers and well-trained horses, you can have absolute confidence in us. But I am afraid we still lack some clothing and armour. I don't want to miss the deadline and fail to carry out our mission on time. Would you consider giving us a few weeks' grace?"
Marshal Gao said: "If that's your problem, you can go to the imperial armoury and choose whatever you like of clothing, armour, helmets and swords, no matter how much. I'll make out a requisition. It is essential that the troops should be fully equipped, in order to cope with the enemy. When you are ready to leave I will personally send someone to inspect you."
So Twin Rods took the order and went with the others to the imperial armoury to get the equipment. He took out three thousand suits of armour, five thousand sets of good leather guards for the horses, three thousand brass helmets, two thousand long spears, a thousand swords, an unspecified number of bows and arrows and more than five hundred iron cannon-balls. These were all loaded onto carts. Shortly before they were due to leave, Marshal Gao himself presented them with three thousand war-horses. Each of the three leaders was handsomely rewarded with silver and silk and their armies were fully provisioned. All three handed in written guarantees of victory, bade farewell to Marshal Gao and the other members of the Council, mounted their horses and rode off in the direction of Runing. Nothing worthy of note occurred on the journey.
Arriving back at his base, Twin Rods ordered the other two to return to their districts, muster their troops, and march back with them. In less than a fortnight the three armies were ready. Twin Rods now divided among them the items received from the government: clothing, armour, helmets, swords, banners, spears and saddles, and also some chain-mail that he had had made and some other items of weaponry. Now all that was needed was the order to march. Marshal Gao sent two officers from the Chancellery to inspect them. A bounty was distributed among the troops, and then Twin Rods marched them out of the city. Here's how it was:
The riders are wearing iron armour, their mounts are fitted with brass bells. Streaming banners fill the sky with colour, gleaming swords flash white for miles around. The curved bows are painted with magpies, sheaves shaped like flying fish are full of arrows. Eagle feathers decorate the panniers; lion-mouthed pots are tied on securely with leopard's tail thongs. Helmets deep enough to guard the nape and fringed with pearls leave only the eyes visible; the heavy armour of the horses, decked with tassels, exposes nothing but their legs. Those who will pioneer the route carry big axes, behind them come the fighting men with long spears. A thousand armoured cavalry leave the city. The three commanders are advancing on the Marshes.
They marched out of the city in formation, Victorious with the vanguard, Twin Rods leading the central force and the Supremo bringing up the rear. The three armies of cavalry and foot raced towards the Marshes of Mount Liang.
Advance scouts from Mount Liang returned to the stronghold and reported the event.
Chao Gai and Song Jiang, the military adviser Professor Wu Yong, his deputy the magician Taoist Gongsun and the rest were all in the Assembly Hall, occupied with day-long celebrations of Chai Jin's arrival, when they received the report: "Marshal Twin Rods Huyan Zhuo from Runing is approaching with an army to attack us."
Together they debated how to meet this attack. The Professor said: "I know of this character. He is a relation, a direct descendant in fact, of the famous general Huyan Zan, who made a name for himself at the founding of the dynasty. He's an experienced and valiant fighter. With his preferred weapon, the two rods, no one can get near him. We need a bold and resolute commander. We must first oppose him with force and then capture him by guile."
Before he'd finished speaking, Iron Ox said: "I'll go and capture the bastard for you."
Song Jiang said: "Who asked you to go? I've already got it worked out: we will ask Thunderclap to lead the first party, Leopard's Head Lin Chong the second, Colonel Hua the third, Steelbright the fourth, and Colonel Sun the fifth. These first five forces will attack in rotation, each moving subsequently to the rear. I myself with ten comrades and a large body of troops will follow in support. On my left I will have five commanders: Whiskers, Sergeant Lei, Mu the Unstoppable, the Tamer, and the Little Duke. On my right will be Morbid, Madcap, Golden Wings, the Flautist, and the Halberdier. We will ask the White-Water Dragon, the Pilot, White Eel and the three Ruan brothers to reinforce us by water in boats. Finally, Iron Ox and Panther will conceal themselves with two separate forces in reserve."
When Song Jiang had completed these dispositions, Thunderclap led the first force down the mountain to take up their position on a flat area of wasteland. Although it was winter the weather happened to be pleasantly warm. Nothing happened for a day, but then the government army was seen approaching. The advance guard led by Victorious encamped and built a palisade. They made no attempt to engage the enemy that evening.
At dawn the next day a roll of drums sounded three times from both camps and the troops formed up. Thunderclap now appeared on horseback resting his wolf's-tooth mace, riding out from the opening in the ranks which was marked by a gate of pennants. Victorious, leader of the advance guard with his long lance, reined in his horse and began to insult Thunderclap in ringing tones: "The imperial army is here. If you don't surrender quickly and still dare to resist, you'll really be asking for it! I am going to flatten your place in the bogs, I shall smash your Mount Liang to pieces and take you all alive, you rebel scum! I shall take you back to the capital to be cut into a thousand pieces!"
Now Thunderclap was not a patient man. He said no word in answer to all this but simply slapped his horse, whirled his mace and charged at Victorious. The latter likewise levelled his lance and galloped at Thunderclap. The two fought twenty bouts or more, till Victorious began to flag and tried to break off. By now Twin Rods and the main force had come up from behind and, seeing Victorious was in difficulties with Thunderclap, he galloped forward whirling his two rods. He was riding the horse the Emperor had given him, the snowy-footed raven-hued steed. Ranting and raving he rode out in front of his troops. But just as Thunderclap was about to attack him, the second contingent from Mount Liang arrived, led by Leopard's Head, who cried out to Thunderclap: "Time to take a break, General Qin, while I fight a few hundred bouts. I can manage this one!" Leopard's Head raised his halberd and charged Twin Rods. Thunderclap pulled his troops back from the left flank and withdrew up the slope to look on while Twin Rods fought with Leopard's Head. They were a perfect match. Halberd clashed prettily with rod, and rod elegantly parried halberd. They fought as many as fifty bouts and neither had the advantage.
Now the third detachment from Mount Liang arrived, under Colonel Hua, who shouted out under the gates: "Take a rest, Major Lin, and let me capture the bastard for you."
Leopard's Head withdrew his troops. Having seen the military prowess of Leopard's Head, Twin Rods also returned to his ranks. Leopard's Head wheeled his troops about and withdrew up the mountain, making way for Colonel Hua, who charged forward with levelled lance. By now the government rearguard had come up to relieve Twin Rods.
The Supremo, wielding his double-edged blade with three prongs, which also had four holes and eight rings, and mounted on his hundred-league bay charger rode forward out of the ranks and challenged Colonel Hua: "You miserable renegade! You're not fit for anything! Now you're going to feel the strength of my arm!"
Colonel Hua was too angry to reply. He merely urged his horse forward to encounter the Supremo. They fought more than twenty bouts. Twin Rods saw that the Supremo's strength was beginning to fail, so he gave his horse its head, whirled his rods and charged Colonel Hua. Before they had had three bouts the fourth Mount Liang detachment arrived, led by the woman warrior Steelbright. She shouted: "Time for you to take a rest, Colonel Hua! I'm going to get that bastard!"
Colonel Hua pulled his troops out to the right and withdrew to the mountain slopes. But before the Supremo had time to engage Steelbright, the fifth Mount Liang detachment under Colonel Sun arrived. Colonel Sun reined in his horse and lined up his troops to watch the contest between Steelbright and the Supremo. The two of them had disappeared in a baleful cloud of dust. One fought with a blade on a long pole, the other with two swords. When they had fought more than twenty bouts, Steelbright put up her two swords, turned her horse and rode away. The Supremo, thinking to snatch glory, galloped in pursuit. Steelbright now hung the two swords on her saddlebow and from beneath her robe took out a red cotton lasso with twenty four metal hooks attached to it. She waited until the Supremo had almost caught her up, then turned in the saddle and let fly with the lasso. Her aim was perfect and before the Supremo could even raise his arm he was dragged from his horse. Colonel Sun ordered his troops forward immediately to take the Supremo captive.
Twin Rods was livid. He rode furiously to the rescue. Slapping her horse Steelbright rode to meet him. Twin Rods was prepared to eat her alive. But after twenty bouts he still wasn't able to get the better of her. He said to himself: "This bloody amazon has stood up to me for I don't know how many bouts. She is really something!" Increasingly desperate, he resorted to a trick: he allowed her to come in and then tried to hammer down on her with the two rods. Her two swords were still inactive as the rod in his right hand began to descend towards the crown of her head. But so sharp of eye was she and quick of hand that in a flash she was parrying with the swords. Her right hand went flying upwards, so that the rod came crashing down only to meet the blade of the sword with a great clang, sparks flying in all directions.
Steelbright turned her horse and galloped back to her own side. Twin Rods galloped in pursuit. Colonel Sun levelled his lance, urged on his horse and charged towards him. Behind him Song Jiang and his ten picked leaders had arrived and were deploying their forces. Steelbright retired with her troops to the mountain slope. Song Jiang was delighted when he heard they had captured the Supremo and he came to the front to watch the combat between Colonel Sun and Twin Rods.
Colonel Sun with his lance and with the jointed steel rod hanging from his wrist, galloped to encounter Twin Rods. They both fought with the rods, a form of combat at which both were equally skilled. Colonel Sun wore a cross-barred helmet, a scarlet silk headcloth, and a black robe studded with jade green decorations. His gilt armour had a blackish sheen to it and the horse he rode was a piebald. Wielding his "tiger's eye" rods, jointed like bamboo, he outshone the heroes of olden days.
Twin Rods had a great spiked helmet, a golden headcloth and a black robe studded with the seven stars. He had a black armoured vest and rode his famous black charger with white socks. He wielded his two octagonal rods of especially hardened steel. The one in his left hand weighed twelve catties and the one in his right hand thirteen. He was the very image of his famous ancestor. The two of them traded blows there in front of the armies. They fought more than thirty bouts and there was nothing to choose between them. Song Jiang could not stop applauding.

Each on a piebald strong as a dragon,
Twin Rods versus Colonel Sun;
The skill of each is truly a marvel, they'll Kill each other before they're done!

Among the government forces, Victorious now heard that the Supremo had been defeated. He mustered his troops, who were bringing up the rear, and charged forward. Song Jiang, to prevent his breaking through, pointed with his whip and the ten leaders, with a mixed body of men, quickly deployed in defence. The four detachments behind formed into two halves and mounted a pincer movement. When he saw this, Twin Rods hastily wheeled his forces round so they could face the attack on both sides.
Why could the Mount Liang forces not win this battle outright? Well the force commanded by Twin Rods consisted of what is called "linked cavalry." The horses bore leather armour and the men wore chain-mail. The horses' armour left only their hooves showing, while the men's chain-mail allowed only their eyes to be seen. Although Song Jiang did have some armoured cavalry they were equipped with no more than red-tasseled masks and brass bells and pheasants' feathers and the like. There was no way this could give them protection against arrows. Twin Rods' three thousand cavalry were all equipped with bows and loosed off arrows, so their adversaries dared not close with them. Song Jiang hurriedly gave the signal to withdraw. Twin Rods likewise retreated some six or seven miles and pitched camp.
Song Jiang marshalled his troops and retired to the western slopes of the mountain where they halted and made camp. At his orders, his bodyguards brought in the Supremo, clustering closely around him. Song Jiang immediately stood up and ordered them back. After untying the bonds himself he led the Supremo into his tent and gave him the guest's seat. Then he prostrated himself. The Supremo hastily returned the compliment, saying: "I am a prisoner. I should expect to die. Why, sir, do you treat me like an honoured guest?"
Song Jiang said: "It is only because we have nowhere else to shelter that we have temporarily occupied the marshes. We are forced to take refuge there for a while, the times being so evil. The Emperor has sent you to arrest us. By rights we should surrender to you, but that would be to give away our lives. We are guilty of opposing you and have caused you much offence. I entreat you to forgive us."
The Supremo replied: "I have long known of your loyalty and humanity, how you help those who are in danger and relieve those in distress, but this is generosity beyond all expectation. If you should choose to spare my worthless life, then in recompense I must devote myself entirely to your service."
Song Jiang said: "We all confidently await the Emperor's pardon. We hope for an amnesty which will allow us to offer our services to the country, in defence of which we will not flinch from ten thousand deaths." As the poem says:

Because such greedy officials abound,
These loyal brothers go to ground.
If they weren't all loyal and lovers of right,
Why would the hundred and eight unite?

The same day Song Jiang had the Supremo taken up to the stronghold and presented to Chao Gai. He stayed there in the camp. The three armies and all the leaders were rewarded and the military situation was discussed.
As for Twin Rods, he withdrew to the camp and conferred with Victorious as to how they could overcome the forces of Mount Liang. Victorious said: "Did you see when we pushed forward today how eager those bastards were to attack us? Tomorrow we must attack with massed cavalry and we can be sure of victory."
Twin Rods said: "That's what I was going to do. I just wanted to make sure we are in agreement."
Accordingly he gave the order. "Tell the three thousand cavalry to form up in ranks of thirty, linked together with iron rings. When they encounter the enemy they are to set up long range fire with arrows; when they close they must charge with spears. Divide the three thousand armoured cavalry into a hundred linked units. The five thousand infantry will follow in support. Tomorrow there must be no retreating. You and I will clean up behind. If we are attacked we will take up a three-sided formation and charge."
So the plan was made and the next day they marched out at dawn to do battle.
Song Jiang next day organized his cavalry with five divisions in front, ten commanders bunched together behind them and two concealed divisions, left and right. Thunderclap was first in the field. But when he challenged Twin Rods, the only response from the opposing army was a loud cheer. They did not offer to engage. The five leading divisions now spread out in a straight line. Thunderclap was in the centre, Leopard's Head and Steelbright on the left and Colonel Hua and then Colonel Sun on the right. Soon Song Jiang arrived with the other ten, in tightly massed ranks of cavalry. Opposing them they could see around a thousand infantry, beating drums and shouting, but not a single cavalryman rode out to do battle. Song Jiang was greatly troubled by what he saw. Quietly he gave the order: "Tell our rearguard to withdraw." Then he rode over to Colonel Hua's position to observe from there. Suddenly a series of reports were heard from the enemy front ranks. The ranks of the infantry immediately parted and out rode the linked cavalry in a three-sided formation. They advanced, volleying arrows from the two sides and with levelled lances in the centre. Desperately Song Jiang ordered his troops to fire back. But they could offer no serious resistance. All the horses in the linked units of thirty had to gallop forward together; there was no chance for anyone to hold back.
The linked cavalry filled the whole field of battle. And still they came charging on. Song Jiang's five leading divisions were thrown into utter confusion and could not stick to their plan. The large group of cavalry behind them could not make a stand and all ran for their lives. Song Jiang galloped off, surrounded by his ten commanders. A unit of linked cavalry was hard on his heels, when the troops hidden in the reedbeds — led by Iron Ox and Panther — charged out to the rescue. Song Jiang's forces retreated as far as the water, where the six water leaders — the White-Water Dragon, the Pilot, White Eel, and the Ruan brothers — were waiting. Six war boats were drawn up ready. Song Jiang hurriedly embarked and ordered each captain to go under his own steam to rescue the other leaders and get them on board. Having continued the pursuit up to the water's edge, the linked cavalry set up a barrage of arrows. But the boats were protected by shields, so these caused no casualties.
The boats were now hurriedly rowed across to Duck's-Bill Landing, where everyone disembarked. In the waterside camp the troops were counted. There had been heavy losses, but fortunately all the leaders were safe. Although some had had their horses killed, they had escaped themselves.
In a little while the Guv, the Flea, Blackface and Auntie Gu all came racing up the mountain and said: "Their infantry are attacking now. They've practically demolished the inn. But for the signal boat we would have been captured."
Song Jiang comforted each of them. When they checked all the leaders it was found that six of them had been wounded by arrows: Leopard's Head, Sergeant Lei, Iron Ox, Madcap, Blackface and the Tamer. Of the men, countless numbers had received arrow wounds. When Chao Gai heard, he came down the mountain with the Professor and Taoist Gongsun to find out more. Song Jiang's brows were knit in an unremitting frown, his expression deeply gloomy. The Professor did his best to reassure him: "No point in grieving, brother. Victory and defeat are part and parcel of the soldier's trade. What's the good of moaning? We've got to think of a new plan to overcome the linked cavalry."
Chao Gai now issued the following order: "The water-borne troops are to strengthen their defences and secure their boats, defend the landing place and keep watch day and night. Song Jiang is to go up the mountain to rest."
But Song Jiang refused to go. He remained in the camp at Duck's-Bill Landing, and instead ordered the wounded leaders to be taken up the mountain to recuperate.
Twin Rods, after his great victory, returned to camp. The linked cavalry were disconnected and came forward in turn to ask for their reward. Countless numbers of the enemy had been killed, more than five hundred taken alive, more than three hundred war-horses seized. Accordingly Twin Rods sent someone to the capital to report the victory, whilst he distributed rewards to the three armies.
Marshal Gao was presiding in his chancellery when it was reported: "General Huyan has had a great victory over the forces of Mount Liang. He has sent someone with the report." Gao was delighted with the news. Next day at dawn he hurried off to tell the Emperor, without even waiting his turn. The Emperor was exceedingly well-pleased. He graciously bestowed on Gao ten bottles of yellow seal imperial wine and a fine embroidered robe. He also ordered an official to carry a hundred thousand strings of cash to the army camp to divide among the troops. Marshal Gao returned to the chancellery with the imperial edict and duly dispatched someone with the reward.
When Twin Rods heard that an envoy from the Emperor was on the way, he and Victorious rode out several miles to meet him. When they had brought him back to the camp and expressed thanks for the great favours received, they entertained him with wine. Victorious was told to distribute the money among the troops, and the five hundred captives were ordered to be brought, so their heads could be cut off and sent to the capital, as evidence of what had been achieved.

The emissary inquired: "How did you come to lose Colonel Peng?"
Twin Rods said: "He was so eager to capture Song Jiang that he attacked deep behind the enemy lines and got taken himself. But those bandits won't dare show themselves again. I shall press home the attack however. It is essential to clear out the mountain stronghold and sweep the marshes clean. We're going to capture the whole lot of them and wipe out the nest of vipers. The problem is there's water on every side of them and no access by road. You can view their defences from a distance but the only way to get rid of them is to bombard them with cannon and smash that thieves' den to pieces. I have heard that in the capital there is a famous gunner called Ling Zhen, also known as Thunderer, from the sound of his guns. He's an expert with cannon, and can throw a shell fifteen miles or more. Wherever his shells fall they cause huge devastation. If we can get him, we'll pound their stronghold. He's even an expert in martial arts, and can handle a bow or a horse brilliantly. When Your Excellency returns to the capital, please acquaint the Marshal with this matter and ask if this man can be sent to us as a matter of urgency, so we can capture the thieves' den within the time-limit."
The emissary agreed to start next day. Nothing worth telling occurred on the journey. Back in the capital he went to see Marshal Gao and told him about Twin Rods' request for the master gunner Ling Zhen and about the contribution he was to make. Marshal Gao immediately issued an order instructing the master gunner Ling Zhen to report to him.
This Ling Zhen was in fact a native of Yanling. He was the top gunner of the Song Dynasty. People called him Thunderer. In addition he was an expert in martial arts.

City walls crumble when he opens fire;
Ghosts, gods grieve as the smoke mounts higher.
His explosions set the heavens aflame.
Four hundred provinces know his name.

When Thunderer reported to Marshal Gao, he received his commission, with orders to requisition horses and all necessary equipment and get going. So he got together the necessary guns and ammunition, with explosives of every kind. The cannon-balls and guns were loaded onto carts. He equipped himself with suitable clothing and armour, a helmet and a sword. Then with all his luggage and equipment and with thirty or forty troops he left the capital and took the road to Mount Liang. On arrival he went first to see Twin Rods, then he saw Victorious, leader of the vanguard. He found out all he could about the camp in the marshes, distances and routes, and the inaccessible parts of the mountain stronghold. He chose three kinds of missile for the bombardment. The first were wind shells, the second gold wheel shells and the third shrapnel shells. First he had the soldiers secure the guns to their carriages. These were set up on the water's edge and prepared for firing.
Now in the smaller camp at Duck's-Bill Landing, Song Jiang and the Professor had been discussing how to regain the initiative, but they could find no workable plan. Then a scout reported: "They've sent a master gunner from the capital. He's called Ling Zhen or Thunderer. He's been setting up his guns at the edge of the water. They're preparing to bombard us and break down our defences."
"That's not too serious," said the Professor. "We're surrounded by water, there are many channels and the Place of Many Meanderings is set back from the water a long way. So even if they had cannon that would shoot down the sky, they'd hardly be able to hit us. Let us evacuate the little camp at Duck's-Bill Landing, and wait and see what they can manage with their guns. After that we'll make up our minds what to do."
Song Jiang gave the order to evacuate the little camp at once. Everyone moved up the mountain. Chao Gai and Taoist Gongsun received them in the Assembly Hall. "But what's your plan for defeating the enemy?" they asked.
The question was scarcely out before an explosion was heard down below. Three guns had been fired in rapid succession. Two of the shots fell in the water, but one hit the camp at Duck's-Bill Landing, spreading gloom in Song Jiang's heart and causing the others to turn pale.
The Professor said: "If someone could tempt Thunderer down to the water's edge, we could capture him. Then we'd be able to work out how to defeat the enemy."
Chao Gai said: "Then let the White-Water Dragon, the Pilot, White Eel and the Ruan brothers row over and put this plan into action, supported by Whiskers and Sergeant Lei on land."
When the six boat captains had received their orders they formed into two parties. The White-Water Dragon and the Pilot went first, with some fifty troops who were good swimmers in two fast boats. Stealthily the boats glided out from the reeds, and behind them a second group led by White Eel and the Ruan brothers with forty or more small boats. When the White-Water Dragon and the Pilot reached the other shore they charged at the guns with wild shouts and overturned them.
The gunners immediately reported this to Thunderer. Thunderer got two cannon with wind shells, loaded them onto horses and raced to the scene with a thousand troops. The White-Water Dragon and the Pilot then withdrew with their men. Thunderer pursued them as far as the reedbeds on the edge of the water, where he found forty or more small boats drawn up in a straight line, manned by several hundred sailors. White-Water Dragon and the Pilot had already escaped to their boats, but these boats had deliberately not rowed away. When they saw the enemy the crews gave a great cheer and all dived into the water. As Thunderer's troops were about to attack the boats, Whiskers, Sergeant Lei and their troops began shouting and beating drums on the opposite bank. Thunderer seized a lot of the boats and ordered all his men to board them and attack the enemy on the other side. When the boats were right out in the middle of the water, Whiskers and Sergeant Lei on the other bank beat gongs, and fifty sailors rose from the depths and grabbing the boats by the stern pulled out the bungs, so that the water rushed in. They then capsized them, flinging all the troops into the water. Thunderer tried desperately to turn back but his boat's rudder had been torn off and sent to the bottom. The two leaders now surfaced on either side of his boat and tilting it suddenly hurled him out. Ruan the second was waiting for him underwater. He embraced him and dragged him out onto the other bank, where the leaders were ready to receive him. They trussed him up securely and carried him off to the mountain. Two hundred enemy troops were plucked alive from the water, about half the force drowned, and only a few escaped with their lives and returned to base.

Why did they let those crews get away?
Why not use their guns like they ought to?
Of their thunderous barrage we've nothing to say.
More lethal are storms in a few feet of water.

When Twin Rods heard what had happened, he rushed there with his troops. But the boats had all disappeared into Duck's-Bill Landing. It was too far for arrows to carry, and anyway there was no one to be seen. He had to swallow his anger. He stood there fuming for a long time, but in the end had to withdraw.
The leaders took Thunderer up the mountain, sending someone on ahead to report to Song Jiang. Song Jiang and the other leaders went down as far as the second gate to receive them. When he saw Thunderer, Song Jiang hurriedly loosed his bonds with his own hands and blamed everyone, saying: "I told you to invite the commander politely to come and see us, why have you treated him in such an unmannerly fashion?"
Thunderer prostrated himself in gratitude for their sparing his life. Having given him a cup of wine, Song Jiang took him by the hand and invited him up the mountain. When they reached the main stronghold and he saw that the Supremo had become one of the outlaws' leaders, Thunderer was rendered speechless.
The Supremo reassured him: "Chao Gai and Song Jiang are obedient to heaven's will. They welcome good men here and strive for the nation's peace. Since we are here it behoves us to obey them."
Song Jiang also reassured him and he replied: "I would have no objection to staying and serving you. But my mother and wife are still in the capital, if people there get wind of this, I am afraid they will be executed. So what am I to do?"
Song Jiang said: "There's nothing to worry about. In a few days' time we will send you back."
Thunderer thanked him and said: "Such is your kindness, I shall die content."
Chao Gai said: "This calls for a celebration."
Next day a grand assembly of all the leaders was held in the hall. While they ate and drank, Song Jiang and the other leaders discussed how to defeat the linked cavalry. They were getting nowhere, when Spots stood up and said: "I have no qualifications to speak, but I would like to propose a solution. The linked cavalry can only be broken by a weapon which a good friend of mine possesses."
"What's this weapon you say we could use, my friend?" the Professor asked. "And who's this good friend of yours?" Spots explained, taking his time and with his hands crossed respectfully in front of him. And the answer to these questions was to have important consequences: several leaders will make the journey to the capital, and more than three thousand cavalry will meet an evil genius. Truly, there was to be:

A plan to steal the Unicorn from the jade city;
A plot to grab the fabled beast in the golden palace.

"WHOM do you recommend as the commander for the vanguard?" asked Marshall Gao Qiu.
Huyan Zhuo replied, "I have confidence in Colonel Han Tao at Chenzhou. He is a Shandong man and is skilled in all military strategy. His nickname is 'Ever Victorious General.' Another fine man is Colonel Peng Qi at Yingzhou. He comes from Kaifeng and all his ancestors have been military men. He is also skilled in strategy and has the nickname of 'Heavenly Eyes General.'"
Marshall Gao Qiu was much pleased at this, and immediately had dispatches prepared for those two Colonels to come to the capital at once. Within a few days they duly arrived and had interviews with Gao Qiu and Huyan Zhuo, and were promoted to their new posts. They discussed plans for the coming campaign against Liangshan Marsh. They had altogether five thousand cavalry, and five thousand infantry. Gao Qiu ordered that three thousand cavalry and five thousand infantry be sent to the front at once.
Huyan Zhuo, however requested several days' postponement of the start of the expedition as the troops were not well equipped.
Gao Qiu gave them permission to draw freely from the Imperial stores at the capital for whatever armor, etc. were required. They must make all arrangements, and when they were ready to leave for the front he would dispatch a staff officer to inspect the troops, and report direct to himself.
Huyan Zhuo visited the ammunition depots, and dispatched large quantities of war materials including five hundred rockets. Before their departure Gao Qiu gave them three thousand more battle steeds, and also many presents in silver and gold.
The General and his two Colonels then distributed their supplies of equipment, and had everything ready and within half a month their troops were assembled at Runing Prefecture. Two staff officers arrived from the Capital to inspect and encourage the troops. After a general parade the armies were mobilized towards Liangshan Marsh.
The bandit scouts duly reported the arrival of the troops, and a council of war was held by the leader of Liangshan Marsh.
"I have heard of the great fame of this General Huyan Zhuo," said Wu Yong,"this is a man not to be slighted. We must employ our bravest men in the first battle and afterwards we can try strategy."
Li Kui here interposed, "I will go to capture that fellow."
"How can you go?" said Song Jiang. "I have a plan. We must fight the battle with five detachments in turn; first, General Qin Ming; second, Lin Chong; third, Hua Rong; fourth, Hu San Niang; fifth, Sun Li. They must follow each other in that rotation so that each will have a rest between bouts." He then announced how he himself and other ten leaders would be divided into three parts. He then gave orders where the bandits should proceed to and await the attack.
On the following day the enemy came in view, but they had not all taken up their position before it was evening. Early the next morning the drums were beaten, and both armies were on parade. General Qin Ming rode forward with his heavy mace. General Huyan Zhuo spoke, "This is the Imperial army, and you had better surrender at once. If you refuse to do so then your body will be hacked up into thousand pieces. I am going to wipe out the nest of bandits here. Many will be killed, and all the rest will be captured and sent as prisoners to the Capital."
General Qin Ming took no notice of this, but advanced waving his mace. Colonel Han Tao accepted the challenge, and rode out to meet Qin Ming. They fought for some time without any result, and then Han Tao retired.
The next combatants were General Huyan Zhuo and Lin Chong. After about fifty bouts these two retired.
Then came Hua Rong who fought about twenty bouts with Colonel Peng Qi.
These were followed by Hu San Niang who fought against Colonel Peng Qi for about twenty bouts and then she retired. Peng Qi thought that he had won so he pursued her. She, however, only put aside her sword, and now took a long red rope with numerous hooks. She waited until Peng Qi was quite close, and then suddenly turning in her saddle she cast the rope, caught Peng Qi, and pulled him off his horse. Sun Li was quite close, and he galloped forward with a few men and took Peng Qi captive.
General Huyan Zhuo was very angry at this trick, and rushed forward to engage Hu San Niang himself. But after ten bouts he found that he could not overcome her. He decided to beat her by a trick. He waited until she rushed at him, and met her with an iron whip in each hand, and used both at the same moment. She parried both blows with her swords—the swords met the whips with a loud crash, throwing off sparks—and she rode away unhurt. He pursued her on horseback, but was intercepted by Sun Li who fought with him. These two fought for about thirty bouts. Han Tao now gave orders for a general advance, and upon seeing this movement Song Jiang issued similar orders to his men. The troops of General Huyan Zhuo were all well protected by armor, and the only exposed spots were their eyes. The bandits now shot arrows, but did no damage on the enemy because of the armor. But when the two thousand archers of General Huyan Zhuo discharged their arrows they took effect on the bandits who had not the armor. Song Jiang seeing the position ordered a general retreat. Upon reaching their camp they stopped, and Song Jiang sent for the prisoner Peng Qi. Upon reaching his tent Song Jiang himself unbound the ropes on the prisoner, and invited him to sit down.
"I am your prisoner," replied Colonel Peng Qi, "and am quite ready for death. But why are you treating me like this?"
"As we have no safe place to live in," replied Song Jiang, "we have to take our position at Liangshan Marsh for the time being. When the Emperor sent you here to capture us, we would have surrendered if we were not afraid that we should all be killed. Therefore we are forced to fight against you. It is quite unintentional that we oppose your power, and we must plead for your mercy."
"For a long time I have heard of your love for justice and benevolence," replied Peng Qi, "and that you are always assisting those in distress. Now I know as a fact that your chivalry is real. If you now spare my life I shall be extremely grateful to you."
That day Song Jiang sent Peng Qi to Chao Gai at Liangshan Marsh where he was to be quartered, but treated well.
Upon General Huyan Zhuo reaching the camp he discussed with Han Tao what steps should be taken to defeat the bandits.
"Today," said Colonel Han Tao, "the brigands felt the effect of our advancing army so they retreated. Tomorrow we must pursue them, with all our cavalry and defeat them completely."
General Huyan Zhuo agreed that that must be done. He accordingly issued orders that the following day three thousand cavalry must be linked up in small rings of thirty each. They were to wait until the bandits were close, and then rush forward with spears. These 100 squadrons of cavalry should be supported by five thousand infantry. There would be no single combats, and the General and Colonel Han Tao would take up their position in the rear instead of in front of the army.
